"I am a working mother who rushes daily to work from 09.15–16.30 in London and my timings are key as my children are in nursery and cannot be dropped any earlier than 08.00 or fetched any later than 18.00."

She talked about having to catch the 08.39 train, which gets in 15 minutes later than the previous train used to:

"Fifteen minutes is an age in the life of any commuter, but for one in my position, working set, reduced hours who has no option to stay later or come in later it is nothing short of a disaster."

It is not only individuals who are suffering. Businesses are suffering, too. Macrovision, a business in my constituency, wrote to First Great Western to say:

"I do not believe that First Great Western Link has adequately considered the impact of this timetable change, as it is hugely important for the economy of Maidenhead and to the people who live and work there."

Hutchison 3G, which now employs some 1,400 people on its site in Maidenhead, deliberately sited its building close to the railway station so that it could support the sustainability agenda by encouraging people to use public transport. It says:

"One of the key factors in locating our offices in Maidenhead were the excellent train links that this provided for our employees, many of whom live in London, and for our business associates who regularly travel to Maidenhead for meetings . . . The effects of this change will make retention of our London based employees more difficult and increase the amount of time taken for our employees and business associates to travel to and from meetings and their homes."

Thames Valley chamber of commerce describes

"the slow stopping train, akin to the milk train service, creating the image of a sleepy backwater town", and says that

"the effect on Maidenhead's economy, and that of the Thames Valley, will be weakened by new businesses thinking twice of relocating due to its worsening rail links in and out of London."

Why has all this come about? It cannot be that very few people use these services. Indeed, in response to a question that I put to the Minister of State, Department for Transport, the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. McNulty), he replied on 19 January that, in the nine months from April to December last year, there were more than 2,300,000 passenger journeys to and from Maidenhead, and more than 760,000 passenger journeys to and from Twyford. No, the Strategic Rail Authority made a decision to merge the franchises of First Great Western and Thames Trains into a single franchise, to put the emphasis on increasing the punctuality of long-distance services, and to move the commuter services from Maidenhead and Twyford from the fast line to the slow line. This has resulted in the creation of a timetable that has reduced the number of fast and semi-fast services to and from Paddington, and many journeys are now significantly slower than they used to be.

First Great Western Link, in its response to many people on this issue, is very clear about the role of the Strategic Rail Authority in this decision. It stated that any train operator bidding for the franchise would have had to deliver the same objectives. These included:

"To implement a timetable that would address overcrowding issues"— something of an irony, given that the overcrowding has now increased as a result of the timetable changes—and

"To reduce the number of services running in this area, (although at the same time increasing capacity on the remaining services). This is in line with the Strategic Rail Authority's view that less trains on this congested network would increase punctuality."

I have to tell the Minister that having fewer trains on this network has not increased punctuality; it has severely reduced punctuality. There are significant delays for passengers, and, moreover, longer journey times have been created. The Strategic Rail Authority's decision has not had the impact that it was intended to have.

First Great Western and, at the time when it announced the timetable changes, the Strategic Rail Authority, seem to have had a rather different opinion. It is very galling for my constituents to suffer such a deterioration in rail service while hearing on local radio, and seeing in advertisements and flyers from First Great Western, that the service is of benefit to customers and has improved. In December 2003, when the Strategic Rail Authority announced the timetable changes, it headed the announcement "Franchise Decision Means Big Improvements". It then listed a number of improvements that were all to services for Reading and the west.

Right at the end, the announcement said

"The new timetable means some increases in peak journey times on trains between London and Slough, Maidenhead and Twyford".

Some increases in peak journey times, indeed. It means that the service is now not providing those semi-fast services through to Paddington, but is causing considerable difficulty to commuters who—as I said earlier—are late for appointments and meetings, unable to juggle their child-care arrangements with their travelling arrangements, and suffering not only a severely reduced service but a very unpleasant experience on many trains owing to the present overcrowding.

Sadly, the Government have also taken the view that there is overall benefit in the new timetable. When I asked the Minister of State what response the Department for Transport had made to representations regarding the timetable changes, he replied

"The Department's response to representations related to the December 2004 timetable changes is that they deliver wider benefits through improvements to punctuality across the First Great Western and First Great Western Link franchises."—[Official Report, 24 January 2005; Vol. 430, c. 37W.]

I reiterate to the Minister that that is not what is happening to my constituents and those who travel to my constituency from elsewhere. They are not seeing benefits and improvements; all they are seeing is a reduced and deteriorating service.

Where can we go from here? I urge the Minister to consider three stages—three sets of decisions that can be made. First, I hope that First Great Western will continue to look at the timetable, make immediate further changes to the timetable that is currently operating, and increase the number of carriages on some of the trains, not just so that services can be improved in terms of time but so that the dangerous levels of overcrowding from which many are suffering can be reduced. That is the immediate need.

Secondly, the Minister will know that later this week Network Rail will hold its timetabling conference, which will set the timetable not for later in the summer but for 2006—that is, from December 2005 to December 2006. That timetable needs to make the changes that are needed to ensure that we return to the level of service that we experienced when Thames Trains was in charge. We certainly need services to be returned to the fast line rather than being shunted on to the slow line if we are to see the service that people need and deserve from an economically vibrant part of the country and an important economic hub in the south-east—namely an important part of the Thames valley.

This is the third aspect that I want the Minister to consider. The current franchise runs out in April 2006. Later this year, decisions will be made about the franchisee for the 10-year period after that. There is a slight difficulty over that process. It is being started by the Strategic Rail Authority—which, of course, is being abolished by the Government—and will be finished by the Department for Transport. I urge the Department to ensure that the franchise specification for these services returns us to the level of service that was available to my constituents before First Great Western took over the merged franchise in April 2004. Only a return to that level of service will ensure that my constituents in Maidenhead, Twyford, Cookham, Wargrave and Furze Platt and others who use those services will be able to enjoy the sort of service that is needed. That will ensure not only that they can carry on with their lives working in London, Reading or round about, but that we can retain the economic vibrancy of that important part of the Thames valley.

I urge the Minister to look seriously at the issues that I have raised. This is not simply about one or two people grumbling that their trains are late. It is a significant issue for my constituents and others. They have seen a severe reduction in service.

The Government want people to be able to enjoy a better work-life balance. They want sustainability and to encourage people on to public transport. All those agendas are being reversed through the action of the Strategic Rail Authority in merging the franchise, in requiring fewer trains to be put on and in putting trains for commuters on the slow lines. People are now getting into their cars rather than using the trains. That is not what the Government want. It is not what I want. I want a good level of rail service to Maidenhead, Twyford and the other stations in my constituency. I urge the Minister to look seriously at taking the action that is necessary through the agencies available to the Government to ensure that the timetable for 2006 is better and that the franchise arrangements return us to the level of service that Maidenhead, Twyford and the rest of my constituency not only need but deserve.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Charlotte Atkins): I congratulate the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) on securing this debate and on providing an opportunity for the House to discuss rail services to Maidenhead and Twyford. There are regular direct rail services from both stations to London Paddington. A branch line to Marlow leaves the main line at Maidenhead and one to Henley-on-Thames leaves it at Twyford. Both branch lines have been proposed for designation as community railways under the strategy published by the Strategic Rail Authority in November 2004.

The new timetable introduced on 12 December 2004 is a fully integrated timetable covering both First Great Western and First Great Western Link. It is the most radical restructuring of services into London Paddington for more than a decade. The intended benefits of the new timetable include improved performance, increased capacity, reduced overcrowding and a clearer and more focused management approach to platform capacity at Paddington and Reading.

Before the timetable change in December 2004, there were 12 services between Maidenhead and London Paddington between 7 am and 10 am. There are now 17. The number of weekday services from Twyford to London Paddington between 7 am and 10 am was 13, and that has increased under the December timetable to 18 direct services. From London Paddington to Twyford between 4 pm and 7 pm, there are now 15 direct services, and between London Paddington and Maidenhead, 17 direct services, compared with 13 and 15 respectively before the timetable changes.

Both First Great Western Link and the Strategic Rail Authority are closely monitoring the performance of the new timetable to ensure that it meets its objectives, but it is too early yet to draw any meaningful conclusions.

Commuter operators are required to carry out passenger counts to demonstrate that adequate capacity is provided to accommodate the passengers expected throughout the morning and evening peak periods. That ensures that franchise operators properly address the issue of capacity requirements in peak periods, while accepting the reality that this is a walk-on service and forecasting demand in advance is not an exact science. Train operators must agree with the SRA a timetable and train plan, showing the proposed allocation of rolling stock to services, as necessary to comply with a contractual limit on overcrowding.

Train operators are subject to financial penalties if they provide less than the agreed capacity. There are specified levels of overcrowding in peak periods that train operators should not exceed. They are 4.5 per cent. above capacity for either peak in isolation, or 3 per cent. for both peaks combined. Figures for First Great Western Link for the count in October 2004 were 2.5 per cent. in the morning peak, 1.5 per cent. in the evening peak, and 2.1 per cent. for both peaks combined. This is an average for all trains in the peak period. Where an operator of London commuter services exceeds levels of train crowding specified in the franchise contract, the SRA can, but is not obliged to, require the train operator to produce an action plan for providing more capacity and alleviating overcrowding.

It is an inescapable fact that the more heavily laden the train, the greater the number of passengers who are likely to be at risk in the event of an accident. Nevertheless, there is no evidence at present to suggest that overcrowding is, in itself, dangerous or actually causes accidents. All rolling stock is designed to run safely even when fully loaded, so the number of passengers does not affect a train's operating performance or its structural integrity.

The Rail Safety and Standards Board is currently researching the health and safety effects of crowding on passengers. First phase results are due to be published shortly. The aim of the work is to establish an understanding of the health and safety issues that may arise as a result of crowding on mainline and underground railways. The research seeks to identify all those situations in which crowding could lead directly to injury or make an accident worse.

Furthermore, the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 places a general duty on employers to ensure, so far as is reasonably practicable, that workers and others, including passengers, are not exposed to health and safety risks. On the railways, that duty falls largely on train operating companies and on Network Rail, the infrastructure controller, to manage overcrowding on a day-to-day basis.

First Great Western Link ran 82.4 per cent. of its trains to time in the year to 30 September 2004, compared with 74.7 per cent. in the previous 12 months. The average figures for all London area commuter train operators were 84.4 per cent. and 79.7 per cent. respectively. The early weeks of a new timetable often see punctuality slip as the new arrangements become established. However, there is evidence that the new timetable is proving fairly robust. Both First Great Western Link and the SRA are monitoring punctuality and overcrowding. Changes have been incorporated thanks to experience already gained from the new timetable. For example, the 7.27 am service from Twyford is now running more reliably than it did when the timetable was first introduced in December and has been lengthened to 10 coaches.

Mrs. May: I am grateful to First Great Western Link for having doubled the number of coaches on the 7.27 am Adelante, following considerable pressure from me and the passengers to do something about that service. I am listening very carefully to the Minister's response. She quoted an increase in the number of services to Maidenhead and Twyford, but does she accept that the key issue of concern to my constituents is the length of journey time? That means that many of them are now crowding on to a smaller number of services because many of the services that have been introduced, to which the Minister refers, are now slower services stopping at every station. It is the length of journey time that is crucial. My constituents want it at 20 to 25 minutes, not at the 35 to 40 minutes that some of those other services take.

Charlotte Atkins: I appreciate the concerns of the right hon. Lady's constituents, and I am sure that those representations will have been taken up by the operators and will be looked at in the context of the complaints that they have received. However, the Department has so far received very few representations from the right hon. Lady's constituents, although obviously she has made representations on their behalf.

An Oxford to London Paddington service at around 8.15 is calling additionally at Maidenhead to help with overcrowding.

Regional planning assessments will form the basis for planning the development of the railway over the next five to 20 years. Those will consider the function of the railway within current and future land use and transport systems, and its role in supporting the economic and wider development objectives of local, regional, devolved and central Government. A key objective of the RPAs will be to maximise value for money in pursuit of the Government's objectives for the environment, safety, economy, accessibility and integration. The RPA for the south-west is due to be published in winter 2005.

The SRA's forthcoming great western main line route utilisation strategy was published for consultation in January and will examine service patterns on all train services using the London Paddington corridor, including consideration of the practicality and value of providing or changing commuter services to Maidenhead and Twyford.

Maidenhead and Twyford are well used stations with substantial numbers of commuters, making reliable, punctual services absolutely vital. The future of rail services from both towns is secure and the SRA will be working with First Great Western Link to improve the performance and quality of the services to and from them.

Today, we have had an opportunity to consider the services and for the right hon. Lady to make her points clearly. I am sure that those issues will be noted and taken up by my hon. Friend the Minister of State.

Economic Strategy

1. Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): What discussions he has had with the Scottish Executive on future economic strategy in Scotland. [213400]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Alistair Darling): I have regular discussions on a range of matters with Scottish Executive Ministers.

Mr. Salmond: Has the Secretary of State seen the "Index of Success", published by the Federation of Small Businesses and prepared by Mr. John McLaren, the Labour party's former economic adviser? It shows Scotland as 10th out of 10 of the small countries in the survey, behind Switzerland, Iceland, Norway, Sweden, Finland, New Zealand, Austria, Denmark and Ireland. With the Tories saying that Scotland is unattractive and the Labour party's former economic adviser saying that we are bottom of the league, what is it about those other countries that makes them so successful—except that they are independent and Scotland is not?

Mr. Darling: As ever, the hon. Gentleman might do better to look at the detail of the report instead of making the usual wide-ranging assertions that do not bear close examination. That survey showed that Scotland has many good and attractive aspects, which is why, with the rest of the United Kingdom, it is enjoying a long period of sustained economic growth and low unemployment.

One point that the FSB report highlights, and the main factor that is holding Scotland back, is its poor health record. That is why the Scottish Executive is putting substantial sums into health and making the necessary reforms to improve our health. That is important.

Yesterday, the hon. Gentleman claimed that he could set up some sort of fund to support Scotland from North sea oil.

Mr. Salmond: Like Norway.

Mr. Darling: The hon. Gentleman says, "Like Norway," but I am wondering what sort of fund it would be when it would have an annual shortfall of more than £4 billion, even if every single penny of North sea oil revenue were allocated to Scotland, which would be unlikely. [Interruption.] The fact is that the hon. Gentleman's economics do not add up. They did not add up when he was leader previously, and they do not add up now.

Mrs. Helen Liddell (Airdrie and Shotts) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is strange that those who purport to speak for Scotland spend their time talking it down? Rather, they should recognise the extent to which men and women in both the public and the private sector have succeeded in building a Scotland that can look forward to the future with confidence. Those who talk down Scotland talk down Scotland's people.

Mr. Darling: My right hon. Friend is right. The fact is that nationalist policies failed and were rejected by the electorate on each and every occasion when the hon. Gentleman led his party previously, and they will be rejected when he next leads it into an election. When people look around Scotland they see economic success, more people in work, more businesses, and expansion across the board because of the economic policies that are good not just for Scotland, but for the whole of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Peter Duncan (Galloway and Upper Nithsdale) (Con): The Secretary of State implores us to look at the detail, but that shows Scotland's relegation to 36th in the world league for competitiveness. Is he proud of that record in government?

Mr. Darling: If the hon. Gentleman looks at all the recent economic surveys of Scotland and the United Kingdom, he will see that they universally recognise Scotland as a good place in which to do business. When he comes to the Dispatch Box and looks over his shoulder to see all of two Conservative Members sitting in the Chamber today, he may want to reflect that part of his problem is the Conservatives' attitude to Scotland. Yesterday morning, his prominent Front-Bench colleague said on the radio:

> "The problem in Scotland has absolutely nothing to do with immigration levels, I'm afraid it has to do with the fact that Scotland is not a very attractive place for people to come and settle."

Does that not speak volumes about just how out of touch the Conservative party is with Scotland?

Mr. Duncan: The simple fact is that Scotland's economy is not attracting or retaining the very best. The figures are indisputable, with gross domestic product growth consistently lagging behind the rest of the UK, at some 7 per cent. since 1995, business start-ups at only three quarters of the UK level, and manufacturing export levels continuing their seeming decline. What more will the Government do to redress that decline, and when will they sit up and take notice?

Mr. Darling: Rather like the hon. Gentleman who speaks for the nationalists, the hon. Gentleman who speaks for the Conservatives is selective in the statistics that he quotes. I notice that he did not actually repudiate what his Front-Bench colleague said yesterday—that the Tories believe that Scotland is not a very attractive place for people to go and live in. What about the fact that we are home to one of the biggest banks in the world? The Royal Bank of Scotland is building brand-new headquarters just outside Edinburgh, and we are home to numerous other financial institutions that are doing well, such as the Halifax Bank of Scotland. Even in manufacturing, where, yes, there have been difficulties because of the difficulties that face the electronics industry worldwide, there are successes to which we can point. The fact is that Scotland is now a very different place from the Scotland of the 1980s and 1990s, when there was record unemployment and a second generation of people were growing up with no work. The other thing that the hon. Gentleman should focus on is that the policies he advocates—£35 billion-worth of public spending cuts, with all the economic instability that would result—would take Scotland back to the past. No wonder the Conservatives are completely out of touch with modern Scotland. On present form, they are likely to remain that way for years to come.

Defence Industry

2. Mr. Bill Tynan (Hamilton, South) (Lab): What estimate he has made of the number of jobs in Scotland which are dependent upon the defence industry.

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Alistair Darling): The UK defence industry is very significant to the Scottish economy. The most recent figures suggest that an estimated 7,000 jobs in Scotland are directly related to Ministry of Defence equipment contracts, with a further 7,200 civilian personnel employed by the MOD and its agencies. Additionally, significant employment will be created indirectly by MOD activities in certain parts of Scotland.

Mr. Tynan: I thank my right hon. Friend for that comprehensive response. Does he accept that defence industry jobs are mostly high-skilled and high-tech, and give wonderful opportunities for apprenticeships for young men and women in Scotland? Has he made any assessment of the number of jobs that would be lost in Scotland if we decided to withdraw from NATO and our peacekeeping facilities around the world?

Mr. Darling: Withdrawing from NATO would not just be bad in terms of the UK's international obligations but—my hon. Friend is right—it would be devastating for the defence industry in Scotland. We know that the nationalists stand for the break-up of the British Army and the Royal Navy.

To take just one example, as was made clear yesterday, the Government want to proceed with the programme to build two large aircraft carriers. That will create jobs for more than 10,000 people in the United Kingdom—many of them at Govan and Rosyth, the MOD anticipates, provided that those yards come in with good bids. We expect that to be extremely important for Scotland. Withdrawing from NATO would be disastrous. So, too, would be the commitment by the Conservative party to cut £35 billion of public expenditure. That would be bound to cut defence procurement. We do not even have to speculate about that, as it is precisely what happened in the past when the Tories were last around, and allowed the resources available to the MOD to be run down because of their irresponsible economic attitude.

John Thurso (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross) (LD): Does the Secretary of State accept that defence jobs are as important for the highlands as they are for the south of Scotland? Recently, there has been much press speculation that the announcement yesterday of a physical integrator contract for the future carrier vessel would be accompanied by announcement of the physical integration site. As that was not the case, will the right hon. Gentleman take this opportunity to assure the House, and my constituents in Nigg, that the criterion used for the selection of that site will be best value, and not, as the press suggested, a fix by the Treasury?

Mr. Darling: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence will, I understand, be issuing a written statement in about 20 minutes' time. He will say that we anticipate that, subject to value for money, the carriers could be built at four sites in the UK—Govan, Portsmouth, Tyneside and Rosyth. That will have to be subject to value for money, as the hon. Gentleman will accept. I fully accept that defence jobs are important wherever they are, but the general point is that if we are to safeguard the defence jobs that we need, first, we should remain part of the United Kingdom, because there is no way that such jobs would go to Scotland if the Royal Navy were broken up, as the nationalists advocate. Secondly, it is essential to maintain levels of public investment, yet the Conservatives are on record saying that they want to cut public investment to the tune of £35 billion. If that happens there are bound to be casualties. Among them would be the Army and the Navy—and the hon. Member for Galloway and Upper Nithsdale (Mr. Duncan) has done nothing to refute that this morning.

Dr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the announcement of tranche 2 for the Eurofighter Typhoon just before Christmas was a hugely important boost to BAE Systems Avionics in Edinburgh, a provider of high quality jobs? Against that background, it was disappointing that the company announced 190 redundancies. Will my right hon. Friend encourage the Secretary of State for Defence, in his discussions with BAE Systems, to ask the company to minimise those redundancies and ensure that they are voluntary?

Mr. Darling: I share my right hon. Friend's concern about the job losses announced in relation to some restructuring at BAE Systems, and I hope that the company will do everything it can to try to ensure the future employment of everyone concerned. He will also be aware of the fact that the Department of Trade and Industry has asked the Office of Fair Trading to look at the proposed sale of some of that business to an Italian company, but I very much hope that we can do everything possible to maintain those jobs, because they are very high-skilled, and the people who work in the industry have served Scotland and the industry very well.

Gaelic

3. Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): What plans he has to support the Gaelic language. [213402]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mrs. Anne McGuire): Action to support the Gaelic language is primarily the responsibility of Scottish Ministers. However, during his visit to Stornoway yesterday, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was delighted to announce the Government's decision to include for the first time Gaelic headings in the new e-passport, which is to be introduced later this year.

Mr. Reid: I welcome the Scottish Parliament's Gaelic Language (Scotland) Bill, which will require Scottish public bodies to prepare development plans about how they plan to use the Gaelic language in carrying out their functions. However, Scottish Ministers and the Scottish Parliament have no say over how UK public bodies operate in Scotland. Will the Government ensure that when UK public bodies such as the Department for Work and Pensions, the Home Office and the Ministry of Defence are operating in Scotland, they prepare and implement Gaelic language development plans?

Mrs. McGuire: The Secretary of State and I are keen to ensure that the Gaelic language is supported by Whitehall and Westminster, and I can advise the House that my right hon. Friend has written to all Departments to highlight the importance of the new Gaelic Language (Scotland) Bill. Of course, the hon. Gentleman is right to suggest that the Bill does not extend statutory responsibilities or obligations for UK public bodies, but the Scotland Office has hosted a constructive meeting between the Scottish Executive and Bòrd na Gàidhlig, with wide representation from Whitehall Departments, as a preliminary exchange on exactly how the voluntary arrangements might work in the spirit of the new Bill.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley) (Lab/Co-op): Will my hon. Friend tell the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) that the parts of Scotland where the Gaelic language is spoken are some of the most attractive in the whole of the United Kingdom?

Mrs. McGuire: The Secretary of State and I can give any hon. Member every assurance that the areas where the Gaelic language is spoken are definitely some of the most beautiful parts of Scotland, and when the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) next visits Scotland, perhaps he might want to come further than the nearest grouse moor.

Wind Farms

4. Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): What discussions he has had with the First Minister on development of wind farms in Scotland. [213403]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mrs. Anne McGuire): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has regular discussions with the First Minister. The development of wind farms in Scotland is a devolved responsibility.

Miss McIntosh: However, energy policy is a national and UK responsibility, and how can the Government have a energy policy whose sole commitment to renewable energy seems to be its obsession with wind farms? Does the hon. Lady think that with masses of onshore wind farms, Scotland will be a more attractive or a less attractive place to live?

Mrs. McGuire: I hate to correct the hon. Lady—no, I love to correct her: her interpretation of the development of renewable energy in Scotland is misleading. Everyone recognises the fact that wind farms are intermediate technology, but they are commercially viable and they are available at the moment. We have a renewables obligation, and until such time as other technologies, such as those that relate to wind, tides and energy crops, come on stream, we must consider how we reduce our emissions and provide clean renewable energy for Scotland. If the hon. Lady needs any reassurance that the greatest creative minds are looking at different ways of doing that, I assure her that—today, in fact—the Environment and Rural Development Committee of the Scottish Parliament is taking evidence from NFU Scotland, which wants dung power to become part of the energy mix in Scotland. In case anyone thinks that that issue is peculiar to Scotland, let me point out that there is already a dung power station in Devon.

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries) (Lab): My hon. Friend is aware from discussions that we have had in the past that the development of wind farms in the areas of most scenic beauty is extremely contentious. Does she agree that we need to consider the development of more wave and tidal power, and that much more needs to be spent on research? I honestly think that we have failed, over 20 or 30 years, by being so dependent on gas and oil for far too long.

Mrs. McGuire: My hon. Friend is correct. There is already significant investment in wave and tidal demonstration projects. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State recently visited the demonstration project in Islay, and as the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) will verify, a great deal of work is being put into such pilot projects. The Department of Trade and Industry is providing almost £500 million of funding for such research and development demonstrations. We are aware that we must have an energy mix, and we are doing as much as possible to ensure that when the time comes, we will have a renewable energy policy worthy of the name.

Mr. Peter Duncan (Galloway and Upper Nithsdale) (Con): Clearly, the Minister knows that it is important to get the energy mix right. So, too, does the Deputy Minister for Enterprise and Lifelong Learning in the Scottish Parliament, who said:

"does it make sense, at the very time when climate change and the reduction of greenhouse gases have shot up the political agenda, to be planning the elimination of nuclear power?"

Does the Minister agree with that comment?

Mrs. McGuire: I think that the Deputy Minister said that there needed to be a mature debate. Most of us in the House—[Interruption.] Perhaps apart from the Conservatives, who want to try to politicise the issue, most of us realise that we must have a mature debate on the energy mix that will take us through the 21st century.

Mr. Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): One renewable energy project that has received welcome funding from the Department of Trade and Industry is the innovative Pelamis wave project developed by Ocean Power Delivery, which is based in my constituency. Will my hon. Friend examine ways of building on the success of that project to establish a focus for renewable energy in Leith docks, which would allow us to tap into the immense potential for manufacturing jobs in such a growing sector of the economy?

Mrs. McGuire: I am well aware of the project about which my hon. Friend speaks—perhaps I will discuss the issues with him later. His question encourages us to appreciate not only that we must have renewable energy sources, but that creating such sources will be of benefit to economic development and job numbers in Scotland.

Energy Policy

5. Pete Wishart (North Tayside) (SNP): What discussions he has had with the Scottish Executive and Cabinet colleagues on the future of energy policy for Scotland. [213404]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Alistair Darling): Ministers and officials keep in regular contact with Scottish Executive and UK Government Departments on a range of developments affecting energy policy.

Pete Wishart: I thank the Secretary of State for that reply. Following on from the last question, the Prime Minister himself has described climate change as perhaps the world's greatest environmental challenge, yet Talisman, the company behind the 1,000 MW Beatrice offshore wind farm planned for the Moray firth, has described transmission charges as the biggest threat to such projects going ahead. Will the Secretary of State explain how transmission charges that are £20 per kW higher in remote areas will help to address the matter, and how they could possibly encourage such developments, which we dramatically require?

Mr. Darling: As ever with the nationalists, one cannot take what they say at face value. I, too, have held discussions with the company behind that proposal, and it has to look into a range of issues, one of which is transmission charges. We are mindful of that, and we made necessary changes to the Energy Act 2004 to ensure that we could help generation in the north of Scotland. I say to the hon. Gentleman, as I have said many times when we have discussed these matters in the House, that it is important for us to have a transmission regime that is reasonable not only for the north of Scotland, but for offshore generation. Although it is by no means certain that such sources will provide a lot of energy in the future, we certainly need to examine the situation if we are to get a proper balance between renewable energy and other forms of energy generation.

Anne Picking (East Lothian) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that in the energy policy for Scotland there is a place for all forms of energy, including nuclear power? Security of supply and safety are absolutely fundamental to the provision of energy in Scotland.

Mr. Darling: I agree with my hon. Friend that we need a sensible mix of energy generation to ensure continuity of supply. She will know that Torness power station has many years ahead of it and that decisions must be taken in due course about whether it should be refurbished so that it can continue generating. The hon. Member for Galloway and Upper Nithsdale (Mr. Duncan) was somewhat critical about this matter a few moments ago, but it was right for the Deputy Minister in the Scottish Executive to draw attention to the fact that we needed a mature debate on how to guarantee our energy supply in the future. That means having a proper mix of energy, which will no doubt include Torness.

EU Structural Funds

7. Sir Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire) (LD): If he will seek to promote the interests of areas in Scotland likely to lose access to EU structural funds when public sector relocations are being planned. [213406]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mrs. Anne McGuire): No decisions about the relocation of Government Departments away from Whitehall have yet been made. They will be based on Departments' operational needs and individual business cases rather than the particular needs of specific areas, or geography. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has made clear to other Departments the advantages of Scotland as a location, and has encouraged them to consider Scotland when reviewing relocation plans.

Sir Archy Kirkwood: I am grateful for that answer, but does the Minister accept that Scotland is a bona fide locus for the relocation of public sector jobs and that Whitehall Departments should be actively encouraged by the Scotland Office to consider such relocation? In that context, will she bear in mind giving priority in that consideration to areas that might be about to lose European structural funds?

Mrs. McGuire: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that Scotland is a suitable relocation site for jobs from Whitehall. Obviously, all the issues that he has raised will be taken into consideration. It is worth mentioning, though, that it would help people to see Scotland as a suitable site for relocation if members of the Conservative party stopped saying that Scotland was an unacceptable place to live.

ADVOCATE-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

The Advocate-General was asked—

Devolution/Human Rights

16. Annabelle Ewing (Perth) (SNP): What devolution issues have been raised with her since 11 January. [213396]

17. Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): What devolution issues she has considered since 11 January. [213397]

18. Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): What devolution issues she has dealt with since 11 January. [213398]

19. Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab): What human rights issues she has considered since 11 January. [213399]

The Advocate-General for Scotland (Dr. Lynda Clark): Since 11 January 2005, 55 devolution cases have been intimated to me, all of which have raised human rights issues. All of the 45 civil cases intimated to me concern prison conditions. Of the 10 cases relating to criminal law, eight related to pre-trial delay, one to delay in hearing an appeal and one to the detention and questioning of a 14-year-old boy.

Annabelle Ewing: I thank the Advocate-General for her answer. Is Lord Fraser correct when he says that the Inquiries Bill will allow him to secure the release of tapes of "The Gathering Place", and will that be enthusiastically supported by all Labour Members, from the First Minister upwards?

The Advocate-General: I have every respect for Lord Fraser; he is of course entitled to his interpretation. His inquiry predates the Bill to which the hon. Lady refers. Therefore, I do not think that I can further assist her.

Miss McIntosh: The hon. and learned Lady has had cause to consider a number of cases in relation to pre-trial delay. What is the current delay, and is the 110-day rule still applicable?

The Advocate-General: As the hon. Lady knows, the 110-day rule has been altered by statute to some extent, to change the way in which the dates run. Generally, the person concerned is not in custody in pre-trial delay cases. The 110-day rule relates to people who are in custody. People who are charged with summary offences or who have been released on bail are not covered by the rule. In some cases intimated to me as devolution issues the delay between the charge and the trial, when the person has not been in custody, has been substantial. Those are some of the cases on which challenges have been made.

Mr. Reid: In response to my question at the last Advocate-General's Question Time, the hon. and learned Lady told the House that she had intervened in only one or two of the cases notified to her. As she is soon to depart voluntarily, will she advise the House whether there is enough work in her office to justify a full-time ministerial salary?

The Advocate-General: There is some slight confusion; I was talking about one or two of the types of case raised. I have intervened and appeared in a number of cases. I do not have the figures to hand, but I have appeared personally in the highest courts in at least 10 different cases. I have also intervened through counsel in a number of other cases; I can give the hon. Gentleman the specific numbers. Devolution issues are only a very small part of my work. My work is advisory. For example, as I tried to explain to the Scottish Affairs Committee, most of my time is spent dealing with advisory matters that—unfortunately, from the point of view of Members—are regarded as confidential. Nevertheless, such work is a very important part of the role of Advocate-General. I hope and think that it will remain a very important role. Of course I have a range of other roles, and I refer the hon. Gentleman to the Select Committee evidence.

Mr. Dalyell: May I take the opportunity to thank my hon. and learned Friend for much of the unsung work that we know she has done behind the scenes? Also, may I take what is probably my last parliamentary opportunity to register the belief that languishing in Barlinnie is a man who may have been a sanctions buster, but who almost certainly was not a mass murderer? Before she leaves office, will the Advocate-General reflect on the extremely unsatisfactory division between Foreign Office responsibilities, on which I had a recent Adjournment debate, and the responsibilities of the Crown Office, where, to be frank, Westminster MPs are told to keep out?

The Advocate-General: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for singing my praise. I am sure that his will be sung in many quarters for having made such an enormous contribution to the work of Parliament.

I know that my hon. Friend has been concerned about the division of responsibilities. Perhaps I can assist him by drawing his attention to the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission, an independent body charged with reviewing alleged miscarriages of justice in Scotland. It might be able to examine some of the issues that cause him concern.

CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State was asked—

Magistrates

20. Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): What measures he is taking to retain magistrates. [214423]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. Christopher Leslie): The implementation stage of the magistrates national recruitment strategy will be launched shortly, building on an extensive programme of research and the testing of advertising approaches in the first year. My Department is analysing the healthy 1,949 returns that we received from the recent magistrates questionnaire to see which factors best influence both recruitment and retention. We hope to announce further measures in due course.

Richard Ottaway: Yet after eight years of Labour Government, we still have a problem. A national recruitment strategy, Operation Black Vote, and hotlines have all been tried, yet we have a shortage of magistrates. The Minister has rejected allowances—wrongly, in my view. Magistrates deal with 90 per cent. of the crime in this country. Does he recognise that he will have to do more if he is to turn the problem around and provide a proper strategy for an important part of our community?

Mr. Leslie: I agree to some extent. We do need to encourage employers to adopt a more supportive attitude to having magistrates in their employ. We should also consider sitting patterns, to see whether they are flexible enough to allow people to become magistrates. As for paying magistrates, a broad estimate is that that would involve about £100 million of expenditure. Given that the shadow Cabinet is proposing to cut £155 million from the Court Service, the prospects for proper recognition of magistrates by a Conservative Administration are pretty woeful.

Mr. David Lepper (Brighton, Pavilion) (Lab/Co-op): The Minister will have been told by our right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor, who visited the Brighton and Hove area a couple of weeks ago, of the desire of magistrates on the bench there to be able to retain some of the older magistrates who, despite having reached the upper age limit, still have valuable service to offer. Will he comment on that, and on what steps can be taken to help the Brighton and Hove bench to recruit younger magistrates as well, as it already has done to some extent?

Mr. Leslie: We need to recruit magistrates from all age groups, so long as they can demonstrate that they have the necessary maturity, judgment and strength of character to undertake that judicial function. We are considering various ideas—my hon. Friend mentioned a couple—that have emerged from the mass questionnaire. That has galvanised quite a lot of support in the magistrates community, and we are analysing the returns now. I hope that some of the suggestions made will result in innovative approaches.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Given that the number of magistrates rose substantially under the Conservatives, has fallen substantially under Labour and is now described by the Lord Chancellor as a sore issue, what has been the single most important measure that the Lord Chancellor has taken to retain magistrates, and why has it failed?

Mr. Leslie: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman should exaggerate; the figures are not quite as bad as he suggests. [Interruption.] As I hear said from the Benches behind me, crime doubled when the Conservatives were in power, and we are working hard to reduce crime and continue the good record that we have. We have made changes, such as beginning to advertise in different ways to potential magistrates the benefits of their applying to join the bench, which has been a major step forward, and other changes are coming. Asking magistrates themselves what helps to keep them on the bench and what would recruit others is probably the best approach. That is what we have done, and we will learn lessons from talking to them directly.

Domestic Violence

21. Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the availability of legal aid in domestic violence cases. [214424]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. David Lammy): Domestic violence proceedings are a priority area for legal aid funding. That is reflected in the Legal Services Commission's funding code criteria, which now allow domestic violence cases to be funded very widely.

Julie Morgan: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Is he aware that in Cardiff three years ago more than 50 per cent. of known victims of domestic violence refused to make a complaint? Last year, the figure was down to 14 per cent. Does he agree that that shows an increased confidence in the judicial system, and that it is also the result of good inter-agency working? With that big increase in women taking cases to court, can he reassure me that enough legal aid will be provided?

Mr. Lammy: I know that my hon. Friend has continued to take up these issues not only in her constituency, but nationally. I am pleased that we have been able to put victims of domestic violence at the heart of the criminal justice system with the new Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act 2004. We have seen a steady increase from 2001, when we were spending about £44 million in this area of law, to the last financial year, in which the amount was £56 million.

Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con): According to the Law Society, managing legal aid expenditure as a single budget has meant that overspends on criminal legal aid have been met by cutting civil legal aid, while poor forecasting of demands on the criminal legal aid budget has led to erosion of the civil legal aid budget. That is an ongoing problem. Do the Government now intend to get a grip on this failure of management?

Mr. Lammy: What the Government are not doing is what the Opposition propose in the James review—scrapping community legal service partnerships and the money going to our citizens advice bureaux and law centres. We are not doing that, but we are sitting down with the professions in a fundamental legal aid review.

We are sitting down with the Crown Prosecution Service and looking at processes in our criminal justice system to ensure that they are not driving up costs. As we are proud on this side of the House of the advice that people get in our local communities, and particularly our civil legal aid, we are going to protect it.

Magistrates/Police/Community Liaison

22. Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): If he will bring forward proposals to improve the contact between magistrates and the police and communities they serve; and if he will make a statement. [214425]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. Christopher Leslie): It is the Government's view that the criminal justice system can be better connected with the wider community without adversely jeopardising the integrity of law enforcement or judicial independence. Early returns of the recent questionnaire sent to all magistrates suggest that they, too, are keen to see a greater dialogue with neighbourhood groups, local schools and the local media in order to broaden the understanding of key community concerns.

Mr. Allen: What on earth is the National Criminal Justice Board doing about all this? People tell me—I do not believe them—that it is a bunch of lawyers talking about esoteric points of law. Will my hon. Friend ensure that the board understands that the criminal justice system belongs to the people whom it is meant to serve, not to a few professionals? Will he ensure that, rather than the odd public meeting here and there, there is a systematic effort by the board to ensure that every tenants association, neighbourhood watch scheme and community is intimately involved in the development of the criminal justice system and understands it?

Mr. Leslie: My hon. Friend is right that the law does not belong to lawyers. Occasionally, we need to bring together officials from the Crown Prosecution Service, the courts administration, including the judiciary, the police, the probation service and the Prison Service to allow them to iron out the differences between their departments and work smoothly together as a team. I hope that those partnerships will mean better local engagement with neighbourhood organisations and tenants associations such as neighbourhood watch, and I know that local criminal justice boards intend to do that as soon as possible.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): The proximity of courts to police stations, custody suites and the community is important. I have just received a draft business plan from Her Majesty's Court Service Avon and Somerset, which, unsurprisingly, has a purpose, a vision and an aim. Part of its purpose is to focus on the public; part of its vision is an empowered local service; and part of its aim is being local and accountable. Rather disappointingly, however, it proposes to resurrect the dreary plans to close courthouses in Frome and Wells. When will local accountability mean keeping local courts open?

Mr. Leslie: Far fewer courthouses have closed in the past year than under previous Administrations. Given that there are so many courthouses, however, from time to time local magistrates committees recommend amalgamations, or consolidation of buildings. From this April, the new unification of the courts administration will provide opportunities to set up new magistrates facilities, perhaps in towns that have a civil court only—there are swings and roundabouts. I will re-examine the programme in Somerset highlighted by the hon. Gentleman and form a view.

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): Does the Minister agree that civil action is sometimes an effective way in which to deal with antisocial behaviour? Are county courts encouraged to help local crime prevention partnerships in the same way as magistrates courts by, for instance, fast-tracking cases to evict antisocial tenants who allow people to deal drugs on their premises? Such civil action is often more effective than criminal proceedings in promptly removing a problem from a problem estate.

Mr. Leslie: We must ensure that our civil and criminal courts work together more closely, particularly on antisocial behaviour. Local residents find it baffling if technical obstacles in the courts system make them feel that proceedings are moving too slowly. We have set up a series of new antisocial behaviour response courts, which include properly trained legal advisers and better specialist prosecutors to allow us to proceed more speedily with antisocial behaviour cases.

New Courthouse (Colchester)

23. Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): On what date he expects a full planning application to be made for a new courthouse in Colchester; when he expects construction to commence; and what the scheduled opening date is. [214426]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. Christopher Leslie): Unfortunately, I cannot give the hon. Gentleman the specific construction schedule, because my Department is still finalising our investment plans for the Essex courts scheme.

Bob Russell: The Minister knows that I have raised the question of Colchester courthouse on numerous occasions. As I have pointed out previously, we have waited for a decision for longer than the duration of the second world war. May I put a deal to the Minister? If he will promise to announce a commencement date within six months, I will promise not to ask any more questions for six months.

Mr. Leslie: I enjoy the hon. Gentleman's questions so much that it is tempting not to give him a date so that we can continue this dialogue. I understand his tenacious attempt to secure early completion, but lots of other schemes across the rest of the country are also priorities. The pot of money is finite, and I am trying my best to ensure that we get a good spread of new build and refurbished magistrates courts as soon as possible.

Magistrates Courts (West Midlands)

24. Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): How many magistrates courts there are in the west midlands region. [214428]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. Christopher Leslie): There are currently 12 magistrates courts within the west midlands magistrates courts committee area.

Mr. Cunningham: What training is given to magistrates to deal with cases such as domestic violence and child abuse?

Mr. Leslie: The independent judicial studies board is responsible for training the judiciary. It also helps magistrate courts committees to give extra training sessions to local magistrates through the local bench. From April, that system will change, but the judicial studies board will undertake some of the training, funded by the taxpayer. I will try to give my hon. Friend some more information about the specifics of domestic violence case training, which is obviously a priority for all hon. Members.

Freedom of Information Act

25. Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): What mechanism is in place to review the operation of the Freedom of Information Act 2000. [214430]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. David Lammy): Comprehensive arrangements are in place across central Government to monitor the operation of the Act. The Department for Constitutional Affairs will receive quarterly returns from Departments on a range of information, including numbers of requests and the timeliness of responses. The first set of data will be published in June.

Norman Baker: Does the Minister agree that Departments seem to be significantly ill prepared to deal with the volume of requests coming in, despite the fact that they have had five years to prepare for the implementation of the Act? Has he seen the front page of The Independent and other newspaper stories that suggest that very few of the requests submitted are resulting in any information being released at all? Would he think about renaming the Act the "Creative Excuses for not Releasing Information Act"?

Mr. Lammy: I have answered a number of questions on freedom of information at this Dispatch Box. There have been questions about shredding, but that was not happening, and questions about a lack of training and workshops, but that was not the case, because the Minister was going around all Departments, and around the country, informing people about freedom of information. This is about the public getting access to important information about the public services that they use. There have been more than 4,500 requests, many of which have led to that information being given within 20 days. The Act is working, and working well.

Legal Aid

26. Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): What changes he plans to make to legal aid as a result of his fundamental review of legal aid. [214431]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. David Lammy): The fundamental legal aid review will report to Ministers in the first part of this year on reforms to place legal aid on a sustainable footing in the longer term and to target resources better to deliver the right outcomes for the right people. Ministers will then consider its recommendations.

Mr. Kidney: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Can he give an assurance that as he attempts to design a modern system of legal aid that guarantees access to justice for all who need it, whether for criminal or civil cases, he will maintain a consistent and substantial budget for legal aid, and will not embark on a Tory model of cuts in budgets?

Mr. Lammy: Since the publication of the James review, there has been a huge dividing line on legal aid. The Government are committed to legal aid and are spending more on it than any other developed country in the world, but we want to ensure that that money is going to the people who need it, that we have frank and honest discussions, particularly with the professions, about how we spend those funds, and that processes, particularly criminal justice processes, are not driving up costs. The Conservatives are committed to taking money away from citizens advice bureaux and law centres; that is something that the Government stand against.

30. Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey) (LD): What assessment he has made of the implications of the Access to Justice Act 1999 for civil justice in England and Wales. [214435]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. David Lammy): The 1999 Act covered a number of areas of civil and criminal justice. Its main provisions established the community legal service and the criminal defence service, and extended conditional fee agreements. The Department conducted an independent review from September 2003 on the operation of the CLS to assess the impact of the delivery of an efficient and effective service on those who most need it.

Simon Hughes: Last year's Government figures showed that the number of people who have had civil legal aid has dropped by more than half over the past 15 years. Has the Minister's Department now decided on the value of equity in a person's home that should preclude their getting legal aid? The Department said last autumn that it would announce that. Has it decided? It matters to huge numbers of people around the country.

Mr. Lammy: We will publish the results of that consultation shortly. I have been engaged in a range of meetings, particularly with the legal aid community, the Bar Council and the Law Society. The hon. Gentleman should remember that the Access to Justice Act 1999 took out of scope personal injury litigation, which means that there has been some reduction. We are committed to ensuring the appropriate levels of funding for civil legal aid, but we must also ensure that the money is being well spent against a budget that is now £2 billion, beyond which we cannot go. However, I shall publish the results of the consultation shortly.

Legal Profession (Regulation)

31. David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): If he will make a statement on the regulation of the legal profession. [214436]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. David Lammy): The current regulatory framework for the legal profession is largely based on self-regulation, with the professional bodies—the largest are the Law Society and the Bar Council—combining regulatory and representative functions. The Government commissioned the Sir David Clementi review and are considering his proposals in detail.

David Taylor: I am a member of the Magistrates Association and when the Lord Chancellor gave an excellent address to our annual conference last autumn, he said that magistrates should be considered as part of the legal profession, and that they should be effective in their operations, connected to their communities and respected for their decisions. If that is so, why was my first-rate former bench colleague, Councillor Mrs. Adoline Smith, who frankly expressed her views on the sentencing options for burglary, asked to stand down from the bench? Is not that over-regulation which has deprived the people of Leicestershire of an excellent magistrate?

Mr. Lammy: It would be quite wrong of me to comment on an individual case. We have conducted the Sir David Clementi review so that we can have that frank and open discussion and ensure that we have the legal community that the country needs and deserves in the 21st century. I held a meeting with stakeholders about the issue last week and I will ensure that magistrates are part of those discussions as we go forward.

HOUSE OF COMMONS COMMISSION

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission, was asked—

Child Care Facilities

33. Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): What plans the Commission has to provide child care facilities in the House. [214438]

Sir Archy Kirkwood (representing the House of Commons Commission): As I am sure the hon. Lady knows, a study was conducted in 2002 on the feasibility of providing child care facilities for staff of the House, Members and Members' staff. Following the review of the report's recommendations, the value of the child care voucher was raised, the scheme was extended to cover all qualifying children in families, and eligibility was extended to cover Members' staff. I am sure that the hon. Lady also knows that we are providing babycare room facilities in the main building and baby changing facilities in the Palace and Portcullis House.

Julie Morgan: I agree that some progress has been made in recognising the child care needs of Members and staff in the House, especially through the expansion of the child care vouchers and the Westminster holiday play scheme, which staff and Members use. However, does not the hon. Gentleman agree that it is high time we had a nursery here to serve both Houses and enable Members and staff to do their work more effectively? Will he reconsider the matter?

Sir Archy Kirkwood: The hon. Lady has ploughed an assiduous furrow on the matter and I welcome her interest. My fellow Commissioners will always be alive to the need to make this place a more family-friendly workplace. However, the evidence has not changed since the review was undertaken in 2002: the vast majority of people would like to provide care for their children at home rather than bring them to this place. It is right to bear the aspiration in mind—we want to set an example for other workplaces. The balance of advantage is currently in favour of extending the voucher scheme, but we will continue to keep the matter under review and if the next Parliament has a new intake of lady Members who are as assiduous as the hon. Lady, we might reconsider it early in that Parliament.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Surely a proper nursery or crèche facility in the House is more than an aspiration to bear in mind. Is it not absurd in this day and age that the House of Commons takes pride in the existence of the Shooting Gallery but is unwilling to contemplate providing a facility that would be widely used and enjoyed? The matter will be raised over and over again, eloquently by the hon. Member for Cardiff, North (Julie Morgan) and others, and with monotonous regularity, to the point when the House of Commons Commission will probably decide that it is best to give up the unequal struggle and simply provide the facility.

Sir Archy Kirkwood: I understand that point perfectly, but it might interest the House to learn that up to 150 members of staff take advantage of the voucher scheme. That is a much bigger number of people. They are getting more modest benefits, but those benefits are appropriate to their needs. Some Members' staff in their constituencies are also taking advantage of the scheme, which is something that we shall want to promote in future. This is not simply an either/or; there will always be a tension between offering provision for the few and offering provision for the many, and we must keep the issue in mind while trying to develop the voucher scheme, which provides greater benefit for more people.

LEADER OF THE HOUSE

The Leader of the House was asked—

Sub Judice Resolution

34. Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): What input he has had to the Procedure Committee inquiry into the operation of the House's sub judice resolution. [214439]

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Phil Woolas): Following representations from my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble) last July, my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House asked the Procedure Committee whether it would look at the application of the sub judice resolution in respect of coroners' courts and advise on whether there should be some extension of the discretion allowed to the Chair. He welcomes the Committee's inquiry, and looks forward to its findings with interest.

Ms Keeble: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that reply. Would he be prepared to give evidence to the Committee himself, particularly in regard to coroners' courts, where no one is on trial and there is usually no jury? It would be quite wrong, when no one's right to a fair trial is being infringed, for the sub judice rule to prevent MPs from asking questions about matters of acute general public concern.

Mr. Woolas: I congratulate my hon. Friend on her campaign on this issue, which is important to her constituents and to those of other Members. My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House will look carefully at her request regarding the Procedure Committee's inquiry. It is true that coroners' courts do not determine the guilt or innocence of individuals, but they do reach important findings, and there is perhaps a risk of prejudicing their proceedings through statements being made in the House. I am sure that the Procedure Committee will note what my hon. Friend has said, and that it will pay careful heed to the evidence that she has given.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): Is the Deputy Leader of the House aware that the Procedure Committee, which I chair, is currently undertaking an inquiry into the sub judice rule and into matters relating to coroners' courts? The Committee plans to make its report to the House before Easter. May I also say to the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble) that there is still time for right hon. and hon. Members to submit evidence directly to me or to the Committee Clerk and, if necessary, to request to give oral evidence in person?

Mr. Woolas: I am sure that the whole House is grateful to the Committee Chairman for those remarks and for the inquiry that his Committee is undertaking. These are important matters because, when a coroner's inquest is adjourned, members of the public—and Members of Parliament, through the House's resolutions on sub judice—are debarred from commenting on its proceedings. That is the difficult situation on which the Committee is being asked to make recommendations.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): I welcome the current review, but is the Minister aware that much of this discussion took place in the Joint Committee on Parliamentary Privilege back in 1999? Its report made a number of recommendations, including one that the two Houses of Parliament should bring the same rules into force, because there is an anomaly in regard to the way in which the sub judice rule is dealt with in each House. Does the Minister also recall the Committee's strong recommendation that "No action should be taken to limit freedom of speech in Parliament in respect of

(a) matters subject to a court injunction imposing confidentiality; or

(b) breaches of the Official Secrets Acts."?

Is he satisfied that the current review will be able to take those recommendations forward?

Mr. Woolas: I am aware of that report by the Joint Committee. Indeed, when my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House referred the request from my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North to the Procedure Committee, along with a request from the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, that request was copied to the Procedure Committee in the House of Lords, because of the important questions that it raises. For the two Houses not to act in tandem would create further complications and, perhaps, further injustice.

HOUSE OF COMMONS COMMISSION

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission, was asked—

Youth Parliament

35. Mr. David Stewart (Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber) (Lab): What plans he has for the Youth Parliament to sit in the House of Commons Chamber. [214440]

Sir Archy Kirkwood (representing the House of Commons Commission): In its report on connecting Parliament with the public, the Select Committee on Modernisation of the House of Commons suggested that the United Kingdom Youth Parliament should be able to meet and debate occasionally in the Chamber when Parliament is not sitting. However, my hon. Friend—if I may call him that—will be aware that there is a long-standing convention in the House that Mr. Speaker shall have exclusive jurisdiction over the use of the Chamber.

Mr. Stewart: Has the hon. Gentleman read the poll in today's edition of The Herald, which shows that 80 per cent. of young people aged between 16 and 20 surveyed are very interested in the politics of crime and punishment? Does he not think that that would be an excellent debate for the Youth Parliament to have in this very Chamber?

Sir Archy Kirkwood: I am aware, as is the Commission, of the need to try to engage greater interest among that age group in particular, and we are also aware of the valuable work of the United Kingdom Youth Parliament. The hon. Gentleman might not know that Committee Room 10 is already used very effectively by the education unit, and it is on a much more sensible scale for the number of youngsters often involved. I say to him in the spirit of compromise—although we have to be careful about the practicalities and precedents—that if the representatives of the United Kingdom Youth Parliament want to get in touch with the Commission and the education unit, I am sure that we will be able to promote their interests in a way that is beneficial to both parties.

BILL PRESENTED

CHILDREN'S FOOD

Ms Debra Shipley, supported by Vera Baird, Alan Howarth, Geraint Davies, Mr. Andy Reed, Mr. Simon Thomas, Mr. Ernie Ross, Mr. Graham Allen, Mr. Paul Burstow, Mr. Paul Tyler, Angela Eagle and Mr. Robert Walter, presented a Bill to make provision regarding the marketing, promotion and sale of food and drink to and for children; to make provision for education and the dissemination of information about children's diet, nutrition and health; to place certain duties on the Food Standards Agency; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 8 April, and to be printed [Bill 56].

Small Shops (Protection)

Brian Cotter (Weston-super-Mare) (LD): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to require local authorities to develop plans to support small shops; to amend the Town and Country Planning Act 1990 to impose additional planning requirements in relation to large shops and shopping centres; to make provision about retail purchasing by local authorities and other public authorities; to amend the Local Government Finance Act 1988 in relation to non-domestic rates for small shops and related business; and for connected purposes.

Small shops are at the very heart of our local communities, providing vital services to local residents and a wide choice of goods and services. A study produced by the Council for the Protection of Rural England in 1997 highlighted some of the most important functions provided by small shops, which can apply equally to small retailers in urban and rural environments.

The survey showed that small shops provide a lifeline for those in need, such as the elderly, the young and those without transport, and provide valuable opportunities for human contact. For some people on their own, particularly the elderly, the only conversation they may have all day is with the shop assistant in their local store, so the friendly and intimate experience of shopping in a small outlet is one that they particularly value. Just last week, I met a lady who sees that as a particularly important and satisfying part of her job, as do many such people.

Small retailers provide a market for local produce and suppliers, thus providing consumers with more choice and recycling money back into the local community, and they also provide important job opportunities in such communities. A report published by the Department of Health at the end of 1999 as part of the Government's neighbourhood renewal strategy summarises the important role that small shops play in poorer or isolated locations:

"Thriving local shops can provide employment for local residents and a pathway into new schools and training opportunities, can reduce crime and can improve health by providing a range of quality goods including food, at affordable prices."

The important role that small shops play in our local communities is therefore clear, so it is worrying that recent years have seen a rise in the number of small retailers shutting up shop for good.

In a 2002 report, "Ghost Town Britain: Death on the High Street", the New Economics Foundation revealed that between 1997 and 2002, specialist stores such as butchers, bakers and fishmongers shut at the rate of 50 per week. Assuming closures have continued at that rate, I would maintain that more than 20,000 specialist shops have closed since Labour came to power.

An increase in the number of local bank branches and post offices closing has also accelerated the decline of local shopping parades as consumers look elsewhere to access the financial and shopping facilities that they need, often in out-of-town shopping centres. In August, the New Economics Foundation launched its "Clone Town Britain" survey amid fears that Britain was becoming a nation of clone towns, suggesting that "identikit urban environments" and chain stores are squeezing out local identity and individuality.

To some extent, those changes reflect developments in lifestyles and consumer tastes. Many of us, including me, appreciate the convenience of shopping at a supermarket or shopping centre and of meeting all our needs under one roof. Supermarkets in particular can provide shoppers with access to cheap food and goods, and competition between the major players is therefore of benefit to the consumer in helping to keep prices down. Currently, however, there are concerns about the consolidation of the grocery market by the larger supermarkets and about the operation of the supermarket code of practice, particularly in relation to the treatment of suppliers. That has led the Association of Convenience Stores, Friends of the Earth and others to call for a full market review by the Office of Fair Trading.

Research conducted on just over 1,000 consumers for the Association of Convenience Stores in October 2004 showed that 63 per cent. thought that the growth of supermarket-owned convenience stores gave consumers less choice about where to shop. Therefore, it seems that while people want the convenience and cheap goods that supermarkets provide, they also want the diversity and friendly service that small local retailers provide. That is why we must act to prevent a further decline in the sector.

My Bill seeks to address that by requiring local authorities to develop retail plans for their area, as proposed by the New Economics Foundation, building on proposals outlined under the Local Communities Sustainability Bill. That was highlighted in a report on small shops published by the Better Regulation Task Force in July 2001, which said that "small retailers continue to have concerns that planning decisions that allow out of town stores to be built do not fully cost and assess the impact on local retailers and employment in the surrounding area."

Recently, in my constituency, I was approached by small retailers in one parade of shops who were extremely concerned about a planning application that had been submitted to site a supermarket express store in the area. Although those plans were subsequently rejected, it is imperative to ensure that local authorities take sufficient account of concerns raised by small retailers and consumers in reaching their decisions. Without the Bill, that cannot always happen. It is therefore imperative that we encourage local authorities to take a sustainable approach to economic planning and require them to consider both small retailers and consumers in their plans, including the need to ensure social inclusion and diversity in the retail sector. Such plans could be implemented in several ways, but it would ultimately be up to each local area to decide what worked best for it.

My Bill would also call for local competition policy, again as proposed by the New Economics Foundation. Normally, competition policy is addressed nationally, but it would be applied locally under my Bill. The national predominance of a chain is meaningless in deciding whether a supermarket will drive local shops out of business. Such an application of the law would also empower local communities to make decisions about the future of their areas.

Under the proposals, local communities would also have the final word in any decision on whether to allow the construction of a large shopping centre exceeding a certain size. My Bill would also implement the recommendation made by the New Economics Foundation to require local authorities to use tools such as those developed by the foundation to track local spending and then favour local retailers whose businesses ultimately leave more money recirculating in the local economy, especially in poor areas.

Finally, my Bill would also provide rate relief for shops and businesses with a rateable value of less than £25,000. The proposal would be revenue-neutral, with larger businesses required to cover the cost in accordance with an upward scale. Research published by the Department of the Environment in 1995 showed that business rates represented 30 per cent. of the profits on businesses with turnovers of less than £100,000—more than twice the proportion for large businesses. The Government have acknowledged that that is a problem for retailers, and stated in their response to the Better Regulation Task Force report on small shops that "small high street shops are sometimes valued at a higher rate per square metre than supermarkets."

While the Government themselves have recognised the problem, their proposed rate relief scheme, which would provide relief for small firms with a rateable value of less than £10,000, will not do a great deal to address the problem. The Federation of Small Businesses has argued that the threshold is too low. Following the recent revaluation of commercial properties, it warns that many small shopkeepers may experience a considerable increase in their rates. It goes on to say that a shop in the south of England faces an average 29 per cent. increase in its rateable value, which could mean an increase of about £1,800 in the final rates bill.

My Bill seeks to address the effect of the recent revaluation and the disproportionate burden that business rates place on small shops by increasing the threshold at which rate relief is available for smaller retailers. The measures that I have proposed are essential if we are to ensure that there is no further erosion of Britain's independent retail sector, and I therefore commend the Bill to the House.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Brian Cotter, Malcolm Bruce, Mrs. Annette Brooke, Sue Doughty, Andrew George, Mr. Parmjit Singh Gill, Mr. Mike Hancock, Mr. David Heath, Dr. John Pugh and Sarah Teather.

SMALL SHOPS (PROTECTION)

Brian Cotter accordingly presented a Bill to require local authorities to develop plans to support small shops; to amend the Town and Country Planning Act 1990 to impose additional planning requirements in relation to large shops and shopping centres; to make provision about retail purchasing by local authorities and other public authorities; to amend the Local Government Finance Act 1988 in relation to non-domestic rates for small shops and related business; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 20 May, and to be printed [Bill 57].

Opposition Day

[4TH ALLOTTED DAY]

Climate Change and the Environment

12.42 pm

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): I beg to move,

That this House endorses the comments of Sir David King that climate change is the most serious threat facing the planet and congratulates him on his work in this area; welcomes the Prime Minister's commitment to make the tackling of climate change a top priority for the United Kingdom's presidencies of the EU and G8 this year; reiterates the UK commitment to a 60 per cent. reduction in carbon emissions by 2050; strongly welcomes the coming into force of the Kyoto agreement on 16th February and the strong role the European Union has played in achieving this; believes that it is vital that, post-Kyoto, the international community works to reach agreement on the action needed to tackle climate change, which should engage the United States but which should also recognise the importance of the energy choices which face many of the major developing countries; calls on the global community to work with them in addressing those choices; rejects the notion that tackling climate change will of necessity damage the economy and indeed suggests that it is failure to do so that will lead to that result; believes that all parties in this House should by their own actions help convince the public of the need to take environmental matters seriously; and therefore condemns Conservative plans severely to weaken the Environment Agency through the massive and debilitating cuts proposed for the Agency by that party, and its damaging plans to abolish the climate change levy.

It is a great pleasure to introduce a debate on the important subject of climate change just a few days before the Kyoto protocol comes into force on 16 February. It has been a long, hard struggle, and it is right to pay tribute to people from all parties and all countries who have made Kyoto possible, despite the opposition of the United States, Australia and others. It is nearly the anniversary of a debate that the Liberal Democrats introduced in the limited time that we are allowed for Opposition debates. On 10 February 2004, we held a debate on the state of the environment and, as environment spokesman, I said that the environment was not receiving sufficient attention in the House, and that there should be an annual debate on it. We have waited without success for the Government to introduce a debate in the intervening 12 months, so, almost to the day, we are pleased to introduce another. The Liberal Democrats have a limited number of Opposition days, so it would be very welcome if the Government provided time for such debates.

During this Parliament, we have introduced three substantive debates on the environment in Opposition time. By comparison, there has been only one debate in Government time and the Conservatives have not introduced any at all. They were going to introduce a debate on climate change last year but, at the last moment, it disappeared and was replaced by a debate in which they opposed wind farms. That must be the only example in history where the horse has been pulled up before the runners are off.

Mr. Colin Challen (Morley and Rothwell) (Lab): Does the hon. Gentleman recollect that the last time that his party held a debate on this subject not a single Liberal Democrat Back Bencher made a speech? Is there a three-line Whip today?

Norman Baker: No, I do not recall that. There is not a three-line Whip today—there is genuine interest among Liberal Democrats in the environment, as demonstrated by the number of my colleagues who are here today. I hope, incidentally, that subsequent interventions will be directed more towards the important issues that we are debating, instead of being narrow party points.

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): Perhaps I can help. Does the hon. Gentleman remember the Second Reading of the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill—a Bill about the local environment—in which not one Liberal Democrat Back Bencher spoke?

Norman Baker: No, I do not recall that, but I do recall that we, unlike the so-called official Opposition, supported the Government on that occasion.

I do not want to rehearse at great length the examples that prove that climate change is occurring. We have all seen them in the newspapers and heard them on television and the radio, so there can be no doubt whatever that climate change is occurring or that it is induced by human behaviour. Sir David King, the Government's chief scientific adviser, has done a splendid job in drawing attention to the scientific evidence, which is now accepted by the vast majority of scientific opinion across the world. It is accepted by all parties in the House—I see a Plaid Cymru Member in his place—and I am not aware of any Member who fails to believe that climate change is happening and that it is humanly induced. If there are any such Members, I hope that they will make themselves known today.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South) (UUP) rose—

Norman Baker: Perhaps we have one.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that there is growing confusion about the issue? A week or so ago, there was a conference led by an Oxford professor, in which it was agreed that there was global warming. The next day's Metro reported that the increase would be 11°, but the professor subsequently said that it would be only 5°. Does the hon. Gentleman accept that some people are beginning to wonder whether there might be another ice age before we get really burned up?

Norman Baker: I acknowledge that the science is not exact and that there are different projections for the future in respect of the exact level of temperature change. That is bound to be the case, but it is unquestionable that climate change is occurring and that temperatures are increasing. If the gulf stream switches off, that could well lead to downward changes in temperature for this country, but that does not show that climate change is failing to occur—it is occurring.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): Has the hon. Gentleman seen the latest scientific assessment of all the papers on climate change by climatologists and other experts, which shows that there is no longer any significant argument about these matters among the scientific community? Indeed, there is hardly a single person who doubts the fundamental fact that the world is warming—and doing so alarmingly quickly.

Norman Baker: The right hon. Gentleman is absolutely correct, and I pay tribute to the work that he did in government in bringing this matter forward and to his subsequent contribution in opposition. It is welcome to have such a knowledgeable voice on the Conservative Benches. He is absolutely right that there is no doubt among the scientific community. That is not to deny that some individuals are advancing the theory that climate change is not occurring. Indeed, I shall consider some of those voices now.

One voice is that of Julian Morris of the International Policy Network, who claims that climate change is a myth. Apparently, sea levels are not rising and Britain's chief scientist is "an embarrassment" because he believes that catastrophe is inevitable. It is worth pointing to the close links between International Policy Network and Exxon Mobil, which gave the organisation $50,000. Exxon lists that donation as part of its climate change outreach programme. There are also close links with the Washington-based Competitive Enterprise Institute. We may be able to deduce from the comments of Julian Morris that there is an ulterior motive behind his denial of climate change.

I have already mentioned the Competitive Enterprise Institute, and Members may have heard the outrageous interview with Myron Ebell on the Radio 4 "Today" programme. He criticised Sir David King in hugely personal and outrageous terms and called climate change "a tissue of improbabilities", claiming that the objective was for Europe to "attack America's economic superiority". It is worth pointing out that the Competitive Enterprise Institute is also funded by Exxon Mobil—to the tune of $280,000 in 2001.

We could also mention Dr. Roger Bate of Tech Central Station. He also criticised Sir David King, who is fast becoming an object of derision for people associated with Exxon Mobil and others. He says that "it is especially shameful for the British to attempt limiting debate"— apparently that is what we are doing—

"in a country that had science suppressed far too often in the past."

I do not think that many hon. Members will recognise that description of this country. The House may be interested to know that Tech Central Station received $95,000 from Exxon Mobil last year for climate change activities.

I am sure that some people are genuine and well meaning. David Bellamy, the former environmentalist, has denied climate change in the newspapers. I am not sure that we can give much credit to his views, but I think that he is genuine. Tech Central Station, the Competitive Enterprise Institute and the International Policy Network are linked not by a belief that climate change is not happening, but by a need to advance an argument on behalf of those with a vested interest in action not being taken. A plethora of such articles has appeared in the press, supposedly from independent scientists. In fact, they are nothing of the sort: they are being paid by the oil industry to advance some very short-sighted arguments.

In the oil industry, Shell and BP have shown leadership. They embrace new technology and realise that we must change. There is a big difference between their activities and those of Exxon Mobil, which pretends that it can still keep its head in the sand.

Mr. Simon Thomas (Ceredigion) (PC): I acknowledge that Shell and BP accept the science of climate change and that they have invested in other technologies. However, those two companies have posted huge profits in the past week. That raises the question of why they do not invest significantly more in renewable and energy-saving technologies. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that they could be doing a damn sight more?

Norman Baker: Yes, they could. They have accepted the science and are going in the right direction, as the hon. Gentleman says. I am grateful for his intervention. It might encourage them to go further, as I believe that they should.

Mr. Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that a windfall tax on those producers would be a good idea? That money could be invested in renewable energy technologies, as has been suggested.

Norman Baker: I am not necessarily in favour of windfall taxes, but I believe that measures should be put in place to encourage companies to take the right steps. That can be achieved without a windfall tax, not least because it is in companies' economic interest to go down that road.

I want to speak briefly about media reporting of climate change. I make a particular plea to the producers of the "Today" programme on Radio 4. Can we please stop having artificial debates between those who believe that climate change is happening and the minority who say that they believe that it is not? We should move on from that: we need debates between politicians about how best to deal with the problem. Producers insist on presenting a ludicrous juxtaposition that does not help the argument. I very much hope that they will take what I say on board. We no longer argue about whether smoking causes lung cancer. That is now accepted, and I hope that BBC producers will accept that parallel.

I congratulate broadsheet newspapers such as The Independent and The Guardian on much of the exposure that they give to climate change and on the way that they raise the issue for readers, but it is not sufficient for their science editors simply to write a finite piece that causes people to think how dreadful things are. Politicians of all parties and countries should be engaged and asked what they are doing about the problem. The newspapers need to make the issue far more political than they have done so far.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab): It is slightly dangerous to go down the road of suggesting that people whose opinions may be erroneous or unpalatable should not have the right to express them on radio, if it is the presenters' choice that they should do so. I am generally in favour of what the hon. Gentleman is trying to do, but I think that that is dangerous.

Norman Baker: Let me reassure the Father of the House that no one is suggesting that people should be censored, or that the "Today" programme's editorial content should be determined by anyone other than the BBC. However, it is neither sensible nor editorially justifiable to give equal weight to both sides of an argument when the overwhelming scientific consensus is on one side. That consensus is so overwhelming that it should be taken as read. For instance, a person who wanted to say on Radio 4 that lung cancer was not related to smoking would be given short shrift. That is the comparison that I want to make.

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries) (Lab): To set the record straight, is the hon. Gentleman saying that we should listen to what is being said, and that programmes should have a mix that includes politicians? Surely he is not saying that other people should be set aside, and that politicians should take control?

Norman Baker: I am certainly not saying that. Programmes should dovetail scientists, politicians and pressure groups. That sort of arrangement applies in most other fields of policy, although it seems that it does not in respect of environment policy.

Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey) (LD): My hon. Friend has praised some elements of the press, and some of them do a very good job, but does he accept that the national media should also report what happens at a local and regional level? For example, one Sunday newspaper carried a very good story about the potential effect of climate change on a very old pub's daub and wattle structure. People realise that climate change affects faraway countries with which we have links, but they will be more likely to accept that they must change their lives and lifestyles if they understand that places in this country can suffer as well.

Norman Baker: I agree, and I should declare an interest: I own a building with wot and dobble—I mean wauble and dot—

Simon Hughes: Wattle and daub.

Norman Baker: With that particular method of construction—[Laughter.] That was how buildings were made many hundreds of years ago. As always, my hon. Friend makes a valuable point.

I turn now to the comments of Bjorn Lomborg, associate professor of political science at Anglia university. He was the author of a book entitled "Global Crises". I believe that he is well motivated, but in error. If some hon. Members disagree, I can say that I am being generous for the purpose of this debate.

Lomborg suggests that we should spend the money necessary to tackle global warming on other matters, such as helping developing countries with aid, and so on. I shall describe later how I do not believe that there is a net cost to the prevention of global warming, but I think that Lomborg misses the point. He is worried about developing countries, but they are the ones that suffer most from global warming. They will be hit first by the floods associated with warming, and their populations and lifestyles will absorb the biggest impact.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (East Surrey) (Con): Of the money given by the developed world to the developing world for energy projects, less than 3 per cent. is spent on renewable forms of energy. Does not the hon. Gentleman think that that is shocking? Should we not take that huge opportunity to get the latest technology to places where it will make a real difference?

Norman Baker: I absolutely agree. The hon. Gentleman is Chair of the Select Committee on Environmental Audit, and does a splendid job. Moreover, I watched him grill the Prime Minister very effectively this morning in the Liaison Committee.

All Governments—our own can do this through the Department for International Development and other Departments—need to look at how international development aid is spent. We need to know that the money we give in aid, for good reasons, is not making an environmental problem worse. In the end, developing countries need a secure environment even more than the UK does. It is an own goal to encourage fossil-fuel energy generation, as happens in some places.

It seems very likely that there will be an increase in global temperature of 2°C by the 2050s. The consequence for the developing world will be that an additional 250 million to 300 million people will be at risk of contracting malaria. Also, 12 million more people will be exposed to hunger as crop production falls, and 20 million more could suffer from coastal flooding. Clearly, that must be tackled. I suggest to Mr. Lomborg that merely giving aid and doing nothing else is like pouring water into a colander: it will not solve the problem.

Does tackling climate change have a negative economic impact? The Secretary of State will know that one reason given by the US for not engaging in the Kyoto process was the alleged damage to the US economy. Frankly, I think that that damage is somewhat overstated. To be fair to the Government, and their Tory predecessors, this country over the past 15 years has demonstrated an ability to disconnect economic growth from carbon emissions. That is a very important lesson to take out and sell to the Americans and to others who are sceptical about the proposition.

Mr. Simon Thomas: It is true that carbon emissions can be decoupled from economic growth, but does the hon. Gentleman agree that the aviation industry is the exception and that the problem that it poses needs to be tackled? Under Kyoto, this country has generally succeeded in decreasing emissions, but the aviation industry and some parts of the transport sector remain problematic. Does he agree that the decoupling that he describes has to happen in those sectors as well?

Norman Baker: I agree, and I shall come to that later, if time allows.

One of the first things we must do is to end the "predict and provide" policy on airport growth, which the Government seem to have accepted. Secondly, fiscal measures must be introduced to put pressure on airlines for greater efficiency in minimising carbon emissions, which will soar if we do not take action soon.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): On economic cost, is my hon. Friend aware that a Friends of the Earth report in 1997 predicted that, by 2030, the period between storm surges of the magnitude previously expected once every 100 years will be reduced to 12 years in Holyhead, five years in Cardiff and three and a half years in Milford Haven? The resulting damage will give rise to untold economic costs, and investment now is likely to pay for itself many times over in preventing damage in the first world, let alone the third.

Norman Baker: That is right, and there are two equations. The first is the cost of doing nothing. Those who say, "Let's not take action because it would damage the economy," fail to cost in the effects of doing nothing, which are significant. Flood defence work is required in this country, but that is not the only example. Doing nothing will have huge economic costs. Parliamentary answers I have received have suggested that the total cost of damage to the environment in 2004 was £67 billion. Not all of that arose from climate change, but much of it did. That is the cost of doing nothing.

Mr. Gummer: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that another argument is that the United States Department of Energy showed that it could meet its Kyoto targets without harming its economy or changing the lifestyle of its people? The problem is that the targets are not high enough, but it is an absolute lie to suggest that they cannot be met other than by damaging the economy.

Norman Baker: The right hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. I note that Spencer Abraham has left the US Department of Energy since that report was issued, and those two facts may not be unconnected.

The right hon. Gentleman may want to refer to what Bill Clinton said in 1997 when he was President:

"The conversion of fuel to energy use is extremely inefficient and could be made much cleaner with existing technologies or those already on the horizon, in ways that will not weaken the economy but in fact will add to our strength in new businesses and new jobs. If we do this properly, we will not jeopardize our prosperity—we will increase it."

That is right and those who are concerned about the economic impact of tackling change should realise that it is not damaging, but an opportunity.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. Has he seen, by any chance, the report sponsored by the World Wildlife Fund, "Cry Wolf", which charts the way in which industry has consistently exaggerated the costs of incoming environmental legislation? Is he aware that Digby Jones came before the Environmental Audit Committee recently and could not name a single British company that had left the United Kingdom because of environmental laws?

Norman Baker: The hon. Gentleman is right to draw attention to that report. I am glad that not all parts of industry are negative. Some are forward-thinking and the work of the Carbon Trust is useful in that connection. For example, BP spent $20 million to implement its energy reduction strategy between 1998 and 2001. It embarked on that for environmental reasons, but released almost $650 million in financial savings in just three years. There is no doubt that such action can be economically as well as environmentally beneficial.

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that one of the most important elements of ensuring that industry does not lose out economically from the business reaction to climate change is the security of forward signals for its future business? In that context, would he comment on the wisdom of abolishing some of those forward signals—for example, the climate change levy?

Norman Baker: It would be extremely detrimental if the climate change levy were abolished and not replaced with something as or more effective—we would argue for a carbon tax. Pressure is being applied gently and should be increased, and it would send entirely the wrong signals to industry if that pressure were removed. All political parties should think carefully about manifesto proposals that might send the wrong signals for tackling climate change.

I could give other examples, but will not do so for the good reason of lack of time. However, there is no shortage of businesses that have taken action on the environment, often because they believe that they should do so for reasons of conscience, and have seen large consequential increases in their productivity and profits.

Mr. Gummer: Does that not lead the hon. Gentleman to be displeased with the Government for going back to the European Union and reneging on their original proposal? They pretended that that had something to do with bureaucracy in the European Union, but the reason was that the CBI was leaning on the Prime Minister and the Prime Minister gave way, as he always does on this matter.

Norman Baker: One of the joys of making speeches on the environment in the presence of hon. Members who are well aware of the facts is that they anticipate my points, although that is sometimes unhelpful to the continuity of my speech.

I agree that the position on the national allocation plan is unfortunate. The Government have reneged on the original targets and pulled back from them. That sent exactly the wrong message to countries in the EU that have not yet signed up. It is unhelpful if we send out conflicting messages saying that it is a good scheme but that we shall partly renege on it. The Government say that they have more information, which caused them to change their view. How convenient. That might be true, but does not seem convincing on paper.

I understood that the outcome of the dispute between the European Union and the Government was going to be cleared up this week. However, The Daily Telegraph, which I always read because it is a most reliable newspaper—I am sure that hon. Members agree, tongue in cheek—said today that the European Commission has forced Ministers to delay an announcement yet again until the matter is sorted out. When the Secretary of State or the Minister replies, perhaps they will clarify where we are with a national allocation plan, whether agreement has been reached and, if so, on what basis. If we have reduced our target—the reason would probably be pressure from uneducated elements of business—it would be unfortunate and unhelpful to the international efforts of the Prime Minister to convince others to treat climate change seriously.

On the international situation, first, I welcome the fact that the Prime Minister and the Government have made climate change one of the two priorities for our EU and G8 presidencies. That is absolutely right and if we were in government, we would probably have picked the same two priorities. We are pleased that that is the Prime Minister's approach and it is clear that he is giving time to it and that a lot of work is going on behind the scenes with the Secretary of State for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and others in difficult negotiating territory. We support them in their negotiations and I hope that we can provide constructive support, as well as constructive criticism in an attempt to be helpful.

The United States Administration are the predominant problem, but we also need to accept the situation in developing countries, such as China, India and Brazil, whose economies are fast-growing. China has an immensely fast-running economy; it is almost unbelievable how fast it is growing. The result will be an increase in energy consumption, and we have a key role to play in such countries' choice of whether they will base their energy needs on renewable resources, fossil fuel, or nuclear options. If those developing countries ask why they should sort out the mess created by the western world and suffer the brunt of the problem, as they might, we must have a good answer. We must make it clear that we got it wrong in many ways, but that we now have collective responsibility throughout the world to try to sort it out. If we do not sort it out, they will suffer even more than we will.

Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): The hon. Gentleman referred to developing countries, the central feature of which is population growth. The world's population is increasing by around 250,000 a day and the main growth is in India and China, but they are not using modern renewable technologies. Does he acknowledge that population growth is a key factor in climate change?

Norman Baker: All human activity is key in climate change, and population growth is one factor. It is important that as far as possible our international development and other policies encourage sustainable living. Population growth is best tackled by providing security and a decent standard of living in developing countries. That will take pressure off population growth, as we have seen in Europe, where it is much lower than in Africa. The way forward is to take an enlightened approach to those countries.

I want to touch briefly on the tactics adopted by the Government towards their partners in the EU and the G8. In December, my colleague the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell), the Lib Dem shadow Foreign Secretary, and I wrote to the Foreign Secretary about the tactics to be deployed in negotiations with the United States. I appreciate that the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs will not want to lay bare those tactics before the House, but it is important to understand that there are two possible ways to proceed. The first is to assume that the United States genuinely does not believe the science, and to spend much time and effort to persuade the US that the science is there. The alternative is to assume that the US knows the science but pretends not to—which is where I think we are—and that it is stalling for time in an effort not to bring in measures that are inevitable. I am frightened that the British Government are spending too much time taking the American position at face value and thus neglecting the opportunity to make more progress. Kyoto will come in next week, in the teeth of US opposition, so it is important that those who have signed up to Kyoto take this opportunity to go forward together. If we go forward together strongly, the US will follow at some point. Furthermore, without causing diplomatic incidents, we should work with individual US states—in the north-east, California and elsewhere—which are actually doing good stuff.

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): And Canada and Mexico.

Norman Baker: Indeed. Those states and countries are moving forward on emissions trading and tackling climate change. American business, too, increasingly recognises the opportunities in the world from tackling climate change. That is what is happening from the grassroots up in the US, but it has not yet reached the White House.

We need to encourage those elements. What we must not do, in any circumstances, is to try to find a halfway house that brings the Americans on board but would involve abandoning key targets to get them to sign a piece of paper that the Prime Minister can wave Chamberlain-style saying, "Climate change agreement in our time." We must avoid that at all costs.

I am worried. Although I believe that the Prime Minister is well intentioned, I am not convinced that he has the diplomatic skills to get the right result in his negotiations with President Bush. A whole range of issues, whether the International Criminal Court, Iraq or even the Chancellor's laudable attempts to secure debt relief, are being stopped, stymied, blocked or opposed by the United States. It is difficult to think of anything that the US has done recently that is helpful to the UK. Our special relationship with the United States is peculiar; it is all give on one side and all take on the other. That seems a peculiar arrangement. I wonder whether it is seriously worth pursuing the idea that we can secure any agreement from the Americans. That is not to say that we should not talk to them. We can agree on matters such as technology and investment in technology and we can agree to share science and so on, but we must not in any circumstances allow the US to be a brake on the post-Kyoto arrangements. We must ensure that those arrangements are put in place with the countries that are willing to agree to them. We must also ensure that they include targets.

The Secretary of State will be aware of a report in The Observer that suggested that in the December Council the British Government made an attempt to abandon the 2050 target for a 60 per cent. reduction in carbon dioxide emissions. We were told subsequently that that was a tactic by the British Government and that in March the policy would come back in.

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Margaret Beckett): I do not want to detain the House, but that was not a tactic by the Government. It was a mistake by The Observer.

Norman Baker: I am sure that The Observer will have seen that and will reply at length on Sunday. Sadly, none of us has the opportunity to do so in that particular format. However, I have seen the minutes so I take the Secretary of State's comment with a pinch of salt. It looked to me, from reading the minutes, as though The Observer was accurate, but never mind, we will take the matter at face value.

I have not concentrated on domestic policy because it is important to get the international scene right. With due respect to the Government, however, if they are to achieve credibility abroad they must deliver real progress at home. Grandiose speeches abroad are no substitute for action at home. I do not pretend that it is easy or that all the problems can be solved overnight, but there are significant shortcomings in the Government's performance that must be addressed. One is Government structure. The Government, sadly in my view, abandoned the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, which for the first time brought transport and the environment together in a sensible way. We now have DEFRA, which, with due respect to the Secretary of State, does not carry the same weight in the Government as the Treasury or the Department of Trade and Industry.

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): It does.

Norman Baker: I should be very surprised if that were so. I can give the Minister chapter and verse, whether on the national allocation plan, abandoned cars or a range of other issues, to show how DEFRA has lost out to the DTI time and time again recently.

Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet) (Con): As well as the desperate need significantly to reduce carbon emissions, we are making a double whammy of the crisis. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman has mentioned that fact. It has been calculated that over the past 25 years we have chopped down 5 million sq km of rain forest—the one instrument, so to speak, that can actually mop up carbon dioxide emissions. That 5 million sq km is equivalent to 20 times the size of the land mass of the United Kingdom.

Norman Baker: That is a good point, which demonstrates how impossible it is to cover the whole range of issues in a speech such as this, especially as I do not want to take any more time from the other Members who want to speak.

The Government must make more progress on transport, where there has been a big increase in emissions which is out of control. Road traffic will grow by about 25 per cent. over this decade alone. Public transport fares are rocketing. The cost of travelling by rail has gone up by 84 per cent. since 1974 and is about to increase again; the cost of travelling by bus has grown by 71 per cent., while the cost of motoring has gone down. We have the aviation problems to which the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Thomas) rightly referred earlier and they, too, need to be tackled. Stephen Tindale of Greenpeace has said that the Government have failed and that they seem to have given up on controlling emissions from transport. That is a big problem and the Government must sort it out. They must also ensure that their energy White Paper, which contains many good ideas, is brought to fruition.

The motion sets out the absolute importance of the need to take urgent action on the serious threat facing the planet from climate change. It recognises the need to engage the US and developing countries, and calls on the Government to ensure that that is a key priority. I hope very much that the House will support the motion.

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Margaret Beckett): I find myself in a rather unusual position for a Minister taking part in an Opposition day debate. Although, inevitably, I do not agree with everything that the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) has just said, I am in agreement with the sentiments expressed in the motion. As the opening words of the motion draw attention to the overwhelming importance and gravity of the threat of climate change, it is welcome and not altogether surprising that there should be common ground and agreement on both sides of the House, or at least in most parts of the House.

Climate change is a global problem—probably, as the motion says, the most urgent challenge facing the global community. It requires not only political leadership but ultimately a global solution. The Prime Minister, as is acknowledged across the world, is doing his utmost to provide that leadership and is leading international efforts to tackle climate change. It was his decision to make climate change a top priority for both our G8 and our EU presidencies. I welcome the recognition of that fact in the Liberal Democrat motion.

I begin by reiterating, as did the hon. Member for Lewes in his opening speech, the sheer breadth of consensus on the science of climate change—a degree of consensus, which, as he said, is not always reflected in the way in which scientific discussion is reported. Over about 18 years, the intergovernmental panel on climate change has brought together more than 1,000 international scientific experts on climate change.

The IPCC's third assessment report in 2001 concluded that there was strong evidence that climate change owing to human emissions of greenhouse gases was already occurring and that future emissions of greenhouse gases were likely to raise global temperatures by between 1.4 and 5.8° C during this century. I am always conscious of the fact that that does not sound very much, but I am equally conscious of the fact that the scientific evidence suggests that such a rise in temperature would have a wide range of impacts both on the natural world and, in consequence, on human society.

Nevertheless, some are still questioning whether we should worry about climate change. The most vociferous challenges that we hear nearly all come from self-proclaimed experts with little real expertise, whose arguments nevertheless receive attention that is out of all proportion to either their numbers or their relevance. That is not unprecedented, of course. The hon. Member for Lewes gave the example of those who query the link between lung cancer and smoking, and there are still more who still query the link between HIV and AIDS. So that phenomenon is not uncommon, but it is dangerous.

I will not reiterate the examples that the hon. Gentleman gave, but I will make an observation about one of those whom he quoted. As he rightly says, Professor Lomborg talks instead about diverting resources that could be used to help to tackle the problems of climate change to tackle those of development. Indeed, we all accept that development needs to be addressed, but the real danger of his argument is that if we follow the route that he prescribes—the hon. Gentleman used the example of pouring water into a colander—we would certainly be in danger of running to stand still, because of trying to tackle impacts that we were not seeking to mitigate. Such people must not be allowed to divert us from the real question, which is not whether climate change is happening, but what we could and should do about it.

Simon Hughes: May I add a further consensual proposition? We have the very unusual circumstance of an Opposition motion on the Order Paper without an amendment from the Government or the Conservative party. There is consensus among the main parties, and broad consensus among those outside who know what they are talking about. Will the right hon. Lady join us—I know that she tries to do this all the time—in persuading the media to place more importance on the huge international issues on which there is agreement than on ridiculous attempts to divide us on matters of zero importance to people abroad, let alone people at home?

Margaret Beckett: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point. Of course, I understand the anxiety expressed by the Father of the House, my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). No one is talking about stifling debate, but there is no harm in giving a proper weighting and relevance to the different contributions to that debate, and I share the view expressed by the hon. Gentleman and his colleague the hon. Member for Lewes that, unfortunately, that still does not seem to be happening in many parts of the media, which give entirely disproportionate space, time and coverage to those whose views are neither widely shared nor widely respected.

The international community has taken an unprecedented and significant step. It is particularly significant in this context because it is clear that the whole international community has accepted the science of climate change and thereby agreed to the Kyoto protocol, whose entry into force we will celebrate next Wednesday. But the Kyoto protocol is just a first tiny step towards tackling climate change. There is little doubt that the uncertainty of the past year or so about when and—indeed, at some stages—whether it would come into force had led to a loss of momentum in international discussions on climate change, and we urgently need to renew that momentum. That is why the Prime Minister put climate change, with Africa, at the top of the international political agenda this year.

Mr. Dalyell: Has my right hon. Friend had the opportunity to make clear her views to either the BBC or the other media on the balance of reporting between those who recognise climate change and those who, for whatever reason, do not? If she has, what answers has she had?

Margaret Beckett: I have not made formal representations because I must admit to my hon. Friend that, over my years in politics, I have not found that formal protests to the news media about such issues are very productive. However, I am aware—I think that this is widely known—that, for example, a thoughtful, well-constructed letter making exactly that point but not challenging people's right to be heard has been sent to such organisations from national representatives of four of the best known non-governmental organisations. I thought for a day or so that that plea had been heard, but in more recent days, there is some evidence that it has been set aside yet again. I share my hon. Friend's view that it would be advantageous to us all if we could move on from what is a very sterile dispute into the much more difficult territory of what we do and how we do it most effectively.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the people who say that climate change is not real and is not happening can have quite a damaging effect on our ability to take effective action, by giving people an opportunity and an excuse to say that they do not need to change their lifestyles? That could have a very damaging impact on the future.

Margaret Beckett: I agree with my hon. Friend that, indeed, such claims can have a damaging effect, and some of their manifestations are more bizarre than others. I was faintly surprised to hear that someone is now suggesting that there is no evidence of sea level rise. I should have thought that that was one of the easiest things to observe—in fact, it is taking place.

Our presidencies of the G8 and the EU give us the opportunity this year to refocus political attention both on the scale of the challenge and, indeed, on how we can meet it. As the Prime Minister said at the Davos meeting of the World Economic Forum, we need to send a clear signal of our common direction of travel to show that we are united as a world community in moving in the direction of greenhouse gas reductions, thus making that a signal that business and the global economy will understand and can follow. We need to underpin that with a firm push for research and technology and for the implementation of technological developments. We need to reach out to the developing world, both to those rapidly industrialising economies whose growing energy needs must be met sustainably and to the least developed countries, which—again, as the hon. Member for Lewes said—stand to lose most from the effects of climate change.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: I do not wish to sound churlish and I hear what the right hon. Lady says and welcome the prominence given to the issue in the EU presidency, but has she spoken recently to the Foreign Office, which produced a Command Paper called "Prospects for the EU in 2005" this month? One might have thought that that provided an opportunity to set out the stall for the objectives on climate change, but climate change is mentioned in only two of 97 paragraphs in that document. That does not fill me with confidence that the Foreign Office, at least, has seized that agenda.

Margaret Beckett: I take the hon. Gentleman's point, and I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary would do so, too. I simply say that what the Foreign Office was seeking to do in that paper was to highlight the things that perhaps people do not know are very much already on the agenda, but I assure the hon. Gentleman that we have the utmost help and co-operation from the Foreign Office, from the Foreign Secretary and, not least, from the many more junior members of the Foreign Office who are in place in our posts in all the various countries with which we need to work and who provide an excellent and very co-operative service, working with my Department, to spread some of these messages. I understand the anxiety that the hon. Gentleman highlights, but I assure him that the Foreign Office is very much on side.

To map our direction of travel, we need to be guided by the best scientific evidence on the potential impact of climate change. That is why at the start of our G8 year, at the Met Office in Exeter last week, we convened a meeting of the top international scientists working on climate change. Those at the meeting concluded that, compared with the IPCC's last assessment in 2001, there is now greater clarity and less uncertainty about the impact of climate change across a wide range of systems, sectors and societies. In many cases, those at the meeting suggested that the risks are more serious than previously thought.

Those at the conference noted that there is evidence that the sensitivity of the climate system to greenhouse gas emissions is now likely to be higher than was believed even in 2001, and that that implies a greater likelihood both of temperature increase and of damaging impacts at lower levels of greenhouse gases in the atmosphere. Those at the conference also noted that delaying taking action is likely to require greater action later to achieve the same temperature target, and suggested that even a delay of only five years could be significant.

As I read those words, I was reminded of a remark that an American business man made to me in Davos—it used sailing as a metaphor, so perhaps it is appropriate today. He said that if it is thought necessary to change course, the earlier one does so, the smaller the course correction can be. The later one leaves it, the greater the course correction, and if one leaves it too late, sometimes sufficient correction cannot be made. That is an apposite and useful example.

Mr. Dalyell: Before my right hon. Friend leaves the subject of the Exeter meeting, may I ask her a question? She will know, because the Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment wound up the meeting, that last Tuesday Professor Mitchell of the Met Office in Exeter, along with Sir David King, emphasised the difficulties that arise when rain falls instead of slow-melting snow, because it comes down much more quickly and there is thus less time for absorption. May I take it that that subject is a top research priority?

Margaret Beckett: We are indeed examining that matter. I am mindful of the remarks from the end of the conference, and we are all conscious, whether owing to snow melt or other events such as those in Boscastle recently, of the way in which changes to the pattern of water flows can make a significant difference to previously expected circumstances.

The report of the science conference uses measured and careful words, but it gives a clear message to politicians. It underlines the urgency of action, and we must ensure that that message is widely heard in the G8, in the EU, at the UN and in our constituencies—wherever climate change is discussed. However, we will not achieve progress simply by reiterating the scale of the threat. We also need to demonstrate that the global community can meet the challenge successfully. As the Prime Minister said in Davos, if we put forward as a solution to climate change something that involves drastic cuts in growth or standards of living, it simply will not be accepted, not least by the poorest countries and societies for which survival itself requires development.

Fortunately, that need not be the case. The UK set out two years ago in the energy White Paper our commitment to cutting our emissions by 60 per cent. by about 2050. We believe that the target is achievable without sacrificing our economy, as our economic analysis suggests. Indeed, the impact of unchecked climate change would be far more damaging to our economy. We therefore hope that others will consider not only following that analysis, but setting similar long-term goals.

Perhaps because we have all been focused on the scale of the challenge, the international community has hitherto spent too little time discussing and co-operating on the strategic challenges of moving to a low-carbon economy. That is why next month, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and I will host a round-table discussion for Energy and Environment Ministers from 20 countries that will focus on such issues. It will be a unique forum to bring together countries with significant and growing energy needs and cut across the usual divides between both developed and developing economies, and ministerial portfolios. The round-table discussion will examine the challenges of stimulating research, technology and investment to tackle climate change, and will try to identify some of the ways forward.

All countries need to be engaged in the effort to tackle climate change, including the world's largest economy and biggest greenhouse gas emitter, the United States.

There is evidence, although I do not suggest that it has been evident in the Chamber today, that some may want to use this issue to engage in grand political gestures and to isolate the US for its regrettable refusal to ratify the Kyoto protocol. There is evidence that some people hope that the US will somehow, through isolation, be drawn back into international dialogue or agreement. That is not a credible strategy. We have already seen from the Kyoto protocol the problems that can be stored up if we do not build the underlying political acceptance needed to deliver our objectives: acceptance is required for the exercise of political will. The Government will thus continue, bilaterally and with our EU partners, to engage the United States intensively in climate change discussions at all levels. We will, of course, do that through the G8, but not exclusively so.

Paddy Tipping: There has been remarkable consensus in the Chamber today, but is it not the case that the programme advocated by the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) is based around the isolation of the United States? Surely we must engage with the largest producer of carbon, hold sensible discussions and acknowledge the work that is being done there so that we can find an appropriate way forward in all our interests.

Margaret Beckett: In fairness to the hon. Member for Lewes—perhaps I misunderstood him—I do not entirely share my hon. Friend's interpretation of his remarks. However, I assure my hon. Friend that we believe that we will stand our best chance of success through engagement.

Malcolm Bruce: Is not the reality that the Liberal Democrats are expressing frustration with the United States because its technology on, and capacity for, energy conservation would allow it to gain the most from, and give the most to, solving the problem? We must of course enlist its technology in addition to our own to solve the problem. Expressing frustration is not the same as not engaging.

Margaret Beckett: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that clarification. I am sure that everyone in the House shares his view on the need for such technological engagement. Indeed, we welcome the focus that the present American Administration have put on research and technology. We must avoid the trap of depicting policy frameworks and technology development as not only alternative, but mutually exclusive, ways of tackling climate change. We take the view that both are essential. In the absence of mandatory policies at federal level, we welcome the fact that several American states are increasingly putting their own innovative policies in place. We are co-operating with those who wish to learn from the UK and EU experience.

The Government have consistently sought to provide leadership on climate change. We have done that through our leading role in the negotiations at Kyoto, Bonn and Marrakech, through our ambitious national targets—our 12.5 per cent. Kyoto commitment, our 20 per cent. nationally set carbon dioxide goal for 2010, and our longer-term 60 per cent. objective for 2050—and through our ground-breaking programmes of national action to deliver them.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: Does my right hon. Friend agree that plant diversity can play an important part in climate change? The World Conservation Monitoring Centre, which is based in Cambridge and funded by the United Nations Environment Programme, is a worthy institute that needs consistent and sustained funding to do its work properly. Will she give a commitment to try to find a stable source of funding for that greatly renowned institute?

Margaret Beckett: I agree with my hon. Friend's general point about the importance of plant diversity, and I understand her anxieties. We are conscious not only of the consistent funding difficulties of the United Nations Environment Programme, but of the discussions that have been taking place about the centre. Although I cannot undertake to solve its problems, my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment continues to be engaged in discussions on the matter.

I referred to the programmes of action that the Government have put in place. They include the climate change levy, climate change agreements, the world's first economy-wide emissions trading scheme, the renewables obligation, our energy efficiency commitment and the work of the Carbon and Energy Saving Trusts. However, we recognise the need for further action to meet our commitments, which is why a review of our climate change strategy itself is under way.

Incredibly, it appears—I hope that we will flush out a denial during the debate—that although the official Opposition claim, I think, to share those common goals, they propose to sweep much of that away. The Conservatives' response to the biggest threat to our quality of life and our children's future has been to oppose some of the most important elements of our climate change programmes. The Conservatives opposed the climate change levy, which has effectively provided business with an incentive to cut emissions and financed new initiatives to do so, such as the Carbon Trust. All revenue from the levy is recycled to support businesses in cutting emissions, which casts doubt on any proposal for its abolition. The Conservatives have also opposed our proposals for the EU emissions trading scheme and, apparently, the Government's renewable energy programme. That is all too consistent with their wider environmental agenda, as the motion points out. Their proposals under the James review include slashing spending in some of the most important elements of our environmental protection and conservation work.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Margaret Beckett: I shall be pleased to give way; I hope that the hon. Gentleman is about to tell me that his policy has changed.

Mr. Paice: I want the Secretary of State to go back over the accusation that she made against the Opposition about the European emissions trading policy. On what basis does she suggest that we have opposed the European emissions trading scheme?

Margaret Beckett: I am afraid that I am not carrying any Hansard references with me—[Interruption]—but that is certainly the impression that we have been given. If that is not the Conservative party's policy, I am delighted to hear it. Would the hon. Gentleman like to tell me from the Dispatch Box that the Conservatives do not propose to abolish the climate change levy? Perhaps he would like to confirm that, as we understand from the last time that the Opposition were asked about the issue, the Conservative party does not feel able yet to support our 60 per cent. target on cutting greenhouse gas emissions. I see that that, too, seems still to be Conservative policy—or rather lack of policy.

Richard Ottaway: In attacking the Conservatives on the climate change levy, is the right hon. Lady not missing an important point about carbon trading, which I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) has confirmed we are supporting? With carbon trading, the climate change levy becomes ineffective. The climate is not changed; it is not a levy but a tax.

Margaret Beckett: I do not share the hon. Gentleman's point of view, but I am grateful to him for intervening, because it gave my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment the opportunity to remind me of what led us to what I have been told is the erroneous conclusion that the Conservative party does not support the EU emissions trading scheme. We were led into that error by their praying against the regulations that introduced the scheme. It is clearly a mistake to think that that had anything to do with their policy. We were also led into the error by the continued criticism, which I am sure I recall hearing from the Opposition Benches, that the targets, including the initial national allocation plan which we have since sought to amend, were too harsh on British industry. A sinner who repents is always welcome.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): The motion also mentions the Environment Agency. Does my right hon. Friend agree that the agency does sterling work? For example, it helps to respond to increasing extremes of weather, such as flooding, and has driven up the quality of our drinking, bathing and river water to a superb level. Is that not because of consistent and substantial Government funding?

Margaret Beckett: My hon. Friend is entirely right in drawing attention both to the value of much of the work of the Environment Agency and to Government funding and the dangers of the James review proposals. The Conservatives propose to take £47 million from the Environment Agency through 1,286 job cuts among those whom they dismiss as operational staff. They are the very people who clean up after disasters, whether in the circumstances that my hon. Friend has identified or those involving the Sea Empress, which caused a massive oil spill off the Welsh coast in 1996.

The Conservatives also gloss over the role of those whom they intend to sack in enforcing the rules on, for example, fly-tipping—abandoned cars, beds and other rubbish—which blights so many landscapes and brings great misery to many ordinary families and communities. Again, that is consistent at least with the voting pattern that the Tory Opposition have displayed. That is why they opposed the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill on Second Reading on 10 January, when they said that such matters were "urban issues" and not rural concerns. This Government disagree, and think that our proposals will improve the local environment for all in urban and rural areas.

Let us consider the Tory approach to climate change. Claiming to recognise the dangers while rejecting potential solutions is not merely backward-looking but typically short-sighted. The motion correctly stresses that it is possible to grow our economy and cut greenhouse gas emissions. Between 1990 and 2003, our gross domestic product went up by 32 per cent., while our greenhouse gas emissions went down by about 14 per cent.

Mr. Simon Thomas: The right hon. Lady is right about the global figures, but surely she is concerned that emissions from transport have gone up and, as I said earlier, aviation emissions have risen significantly. Aviation is covered by international agreements, but we can do something about transport in this country. Does she accept that motoring overall has become cheaper and that the cost of public transport has significantly risen? If so, what will she and the Treasury do to ensure that we encourage motorists to take the cheapest and least environmentally damaging form of transport, saving on carbon emissions? Surely there must be a strategy for dealing with that aspect of emissions.

Margaret Beckett: I accept the hon. Gentleman's point that transport emissions are a very important factor. He referred to the issue of aviation emissions and he is right that they can only be tackled internationally. I hope that he is aware that one of the Government's goals during our EU presidency is to move towards bringing aviation emissions into the second phase of the EU emissions trading scheme. There are many technical problems to solve before that can be done, but it would certainly be a worthwhile and constructive outcome.

The hon. Gentleman is unduly harsh on the Department for Transport and on the Government's overall record on transport emissions. First, the Department for Transport has joined my Department and the DTI in our climate change goals and public service agreements. Secondly, if he looks back at the structure of company car taxation that we inherited, he will see that substantial changes have been made to that, as well as the changes to the taxation structure that the Chancellor made to encourage the use of more environmentally friendly fuel. So it is not the case that steps have not been taken, but I accept that there is a great deal more to do on that, as on other fronts. That is part of the purpose of our climate change programme review.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: The Secretary of State will be aware that among organisations engaged in education on sustainable development there is considerable anxiety about funding, the end of the landfill tax credit funding scheme and the transfer of responsibilities to the Department for Education and Skills. Does she accept that very much part of the solution to all the great difficulties that we face when dealing with climate change is better education? What reassurance can she offer those organisations that they will continue to receive such Government funding?

Margaret Beckett: Obviously, I cannot give an assurance that every programme will be supported in quite the same way, but we looked very carefully at the programmes that were supported under previous schemes to try to achieve the maximum value for money, which I am sure the hon. Gentleman would be the first to seek and to applaud. Although I entirely share his view that it is through education that many of the problems can be tackled, I have little doubt that the Department for Education and Skills is as committed to that as my Department. The previous Secretary of State certainly took the issue very seriously and I have no cause whatever to doubt that his successor takes it no less seriously.

I have talked about the way in which these issues are handled and how we seek to make 2005 a year of international leadership. We will use our EU presidency to encourage EU colleagues to meet their Kyoto targets; to set out a medium and long-term strategy for the EU beyond Kyoto, working towards the guideline of limiting global temperature increase to no more than 2° C, which is an existing EU guideline; and above all to engage the EU in a debate about further action with the wider international community.

I do not want to be diverted, but perhaps this is the point at which to say to the hon. Member for Lewes, who raised the story in The Observer, that there has been a genuine misunderstanding. We all understand that it is always a problem when journalists get hold of a document that they believe to be exclusive, as they often become rather more excited than the content justifies. The European Commission is undertaking on behalf of the whole Community exactly the analysis of the scientific and economic impact of measures that might be taken that we undertook before we drew up our energy White Paper and agreed to our 60 per cent. target. We expect the publication of that analysis this month. It will be considered in the March Council, which will discuss its implications for any medium and long-term targets or goals that the EU might set. The Environment Council was unanimous in resisting attempts to get member states to commit themselves to a number the month before the analysis was published, rather than wait until the month after. That never struck us as a good way to make policy, but I concede that there have been misunderstandings.

In the past few months, there have been some encouraging signals in the international dialogue. It was inevitably becalmed while people wondered whether the Kyoto protocol would come into force, or whether we needed to build on the consensus behind it by some alternative means, but Russia's welcome decision to ratify has been accompanied by two other recent developments. First, everyone has begun to focus more on how we can adapt to the climate changes already built in by human activity in the past century: focusing on adaptation, especially on supporting and assisting the most vulnerable, heightens awareness of the need to find ways to avert even greater dangers and to mitigate our impact on the environment. Secondly, recognition has grown of the fact that, especially in economies such as ours, with increased challenges come increased opportunities. The most obvious are the opportunities to save money while saving carbon—opportunities highlighted by the Carbon Trust and the Energy Saving Trust—but, while welcome, they are a small part of the potential economic benefits of tackling climate change. New jobs—even new industries—are growing up around us: four years ago, 170,000 people were employed in environmental industries, which had a turnover of some £16 billion; today, there are 400,000 such jobs and turnover has reached £25 billion.

Despite those real opportunities, which we must seize, as the world's top scientists recently reconfirmed, climate change remains a serious threat to our world—not in some far distant future, but in our own and our children's and grandchildren's lifetimes. It is a problem crying out for leadership. The Prime Minister has committed the Government to providing that leadership and I hope that the House will agree to support us in doing so by giving its support to the motion.

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk) (Con): I warmly congratulate the Liberal Democrats on choosing the subject of today's debate, and I welcome the Secretary of State to her place. Although I am not sure who wrote her speech, I strongly advise her to sack them. I profoundly deplore the fact that, in relation to such an important subject on which there is so much consensus across the House, she has continued in this debate to display the bad habits that she recently displayed on Radio 4 by making assertions that have no basis in fact. I shall deal with her Radio 4 remarks later in my speech, but on the specific matter of emissions trading, let me point out that everyone knows that the Conservative party has always, without reservation, supported the principle. It is both ignorant and outrageous of her to suggest otherwise, and she does herself and the Government no good in the eyes of those who take an interest in the subject, including many distinguished non-governmental organisations, by making wholly unfounded allegations about the Conservative party, its record and its policy.

This is an unusual Opposition day. No Government amendment to the motion has been tabled, because the Liberal Democrats' motion does not criticise the Government at all but merely attacks the Conservatives. That might give a clue to the Liberal Democrats' intentions, but I have to say, in a spirit of co-operation, that given the last Conservative Government's excellent record on climate change, it is regrettable that the motion only attacks the Conservative party, especially as all the progress made by Britain in cutting carbon dioxide emissions was achieved when the Conservative Government were in power, and since Labour came to office no further progress has been made. I therefore find it rather extraordinary that the Liberal Democrats have included the section in question in their motion, although, to be fair to the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker), he scarcely referred to it in his speech. Perhaps he realised that it did not fit well with the general tone of his speech, with much of which I agree.

Let me deal briefly with the rather silly attack on the Conservative party in the motion by making it clear that when the next Conservative Government have reached the happy stage of being able to abolish the climate change levy—a clumsy and crude tax, which has not achieved most of the benefits claimed for it and whose main purpose, as my hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) pointed out, is removed once an emissions trading scheme is operating effectively—we shall continue to fund the Carbon Trust, the national insurance contributions concessions, the enhanced capital allowances and the other measures that the levy has paid for out of general taxation.

Mr. Morley indicated dissent.

Mr. Yeo: There is nothing new in this—it is all on the record. Perhaps the Minister is trying to apologise for the outrageous assertions made by the Secretary of State, for which there was no basis in fact.

In addition, we shall introduce other market instruments, including changes to the tax system, to ensure that businesses and individuals are encouraged to act in an environmentally friendly way.

Twelve years have passed since I was a Minister of State at the former Department of the Environment responsible for, among other things, climate change policy. I was convinced then that the evidence that the world's climate was changing was irrefutable, and it seemed to me that the likelihood of those changes being caused at least in part by human activity was very strong. Today, I believe the evidence is even stronger. Few people—apart from those with vested interests, some of whom were named by the hon. Member for Lewes—attempt to deny either the scale or the urgency of the challenge we face. The chief scientific adviser certainly does not: he has called climate change

"the most serious issue facing us this century."

In his view,

"Action is affordable. Inaction is not."

A basic duty of Government is to protect citizens against external threats. Defending the borders and policing the streets have long been accepted as part of that duty; another part should be protecting citizens against the consequences of climate change. Achieving the goal of climate stability is a prerequisite of economic prosperity in any part of the world. The present generation of political leaders will be judged not only by how they handle the threat of terrorism but by how they respond to the challenge of climate change.

Fifteen years ago, Britain's Government responded well. My noble Friend Baroness Thatcher was the first Head of Government of any major country to take climate change seriously. Her statesmanlike approach, coupled with the quality of Britain's scientists, gave us international leadership on this important issue. Later, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) played a key role in persuading the United States to sign the Rio treaty. When Labour came to power, hopes were high that Britain's distinguished contribution to confronting the challenge would continue, and the negotiation of the Kyoto treaty was a positive step. The right hon. Member for Oldham, West and Royton (Mr. Meacher), who is sadly no longer a member of the Government, grappled intelligently and bravely with the issues, but regrettably his proved to be a lone voice inside the Government. Gradually, it has become clear that Labour's approach to climate change is all talk.

I welcome the emphasis the Prime Minister has put on the subject in recent weeks. It is good that climate change is at the centre of his agenda for the G8 chairmanship and the EU presidency, but much more than gestures are needed if Britain is to regain the influence it once had. Two things need to happen, and quickly. First, Britain must put its own house in order. Progress in reducing carbon dioxide emissions was good before 1997, under the Conservative Government, but it has stalled. Earlier decreases in emissions have been replaced by a levelling out of the trend, and in some individual years since 1997 emissions have increased.

Sadly, the Secretary of State does not seem to understand those facts. On Radio 4's "Today" programme a few days ago, she misleadingly claimed that emissions of greenhouse gases were well down on what they were when Labour came to power in 1997. As Friends of the Earth immediately pointed out, carbon dioxide emissions have not fallen in the UK since Labour came to power.

Margaret Beckett: I am sorry, but I am afraid that it is the hon. Gentleman who is misunderstanding the point I was making. I was not challenging the fact that, sadly, our carbon dioxide emissions have not gone down. I will not go into the issue of the Conservative record, except to point out that flattening the economy through two recessions means that it is rather easier to cut emissions. It is true that our carbon dioxide emissions have not fallen, just as it is true that they have risen across the whole northern hemisphere. Nevertheless, the basket of greenhouse gases that are part of our Kyoto target has fallen significantly, and we are reaching our Kyoto target several years ahead of time.

Mr. Yeo: The Secretary of State rehearses the tired old argument that the cut in carbon dioxide emissions before 1997 was something to do with the performance of the economy. Let me remind her that we have recently been hearing boasts from the Government about 50 consecutive quarters of economic growth. Almost half those quarters occurred before 1997, under the Conservative Government. The reduction in carbon dioxide emissions under the Conservatives was achieved in a period covering five years of continuous economic growth. The last five years of that period were of continuous economic growth, but despite that, that Government's policies achieved a cut in carbon dioxide emissions that this Government have failed to achieve. They have failed to continue the progress. She misleadingly referred to greenhouse gases in the hope that people will think that they are carbon dioxide. I am glad to say that on the very day when she made her broadcast,—2 February, a week ago tomorrow—a Friends of the Earth press release made it clear within hours that "Carbon dioxide levels have not fallen since Labour came to power . . . UK emissions of carbon dioxide stand at only 7.5 per cent below the 1990 baseline—the same as when Labour came to power in 1997."

[Mr. Yeo]

Perhaps the rises in carbon dioxide emissions that have occurred under Labour explain the attempts reportedly made in secret last year by Britain to water down the longer-term EU targets. Whether or not those reports are true—I have heard the exchanges between the hon. Member for Lewes and the Secretary of State—they certainly give rise to very justifiable concern. In any event, the Government have been forced to admit—at least, this is clear to everyone else—that they will be unable to achieve their own target for carbon dioxide emissions, which is a cut of 20 per cent. on 1990 levels by 2010, as set out in the 1997 Labour election manifesto. That target cannot now possibly be met.

That failure scarcely enables Britain to lecture other countries about the need for more progress. Britain's failure to have a national allocations plan ready and agreed in time for the start of trading in the EU emissions trading scheme further weakens the Government's international authority. Despite its flaws, the EU emissions trading scheme is, at least for the time being, the only game in town. It is the best mechanism available for encouraging the efficient use of resources in tackling climate change and cutting carbon dioxide emissions.

Last summer, the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs had a national allocations plan ready for submission to the EU, but the plan was apparently ripped up on the intervention of the Prime Minister himself. The result is that today, British companies are unable to take part in emissions trading.

Margaret Beckett: That is not entirely accurate. Forward trading is taking place, and no spot trading is taking place at the moment. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be able to explain this away, but I detect some inconsistency in the fact that the Conservatives prayed against the regulations that put in place the emissions trading scheme and have argued against our proposals for the national allocation plan, saying that they were too tough on British business. Having attacked us for being too tough on British business, when we went back to the Commission and said that we believed on the basis of further information that we should be allowed to amend our plan, as a great deal more information had come in since the provisional numbers—we said at the outset that they were provisional—were drawn up, he is now attacking us for wanting to make the change for which the Opposition called at the time.

Mr. Yeo: It is perfectly consistent with strong support for the principle of emissions trading to force debates on the detail of any regulations or measures that are needed to give effect to that principle. We remain unequivocal in our support for the principle of emissions trading as the most effective way of allocating resources in pursuit of the aim of reducing carbon dioxide emissions. On the second point, my criticism is that the Government were not ready. We have known about the start date for emissions trading for years. It should not have been difficult for the Government to work out what our national allocations plan should set out in the interests of a proper balance between environmental gain and the needs of business. Indeed, I am interested that the Secretary of State seems to suggest that it was pressure from the Opposition that caused the Government to withdraw the original plan. Many of my hon. Friends will be flattered to think that the Government pay so much attention to our views. In fact, the Government, as they so often do, caved in to the demands of big business. Big business, not small business, goes round to Downing street and has a word with the Prime Minister, so the plan was ripped up.

It is the result of that chaos that I particularly criticise. It is not the detail of plan A or B, but the fact that, after several years in which to prepare, we have reached the starting date and Britain has joined the Czech Republic, Poland, Greece and Italy as the only countries in the EU that have been unable to get their act together. I think that that shows how inadequate the Government's approach to this very important international issue so often is.

It is hard to see quite how the Prime Minister can reconcile the actions of his Government in that respect with his speech on 14 September last year, when he said that climate change was "the world's greatest environmental challenge"

"our efforts to stabilise the climate will need, over time, to become far more ambitious than the Kyoto Protocol."

On this issue, it appears that, while the Prime Minister is on the surface all talk, behind the scenes his Government are working in precisely the opposite direction from that which is needed if his fine words are to be put into practice. As Bryony Worthington of Friends of the Earth put it:

"The trading scheme is potentially a huge step forward in the race to tackle climate change, but it has been undermined by the lack of ambition countries have shown in bringing it into action. The UK has provided a classic example of how not to do it."

Dr. Whitehead: In terms of speeches that said substantial things but did not presage as much as those substantial things might have suggested, does the hon. Gentleman recall that he set out Conservative action for a greener Britain in a speech to the Centre for Policy Studies on 7 December? Can he recall referring in that speech to a single unequivocal commitment to a new policy instrument dealing with climate change, other than the unequivocal commitment to "nominate 100 stations for urgent upgrade funded by commercial investors"?

Mr. Yeo: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on reading out the Whips' brief, but if he thinks that that causes the remotest embarrassment on the Opposition Benches, he will have to think again. I will set out well before the election some specific measures. [Laughter.] Hon. Members may laugh, but in view of the collaboration that we have seen between the Liberal Democrats and the Government in the terms of the motion, perhaps the Liberal Democrats also have some inside information on the date of the election. Will the Government cut and run before Easter after all?

Dr. Whitehead: Is the answer no?

Mr. Yeo: The answer to the hon. Gentleman is that I set out in a broad way a number of measures that I believe the next Conservative Government should take. I will put flesh on the bones of those measures in the next few weeks. I shall return to the point about railway stations in a moment, but I am surprised that Labour Members should think that it is a bad idea to draw extra capital into modernising Britain's railway stations. The only specific quotation that he could produce from my speech to the Centre for Policy Studies was one in which I set out our passionate commitment to getting public transport the extra investment that it plainly needs and is not receiving under a Labour Government.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: I look forward to hearing what my hon. Friend has to say when he sets out his stall in due course. He will know that huge commercial opportunities are available in tackling climate change, and many businesses are making good business out of taking those opportunities. Does he not agree, however, that science, technologies and business opportunities may not be enough, and that there is indeed a role for fiscal instruments and perhaps the bolder use of such instruments than we have yet seen in this country, as well as regulations, which themselves can create new markets?

Mr. Yeo: I pay warm tribute to my hon. Friend's chairmanship of the Environmental Audit Committee, which has produced many constructive and thoughtful reports on the subjects that we are debating today. He is right that no inherent conflict exists between economic growth, business opportunities and commercial prosperity, and the measures that are needed to tackle climate change—indeed, the two go hand in hand.

Fiscal instruments have an important role to play. I am determined that the next Conservative Government will make greater use of fiscal instruments than the present Government. Unexploited opportunities exist to use our tax system to encourage people to make greener choices.

The starting date for emissions trading, 1 January 2005, was not a great surprise. It is difficult to reconcile the Government's failure to be ready for that date with their claim that they are putting climate change at the heart of the British EU presidency. I wonder how much satisfaction the Minister takes in seeing Britain among the laggards in that process.

Although participation in the scheme, when it eventually happens, will be helpful, it is not the whole answer to getting Britain's $CO_2$ emissions back on a firmly downward trend, which will require policy changes in four areas. First, energy efficiency may be unglamorous, but as a former Conservative Secretary of State for Energy put it, it is "the cheapest, swiftest and most publicly acceptable way to combat global warming."

Even those sceptics who question the science of climate change can scarcely attack measures designed to save households and businesses money. For domestic energy efficiency, the Government rely on the energy efficiency commitment to incentivise consumers. A scheme that does not rely exclusively on promotion by electricity suppliers might excite a wider consumer market. We are studying changes to the energy efficiency commitment to allow more businesses to benefit from promoting domestic energy efficiency, a model that could be applied to business customers as well as households.

The second policy change concerns transport. I recognise that progress has been made in moving towards greener cars, and I am sure that that progress will continue, but transport still accounts for one quarter of $CO_2$ emissions. As is the case with energy efficiency, we must engage the public and help them to make more environmentally friendly choices. We should not use regulations or force people out of their cars, which is the Deputy Prime Minister's policy, because cars have enhanced the lives of millions of people. A car is the instrument that allows almost everyone today to enjoy freedoms that were confined to the rich 100 years ago.

One way in which to encourage greener choices by car users is to go much further than the Government in introducing variable rates of vehicle excise duty, which is the direction suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth). That would be more effective than the colour-coded labels recently suggested by the Secretary of State for Transport. I am not against colour-coded labels, which sound suspiciously like a watered-down version of the colour-coded tax discs that I advocated last year as a way to make the impact that a vehicle has on the environment clear to the public.

An incentive to buying a greener car even bigger than the colour of the label in the showroom would be a wider range of vehicle excise duty rates. Even if such changes applied to new purchases only, they would influence the choice of new vehicles, and everyone would be helped to continue to enjoy driving while reducing the impact of motoring on the public. The Government's approach is far too timid: the difference in vehicle excise duty between a Ferrari and a Smart car is only £50.

Transport involves more than cars. Aviation, which has already been referred to, is the fastest growing source of $CO_2$ emissions in the transport sector, and I hope that it will soon fall within the EU emissions trading scheme. A possible tax on aviation fuel also seems to be back in the news. It could make a big contribution to capturing the environmental cost of aviation, but it will work only if it is introduced on an entirely international basis. If international agreement on aviation fuel taxing is eventually reached, some of the other taxes on aviation could be removed.

More immediately, I am concerned about how little understanding the public have of the link between climate change and aviation. In a survey conducted by the Department for Transport a couple of years ago, only one person in eight made the connection between climate change and flying. We would educate the public about the impact of aviation on the environment if we were, for example, to encourage airlines to show emissions per passenger on travel documents, which would remind people that in environmental terms short-haul flights do not compare well with alternative modes of transport. The more information people are given, the more likely they are to choose the environmentally friendly option.

The third area of policy change concerns renewable energy. The Government are in a muddle: their obsession with onshore wind farms, one of the least reliable and most unpopular forms of renewable energy, will ensure that they miss their own target for producing 10 per cent. of electricity from renewable sources by 2010. With only five years to go, it would be much better if they admitted that they will miss that target. We should develop a more coherent approach to renewable energy to exploit Britain's natural advantages as an island by using offshore technologies, including tidal power and wave power. In that context, I regret the Government's failure to introduce a marine conservation Bill to facilitate the establishment of offshore areas where marine-based renewable energy projects could flourish.

Mr. Challen: Back in the '80s, Lady Thatcher introduced the non-fossil fuel obligation, the bulk of which was paid to the nuclear industry. We would be able to make greater progress towards our targets now if Conservative Governments had bothered to invest in renewable energy.

Mr. Yeo: I am startled that the hon. Gentleman has singled out Baroness Thatcher as someone to attack on climate change. Anyone who has ever heard of the issue recognises that without her the world would be years behind in responding to the issue.

The hon. Gentleman has attacked nuclear power. The present Government are doing their best to prop up the existing nuclear power stations to get a bit more life out of them, so his Front Benchers do not support him. Nuclear power has an extremely positive effect on climate change because it is by far the largest producer of energy without $CO_2$ emissions.

Norman Baker: Will the hon. Gentleman clarify whether it is Conservative party policy to build new nuclear power stations to tackle climate change?

Mr. Yeo: Conservative party policy is to develop energy on the most economic basis. If the nuclear power industry shows that it can compete economically with other forms of power, and if it satisfies the proper and legitimate concerns expressed by some people about the disposal of waste, there is no reason why we should not build nuclear power stations.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: Will my hon. Friend accept that the nuclear industry has managed to compete in the past only with huge dollops of taxpayers' money, and that it is unlikely to be able to solve those problems any time soon?

Mr. Yeo: I am open-minded about nuclear power. [Laughter.] Liberal Democrat Members express great mirth at the idea that one should be open-minded. If a particular type of energy that happens to score well on $CO_2$ emissions shows that it can compete economically, it seems extraordinary that others—notably the Liberal Democrats, who claim to be so concerned—should want to rule it out. The Liberal Democrat approach is extraordinary, and characteristically inconsistent. As I have said before in this House, we will wait and see whether the industry can meet the challenge that I have laid down.

Mr. Simon Thomas: If the hon. Gentleman is right about the Liberal Democrats and their attitude to nuclear energy, why is he prepared to rule out wind energy? In Wales, the Conservative party has opposed all wind farms, both offshore and onshore. We have the greatest wind resources in western Europe, and the technology is ready to go. Why is his party ruling out wind energy?

Mr. Yeo: We are not, as it happens. We are saying that the Government's policy is extraordinarily distorted in that the help that they provide for renewable energy sources is directed heavily towards onshore wind farms. Local communities should have more say on whether an onshore wind farm is built in their area, and any strong local objections should be recognised. Ultimately, there should be a mix of renewables, including wind, wave and tidal power, and a whole variety of other sources.

Dr. Desmond Turner (Brighton, Kemptown) (Lab): I was gratified to hear the hon. Gentleman talk about the opportunities that we have on this island for marine renewable technologies. It grieves me to remind him that research into wave energy was killed off in the early stages of the Thatcher Administration. That was not a very good contribution, because had the work continued, that source would almost certainly be commercially available today.

Mr. Yeo: If the hon. Gentleman is so concerned about the effect of Government policy on research, why does he support the present Government's policy, which has effectively choked off nearly all the resources available for research into anything other than wind power? He appears reluctant to call the Government to account for failing to learn the lessons that he says should have been learned by the Conservative Government.

Mr. Yeo: I have given way to the hon. Gentleman once, and I am afraid that I must make some progress.

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Yeo: No—I am sorry.

The fourth area of policy that needs to be changed concerns the planning system, which should be used to avoid making the consequences of climate change worse. For example, planning policy guidance must be strengthened to make it easier for councils to refuse consent for building on flood plains or on sites where development would make flooding more likely because of run-off problems. We must bear it in mind that one of the characteristics of climate change is that rainfall is becoming more violent and we more often experience high winds. I sympathise with the concerns of the Environment Agency about wrongly located development continuing to make the risks of flooding greater. The harm that such development inflicts is not confined to new buildings but can cause problems for existing properties, and in the end it may be the taxpayer who picks up the tab.

Planning guidance can also contribute positively to cutting carbon dioxide emissions by encouraging development at or near railway stations—a point that I made in a speech just before Christmas. It is a scandal that we have failed, under public and private ownership models, to make better use of the huge brownfield development opportunities that exist around many stations. Starter homes or commercial and retail development on those sites would be beneficial environmentally and in other ways. Planning agreements should ensure that such developments provide funds to improve stations in order to bring them into the 21st century and increase the capacity of the railways at a time of record demand. Those gains could be obtained without taxpayers or travellers having to contribute a penny. Development around stations would offer people more chances to choose environmentally friendly transport options. The Government's role is not to coerce people out of their cars but to facilitate those choices.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): My hon. Friend raises a serious point. Some innovative planning is taking place whereby affordable housing is being built on top of supermarkets, and there is no reason why we should not use our stations more imaginatively by doing the same thing. That would be a sustainable way of going forward, because people's housing would be near to the transport that they were going to use.

Mr. Yeo: My hon. Friend is right. The situation is nothing short of scandalous. Those of us who regularly travel by train are aware of how many opportunities there are around the country to use stations and the land immediately around them for development purposes.

The four changes in domestic policy that I mentioned would add up to a coherent programme to get Britain back on track. With evidence of Britain's determination to tackle climate change at home, we would once more be able to resume our leadership on the issue abroad. Internationally, we should have three aims. First, and most obviously, the Prime Minister should press President Bush much harder, not only on Kyoto but on climate change generally. It is painfully clear that the Prime Minister will not say boo to a goose when it comes to President Bush. What on earth has Britain got in return for its unquestioning support of the United States in the past three years? It does not appear that our influence has been exercised over any important policy area.

Secondly, as the hon. Member for Lewes said, Britain should be more active in reaching out to those elements in the United States who do take climate change seriously. Some states, industries and companies are clear-sighted enough to see that climate change cannot be ignored. They realise that whether or not the United States ratifies Kyoto, there are advantages to America in taking part in emissions trading, in helping to shape the post-Kyoto framework, and in developing the technologies that will lead to the win-win situation of continued economic growth and steadily falling emissions.

Thirdly, although it is crucial to engage the United States in the process, it is equally crucial to bring China and India on board. One way in which Britain could put pressure on the United States is to start negotiating international standards with China and India. I am pleased that the Government's chief scientist has recently been in Bangalore. The growth of those giant economies inevitably means that more energy will be consumed, and in particular coal power. The challenge is to accelerate progress towards minimising the environmental impact of that consumption.

The post-Kyoto framework should have the positive aim of promoting climate stability. The achievement of that aim will not harm business or slow down economic growth, nor will it impede the progress that developing countries make towards greater prosperity. Indeed, climate change is the very background against which developing countries will grow sustainably, and the only background against which that growth will be secure.

I regret that the Liberal Democrats chose to insert a point-scoring phrase into their motion, because without it I would have been able to give the motion my support. However, I can and do confirm that the Conservative party is wholly committed to the actions needed at home and abroad to achieve climate stability. When we were last in government, we took those actions. While we are in opposition, we will support the Government when they propose policies to promote climate stability, and a future Conservative Government will have those policies right at the top of their agenda.

Dr. Desmond Turner (Brighton, Kemptown) (Lab): I am glad that the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) initiated the debate. It started off happily and I was pleased that a consensus was developing across the Chamber, but it has unfortunately gone a little sour since the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) entered the fray.

Climate change is a bigger challenge than the fate or fortunes of any political party and must be tackled through consensus. We cannot simply switch policies if we are to be effective. Lest—perish the thought—the Government change, we must ensure that we have policies that will be consistently supported and developed. In this context, politicians need to grow up in a way that they never have before.

An international consensus is also required and if we can achieve a solid cross-party consensus in this place, we can provide some international leadership. This country has much of the expertise and many of the technologies necessary to begin to tackle the problem. We are fortunate in our climatologists, who are among the world leaders, if not the world leaders. Thanks to them, we have virtually reached a scientific consensus on climate change, although not necessarily on its scale or timing, because that involves so many variables that it is impossible to be totally precise about whether a given level of carbon dioxide concentration will produce an elevation in temperature of 2° or as high as 11°. It is simply too multifactorial, but it is abundantly clear that further changes will occur. We would prefer to avoid any scenario because it would have serious consequences with which we would have to deal.

Our climatologists have been responsible because, although the range of scenarios that they have presented to us so far has been scary enough, they have carefully avoided invoking the apocalyptic. We must remember that an apocalyptic event happened at least once in geological history. The seas boiled and the methane hydrates on the floor of the oceans were released. The temperatures rocketed and approximately 90 per cent.

of the species on earth died. That could still happen, for example, if we lost the Amazonian rain forest altogether, perhaps through fire, which is possible, and the methane hydrates were released again. In that case, a future for the whole human race, let alone any other species, would be almost impossible. Although that is an apocalyptic scenario, it is possible and we should never forget it.

We cannot assume that temperature will increase gradually and that the sea level will creep up by a centimetre every decade. Perhaps we could cope with that, but frightening step changes along the way, with which we could not cope, could also occur. Indeed, if we do not take sufficient action now, and if we retain the business-as-usual model, some of the mildest climate change scenarios would lead to the exposure of thousands of millions of people to danger through flood, famine and disease.

The question is therefore not whether we should act but how soon and how radically we can act. We must be radical about the matter. Descending into petty party political bickering about who did what is therefore pathetic and we should not do it.

John Barrett (Edinburgh, West) (LD): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that those who are most likely to be the victims of climate change are least likely to have influence over gas emissions, and that that is why it is essential to play our part in international discussions about future emissions with emerging industrial nations such as China and India?

Dr. Turner: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention, with which I agree. We cannot say, "We've had all the fun with fossil fuels but we're going to stop using them now and you mustn't use them. You're going to have to stay poor and undeveloped." That will not wash. As part of our international aid programme, we should put funds into developing and distributing simple, low-cost and low-carbon technologies that are usable in the developing world. I am happy that the Foreign and Commonwealth Office initiated such a programme, which is now an international programme, about two years ago. It is under way but it needs to be developed a great deal more. Our country is fortunate in having technologies that can be applied in that work.

I am happy that the Government are reviewing their climate change policies. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State would not claim that our policies were currently absolutely right. They need to be overhauled, partly because they were developed when it was a battle to convince people that climate change was real. Now the battle is tackling it and we need a step change in the effectiveness of our policies. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment can tell us more about the review. I hope that more hon. Members will contribute to the review in a cross-party and collaborative manner. I would even embrace ideas from the hon. Member for South Suffolk.

The Government must review their policies and reach some consensus. They should also examine the coherence of policies. It is not ideal for DEFRA to have responsibilities for climate change, while responsibility for energy, which is one of the key elements in tackling climate change, is split between DEFRA and the Department of Trade and Industry, the keeper of the key fiscal instruments—the Treasury—is a separate Department, and the Department for Transport is also involved. At least four major Departments need to work together cohesively to make a future strategy stick. That might mean a change of culture. I do not mean that in a political sense because politicians can speak to each other happily, but we all know that civil servants have a less good record of cross-departmental collaboration. I therefore suggest to my hon. Friend that we also need to consider our civil service structures for underpinning, delivering and developing climate change policy, because we could do much more on that.

Norman Baker: I am attracted by the idea that my parliamentary next-door neighbour presents. Is he drawn to our proposal, as he should logically be, for a merged department of environment, energy and transport, precisely to deal with the problems that he identifies?

Dr. Turner: I do not want to comment one way or the other on any specific structure. I simply say that we should examine the structures and ensure that, whatever they are, they have an overarching brief to work together. There must be a clear Cabinet responsibility at the top to ensure that co-ordination of climate change policy happens on the ground.

It is good that the Government have adopted the Royal Commission on Environmental Pollution's 60 per cent. target by 2050, but I agree with David King that that is not sufficient to deal with the position that confronts us. We must remember that $CO_2$ is not the only greenhouse gas. It has been established that atmospheric $CO_2$ emissions were no higher than today's when the climate change event in the Eocene occurred. The levels of nitrous oxide and methane did the damage. Other greenhouse gases can be just as threatening as $CO_2$. We therefore need to examine the spread of greenhouse gases and control the emissions of them all.

We need vigorous action now. We cannot afford to wait 20 years. The insurance industry would endorse that because claims against damage through exceptional weather events have rocketed. There is a clear pattern—logarithmic growth—in those claims. There is plenty of evidence that we cannot afford not to take action. If we do not, the consequences will be expensive to the economy. We need to invest more, but we do not have to adopt a hair-shirt economic policy to do so. I see no intrinsic reason why renewable energy should be any more expensive than current generation technologies, once it has got over the initial development hump and is fully developed. Likewise, energy conservation investment will pay for itself.

We have the technical potential to reduce $CO_2$ emissions by 80 per cent. quite easily, and by rather more as far as domestic and industrial energy, land transport and electricity generation are concerned. Air transport remains a problem. People remember the Hindenburg disaster and we would probably have difficulty getting people on to a hydrogen-fuelled plane. Hydrogen is so light that, even in liquid form, the amount required for a transatlantic flight would fill the entire fuselage, leaving no room for the passengers. Anyone with any good ideas on how to make hydrogen storage much more compact should go to the DTI and ask for a development grant, because cracking that problem would be one of the greatest services that they could provide. The path to a non-carbon future—or a virtually non-carbon future, at any rate—would then become possible.

Mr. Challen: In this fairly consensual debate, we have heard that onshore wind farms present a problem. I agree with my hon. Friend that we can probably meet a great deal of our energy needs through renewables, but how would he address the growing resistance to onshore wind farms? Does he agree that one way would be to address their ownership structures? We could, for example, have community wind farms and micro-generation. In that way, people would have a vested interest in going down that route.

Dr. Turner: My hon. Friend is right, but I would also point out that onshore wind farms are a stop-gap. Offshore wind farms are much more publicly acceptable than their onshore counterparts and have better wind opportunities. We will get more electricity out of the offshore wind turbines than out of those on land. But wind power is only a stop-gap. We can only go so far with it, partly because of its unpredictability. We cannot rely on it for baseline load. It is also intrinsically expensive because its load factor is so poor, at 30 per cent. or less. We have, however, the most magnificent energy resources round our coasts in the form of wave and tide power, which has the raw energy potential to provide double the amount of electricity that we currently generate in a year.

Mr. Carmichael: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the flaw in the Conservatives' argument is that tidal and wave resources are, by their very nature, in the more remote, peripheral communities that do not have proper grid connections and that they would get that connection only if they were allowed to develop the intermediate technology, namely wind power?

Dr. Turner: I do not disagree with that. I would not for a moment wish to inhibit the development of wind power. The Government have agreed that the grid has to be rewired and we intend to do that. Yes, that is where the resources are, and we should use them. The Government are already putting resources into wave and tidal technology, through the DTI. I want to see more resources going into it, and I think that they inevitably will.

I agree with Opposition Members' comments about the importance of fiscal measures. We have heard some chat about that today. We need to look carefully at fiscal measures because, in a market economy such as the one that we have to work in, they are the key to driving behaviour and making things work. We have an opportunity, as part of the climate change review, to overhaul those fiscal measures.

The hon. Member for Lewes mentioned the carbon tax. I have long been an advocate of carbon taxation, not simply as a tax being used to take money, but as part of a continuum involving a carbon credit that could be invested in the development of renewables. That has been expanded on by the most recent report from the Science and Technology Committee, which I recommend to hon. Members. Ministers have already read it and I hope that they will look at it again as part of the climate change review.

The main message is that there are many things that we can and absolutely must do. We must do them together because we cannot afford to waste time squabbling unnecessarily. We must agree that, for the sake of the future of the human race, we have to act quickly and with determination. Even if it costs a bit now, the payback in the years to come will be well worth it.

Sue Doughty (Guildford) (LD): I want to look at a number of issues relating to the need for a co-ordinated approach to mitigating the effects of climate change. The first is the security implications of climate change. During the past 12 months, we have been developing a greater understanding of the impact of climate change on the security of countries across the globe, and of the potential for climate change to increase the inequalities between the haves and the have-nots, with the consequential insecurity that that would bring.

I have taken quite an interest in this matter, and it worries me that we still need greater Government co-ordination in this regard. The Minister will recall that, in March 2004, I asked the Secretary of State what assessment she had made of the national security implications of climate change. The Minister responded on her behalf, saying that the Government were "carrying out internal assessments to identify how policy and operational responsibilities in all Departments could be affected by climate change. This process is currently reporting, and has included both the Ministry of Defence and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office . . . Some of the potential linkages between climate change and security include pressure on food and water resources and energy supplies, which in turn . . . may contribute to the causes of migration . . . and conflict."—[Official Report, 10 March 2004; Vol. 418, c. 1534W.]

I followed that up by asking when we were going to see the report, and the Minister replied that it would be "later in 2004", and that copies would be placed in both Libraries. I asked a member of the Library staff about this yesterday, and, having consulted DEFRA, they told me that the information would not be available until April or May this year. I believe that the Minister and the Secretary of State are concentrating on climate change, and I certainly would not suggest that they and their Department are not putting an enormous amount of effort into the matter. We know, however, that climate change is not only the responsibility of the Department that deals with the environment. It is a shared responsibility right across the Cabinet.

When I asked how many people in the Ministry of Defence were working on identifying the national security implications of climate change, I was told:

"Staff working on this do so as part of their wider duties and consequently it is not possible to quantify the numbers of staff involved."—[Official Report, 19 April 2002; Vol. 420, c. 10W.]

Is anyone working on it? Are enough people working on it? In times of instability, this is becoming an increasingly important issue. It will perform a key function in supporting the Prime Minister's leadership role on climate change. In the war against terrorism, climate change cannot be ignored. I hope that that information will be provided so that when he and the Secretary of State are negotiating with the United States—as we know they are doing—we are able to give them more information to push that point.

We must understand that we need adaptation strategies in the face of climate change, and I hope that those strategies will not include increased spending on defence, but will focus on dealing with climate change. We have a choice to make about how much we spend on defence because we have failed to deal with climate change. Other areas of defence are outside the scope of this debate and I will not comment on those.

Malcolm Bruce: Is it not an interesting fact that at the heart of the conflict between Palestine and Israel the single biggest issue to be resolved is who controls the water supply? It is predicted that the main wars of this century are likely to be fought over water because of the pressures of climate change.

Sue Doughty: I thank my hon. Friend for that very helpful contribution. Only this week, we heard about the potential for conflict over the Nile waters and the sources of that river.

We are aware that Sagarmatha national park in the Himalayas is at risk. Glacial lakes are melting, which has an impact on local communities because the water flows down on to the low-lying flood plains. Communities there rely partially on tourism and partially on their normal way of life, which includes the glaciers and the natural beauty of the Himalayas that so many people go to see. That impact threatens their whole way of life and there is a real fear in lakeside communities that those lakes will burst. That would be a catastrophe.

Major changes to the Arctic and the way of life of the Inuit people have been reported by the WWF, and the British Antarctic Survey has commented on the thinning of the icecaps and its implication for sea levels. The WWF website has a very useful half-minute summary: global temperatures have risen by 2°C in the past 150 years; 228 million people are now at risk from malaria; starvation affects 12 million people; 2 million people are short of fresh water; millions are forced to move inland due to coastal flooding; and thousands of species have become extinct in the past 50 years and we know that many more will do so in the next 50. This is not a criticism of current Ministers at all, but the website comments on the fact that Ministers did not take action 50 years ago. I do not know the source for that information.

We are experiencing extreme weather conditions: since Christmas there have been floods in Carlisle and in Scotland. There were hurricanes in Florida last year, which do not just damage properties and cause loss of life, but have a huge financial cost that must be recognised. Insurance claims after the hurricanes in Florida could reach $20 billion. That is a huge sum, and an example of the sums we mean when we talk about investing to save.

Closer to home there is more that we could do. On housing, we agree that we need more homes for people to live in. There are massive increases in the house building programme in the south-east, but we could improve the environmental quality of that programme. Members of Parliament in many parts of the south-east disagree with the Government's calculations on the number of homes needed, their location and how the cake will be divided up. Local authorities have to deal with that problem here and now, and they are already defining guidelines for development that must be sustainable and have Government support, because there are huge opportunities to make sustainable improvements through the housing that we are planning and designing for the future.

If we are talking about sustainable communities, we must ask what that means. It is very curious that we are unable to find out how the Government define sustainable communities. Everyone in the Chamber today would agree about definitions of sustainability and environmental sustainability, but we do not see the word "environment" flowing through into the definition of sustainable communities. Those house-building programmes bring huge beneficial opportunities such as district heating schemes and combined heat and power. However, after Christmas, the Environmental Audit Committee pointed out in its review of housing:

"We regret that in the case of housing the Department (DEFRA) seems to have been sidelined."

There are opportunities, however. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has a draft planning policy statement, PPS1, but it does not recognise the need to ensure that development occurs within environmental limits, as well as other sustainability measures. It does not recognise the need for the precautionary principle for environmental sustainability. Does that matter? Of course it does, because emissions from the housing sector are significant: current levels of such emissions are about 40 megatons of carbon a year. Current plans could reduce that to 30 megatons a year, which is an improvement, but when one looks at Government emission reduction targets for the UK as a whole—from 153.2 megatons of carbon a year in 2000 to 65 megatons in 2050—one sees that a reduction of 10 megatons will not be enough.

The houses we are planning to build now will be in place in 2050. It is important to note that housing does not go away. The foundations that we lay now, and their environmental impact, will be with us in 2050. That makes it sound as though we have a lot of time to get our act together, but melting icecaps and glaciers show that that problem is here now. We think of 2050 as the end of the line, but we have to seize the opportunity now. Considering what we could be facing, poor environmental performance in buildings will be a major contributor to carbon emissions in 2050, and the sector, as the Environmental Audit Committee report pointed out, could contribute more than 55 per cent. of UK carbon emissions—nearly double the current contribution.

In combination with aviation, that will substantially undermine the Government's ability to meet their reduction targets. We need to ensure that we stay on target, and set tougher targets, if we are to make the difference that will call a halt to climate change, which is desperately important.

Some areas that the Government are working on, and their change of heart on aviation emissions, are very welcome, but the "predict and provide" approach must be managed alongside what we can do about aviation emissions. Combined with the effects of building, they will cause a major difficulty. We need to conduct an urgent review now of sustainable construction methods to make an impact on not only the finished buildings and their carbon emissions, but the pollution that will arise as part of the building process.

I touched on flooding earlier. To return to the macro aspect, there are plans to build across the south-east. A village in my constituency has a road with a number of bungalows; it is on a wide flood plain. There is no big river, but we know that each of those properties is being expanded into a house, and such things as conservatories are being built. As the water runs down the hills into the village, instead of it being soaked up by the clay, people sometimes find 2 in of water lying on their lawn. In fact, people are giving up lawns in this village and growing vegetables because of the impact of the water. That is a very small example, but it shows how we are not getting to grips with this increased and sudden rainfall that we are experiencing so often.

How much worse will the impact be on the Thames gateway as we build on it and there is a displacement of water? We have no plan; we have no clarity about what is the purpose of Thames gateway development. On the one side, we are told that it is providing housing for a regenerated community, but Sir John Egan said to the Environmental Audit Committee that the development is intended to house people commuting into London. Are we therefore building a development with no clear idea about how people will commute into London? Will the railway infrastructure be in place or will they get into their cars? Although the Conservatives are saying that cleaner cars are good—we all agree with that, and cars have their place, but not every place—stationary cars in a traffic jam are no solution to climate change problems. We must do much more. It is sad that the Conservatives, who presided over the undermining of the railways, are now trying to claim the moral high ground. I wish that they had done something about it at the time.

When we examine the potential for flooding in the Thames gateway, on which many people have commented, we must ask who will insure the properties. For how long will the Association of British Insurers bail people out when things go wrong, or do the Government plan to be the insurer of last resort? I know that that is not currently part of their plans.

Mr. Morley: I get surprised sometimes about the focus that people put on flood risk in relation to the Thames gateway development. I do not dispute that it is an issue, but the defences in that area are at one in 100 standard, which is extremely high. The Thames gateway design includes green space, for example, which can also be used as sustainable urban drainage, and the plans include the extension of the rail network so that there are public transport links to the new development. A major new development always provides an opportunity to build in sustainable features from the very beginning, and that is certainly the intention with the Thames gateway.

Sue Doughty: I am grateful to the Minister for his intervention, but other commentators do not share his confidence about flooding. Only recently, I was at a seminar with developers who expressed severe concern. At least the Thames gateway has infrastructure planned. What about other places, such as Milton Keynes, where not so much infrastructure will be provided, and places such as Guildford, which is subjected to infill? Displaced water will also be a consequence of such developments, and I would expect to see even more flooding as a result.

We support the proposal of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister that the Environment Agency should be a statutory consultee on planning applications. The Conservatives, however, would cut the Environment Agency. When will they comment on those proposals and understand their environmental implications?

The hon. Member for Brighton, Kemptown (Dr. Turner) mentioned methane. This is a subject close to the Minister's heart and mine, and I urge him to ramp up efforts to reduce the amount of biodegradable waste going into landfill. Please can we make sure, with urgency, that councils have the tools that they need to assess levels of home composting and so on, and to make plans to encourage it? Such small steps will make a significant difference to methane emissions.

Leadership on climate change is needed. We had a peace dividend as the old Soviet empire crumbled—we now want a climate dividend. That opportunity is available, but only if we get our own house in order and exercise real leadership with allies such as the United States, as well as European allies. As polluters, we must recognise that not only do our people suffer as climate change takes hold but others do, too. It is strange, but on a mild day such as today, instead of people saying, "What a lovely day"—it is mild in Guildford, where the flowers are coming out in my garden—perhaps they should say a little more often, "Why is it so mild at the beginning of February?" We must recognise that the problem is here and now, and act on it here and now.

Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South) (Lab): I shall try to be as brisk as possible, partly to allow other Members into the debate, but also because I want to make several points that I hope will upset the apple-cart in relation to the consensus of free trade assumptions on tackling climate change problems—the consensus that trade liberalisation and a free-for-all are somehow compatible with realising many of the goals that Members have identified today.

The Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee has just returned from a Brussels visit, on which we met a large number of Commissioners who were as passionate as any Member who has spoken today about climate change. Those Commissioners were brilliant—until we talked to other Commissioners with interests in trade, who were clearly running with a completely different agenda. When push came to shove, the environment got the shove. That is the crisis that we must face. It is a crisis of political leadership as much as a crisis of climate change.

Mr. Carmichael: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the same contradiction is at the heart of domestic energy policy? On the one hand, the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and the Department of Trade and Industry say that they want to promote renewables development, while on the other, the mad monks at the Office of Gas and Electricity Markets say that we can do that only within the framework of a competition-driven structure that excludes renewables development.

Alan Simpson: I accept that that contradiction exists in government, but I want to widen the picture—I believe that the contradiction exists in every party represented in Parliament today. We need to examine the contradictions in each of our own houses. I would love us to fight a general election on climate change. I would love us to say that the biggest issue that will affect the whole of our lives, and the entirety of our children's lives, is climate change, and that we want to be in dispute with each other about which of us can tackle it most seriously and rapidly. We will not do that, however. The general election will be fought on which leader is the most ugly, which party's set of policies are the most contradictory, who are the biggest bunch of scoundrels, and who can be toughest on immigrants. That will miss the big challenges.

Bob Dylan once wrote in a song:

"You don't need a weather man
To know which way the wind blows".

In the same way, we do not need a panel of scientists to tell us about climate change. Let us ask Munich Re, the biggest reinsurance company on the planet, which says that, on current trends, the global economy could be bankrupt by 2050 because of the sheer cost of making good the damage done as a result of climate change. That is the warning bell about which each of us needs to think hard. What is required is a paradigm shift. We need to change how we think about the way we live in the world and how we think about economics.

In scientific terms, we are told that we must limit temperature rise to 2°C higher than it was in pre-industrial times. The terminology that scientists use is that we cannot go above 400 parts per million of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere—we are now at about 380 parts per million. In layperson's terms, the most important fact is that, on current trends, we would exceed the 400 parts per million figure by about 2015. When Professor Sir David King came to talk to the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee, he was clear about the time scale and said that climate change was a much bigger threat than terrorism. As for the 2015 timetable, that is not when the world will end but when, scientists tell us, we will be locked into irreversible change. This is the period in which we can do something.

Of course this issue concerns more than ourselves. The consequences of climate change will hit the developing world worst and we shall see a huge increase in drought, disease, environmental devastation and mass migration. Some of those problems will come to our shores second-hand, but others will come to us first-hand. At the recent conference in Exeter, the Hadley centre was quick to point out that one of the contradictions of global warming is that we will also experience global cooling. The prospect of the north Atlantic drift ceasing has now reached 50:50. It is not an immediate prospect, but we know that the north Atlantic drift has been weakening over the decades and the consequences are inevitable cooling. The Hadley centre said that on the north Atlantic coast, there may be winter cooling of 5° C, which means temperatures lower than those in the "little ice age" in the 17th and 18th centuries, when the Thames froze over. We are not well equipped to deal with that change.

In addition, sea levels will be affected by the melting of the Greenland and west Antarctica icecaps—something we once did not believe possible—and may rise by up to 18ft. Some coastal constituencies will be affected by that more imminently than my constituency, but the prospect of representing Nottingham sur mer is not entirely ludicrous.

Dr. Desmond Turner: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Alan Simpson: I am afraid I will not accept any more interventions, as Members are queuing up to make speeches.

The erratic weather patterns that we have to deal with are a consequence of climate change. Professor King pointed out to the Committee that we must think about how we manage the prospect of flooding and drought in the same month. We are the beneficiaries of an enormously generous piece of over-engineering—the Victorian sewerage system. No one would build drains of that capacity now, yet most of our cities cannot deal with flash flooding. We therefore need a huge rethink on our engineering programme. At the recent Exeter conference, it was said that even a five-year delay could have a critical impact on our ability to tackle the problem.

I have five suggestions about what we should do. The good news is that a fantastic array of sustainable technologies are coming on to the market. I am incorporating many of them in a derelict place in the middle of Nottingham that will eventually generate 50 per cent. more energy than it consumes. Such developments are exciting, but in 2001, the Prime Minister set aside £5 million so that renewable energy pilot schemes could be targeted on the poorest housing in the country. Sadly, however, since then, the Department of Trade and Industry has not been able to get a single pilot off the ground. There are 2 million households living in fuel poverty. I asked the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister how many properties in the UK's housing stock would meet SAP 65, the minimum standard for establishing a framework to address fuel poverty. On 20 January, I was told that

"16 per cent. of the housing stock meets or exceeds SAP 65."—[Official Report, 20 January 2005; Vol. 429, c. 1044W.]

That shows how behind we are in tackling things.

How can we establish a programme that develops the resources and policy changes to address that problem? First, we need a windfall tax on oil and gas producers. Early-day motion 504 explains that they have enjoyed at least £5 billion in excess profits upstream as a result of increased prices, and I am told that it may be as much as £9 billion. The public and the Government should take a scoop of those profits and put them into renewables. Secondly, as some people believe in market solutions, we must change the market rules. I have recently had a number of rows with developers in my own city, as not one of them has put up buildings that self-generate energy or recycle their own water. They are not required to do so, so if we want such initiatives we must change the concept of building in our society. We should set market rules under which people have obligations so that, for example, they cannot put up a building on a flood plain unless they build in a reservoir capacity. There are cities on the planet that are already doing so, and in some countries developers are required to incorporate self-generation in the design of buildings. We do not have such requirements, because we let people build on the cheap. We steal today from the prospects of tomorrow.

Thirdly, we have an absurd approach to energy markets. Not a single energy company in the land will talk about its business plan for selling less. There is a simple way of tackling that: we change the rules to allow companies to sell conservation rather than consumption. They could sell packages of home warmth in long-term supply packages, to stimulate the consumption of less.

Fourthly, on international commitments, the time has come to scrap the World Trade Organisation and replace it with a world environment organisation. The criteria for assessment would be produced by sustainability audits in which we looked at the patterns of global trade. We must ask ourselves how much of today's trade consists of water sequestration by the north from the south. How many food miles result in carbon dumping on the planet? To what extent are long-term food contracts built on assumptions about the intensification of agriculture, whereas we should be looking at localisation and sustainability.

A number of Members have said that we must focus on the USA, but I agree with the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (Mr. Barrett) that it is more important to look at China. The Chinese Government have guaranteed their population that within the next 10 years every family with one child will have one car, shifting car ownership from 33 per 1,000 to 333 per 1,000. The earth would suffocate under that programme, which is not an unreasonable one. The trouble is that we do not ask what sort of vehicles are being made available in developing world markets.

Finally, to address the problem we need to consider a gift relationship in future, rather than one of exploitation. The history of the last century is one in which we dumped on the developing world the products and practices that we banned in our own land, calling it aid or development. We need a gift relationship—Titmuss talked about it in terms of blood transfusion or the blood donor service in the UK—that is writ large on a global scale and scripted out in environmental terms. If we act selflessly in gifting the technology to others and ourselves, we have a chance of creating an environment fit for our children to live and breathe in. If we do not, the free trade follies that constantly push the environmental agenda to the sidelines of policy will destroy the planet. We will not achieve sustainable economics, and instead will have a world that is driven by no economics at all.

As I said, I would love political parties to fight the next election on the issue of who has the best environmental record and programme. The real question is whether any of the parties in the House have the courage to occupy a platform on which our children's lives depend.

Mr. Simon Thomas (Ceredigion) (PC): I am grateful for being called to speak immediately after that invitation from the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson), as there is one political party that will make climate change a priority at the election. I agreed with almost everything that he said, and I can assure him that he will sympathise with many things in our manifesto. I am afraid, however, that people will not have a chance to vote for us in England.

I am very pleased indeed that the Liberal Democrats have called for this Opposition day debate. I acknowledge that they have used such debates to introduce such matters in the House, whereas the Government have been rather remiss in providing debates on climate change. The usual suspects are in the Chamber. [Interruption.] Indeed, people can see for themselves where there are gaps on the Benches. We have reached consensus on the science of climate change, but we do not have consensus on the political tasks needed to deal with the problem. I shall get the political bit over before I address more consensual matters. If any party, MP or member of a party thinks that we can achieve a carbon-free future without using wind energy they are shutting the door on a solution to climate change. Anyone who thinks that that is a realistic prospect will let down severely the people of this country, the environment and future generations.

The Conservative party has said no to any wind farms whatever in Wales. That is totally unsustainable and I simply cannot accept it as a policy with which to tackle climate change. It is possible to discuss the right mix and the need to invest in wave, solar and other forms of renewable technology, but it is impossible to talk seriously about achieving the 20 per cent. renewable target without including both onshore and offshore wind power.

I also have to say that there have been no significant wind farm proposals for Wales that the Liberal Democrats—whether a parliamentary candidate in my own constituency, a Member of Parliament or an Assembly Member—have failed to oppose. Indeed, Liberal Democrats of some significance and seniority have opposed all those plans. The hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) is not in his place now, but I acknowledge the important work that he has done on these matters. I hope that he can lead his party in securing a more proactive acceptance of the need to use wind on our journey towards the carbon-free future. The wonder of wind energy is that, if we do not need it in 20 or 30 years' time, we can take the structures down and leave the environment as it was—virtually, though not completely, unchanged. That aspect is so different from other forms of energy generation that we need to swallow the pill. I am prepared, and have long been prepared, to swallow it in my own constituency in Wales, and I hope that other parties will, too.

Let us consider what is happening with the environment at present. The public at large, newspapers and the media tend to talk about climate change as if it is something that is going to happen, but it is important to emphasise that it is happening now. We are already very close to the tipping points—the points at which climate change becomes disastrous. A UK voluntary network is run by the Centre for Ecology and Hydrology, and it observes changes throughout the calendar year. It is easy to see from that research over the past 30 years that spring is definitely arriving earlier. I had roses in my garden at Christmas, and a fig tree that is starting to shoot.

We all know what is happening, but it is good to have confirmation. Swallows are arriving a week earlier than they did 30 years ago, and butterflies are also appearing much earlier. One consequence is that species, particularly bird species, are hatching after the glut of caterpillars has gone. The birds are unable to capitalise on the caterpillars, as it were, that have already been and gone in the early spring. The Royal Society for the Protection of Birds has provided figures, and it puts in context the occasional bird strike against the wind farms. That happens occasionally, and there are sometimes bird strikes against my house. At least one bird a year dies flying into my windows—more than died in the wind farm recently in Ceredigion. The occasional bird strike has to be placed in the context of mass bird extinction under climate change.

Within Wales during the past 14 months, the valley of Conwy alone has had three serious breaches of its flood defences. The villages in the valley had three occurrences during the last 14 months that should happen only once every 20 years. Furthermore, the key statistics for Wales, published only a fortnight ago, clearly show a 1°C rise in average temperatures over the past three years compared with the 1960–1990 period. That is important.

The latest report on climate change has come from the international climate change taskforce, chaired by the former Secretary of State for Transport, Local Government and the Regions, and I was pleased to hear him repudiate—on Radio 4 when he launched the report—many of his transport decisions. Let us hope that the current Department for Transport will follow suit. The report states:

> "Above the 2 degree C level, the risks of abrupt, accelerated, or runaway climate change also increase. The possibilities include reaching climatic tipping points leading, for example, to the loss of the West Antarctic and Greenland ice sheets".

The hon. Member for Nottingham, South made a similar point. The report goes on to refer to > "the transformation of the planet's forests and soils from a net sink of carbon to a net source of carbon", recommending that at least 25 per cent. of our electricity should be generated from renewables.

Just a week after the publication of that report came the report from the British Antarctic Survey, showing that the west Antarctic ice sheet is indeed in danger of collapse. If an international taskforce argues that 2° is the tipping point, and if the figures for Wales show that we are already 1° higher, we are already very close indeed to some disastrous changes taking place within the United Kingdom. That demonstrates why political parties should be placing these issues on top of the agenda, irrespective of whether the press want to talk about that in the context of posters, images or dirty campaigning. This issue should, in 2005, be the focus of all our political campaigning. We must do what we can in our constituencies, but hon. Members will know how difficult it sometimes is to get these essential messages across.

One important issue that has not been mentioned—we have mainly talked about political and public responsibility—is business and corporate responsibility. It is crucial to understand that we all have to pull together in tackling climate change. We have already heard a little about Shell and BP and their massive profits—bigger, together, than the entire budget for Wales in a year. Let us consider Shell—described by the hon. Member for Lewes as one of the better companies on the grounds that it had accepted the science of climate change. The company posted massive profits, yet is still asking for UK Export Credits Guarantee Department and European Bank for Reconstruction and Development support to help it develop oil and gas pipelines in Sakhalin in Russia. Shell is still involved in gas flaring in Nigeria, which produces more greenhouse gas emissions than the rest of sub-Saharan Africa put together. These "goodies", then, have accepted the science of climate change, but continue to exploit developing countries by using technology that we would not allow in this country, producing greenhouse gas emissions that offset any savings that the companies are making in this country.

To be honest, I am not certain that a windfall tax is the answer, but something has to be done to bring these companies to book and to ensure that their corporate social responsibility is dedicated to tackling climate change. They should use much of their massive profits to invest in other technologies. That is, after all, to the good of their shareholders in the long run.

The Government have made some progress in respect of the overall basket of greenhouse gases, but as we have already heard, they are seriously short of the targets on CO2 reduction. Indeed, if current trends continue, the projection for 2010 suggests a reduction of 7.7 per cent., as compared with the Kyoto obligation of 12.5 per cent., the manifesto commitment of 20 per cent., and indeed the Prime Minister's own commitment given to the House in December of 14 per cent. That was the commitment that he gave to the leader of the Liberal Democrat party.

It is also important to remember that the UK figures do not include aviation. It has been mentioned a couple of times in the debate, but needs to be emphasised. Aviation is not included in the national greenhouse gas inventories. If aviation were included, we would be talking about figures about 5 per cent. higher. I hope that the Minister will deal with the problem in his winding-up speech. I understand why international agreements mean that we cannot go ahead now and tax aviation fuel, but I also understand that it is possible to tax emissions. What are the Government doing in respect of emission taxation, which would help to drive better technology within the aviation industry without necessarily hugely increasing costs? The costs of the aviation industry need to be put on record. Research shows that the richer people in society are the ones who benefit from cheap flights, often to their second homes in Bayonne or the Navarre valley or wherever. Less well-off people do not benefit much from cheap flights.

Climate change is a huge challenge for political parties and the political consensus in this country, but there are also huge opportunities. This island is the part of Europe with the greatest renewable energy resources. Our solar energy may not be so good, but the wind, wave and tidal energy available to us is very great. We could power the whole of western Europe with energy from wind. The installations would not look very nice, but we have that potential, and we need to start finding creative ways to benefit our communities in that way.

For example, we could allow people to put small turbines on their homes. That would accommodate those who oppose wind farms. If we chose to do that, we should not make people fill out a 19-page form from Ofgem so that they could sell energy back to the network. Another possibility is to give council tax rebates to people who install renewable energy equipment in their homes. We should try to incentivise people in a different way. It is too complicated to convince people to go for the Clear Skies initiative. That is too remote: if we want people to choose renewable energy in their daily lives, we have to make it much easier for them.

Time is short so I shall end with a myth—the myth of Cantre'r Gwaelod. This Welsh folk tale harks back to a time when there was no sea between Wales and Ireland, and it is true that at one time the two countries were not separated by water. The relevant area was flooded as a result of the neglect of a politician, whose name has come down over the centuries. He was not called Blair or Howard, but Seithennen. If we politicians do not want future generations to think of us as the ones who neglected our environment, and if we do not want those future generations to live in caves remembering a time when a civilisation existed before the flood came, we need to be aware of the myths and stories of the past.

Climate change is no myth. What is happening to our environment is no folk tale. We should work to ensure that our reputation in history is a good one and we are recalled with approbation. To do that, we must tackle climate change now.

Mr. Colin Challen (Morley and Rothwell) (Lab): I shall make my contribution as brief as possible. I want to speak about the costs to business of environmental regulations. That is an especially important matter in the context of this debate.

Sir Digby Jones gave evidence to the Environmental Audit Committee. What he said was very revealing. It is clear that he accepts that climate change is taking place. He supports contraction and convergence, even though the Confederation of British Industry is restless in the face of the costs that appear to be imposed on it by the Government. That complaint is reflected in the rather fallacious arguments of the Copenhagen consensus, whose members say that other problems should be dealt with first, as climate change is too expensive to deal with.

The report entitled "Cry Wolf" has been referred to already this afternoon. Prepared by the International Chemical Secretariat on behalf of WWF, it shows how business lobby groups consistently have predicted excessive costs in relation to environmental regulation. For example, the directive from the former EEC on vehicle emission standards introduced the catalytic converter in the early 1990s, and industry experts said that fitting that equipment would cost an extra £600 per car. As it turned out, the extra cost was more in the region of £60.

The report states:

"It led to smaller, cheaper cars being equipped with more sophisticated engines and fuel management technologies which in turn led to improved fuel efficiency in spite of the supposed fuel consumption penalty of the catalyst."

It goes on to detail the new technology's indirect benefits. Some 12 years on from the introduction of catalytic converters, researchers this year calculated that the health benefits alone amounted to some £2 billion.

Another example of the predictions made by business can be found in the introduction to amendments made to the US Clean Air Act 1990. The industry predicted that "unbearable" costs would be attached to those amendments. The maximum figure for those costs was $91 billion, although the real extra costs amounted to $26 billion. I admit that that is still a lot of money, but a White House study found that the changes had produced benefits worth $192 billion.

There are so many other examples of the sort of predictions that business can come up with that I am very concerned at the impact that industrial lobby groups can have in getting regulations watered down. It is regrettable that our national allocation plan—part of the EU's emissions trading scheme—seems to have fallen victim to that process and as a result has become a bit more generous. Once again, industry seems to have been rewarded for crying wolf. It is time for those of us who take climate change seriously to cry foul.

Under the UK's emissions trading scheme, industry received a windfall of around £200 million of taxpayers' money. I recommend that everyone read the slim Public Accounts Committee report on its inquiry into how the UK scheme operated, because it provides an insight into how the Government handled that innovation. There were teething problems and, as expected, money was thrown at it to get it going. Business benefited to the tune of £200 million, but it still cried foul when we tried to introduce more regulations and the climate change levy, which is business-neutral and should be kept and improved, if possible.

Another issue that concerns me is grandfathering. Grandfathers are known as kindly, old gentlemen—there may be one or two in the Chamber—who are blessed with wisdom, authority and far-sightedness. However, in the world of pollution controls and environmental regulation, grandfathering means that industry can claim that its old plant should be exempt from many controls. That is how George W. Bush approached the problem of oil industry pollution when he was governor of Texas: he gutted the Clean Air Act 1990, which had been amended by his father. Now, we want to grandfather future emissions based on industry growth expectations or predictions so that emissions from the growth can be accommodated without breaking the rules. Even if we have an effective emissions, trading scheme, it may allow for growth and emissions and I am sure that many people will find that odd. We should be looking for absolute reductions in emissions and I hope that we will strengthen the European scheme, include aviation, and introduce lower baselines than industry expects. We need to take a much tougher line.

I welcome the report of the international climate change task force which was co-chaired by my right hon. Friend, the Member for Tyneside, North (Mr. Byers).

[Mr. Colin Challen]

Interestingly, the other co-chair was a Republican Senator, Olympia Snowe, which shows that some members of Mr. Bush's party are concerned enough to engage with the science, even if he is not. The report calls for immediate action, such as a twofold increase in research, development and demonstration of renewable energy technologies. It also calls for removal of barriers to the development of such industries and for the abolition of fossil fuel subsidies. I forget how many sisters we have left among the oil companies, but it is amazing that they are reporting such massive profits and still sharing in the $80 billion of subsidy.

Another recommendation in the report is to build on the global climate change framework of both the United Nations framework convention on climate change and Kyoto. It refers to a new basis of equity and common, but differentiated, responsibilities. As someone who supports contraction and convergence, that is the meaning that I want to read into it, but I understand why its authors would not want to say that explicitly. However, the notion of equity is not ambivalent in the report. There is no equitable distribution of carbon emissions at present. The earth's capacity to absorb carbon is put at 3 billion tonnes, but our current emissions amount to around 6 billion tonnes, or 1 tonne for every member of the human race. In this country, we emit around 24 tonnes per household per annum and the figure is higher in the United States.

Those statistics demonstrate the inequitable distribution of carbon emissions and pollution more generally. We need environmental equity as well as carbon emissions trading and so on. We need a cap and trade programme, and contraction and convergence is the name that we must give to it. We must link that battle with the battle against poverty. I hope to hear about that link more often in the speeches of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, because we are making the poor poorer with policies that do not tackle carbon emissions. Marginal agricultural land will become unusable, and drought, the failure of the Indian monsoon and so on will make the task of tackling poverty much more difficult. We must make that link.

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): This has been a good and lively debate. Indeed, we could have had a full-day debate on the subject and I urge the Government to consider that. After all, the Prime Minister has made it clear that he wants to make climate change central to our presidency of both the EU and the G8. This is the third debate initiated by the Liberal Democrats in this Parliament to ensure that we debate the environment, and the House should appreciate that we have done that in the limited time available to us for such debates. There is clearly plenty of scope for debate and many people want to contribute. It would help to inform the Government's approach if they gave us such opportunities, and I hope that the Minister will feed that back.

Mr. Lazarowicz: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Malcolm Bruce: I am sorry, I do not have time. I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman wants to intervene but I have only 10 minutes for my speech, and even so it will be impossible to summarise the whole debate.

What has been interesting about the debate is that a variety of speeches have stressed that the science is incontrovertible, that time presses urgently and that we need radical measures that we should co-operate to support. The problem is that the Conservative party has not been fully part of that. We have heard only one speech from the Conservative Benches during the entire debate. Conservative Back Benchers have made some constructive interventions, but they were less than supportive of their Front-Bench policy, and they are no longer in the Chamber. That is a challenge, because we shall be unable to address the radical climate change policies that are needed if the Conservative party is not fully on board working with us.

The Conservatives have suggested that they want to get rid of the climate change levy and would cut the Environment Agency's budget. They are going round the country campaigning energetically against wind energy while acting as a front for a nuclear power industry that has no economic case to make. Although I will accept some strictures from the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Thomas) on the activity of certain people, we should be clear that not every wind farm is ideally located and that planning issues are legitimate.

As a party, the Liberal Democrats are clear that wind energy is crucial in the short term to meet the renewable energy targets that we have undertaken under Kyoto. As a Scottish Member, I can say that both our Ministers in the partnership Government in Edinburgh are up front in promoting and encouraging wind energy developments. Last week, I walked over a wind farm site in my constituency that will be generating electricity this summer. I have also supported a fairly controversial application that is going through the process. People who oppose wind energy in principle, or who in practice oppose every development, are actually setting themselves against addressing the climate change agenda. It is as simple as that. One cannot be in favour of dealing with that issue and oppose wind energy either in principle or in practice.

Mr. Lazarowicz rose—

Malcolm Bruce: I know how long the hon. Gentleman has been waiting so I will give way, but I would be grateful if he could be quick.

Mr. Lazarowicz: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. What he says about people being consistent must also apply to transport. As he knows, his party in Edinburgh is campaigning against the congestion charge, which is supported by environmental organisations, in that city. That is why Friends of the Earth said today:

"The Liberal Democrats in Edinburgh campaigning against a Yes vote are besmirching the national party's much-vaunted green credentials for the sake of short-term political opportunism."

I do not want to embarrass the hon. Gentleman too much, but will he give a lead to his party in Edinburgh and tell it to stop opposing the congestion charge in that city?

Malcolm Bruce: It was a serious mistake to allow the hon. Gentleman to intervene. The fact is that our party in Edinburgh is critical of the scheme, not the principle, as he knows perfectly well. At the end of the day, with some debate and argument, we might come up with a scheme that we can both support. That is what debate is about.

We have had our differences with the Government on some of the central issues on the climate change agenda. Sometimes we do not think that the Government are radical enough or that their schemes will work, but our debates are about how to come up with mechanisms that will deliver results. There are many aspects of what the Government are doing—their commitment and the mechanisms—that we can and do support, but we need more mechanisms to bring on some of the alternative schemes that are not delivering at present. That is not a criticism of what the Government are doing, but a recognition that if there are too many schemes, things become too complicated and people do not respond.

I urge the Minister to consider other aspects of renewables, such as timber. Our forestry industry could make a substantial contribution, yet it is being frustrated because a time horizon on co-firing could lead to a sudden drop in the market unless there is a recognition that we need both coppicing and off-cuts to become a long-term part of that process. Schemes that involve not electricity generation but space heating using renewable energy and more efficient systems must be encouraged.

The Minister will be familiar with the fact that, with the right mechanisms to increase the promotion of energy efficiency, we could also produce a mechanism that could deliver the expansion of combined heat and power that we all want yet are failing to achieve. In fact, combined heat and power can do more than anything else to help us to meet our 2010 targets, yet its development has come to a complete halt. I urge the Government to think about such mechanisms.

I am pleased that the Secretary of State spoke and engaged with us very seriously on this matter. It is important to make it clear that criticisms of the United States Administration's policies, particularly their hostility to the Kyoto protocol, should not blind anyone to the fact that the US has an enormous contribution to make towards solving the problem, both by changing its own behaviour and by providing the technology that it has the capacity to contribute. One of the encouraging things about the US is that it will make a substantial contribution to that technology regardless of the US Administration's policy.

The hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson) rightly highlighted the problems of countries such as China and India and the need for us to balance their development with the contribution that we can make. That is another reason why I believe strongly that we must recognise the fact that nuclear power is not the solution. Anyone who tries to reactivate nuclear power is blocking the solution, as our past experience shows. The best way that I can describe the nuclear power industry is as a cuckoo in the nest: it sucks all the resources from every other aspect of energy to the point where no other innovation takes place.

We have an overhang of nuclear waste clean-up costs estimated at £50 billion or more. We also have an overhang in that producing electricity with nuclear power costs us more than most other forms of electricity production. Those people who complain that the introduction of renewable energy costs a little more should recognise that the sums involved are a fraction of the extra costs that we have already paid for the nuclear industry, which never delivered any of its early promise. It is a question not of being anti-nuclear, but of acknowledging that the resources that nuclear power devours displace everything else. We simply cannot afford to be taken down that track.

The Secretary of State also rightly made a plea—another challenge to the Conservative party to come on board in this respect—to stop talking about the science, about which we all agree, and to agree about the radical measures that we need to take together to deal with the fundamental problem. All political parties have had difficulties with high fuel costs—a policy intended to discourage car use, or at least to try to connect the car with its environmental impact. That has caused considerable tensions—the blockades embarrassed us all—but we have sustained that policy.

The solution depends on all the major parties being prepared to stand together. The Conservative party's answer to congestion charging is to build more roads, but it exploits the difficulties of making such decisions. The reality is that strong cross-party support is required, particularly in the earlier stages. As the hon. Member for Brighton, Kemptown (Dr. Turner) put it, the problem is so serious and severe that those radical measures, which may not appear popular, are so important that we should all be prepared to stand together to defend and justify them because bigger issues are at stake. So long as a significant political party is playing party politics in that scenario, it will undermine what we can achieve and—as the hon. Member for Nottingham, South says—we may have passed the point of no return by 2015. In 10 years' time, there may not be the capacity to introduce policies that can turn the tide.

This is an important debate. I challenge the Government to recognise the fact that if they are serious—we believe that they are—about their priorities for the G8 and the EU, they must have regular debates during the presidency to report back and give the House an opportunity to inform them and, indeed, perhaps back them up in their negotiations in those important forums. If things really are as serious as the Government say, they should take Parliament with them and not act simply as an Executive. Plenty of hon. Members are willing to support the Government in those difficult decisions, and they should give us the chance to tell them so.

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): We have had a good debate in which hon. Members have made excellent contributions. I agreed with a great deal of what was said, and the Government will support the motion because its thrust is exactly right.

The hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) made a good case and highlighted the political aspects of climate change that we must all address. I also accept the points made by the hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce). It would not be unreasonable for the Government to offer an opportunity to debate the G8 process and the Prime Minister's priorities, so I shall certainly discuss that with the business managers.

The hon. Member for Gordon also made a good critique of the situation and raised important points about such matters as co-firing. Co-firing has excellent potential in relation to biomass and the timber industry, so we are keen to encourage it. Indeed, we are keen to encourage all forms of renewables and technologies, which include combined heat and power. The Government are examining the barriers to the development of CHP to find out how we can assist the situation. I accept the points that he made about nuclear power. The costs are enormous, so perhaps money could be better spent on other renewables at this stage of energy development. However, some of the problems with nuclear energy might be resolved down the line, which could lead to a different argument and changed priorities. We keep an open mind on the pros and cons of all technologies.

My hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Kemptown (Dr. Turner) made several excellent points about climate change and talked about the importance of fiscal measures. I accept his point and shall return to it. The hon. Member for Guildford (Sue Doughty) mentioned housing standards, which are important. We plan to raise housing standards and to apply and develop the new code that was produced by the sustainable buildings task group. I understand her point about the report on adaptation and apologise for its having slipped. That is partly due to the work that must be done across government, but it will be available in May.

My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson) talked powerfully about the international dimensions of the situation and mentioned building regulations. I am interested in the concept of white certificates when considering energy efficiency. We have a successful system of carbon trading and I look forward to the EU scheme. Of course, that is the trade in what are known as black certificates, because carbon is being sold. There is a suggestion that bodies that meet standards of energy efficiency and carbon reduction could receive white certificates, and I think that such a scheme would address the points that my hon. Friend made.

The hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Thomas) was right to talk about the realities of wind because wind is crucial if we are serious about meeting renewable targets. Given market preferences and the establishment of necessary technology, it is thought that wind will make up about 70 per cent. of renewables. If we turn our back on wind, we are turning our back on renewable targets. I do not know whether the Conservative party is turning its back on renewable targets, but that is the end result of rejecting wind.

My hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Rothwell (Mr. Challen) said that industry predictions are often exaggerated—we know of examples of that. He also talked about contraction and convergence. Such concepts have a considerable following, so we must examine them carefully, even though, like all such matters, they have pros and cons.

There was, however, some misinformation in the debate. I am genuinely interested in some of the Conservative party's positions, but find them a little confusing. Since 1997, $CO_2$ has risen overall by about 0.4 per cent. It has gone up and down over the years. Other greenhouse gases, such as methane, nitrogen oxide, sulphur hexaflouride, hydrofluorocarbons and perfluorocarbons, have all decreased by about 6 per cent. since 1997. The UK and Denmark are the only two countries in the EU that are meeting their Kyoto targets. We have a good record on Kyoto, but if I were asked whether that was good enough, I would say no of course it is not, and that we have to do more to reduce greenhouse gases and $CO_2$. That is the whole point of the ongoing climate change review.

On our commitment to a 20 per cent. reduction in $CO_2$ by 2010, the modelling is predicting that we will achieve a 14 per cent. drop—first an increase and then a falling away. However, that does not take into account the impact of the European emissions trading scheme, which will be significant, or other measures that we may bring forward as a result of the climate change review. I think that we can get on track to achieve a 20 per cent. reduction by 2010, and it is our intention to do so.

I am genuinely confused by some of the points that have been made in the debate, such as the Conservative proposal to abolish the climate change levy. The levy is revenue-neutral in the sector, because companies that are part of the scheme receive a reduction in employer's national insurance, and money goes to the Carbon Trust. The hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) gave an assurance that a future Conservative Administration would maintain the funding that goes into the Carbon Trust, which currently comes from the climate change levy. On that logic, the Conservatives are suggesting moving away from making the polluters pay to putting the burden on the taxpayer. That does not strike me as a good sensible green fiscal tax.

Mr. Yeo: I do not know why the Minister is expressing such surprise, because it has always been our position that once emissions trading is fully under way, the principal reason for a climate change levy is removed.

Mr. Morley: The hon. Gentleman is ignoring the fact that the climate change levy is a revenue-neutral tax: it goes back to the sector to improve energy efficiency. It is a green fiscal measure. I support what he said about the scope for extending green fiscal measures, and there is further debate to be had, but such comments are undermined by his point on the climate change levy. It does not make any sense; it is a contradiction.

Let us take the Conservatives' position on wind power, which is an important renewable. It is a myth that wind power is the Government's only policy. We are spending £50 million on marine energy—£42 million on tide and wave—£60 million on biomass, which does not include the reduction in duty, £31 million on photovoltaics, £171 million on offshore wind—there is no spending on the development of onshore wind, because that is well established—and £12.5 million on community and household schemes. So let us not hear the myth that the Government's one approach is through wind power and that we are not supporting other forms of renewable energy.

Mr. Carmichael: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Morley: I am sorry, but I have only a couple of minutes left.

The hon. Member for South Suffolk seems to be suggesting that he would give local communities a right of veto over every wind farm development. I make it clear that I am not against planning procedures properly taking into account people's representations, but the proposal would mean no onshore wind development in this country. If there is no onshore wind development, there is not the slightest chance of meeting the renewables targets, because all independent analysts predict that 70 per cent. of renewable energy will come from wind power. That is a resource that we in this country should exploit.

Although I welcome the consensus shown by this debate and the thoughtful and considered contributions that were made to it, there is a contradiction at the heart of Conservative policy. If the Conservatives oppose renewable energy, abandon targets and give up any pretence of sharing the commitments that we have made to reducing greenhouse gas emissions, they should be honest and admit that they have caved in to industry pressure and given up the green agenda.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House endorses the comments of Sir David King that climate change is the most serious threat facing the planet and congratulates him on his work in this area; welcomes the Prime Minister's commitment to make the tackling of climate change a top priority for the United Kingdom's presidencies of the EU and G8 this year; reiterates the UK commitment to a 60 per cent. reduction in carbon emissions by 2050; strongly welcomes the coming into force of the Kyoto agreement on 16th February and the strong role the European Union has played in achieving this; believes that it is vital that, post-Kyoto, the international community works to reach agreement on the action needed to tackle climate change, which should engage the United States but which should also recognise the importance of the energy choices which face many of the major developing countries; calls on the global community to work with them in addressing those choices; rejects the notion that tackling climate change will of necessity damage the economy and indeed suggests that it is failure to do so that will lead to that result; believes that all parties in this House should by their own actions help convince the public of the need to take environmental matters seriously; and therefore condemns Conservative plans severely to weaken the Environment Agency through the massive and debilitating cuts proposed for the Agency by that party, and its damaging plans to abolish the climate change levy.

Belmarsh Judgment

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I advise the House that when debating the motion hon. Members should take care to avoid referring to individual cases that may be before the courts. The Chair will be particularly attentive in that respect.

I should also inform the House that Mr. Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Mark Oaten (Winchester) (LD): I beg to move,

That this House calls on the Government to respond to the House of Lords judgment on Belmarsh with a system of dealing with terror suspects which does not require a derogation from European Convention on Human Rights obligations and which enshrines the principle that decisions on restrictions on individual liberties are taken by the courts and not politicians.

A couple of weeks have passed since the new Home Secretary came to the Chamber and announced his proposals on how to respond to the Law Lords' judgment. There has been a fair amount of media speculation and debate in the press and we Liberal Democrats felt it was important to bring that debate to the Floor of the House. We had the first opportunity to call a proper debate to scrutinise the Government's plans, and we have taken it.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): When was that principled decision made? Last week, we were told that there would be a debate on crime today.

Mr. Oaten: I think that I decided on Thursday morning, when I was struck by the enormous amount of media debate on the subject. I thought that the Chamber was the proper place for that debate, which is why we are discussing the Belmarsh judgment today. I see the Minister nodding.

This is an early opportunity to explore some of the issues, but first let me make two things crystal clear. First, we welcome the fact that the Home Secretary came to the Floor of the House to announce his proposals. For too long, legal judgments and the rulings of the Law Lords were dismissed or ignored by the previous Home Secretary. At least we now have a Home Secretary who is prepared to engage in debate. We do not agree with the proposals, but we welcome the opportunity to participate in debate and find a sensible solution.

Secondly, the Liberal Democrats in no way underestimate the seriousness of the threats facing this country. The fact that we differ from the Government on how to tackle those threats does not mean that we do not recognise that the world has changed since 9/11 and that we now face a different problem of international terrorism. It is worth putting on the record our acknowledgement of the fact that we all owe our intelligence services an enormous debt of respect and gratitude for their achievements in the past three or four years. It is nothing short of remarkable we have been able, with the help of their work, to avoid the type of atrocity that we have witnessed in other parts of the world.

[Mr. Oaten]

The question before us is one of balance. We all walk a tightrope: on the one hand, we must ensure that we have in place the proper protections in a changed world; on the other, we must protect the very liberties that the terrorists would take away from us. In our judgment, the Government have got that balance wrong in the past three years, and the measures proposed by the new Home Secretary a couple of weeks ago will make the position worse in many ways.

Let me examine some of the ideas and propose some alternatives in a constructive way, to see whether we can achieve a measure of consensus on the way forward. Before doing so, I wish to make an observation about the level of threat. Although I do not question the general threat facing this country, questions have arisen about the threat posed by the individuals held in Belmarsh. I am mindful of your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker, about being careful in our remarks, and as an Opposition Member who does not have access to full information about those individuals, I accept that Ministers might know more than we do, but the release last week of the former detainee known as C raised some concerns.

I understand that intelligence and information can change. I understand that the Special Immigration Appeals Commission reviewed the case on a couple of occasions. None the less, it seems strange that one day an individual is regarded as being so much of a danger to this country that he can be held without charge, but the next day that individual can be released without any conditions. That seems like an extraordinary shift from black to white.

David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden) (Con): My understanding of that case is that there was not a change in the evidence; there was simply a change in the judgment to the effect that the evidence was not good enough.

Mr. Oaten: The shadow Home Secretary makes an interesting point about the transparency in respect of understanding why such decisions are taken. The more we hear about C, however, the more the impact on me and perhaps others is that we want to understand more about the intelligence and the reasons why some other detainees are held. That prompts the question whether some of those individuals are such a danger to society that they should be kept in the way in which they have been kept.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman also agree that under the present arrangements, now overturned by the House of Lords, it would have been open to any of those detainees to go to any country that was prepared to take them? If they were a danger to this country while they were present, would they not equally pose a significant danger not only to this country, but to the wider western world, if they were to find such a country to take them without further detention?

Mr. Oaten: The hon. Gentleman makes a very interesting point. Of course, one of the aspects of 9/11 and of terrorism now is that terrorism is global. The ability to operate in different countries means that we cannot simply assume that a threat will change if somebody is removed to a different country.

Mr. Tom Harris (Glasgow, Cathcart) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Oaten: I want to make bit of progress.

As for the Government's approach, for the past three years, as we know, detainees have been held without charge. The cases have been under review from the Special Immigration Appeals Commission. As a result of the Government's actions, there has been a need to seek annual review by this House of a derogation from the European convention on human rights. It is fair to say that there were many in the first six months and each year thereafter who were prepared to accept that the Government were dealing with a difficult situation and to give them some leeway, but three years on, that mood has certainly disappeared, and the Liberal Democrats made the judgment last spring that we would vote against that derogation.

The Newton committee has been extremely critical of what the Government have said. In December 2003, the committee, which comprises some of the most senior Members in all parts of the House, including my right hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), who is sitting on the Benches behind me, said:

"We strongly recommend that the powers which allow foreign nationals to be detained potentially indefinitely should be replaced as a matter of urgency".

Furthermore, some of the individuals who sit on the Special Immigration Appeals Commission resigned. Mr. Macdonald, who represented the interests of five detainees, became an advocate when SIAC was purely an immigration court dealing with cases that involved national security. He described it as becoming an internment court, however, and said:

"I was increasingly uncomfortable at my position in there, and after the government's reaction to the judgment, I decided it was time to go . . . It's something I've been thinking about for some time. The House of Lords' judgment was so very clear about the need to defend the rule of law and I felt that our role is legitimising something I don't think can be legitimised."

Of course, the Law Lords' ruling was made at the end of last year. They ruled by a majority of eight votes to one that allowing suspects to be held in the way in which they have been held was in breach of their human rights. Lord Nicholls, for example, said that "indefinite imprisonment without charge or trial is anathema in any country which observes the rules of law."

Lord Hoffmann said:

"The real threat to the life of the nation comes not from terrorism but from laws such as these."

The Government have had many warnings, and they have now at last decided to respond. I want to look at their response, but before I get on to the individual measures, I want also to suggest that we should judge those measures on the basis of two overriding principles. From the Liberal Democrat perspective, those principles are as follows. First, we should not have measures that give the Executive alone the power to take these decisions. Secondly, we should not have to seek a derogation or opt-out from our international responsibilities and from conventions. Those two principles should be the benchmark for deciding what Government measures we can support and which ones we will reject.

Let us look and see how the measures match up against those two criteria. The Government have suggested that house detention be used as part of a control order. We think that that is unacceptable. First, we believe that it would require a further derogation, and the Home Secretary said as much when he came to the House and was questioned by the Opposition parties.

I do not know whether the Minister can say whether further legal advice has been taken, but the Home Secretary indicated that house detention would probably require a derogation and Liberty and other organisations think that it would fall foul of our international responsibilities.

The second problem with house detention is that it covers UK nationals, which is totally unacceptable. The third problem with house detention is that it still leaves the power purely with the Home Secretary. If it were to get through the House, the detainees would be likely to challenge it, in which case the Law Lords would probably vote against it three years down the track after various cat and mouse rulings, and the Government would be no better off than they are at the moment.

Irrespective of those legal concerns and the likelihood that house arrest would be challenged, do we want to live in the kind of society in which the Home Secretary has the power to hold people under house arrest or house detention? Whatever the Government call that policy, that is what it is about. The issue may not involve this Home Secretary, but surely we have a responsibility to legislate for what future Home Secretaries might wish to do. When we legislate in this House, we should legislate not for today, but for what might happen in the future. Giving the Home Secretary the power to hold individuals in that way is totally unacceptable.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on how he has conducted the debate, and his party on choosing this important subject for half of its precious Supply day. As well as worrying about how future Home Secretaries might use that power, is it not apposite to consider what recent Home Secretaries—for example, the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard)—might have done with it? It would be benign in some hands and a frightening prospect in others.

Mr. Oaten: Even that former Home Secretary finds the measures unacceptable, which demonstrates how scary they are. The most compelling argument is the list of other countries that use house arrest. Do we really want to be grouped with Burma, Zimbabwe and North Korea? I do not want to be part of the family of countries that have house detention.

Last Friday, I was shadowed by a newly elected member from the Maldives Parliament, who won his seat despite being held under house detention. He found it remarkable that I was spending part of my Friday dealing with the prospect of having to debate house detention in this country. The Liberal Democrats will certainly not support the Government on house detention.

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): I apologise for not being present from the outset, and for being very stuffed up. The comparison with North Korea, Myanmar and Zimbabwe is not correct. Nobody has suggested for one second that the courts would not closely supervise such a power, if it were necessary to take it. There is no reason why a decision by the Home Secretary should not include an automatic and immediate right of appeal, which does not exist in any of the three countries mentioned by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Oaten: I respect the contribution from the hon. and learned Lady, who makes an awful lot of sense on those issues. However, a full judicial process has not been promised as part of house arrest, and the Home Secretary will make the ultimate decision. What the hon. and learned Lady has described is not a full and proper judicial process.

David Davis: I want to help the hon. Gentleman, albeit that the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) is right about the comparison with North Korea. He has discussed one case in which the evidence probably turned out to be inadequate. If that individual is innocent—we do not know—he has been in jail for three years with no trial and no rights. Without the latest judgment on that case, he might have been held for much longer. From his point of view, the situation is not much different from that in North Korea.

Mr. Oaten: The right hon. Gentleman has made a good point.

The Government's second suggestion is control orders. I have a little bit more sympathy with the ideas of control orders, when they do not involve house detention. Lower forms of control orders would probably not require a derogation—again, legal advice would be required on that point—so they tick that particular box, although they might give the Executive too much power. That is an important issue, and it may be a way forward, particularly in respect of how we can use tagging, limits on access to communications—to phones and computers—or perhaps even restrictions on access to financial services.

We would support the measures on control orders if a number of conditions were met. First, they should be issued by judges. Secondly, there should be absolute confirmation that they would not require a derogation. Thirdly, they should be time-limited and renewable with judicial oversight. Fourthly, they should not be used if there is a proper prospect of prosecution taking place. That is a perfectly sensible way forward, through which we could achieve the balance that is being sought between having some control and building in the judicial process. I hope that the Government will consider those suggestions on control orders.

On whether control orders should be used as an alternative to prosecution, we differ an awful lot from the Government. This is a key issue. As the Newton committee said,

"Terrorists are criminals, and therefore ordinary criminal justice and security provisions should, as far as possible, continue to be the preferred way of countering terrorism."

We strongly agree. Surely the right way to deal with the situation is to seek prosecutions in the normal way. I note that the Home Secretary said in his statement that that was his preferred starting point.

It has been possible to achieve that in some cases. In January 2002, two Algerians were charged with membership of al-Qaeda, and although the case was dropped, a year later they were jailed for 11 years. We know that that can be done, so the critical questions are these: why cannot we do that on more occasions, and why is the Home Secretary ruling it out so clearly at this stage? In part, that hinges on concerns about whether one reveals sources, and the protection that one wants to give them. However, I note from the Home Secretary's remarks that he believes that prosecution probably would not be effective in securing a conviction in relation to the existing cases. That may be so, but we should not rule it out on that basis; surely we should also be legislating for future cases, for which we should legislate to allow intercept evidence to be used.

There must be a way forward to achieve more prosecutions. The Law Commission agrees, as does, interestingly, the new chief of police, Sir Ian Blair. He said:

"I have long been in favour of intercept evidence being used in court. The court can then weigh it up. At the moment nobody can test it."

There are models throughout Europe; individual countries have found a way to get prosecutions and achieve a proper court process. So what are MI6 and GCHQ telling the Home Secretary that is making him so nervous about allowing that? If there is nervousness about the kind of information that is allowed in court, why are the Government not looking into alternative ways in which we could set up the court process? For example, what about specially trained and security-cleared judges, who could prepare a case that could then be heard by a different judge? What about smaller juries, or special security-cleared juries? Or—I do not like this, but if it is a way forward, perhaps we could look into it—a jury could hear the evidence, but not have the source material that it has come from. The Government should try to find a way forward on this important principle, so that we can get more prosecutions, as we did in the past.

I come on to two further issues that concern new offences and relate to ideas that the Government appear to have rejected. The first is the idea—again, used in several European countries—of making planning for terrorist activity an aggravating factor when sentencing, by allowing courts to pass longer sentences for non-terrorist crimes where there is clear evidence that the offender intended to go on to commit an act of terrorism. In essence, if it can be proved that some terrorism is attached to a criminal activity, a longer sentence can be obtained. Why have the Government rejected that as a model?

Why have the Government rejected the idea of introducing new offences to deal with loopholes that mean that an individual could be preparing for a terrorist attack that is not covered by legislation elsewhere? We argue that both those proposals should be included in discussions and may be a way forward.

Let me deal with the Government's final suggestion of deportation. I greatly welcome the Home Secretary's announcement that Ministers have spent some time visiting countries to ascertain whether they can gain agreement on improvements in human rights. All parties welcome that. It should be everyone's long-term objective to try to ensure that individuals are free to go back to countries because their human rights record has improved. However, I would be worried if the Government introduced deportation on the basis of flimsy agreements on a ministerial visit when a memorandum had been signed. That is not good enough and would not persuade us that a robust system was in place to test whether the human rights record had improved sufficiently to allow deportation.

The Government know that if the system were not sufficiently robust, the detainees could test it in the courts. We make the simple suggestion of legally binding framework agreements with the relevant countries that are pre-tested in the courts to ascertain whether they are robust enough. Until those agreements are in place, no deportation should happen.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): The hon. Gentleman is making a good speech and a reasonable suggestion. May I take it from his remarks that he has in mind the prudent notion that, in addition to any framework agreement, there should be an observable record of respect for human rights rather than merely a rhetorical expression of support for them?

Mr. Oaten: The hon. Gentleman is right. I do not want a piece of paper but a track record that has been tested, approved and signed by international organisations that we respect for their ability to investigate whether human rights are respected. Only that sort of track record would give me confidence that a deportation could be safe.

David Davis: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his generosity in giving way again. I am straightforwardly seeking information. The French are known to have sent back at least one suspect to Algeria, which is one of our problem countries. Does he know what arrangements they have and whether we can use them?

Mr. Oaten: I do not know the arrangements and I would be nervous about assuming that simply because another EU member state had sent an individual back to a country, we could tick the box for this country. I want to ensure that we have gone through the process properly. Other arrangements exist, but I want them to be of such a high standard that this country would be happy to sign them. We cannot assume that it is safe to send individuals back simply because other countries have done that.

It is difficult to summarise such a complex issue in 20 minutes. We believe that we should seek a cross-party consensus on such matters. The leaders of the two main Opposition parties will see the Prime Minister about the issue and I hope that we can make some progress. However, time is against us. We are required to renew the derogation in March. As things stand, the Liberal Democrats will vote against it. The Government have had three—nearly four—years to resolve those issues and progress has been too slow.

We want a balance between security and the important principles of justice. I hope that progress can be made, but the Government's proposals so far fail to achieve the balance. In many ways, they make a bad position worse by continuing to undermine the strong principles of justice that have served this country so well for many years.

The Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety (Ms Hazel Blears): I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to end and add:

"notes with approval the Government's intention to respond to the House of Lords judgment on Belmarsh by continuing to take all necessary measures to protect the security of the country and its citizens while acting in compliance with the European Convention on Human Rights."

I thank the Liberal Democrats not only for giving up their Opposition time for an important debate, but for the genuinely open and constructive way in which the arguments have been presented. I am keen to develop as far as possible some cross-party consensus about the serious, difficult and complex issues that face the country. I hope that, through debate, argument, discussion and consideration, we can find our way through some of them. We will not always agree and, as the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten) said in his closing remarks, we are discussing the balance between security and liberty. It is a difficult balance to strike and we may strike it in different places, depending on our perspective. However, I hope that we will act in a spirit of seeking the best solution for the future of this country. I take on board the hon. Gentleman's comments that he takes the threat seriously and that he has regard to the challenges that currently face the country.

The Home Secretary would have been present for the debate, but he is giving evidence to the Select Committee on Home Affairs on the subject of our discussion. Otherwise, he would have been here.

Mr. Allen: I thank my hon. Friend for generously giving way so early in her speech. The point that she made about cross-party consensus can also be made about internal consensus within a party, and I think that such consensus can be found. An example would be when the Home Secretary, in his previous job, faced the very difficult issue of student fees. He took a great deal of time to talk to everyone, and used his ministerial team to do so, and a more consensual approach was arrived at, although it remained a difficult issue. Such balances can be struck, both inside and across the parties.

Ms Blears: My hon. Friend is right. When dealing with difficult issues, dialogue usually helps. Being open to other considerations is also important.

As the hon. Member for Winchester suggested, we are under certain time constraints, and time is not always on our side. If we are to renew the part 4 powers, we shall have to do so by 13 March, which is why we have had to lay the order in that regard. We hope that our new proposals will mean that that will not be necessary, but we are constrained by the legislative process. We need to get on with this, but the time constraints do not mean that we should not have extensive discussions with people on these issues. I certainly give my commitment to do that.

I want to set this matter in context by saying a few words about the threat. The hon. Member for Winchester said that he did not doubt that the threat faced by this country was serious, and that it was of a different order since 9/11. That threat comes not only from foreign nationals, among whom it was concentrated immediately after 9/11. As a result of various operations that we have carried out, and because we are now uncovering more about the extent of the threat and know far more about the networks of terrorism, we understand that the threat comes not only from foreign nationals but, increasingly, from British citizens who are involved in this kind of activity. The threat remains serious, and it is the duty of the Home Secretary to protect the security of the nation. At the end of the day, that is probably his most important task, and he clearly takes it extremely seriously.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) (LD): It is perhaps worth making the point that 9/11 did not demonstrate a threat that had not existed previously. The threat had indeed existed. The events of 9/11 told the people of the United States of America that it was a very real threat against them—a fact that they had not appreciated—and demonstrated the extent to which the sources of the threat could be hidden in the country that was being threatened, as they were in the United States.

Ms Blears: The right hon. Gentleman is correct. Clearly, that threat was real and serious before 9/11. Incidents had taken place that revealed that. I am seeking to show that that threat is developing as we learn more about the activities that go on. The threat remains serious, but it is also becoming more complex and more textured as we learn more about the different individuals involved and approach the issue from different angles. The right hon. Gentleman is absolutely right, however. The threat was clearly there before 9/11.

The Home Secretary has regular, frequent discussions with the director general of the Security Service and the Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police. He also receives regular updates on the level of the threat from the Joint Terrorism Analysis Centre. He is in no doubt—and neither am I—that the threat remains, and that nothing has happened to diminish it or to call into question the Government's assessment that a public emergency is threatening the life of the nation. The judgment in the House of Lords found by a majority of eight to one that that was the case. They certainly came to different conclusions on proportionality and discrimination, but they confirmed that a public emergency was threatening the life of the nation.

That is my starting point for this debate, because it sets out the context of the threat. That necessarily shapes the action that we need to take to meet the threat and to protect the security of this country and its people. We need to strike the right balance between security and liberty, but my personal starting point is that terrorism poses a real and serious threat to the structures and people of this country. We have to put in place a framework that addresses that threat as proportionately as we can, and without discriminating, if we are to meet the terms of the Law Lords' judgment. We are currently engaged in a process to try to find our way through this legal system—with regard not only to our own legal system but to the interaction with the European convention on human rights—to find the way forward.

The hon. Member for Winchester said that we had taken an awfully long time to come forward with our proposals, but I take issue with him on that point. The Law Lords' judgment was made on 16 December, and the Home Secretary made his statement in this House on 26 January. That was not a huge amount of time in which to deal with complex issues such as these. I entirely take the point that there were recommendations from the Newton committee, which sparked off the publication of our consultation paper and the wide-ranging debate about the balance between security and liberty. However, the Law Lords made their decision only in December, and the Home Secretary made his statement as soon as he could, on 26 January, to give some flavour to the proposals that we want to introduce.

The hon. Gentleman also said that he could not possibly support the proposals made by the Home Secretary. That is a little premature. We have had the ministerial statement, but we have not seen the legislation and he has not seen the detail. I appreciate his support for some ideas around control orders, but I ask him to hang fire on judging entirely the proposals that we hope to make in the next few weeks rather than months.

The 26 January statement set out our decision to respond to the Law Lords' ruling by including these proposals for control orders. The part 4 powers were designed to protect us against the particular threat identified from foreign nationals whom we could not deport because we were worried about the infringement of their rights under the European convention—the likelihood that they could be subject to torture and ill treatment should they be deported.

We tried at that time to get a tight-focused response to the threat that was there. We used the Special Immigration Appeals Commission, because it was already in existence and it provided a way to take closed evidence, as well as open. It was chaired by a High Court judge and it had a structure to enable us to deal with the problem. Although the part 4 powers have since been traduced and parodied in some quarters as the Home Secretary's huge, broad-brush attempt to lock people up and throw away the key, nothing could be further from the truth.

We really tried to target the threat, which was mainly from foreign nationals. We could not deport them, so we used some immigration powers that were already on the statute book. That is why we went for that model. Clearly, the House of Lords has decided that that is incompatible with the European convention on human rights, although it has not decided that it is unlawful. Therefore, it is a matter for Parliament to decide how we respond to that.

There were two main complaints: the House of Lords did not feel that the detention powers were proportionate to the public emergency that we face and thought them discriminatory as they applied only to foreign nationals, rather than to British citizens as well. In a way, part of that argument is circular, because the Law Lords also expressed the view that, if the proposals applied only to foreign nationals and there was a threat from British citizens, was it not the case that they were disproportionate if we were not applying them across the board? Although they had concerns on those two separate limbs, there was also a connection between whether the powers were discriminatory and whether there was a similar threat from British citizens—were they therefore disproportionate because we had not exercised them against British citizens in such a way?

Mr. Boswell: Is not this the dilemma that the Minister faces? If the detention orders apply to only a handful of foreign nationals, for the reasons she has given, and if the terrorism threat to this country is much more extensive—for the purposes of the debate, we must accept that it is—it seems almost paradoxical to say that the existence of those powers, confined to foreign nationals, is in any way sufficient or appropriate to meet the threat that the country faces. It seems to be partial because it is discriminatory. If she argues that only a few people are involved, that in a way weakens the case that she has to make. I expose that as a dilemma, without necessarily resolving it.

Ms Blears: This whole area is full of dilemmas for us to try to resolve. They are not easy issues. We have said that the part 4 powers were exercised very sparingly indeed; we only ever certified 17 people. Equally, when we introduce control orders, we do not want to use this as a broad-brush measure. We want to target it on the threat. At the moment, all we have are powers of detention or no powers at all. That makes a good case for control orders, because we could have a spectrum of powers tailored individually to the threat that we face, which I hope will help us to meet the claim made by the House of Lords on proportion—this was a matter of all or nothing. The House of Lords did not feel that detention was proportionate in those terms.

Clearly, the case for control orders should be more reassuring to the country, as we shall be able to tailor the web of restrictions to meet the threat that we face, which inevitably will arise at different levels. As a general matter, as the Home Secretary said in his statement, we want control orders to be very tightly focused. We do not envisage using them in such a broad-brush way.

Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey) (LD): I accept what the Minister says, and the House of Lords judgment was clear, but what we have at the moment is what this Government have given us. She was not a Home Office Minister at the time, but the law that we have was introduced by a Labour Government and passed by Parliament. Some of us opposed it, saying that there were other measures—not all-or-nothing measures. That has always been an agenda option, but the Government decided not to choose it when it was available the first time round.

Ms Blears: The existing powers have been subject to appeal. The Court of Appeal supported them unanimously; the House of Lords took a different view. Clearly, therefore, these are controversial matters, in both legal and political terms. The hon. Gentleman decided at the time not to support that way forward, but that way was taken and was supported by the Court of Appeal. We now have the Law Lords' judgment, and we are responding to that.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): I was one of those who did not support the legislation when it was first proposed, not because I want there to be any terrorist outrages—quite the opposite—but because I want a process of law, not of Executive detention. The Minister must address whether it is right, in a democracy, for a Government to take on themselves powers to detain people without charge, and without knowledge of the evidence against them—indefinitely, in the case of foreign nationals. The response to the Law Lords' judgment must be that we accept the point of an independent judicial system—independent of the political process.

Ms Blears: Yes, I shall come to those points. As my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) pointed out in her intervention, we want rigorous independent judicial scrutiny of the proposed powers, but I shall come to those.

The proposals for control orders therefore address the issues highlighted by the House of Lords head-on: in relation to proportionality, as we will have a tailored suite of measures; and in relation to discrimination, as they will apply to British citizens as well as foreign nationals. They will apply regardless of the type of terrorism in which people are involved. The proposed restrictions will range from not associating with certain people to not having access to the internet or mobile phones, notification as to an individual's whereabouts and not visiting particular premises or areas. The Home Secretary has made it clear that the decision to make a control order would not be taken lightly and, rightly, would not be unfettered. Safeguards are important, and will include independent judicial oversight of the Home Secretary's decision to make or vary a control order. In addition to the right of appeal immediately against the order, there will be regular independent reviews, not just of the fact that the order has been made but of any conditions attached. Circumstances might change, so different conditions might be appropriate at different times.

The hon. Member for Winchester referred to the revocation of the certificate in relation to C, asking whether one day this person was a huge threat to the security of the nation, and the next day he was not. I shall not comment on his individual case, but circumstances might well change and people's networks of contacts might get degraded through disruption by police operations, so there might no longer be a need for the most rigorous conditions in a control order. It is right that one should be allowed to apply to vary and change the conditions envisaged in the control order at that time.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD) rose—

Ms Blears: I shall make one further point, as it may help hon. Members. I am conscious of the time.

It is important to take the issue of who makes the orders head-on, as that is a difference between us at the moment. The Home Secretary said in his statement that

"to surrender the responsibility of the Executive to the courts to take decisions on these matters, it would in the most real sense be a betrayal of the responsibility that I as Home Secretary and any future holder of this office bear for the security of the state. That responsibility must lie, and in my opinion rightly, with the Executive and in this case with the Home Secretary."—[Official Report, 26 January 2005; Vol. 430, c. 318.]

The role of the courts is properly to reach a view on the decisions of the Executive in accordance with the law. That is the position that we take in relation to that. Clearly, we shall continue to discuss and debate this matter. As the Home Secretary is responsible for the country's national security, he feels that abrogating those decisions to the judiciary is not the appropriate way to proceed. That does not mean that rigorous, independent judicial oversight cannot be done to make sure that any decisions taken are in accordance with the law. Our motion makes it clear that we want a system that is in compliance with the European convention on human rights. It was this Government who passed the Human Rights Act 1998, and we take our responsibilities incredibly seriously in that regard. We want to make sure that we are in compliance.

Lembit Öpik: As I listen to the Minister, I find her comments increasingly reminiscent of the similar arguments that were used to defend detention without trial in Northern Ireland. Leaving aside the political and legal questions, does she accept that plenty of evidence from Northern Ireland suggests that even control orders have the adverse effect of turning such individuals into martyrs in the eyes of the very people whom she is trying to deter from terrorist activity? May I suggest that many of the proposals, especially on detention, could end up becoming a recruiting sergeant for the terrorists?

Ms Blears: We are conscious of those arguments, and we have learned from the experience of trying to deal with terrorism over many years. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would accept, however, that some individuals are committed to taking action that would strike at the very heart and fabric of the values that we hold dear in our democracy. They are out there. How do we strike a balance and operate a system that enables us to contain the threat against this country and, at the same time, maximise the rule of law?

We must try to ensure that we comply as much as we can but, at the same, we recognise that there are circumstances in which there is not sufficient admissible evidence. If evidence were used, it could reveal the techniques and capabilities of the Security Service, to the detriment of our ability to thwart and disrupt terrorists of that nature. That is an extremely difficult balance to strike. I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman is in danger of painting a black-and-white picture: either we let everyone out or we lock everyone up; either we comply with the rule of law or we completely abrogate it. There is a shade and a spectrum—we can seek to maximise our compliance with the rule of law while at the same time providing a rigorous framework that protects this country.

Lembit Öpik: I do not intend to embark on a dialogue with the Minister, but I would point out that everyone agrees that detention without trial in Northern Ireland was ultimately counter-productive. I am merely suggesting that much of the language and the justification that she is using for Government policy sounds exactly like the justification used before detention without trial was repealed.

Ms Blears: The hon. Gentleman repeats his remarks, but I do not think that it would be useful for me to repeat mine.

When the Home Secretary makes the orders he is not passing a sentence on someone; he is taking action to prevent them from threatening the security of this country. The decisions that he makes under part 4 of the present legislation have been subject to review by the Special Immigration Appeals Commission, which is a court chaired by a High Court judge who has seen the evidence, both open and closed. We therefore have a system of good, rigorous, independent judicial oversight, and we would certainly want to have at least as robust a system for the control orders, and to make sure that judges are involved in scrutinising the Home Secretary's decisions.

Mr. Beith: Surely the Minister appreciates that there is a difference between oversight and judicial decision making. There would be no abrogating of the Home Secretary's responsibility for security if he initiated a process in which the decision was made judicially and not as part of a lengthy subsequent review. There is surely room for the Government to move and recognise that most of the public would be much happier if the decision were in the hands of the judiciary and the Home Secretary merely initiated the process.

Ms Blears: I accept the right hon. Gentleman's point, and I am trying to be as honest and straightforward as I can. The Home Secretary makes the decision because it is right, given his personal responsibilities for the security of the nation, for him to do so, rather than give that decision and responsibility to someone else. He accepts that it is right to have good judicial oversight, but he does not think that those decisions should be made by the courts. He thinks that initially they should be made by him in exercising his responsibility on behalf the Executive. I am sure that we will continue to have this debate, but it is right to be open about the matter.

Mr. Robert Marshall-Andrews (Medway) (Lab): Will the Minister address two related questions? First, will the judicial oversight or review to which she referred be based on matters of fact as well as law? Secondly, is it proposed that judicial review by the High Court be excluded, as it has been in the past?

Ms Blears: I am sorry to disappoint my hon. and learned Friend, but I am not in a position to make proposals on those matters of detail, which need to be finalised. What is the standard of proof required? What is the extent of judicial oversight? Should there be a judicial review or an appeal? Is the process based on fact and law? Those are all perfectly legitimate questions, but I am not in a position today to give the House the information requested by my hon. and learned Friend. Those matters, including whether judicial oversight will be as robust as we want it, will be properly and fully explored.

Simon Hughes: The Minister has admitted that this is a really important matter. Would it not be far more acceptable, and better meet the Home Secretary's objectives, if the police were able to arrest someone if they believed that they were conspiring to commit an offence related to terrorism? That is what happens now, and as long as the police officer has a reasonable suspicion, it is not necessary to go to the courts every time the police want to arrest someone. Why cannot we have the same process, which would be open to judicial oversight if the police overstepped the mark?

Ms Blears: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point, but I have already said that I am not in a position to provide a final view on the matter. The debate about the right process will continue. My main point is about who initiates and who makes the orders, and we seem to take different views on that. We are happy to discuss these matters as the debate develops on how the process should work.

I want to explain our approach more fully. It has been said several times that the most appropriate way to proceed is to prosecute. I want to put on record the fact that we absolutely share that view. Whenever we can, we want to prosecute, bring people to trial, adduce the evidence and let the court decide. It is only when we cannot prosecute because parts of the evidence are inadmissible or would reveal the capabilities of the Security Service that we find ourselves in the position of requiring some mechanism and machinery to enable us to protect the people of this country through a series of orders, while at the same time ensuring that we comply with the rule of law as much as possible. We always prefer to prosecute when we can. A number of prosecutions have already been launched and hon. Members may be aware of the comments of the new Metropolitan Police Commissioner, who expressed his frustration at how little detail we have been able to provide because these matters are sub judice. The public do not know the extent of the arrests, operations and work that have been carried out in order to bring people to trial. Prosecuting is, as I said, always our preferred option.

Some people are highly exercised about why we decided not to allow intercept to be used as evidence. It is right for me to provide hon. Members with some of our detailed thoughts on that matter. First, it is not a magic bullet. We have said time and again that the review examined whether we would be able to bring more serious criminals and terrorists to trial if we used intercept as evidence. The review found that that would not be the case and it examined the cases of individual detainees. As I understand it, it would not have been possible to bring any of those cases to a formal trial by using intercept evidence.

This country has a unique system of co-operation between our intelligence agencies and the police. It does not exist in many other countries. The sharing of intelligence product with our law enforcement agencies is second to none and there is a genuine worry that if we were to allow intercept to be used as evidence, that unique and close working relationship could be jeopardised. Some of the intelligence product might not be able to be shared with law enforcement in any case. I would be seriously concerned if the excellent disruptive work that currently takes place were to be put at risk because intelligence agencies felt it impossible to share their intelligence product with the police service. Indeed, if we allowed that to happen, as some have proposed, we would be taking a retrograde step. Once again, these are matters of fine balance and our decision is that, on balance, the benefits do not outweigh the costs at this time.

David Davis: I want to question the Minister on the sensitivity of our allies in the war against terror. Most of them allow intercept evidence, so it seems strange that those who use it themselves should object to our using it. I have always found the argument unpersuasive since the time when I worked in the Foreign Office.

Ms Blears: The right hon. Gentleman may find the arguments unpersuasive, but I find them quite persuasive as they are put to me at the moment. Clearly, we all have to make our own judgment about where the balance is drawn. We have a unique system of very close co-operation, and I am worried that we would jeopardise it if we used intercept as evidence. Secondly, we have an adversarial legal system, in which the defence has the right of full disclosure. If the security services were to use those parts of intercept that supported their case, they could be accused of cherry-picking the evidence. Quite rightly, the defence would seek to follow the whole chain of events in respect of the intercept that had been obtained.

Our adversarial system complies with the European convention on human rights and contains a number of hurdles that make it very difficult to use intercept as evidence. Moreover, technology is changing very fast indeed. We have been working to develop a legal model containing a system of checks and balances that would enable us to use intercept as both intelligence and evidence. However, the speed of technological change means that any model that we might develop would not be robust enough to interact with our legal system.

Other hon. Members have asked whether public interest immunity certificates would suffice to enable us to keep sensitive information about the security services' capabilities outwith disclosure. Again, the risk is that the courts would not support the PII certificate. If that happens, a capability that is disclosed is disclosed for all time. That is a major difficulty with using intercepted evidence.

I am not saying that the Government will not keep under review a matter that has been reviewed five times in the past 10 years. On each occasion, it was decided that intercepted evidence should not be used. I appreciate that people argue the other side of the case firmly, but the Government are not convinced that intercepted evidence could be used to fight terrorism more effectively than is the case at present.

David Davis: I thank the Minister for giving way yet again; she has been very generous. I want to ask a question about the use of PII. Other nations, particularly America, have very formal structures to arbitrate between the interests of the state and of the defendant, and they work well. If the Minister is so doubtful about using PII certificates, why can this country not adopt such a structure?

Ms Blears: All these matters have been examined. We have looked at other legal systems and protection mechanisms, as we are keen to find a way forward. However, we cannot simply transplant other systems into our law, as it operates in a different way. We are not convinced that we could achieve a system that was robust enough to protect the security services and at the same time allow us to use useful product.

In some countries that use intercept as evidence, the product is fairly minimal. Because it is used as evidence, other people are unwilling to share their product. That is a real concern for the Government. At the moment, we get excellent product because we are able to use it in surveillance and other activities that enable us to disrupt much of what might otherwise happen. The whole House will agree that the record of our intelligence agencies and police force in disrupting some of what might have happened in this country is second to none.

I apologise to the House for dealing with intercept at length, but the matter has been raised in a number of debates recently, and it was important to go through the issues associated with it.

The hon. Member for Winchester asked whether we would consider the Newton committee's recommendations in respect of looking at other offences committed preparatory to the commission of terrorism. We are actively looking at those recommendations. Control orders are our priority at the moment, as we want to have something in place before the part 4 powers expire. However, if there are other steps that we can take to make our judicial system more effective in fighting the threat of terrorism, we will of course look at all of them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker, I think that I have dealt with most of the issues raised by the hon. Member for Winchester. With your leave, I shall try at the end of the debate to cover any other matters that come up. I am pleased by the tone of the debate so far, and I am sure that all hon. Members will continue to co-operate in the search for solutions to the very difficult problems with which we are faced.

David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden) (Con): I begin by commending the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten) on the tone that he set for the debate. This is one of those debates in which hon. Members will not engage in political combat so much as seek to persuade each other. The opposing principles involved—the preservation of life, or the preservation of our way of life—are fundamental, and that is something that we should not underestimate.

I also want to commend the Home Secretary on the long overdue action that he has taken to make deportation possible. As I said to the hon. Member for Winchester, the French seem to be able to deport people to Algeria, which is one of our problem countries. Why can we not do so, not necessarily using the same mechanism, but using our mechanisms? As a former Foreign Office Minister, I recognise that this is a difficult but nevertheless creditable process.

Jeremy Corbyn: As a former Minister, the right hon. Gentleman is aware that the Foreign Office monitors human rights issues in all countries and that the Home Office has its own internal system, although I believe that it is slightly different. Is he satisfied that if someone is deported to Algeria—there are plenty of other examples—they will not be subject to abuse or Executive detention, not necessarily on arrival, but later, which may be why they left that country in the first place?

David Davis: The hon. Gentleman has raised a good point, and it is the sort of matter that the Minister would have to address in the memorandum of understanding. I do not agree with the hon. Member for Winchester that there has to be a legal framework, because a memorandum of understanding can be binding between countries. It should address torture and execution, which are the two primary issues, but also Executive detention. A judgment must be made, and it will be a better judgment than the one we have had so far.

I want to read some extracts from the minority opinion of Lord Hoffmann, who made some pertinent points that go to the core of the issue. He said:

"This is one of the most important cases which the House has had to decide in recent years. It calls into question the very existence of an ancient liberty of which this country has until now been very proud: freedom from arbitrary arrest and detention. The power which the Home Secretary seeks to uphold is a power to detain people indefinitely without charge or trial. Nothing could be more antithetical to the instincts and traditions of the people of the United Kingdom."

As I develop my argument, I shall explain how the Government's proposal still falls within the description of the old system.

What Lord Hoffmann went on to say is important in the context of the Minister's reasonable comments about a state of emergency. He said:

"This is a nation which has been tested in adversity, which has survived physical destruction and catastrophic loss of life. I do not underestimate the ability of fanatical groups of terrorists to kill and destroy, but they do not threaten the life of the nation. Whether we would survive Hitler hung in the balance, but there is no doubt that we shall survive Al-Qaeda. The Spanish people have not said that what happened in Madrid, hideous crime as it was, threatened the life of their nation. Their legendary pride would not allow it. Terrorist violence, serious as it is, does not threaten our institutions of government or our existence as a civil community."

In conclusion, he said:

"The real threat to the life of the nation, in the sense of a people living in accordance with its traditional laws and political values, comes not from terrorism but from laws such as these. That is the true measure of what terrorism may achieve. It is for Parliament to decide whether to give the terrorists such a victory."

I would not have chosen that phrasing, but Lord Hoffmann is saying that terrorists may destroy our buildings and our lives, but without our help they cannot destroy our way of life. That is what this debate is about today.

Simon Hughes: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the implication of that very good summary of the position is that there was not and still is not a case for derogating from our obligations under the European convention on human rights, because it allows flexibility in certain cases? That means that his party, like ours, will hold to the view that we must stay within the European convention and not seek to derogate again, which would be a different position from that taken by his party during the last Parliament.

David Davis: I take the hon. Gentleman's point. I support the thrust of the argument urged by his party today. He will not be surprised to hear that I would have phrased it in terms not of the ECHR but of our fundamental rights, which are of longer standing. Let us consider how the Government can deal with the matter in a way that meets the fundamental rights about which I am concerned and the concerns that he is expressing.

Although I realise that there is a good reason why the Home Secretary cannot be in the Chamber today, I am sorry that he is not here, as I was going to tease him slightly. When he and I first knew each other more than 30 years ago in the 1960s the most fashionable writers were revolutionary left-wing writers, such as Guevara and Frantz Fanon. Some of the writers that the Home Secretary would have read made it clear that one of the main aims of revolutionary terrorist acts is to provoke a reactionary response from the state, to recruit new people to their cause. We must bear that in mind when addressing these issues so that we do not inadvertently do what the terrorists want us to do—in effect, that is what Lord Hoffmann was talking about.

The Home Secretary's proposed actions may not only be in breach of hundreds of years of our ancient British liberties, they may also be counter-productive. I do not normally quote Frenchmen, but in the words of Talleyrand this is, in terms of the war against terror,

"worse than a crime, it is a mistake".

That is the risk we face. As I said about house arrest when the Home Secretary made his statement to the House on the matter, he may lock up one known terrorist but he will create 10 unknown terrorists. Although house arrest is marginally less draconian than being in prison, the irony is that it may act as a stronger recruiting agent because it is in the middle of the community from which the person comes.

I am not the only person who takes that view—the most eminent ally I have found over the past few days is the chairman of the Bar Council, who said:

"Disproportionate measures risk radicalising the community from which a detainee comes. That may make this country less rather than more safe."

It is important that we keep that in mind.

Mr. Tom Harris: I assume that the right hon. Gentleman is talking about the current situation in Belmarsh rather than the Home Secretary's new proposals. Can he put that scepticism in the context of his support for the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001? In December, he told Morgan and Platell that he could not remember whether he supported the Act. Is his memory any better now? Can he tell us whether his new position is a U-turn or what he always believed?

David Davis: If the hon. Gentleman wants us to return to political combat I am happy to do so, but I am not talking about the old system, I am talking about what is now being proposed. The Minister could not elaborate in detail on that set of proposals, but we shall no doubt hear more over the next few weeks. We shall have to assess the proposals in terms both of the fundamental human rights in which I believe, even if the hon. Gentleman does not, and of the safety of our country. I happen to believe that the proper action will maximise both and will not act as a compromise between them, as I shall explain.

We should address the principles of justice that are being jeopardised by the Government's proposals. The first is the presumption of innocence. Then there is the person's right to know the charge against them, the right to know and challenge the evidence against them and the right for the case against them to be proven beyond reasonable doubt. It was failure on all those counts that led Ian Macdonald to resign from his position as a lawyer serving the Special Immigration Appeals Commission. He talked about the new proposals as follows:

"They are really using detention rules which have been declared unlawful. At the end of the day if you're going to keep people in some sort of house arrest or in prison, you really have to take account of what I think is a fundamental principle, that people are presumed innocent. If they're really dangerous they should be charged under criminal law."

That is the key point before us today.

Objections to the SIAC procedures apply equally to the new proposals.

Vera Baird: Although Ian Macdonald resigned, that was surely triggered by the House of Lords judgment. I have known him for many years, and he is a man of the highest calibre. He served in his role for more than two years, feeling, as he made clear, that he had been doing something helpful and that he had been able to assist the defendants, which shows that SIAC is not a hopeless and futile pursuit but that it can in fact play an important role. That is not something that should be diminished.

David Davis: The hon. and learned Lady makes an important point. I think that I am right in saying that Ian Macdonald said when he resigned that he had joined up because he thought he could help by doing a good job. The circumstances that he describes sound like a slow process of becoming more and more disaffected with the operation of the procedures, which, as she suggests, precipitated his resignation after the House of Lords decision. In fact, he was not the only one who felt that way: at least one other resigned and a number of others considered resigning, and for good reason.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): My right hon. Friend knows that I am against the Government's proposals in principle. Will he also address the Minister's statement to the effect that there will be rigorous legal supervision of the control order process? He will bear in mind the fact that she was unable to answer the question that the hon. and learned Member for Medway (Mr. Marshall-Andrews) asked about whether the judicial review would extend to facts or only to law. She said that she had not made up her mind. Until we know what her mind is on that matter, she is in no position to say that the judicial supervision will be rigorous.

David Davis: I start further back than my right hon. and learned Friend. First, I do not like the idea of the Executive taking such decisions. Even under the current procedure, people have been in prison for three years, and perhaps longer in one case—we do not know—so I do not like it from that point of view. I do not like the state taking those decisions into its own hands. As I am about to explain, I also think that the standards applied on questions not only of law but of fact are very important. That is where the primary criticism of SIAC lies, in my judgment.

After all, the purpose of the Newton committee, which was set up at the beginning of the process when the 2001 Act first came into effect, was to assess how the legislation was working and to ensure that the House received a report on its operation. At the beginning, as the hon. and learned Lady made clear in her intervention, many people did not quite know how the system would work, but they wanted to try to make it work. They were very good, high-quality people, but they have reached the conclusion, as Newton did, that the system is not working well.

Let us bear in mind the fact that the Newton committee included several ex-Cabinet Ministers and ex-Ministers who had responsibility for security in Northern Ireland—not people who would normally be viewed as a pushover for the civil liberties lobby. They reached a series of conclusions and a number of principled objections to the operation of detention established by the 2001 Act. Essentially, the committee noted that the suspects faced no specific charge and were not presented with, and given the opportunity to refute, all the evidence against them. It reached the judgment that that increases the risk of a miscarriage of justice—the point that came up in the Liberal spokesman's comments.

The report also suggested that that risk is compounded by certain features of the certification and adjudication process. For example—in my view, this is almost the most important thing at the centre of the issue—the standard of proof involved in the SIAC procedure is "reasonable belief and suspicion". That is an incredibly low standard of proof on which to undertake the incarceration, certainly of a citizen of this country, but frankly, of anyone. Let us understand that point. We talk about the terrorist destroying lives, but incarceration is a way of destroying a life, too. Such people cannot work or do anything. Even if people are incarcerated in their own homes, it still involves the destruction of the life that they have a right to expect if they are innocent.

In addition, the current SIAC rules do not oblige the Home Secretary to reveal all the material that could help the suspect, even in summary form. Sometimes, the vast majority of the details of a case are closed, so the open case might be an unreliable indication of the basis of the closed case. The report also noted that detention under part 4 can be for an indefinite period—one of the more Kafkaesque aspects of the current system.

The problem with the Minister's inability to reply to the hon. and learned Member for Medway is that, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) points out, we must assume for the moment at least that the same approaches, criticisms and concerns will apply to the review process that will follow on from Executive detention or control orders in the looser sense. In my view, that is, frankly, unacceptable. It is not consistent with the long-term liberties of British subjects, and as I have said already, it may be counter-productive.

Vera Baird: I have heard all the right hon. Gentleman's reservations about SIAC, but if the same system carries on, surely the answer to the question asked by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Medway is yes, because the new court to replace SIAC will, as SIAC does, review the facts as well as the law.

David Davis: The hon. and learned Lady is right, but part of the problem is that the facts will be reviewed using a lower standard of proof. Additionally, in some instances, much of the case might be the secret case rather than the public case. The procedure is poor.

Mr. Allen: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

David Davis: In a moment, because the hon. and learned Lady raised a serious and important question. The procedure is poor for a country that has long stood by the presumption of innocence, the right of people to know the charge and evidence against them, and to be able to refute it beyond reasonable doubt.

Mr. Allen: People of good will on both sides of the House are trying to help the Government to reconcile the awful dilemma between terrorist threats and attacks on civil liberties. Is not one way forward the fact that few cases have resulted in people being incarcerated in Belmarsh? There have not been several hundred cases, but instead only a relatively small number, so surely that gives us more leeway to use procedural sophistication to try to overcome the dilemma.

David Davis: I do not think that it does. Obviously it is better to have few cases rather than many, but even one case of injustice is sufficient to warrant the serious attention of the House. It takes only one case of injustice to act as a recruiting sergeant, as I said earlier. That is why I am worried and why I want to outline what I believe is the right procedure for the Government to pursue, which I hope will meet the requirements for both national security and our liberties.

Mr. Oaten: Is not the other problem with the point made by the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) that although the Home Secretary initially said that he thought that control orders would rarely be handed out, he gave media interviews in which he said that they might have to be handed out to relatives, friends and associates? We might be dealing not with a limited number of control orders, but with a large number.

David Davis: That is true. The simple fact of the matter is that the House could not pass a law on the presumption that it would apply to only one or two people. It must use the presumption that a law will be used to its maximum. If we look back at the case that the hon. Gentleman raised, I recall that the evidence had not changed but was found to be too weak to sustain the case against the individual. It is implicit in that that a person was locked up wrongly for three years. If only one person is locked up wrongly, let alone hundreds, it is too many.

The Newton committee made several proposals, two of which stand out in the context of today's debate as offering the Government a way forward. It recommends developing a body of counter-terrorist law that is specific to the problem that we face, but capable of being enforced without compromising our criminal justice system. I agree with that, and the Liberal Democrats' proposal was in part a development of it. However, I got the impression that the structure could be wider than that, and if we hear from the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), a member of the Newton committee, he might clarify that point. I thought that the committee had in mind a complete body of law applying to terrorist offences that would be part of the criminal law, but separate from it. For example, when the American authorities had trouble securing effective prosecutions against gangsterism and racketeering in north America, they introduced the RICO—Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organisations—Act. Perhaps such an approach should be considered for terrorist offences.

The most important suggestion made by the Newton committee was the proposal to render terrorist suspects capable of being brought to trial under the normal British system of justice. It suggested that intercept evidence should be allowed in court, and proposed—I thought that this was the most important aspect—that an investigating judge who was different from the trial judge should sift the sensitive evidence.

The presumption so far seems to have been that such evidence would be only intercept evidence, but the proposal was for assessing and checking sensitive evidence—intercept and all other intelligence-based evidence—before presenting it to the court in a way that protected the intelligence source, human or technical, and at the same time protected the rights of the defendant.

The Minister spoke about public interest immunity certificates. I am not a fan of them. When I have been asked to sign a certificate, I have refused because I have taken the view that they were being used to avoid embarrassment for the Department concerned rather than to pursue justice. Given the Minister's concern about PII certificates and the right of a judge to overrule them, that is the area where the Government's focus should be sharpest, because it is where we have the greatest opportunity for advancing the case for the possibility of prosecuting terrorists while at the same time protecting our services.

I talked privately to the Home Secretary about the matter and, as far as I can without giving away any confidences, I will replicate that conversation. The Home Secretary said, as the Minister has said, that it may not even be primarily intercept evidence that is involved in tracking down suspected terrorists and determining who they are. Let me put the most difficult case and see how we can pursue it under the Newton rules. Let us assume that the data are not intercept data but from an informer whose life might be at risk in a terrorist organisation and who is so nervous that he will not even meet the investigating judge to be interviewed. What will happen to that person if they are not put under house arrest?

The first thing that we must understand is that if the person concerned is a threat to the state and to our citizens, they will be under the most intensive surveillance—what the agencies delicately call technical attack: bugging, video surveillance, human surveillance, intercepts of mobile, landline and satellite telephones, and of e-mails and bank accounts, and the tracking of vehicles. There is a vast range of facilities available to the security services.

If at the end of that process there is no evidence, we are talking about locking somebody up as a result of an uncorroborated comment from an informer who might be an enemy, might be in political opposition to the person, might have been bribed or might merely hate the person. Either one can develop the evidence and determine that the person is a terrorist or one cannot. Given the intensive nature of the surveillance that will be ranged against somebody who is a serious threat to the state, it is untenable that a case could not be built even if the original data that allowed the individual to be targeted were not used.

Simon Hughes: The countries on mainland Europe that use such a system do so because they have an inquisitorial tradition, where it is acceptable to have an examination by somebody competent to filter out the evidence that can go to stage two. Such a change might require us to alter our mindset and do some jobs not adversarially but by an inquisition. I and my colleagues are up for that, because it preserves a proper legal process and ensures that sources are protected where necessary.

David Davis: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. He probably understands how big a jump it is for me to go to a continental inquisitorial system from the normal adversarial systems that I prefer. The simple fact is that the judge, who will presumably be a specialist in the area, would be duty-bound by the requirement not only to protect absolutely the lives and technical sources of the security services, but to ensure that the defence is not prejudiced in the evidence presented to the court in summary or in total. That seems to me to be a perfectly acceptable system. It will be of a higher quality, and in the long run more effective than our present system, and it will be entirely defensible to the communities that might otherwise be radicalised by inappropriate measures.

Mr. Boswell: Does my right hon. Friend agree that in the scenario he paints involving the single informer who might have a prejudicial interest in the person in question, it would be unacceptable, under the system that the Government propose, for Ministers to conclude that that person was a threat if that was the sheer weight of the evidence available to them? Unless there is some way to test the accusation and to do so objectively, it is not acceptable to put people in prison or to some other inconvenience simply by administrative fiat.

David Davis: My hon. Friend puts the argument better than I could. We are, in effect, discussing sending someone down on the uncorroborated say-so of a single informant. I defer to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham, but I spent about nine of 13 years dealing with the agencies involved in this issue, and they were very clear that the people they dealt with did not always demonstrate the most saintly calibre in providing information. The agencies had to corroborate the information that they gave—a matter with which the House has become all too familiar in the past year.

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): The right hon. Gentleman correctly identifies one of the great difficulties: the inability to establish what information can be released to the defence so that the accused is aware of the allegations being made against him. What is not clear to me is how the process that he describes would enable more information to be released to the defence than would be possible under the Government's proposed system.

David Davis: The process would allow more information to be released to the court—not to the defence—because, to be frank, it would not allow a fishing expedition to be conducted into the totality of the intelligence agencies' data. As things stand, a defence lawyer would be able to say, reasonably, "We have been given only half the evidence. Now, I need to see the other half." Our aim is to ensure that the balance is maintained.

The second difficult case that I wish to put relates to the Liberal Democrats' proposals for milder methods—using tagging and other sorts of control order. I gave the matter extensive thought in the weekend following the Home Secretary's statement. I started from the presumption that whichever standard of proof was applied to the Government's proposal of house arrest would be applied to control orders—in effect, suspicion. That is a concession in terms of our law and our fundamental liberties.

I then thought what advantage would arise from the Liberal Democrats' proposed method. Tagging is clearly a valuable technique in dealing with criminals. I suspect that the Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety knows more than most about it. Criminals tend to come from a community and to have family in the country, so if they break their tag, they will be found again at some point and go to jail. However, the first thing that a terrorist whose only connections in this country are those of a terrorist network will do when he or she is tagged is cut the tag and vanish. A proposal that appears to provide greater security but, in fact, does not, and which sacrifices normal standards of proof as well, is dangerous.

Mr. Beith: The right hon. Gentleman gives me the opportunity to make it clear that the Newton committee did not recommend house arrest. It recommended movement restrictions. Such restrictions have to have purposes, primary among which would be to prevent a person who is suspected of associating with terrorists from doing so or furthering their objectives. A combination of restricting a person to a specific locality at certain times, excluding him from certain types of communication and tagging him to determine where he is would provide a basis on which a measure of liberty could be restored to that person, but would also give us some means of knowing that he is not resuming associations of which there is some reasonable evidence.

David Davis: I accept that that was the argument made in the Newton report, but it is the one aspect of that report by which I was not persuaded, mainly because it seemed that there was the ability to escape at some point. That is the difficulty. We cannot take such a risk with someone who presents a lethal threat to the community. I grant that there is a trade-off with regard to allowing more liberty, but against the standards of proof that that are being talked about, I would not make that trade-off. That is my argument. I say to the right hon. Gentleman that I found the Newton report a formidable document and was unpersuaded only by that one small component. That is why, after some deliberation, my party has come to the conclusion that has been set out today.

Mr. Oaten: Just to be clear, the right hon. Gentleman's position is black and white: the person is either in jail or they are released.

David Davis: In essence, that is right. With regard to the prospect of a terrorist offence, we concluded that the terrorist must either be under control or not. I do not think that the proposal that the hon. Gentleman made, which I accept is new, is one that we can accept.

The issue comes back to the sacrifice that has to be made, which is a sacrifice of standards of proof and the presumption of innocence, which I think are fundamental—in other words, the basic standards of liberty that we determine here. Incidentally, I am not at all sure where the requirements for the standards of proof and control orders would fit into the human rights issues raised by the hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes).

Simon Hughes: First, I am told—I have not done the research—by somebody who I know has talked to members of the right hon. Gentleman's party, Professor John Spencer in Cambridge, that in other European jurisdictions, there are control orders that have been found to be European convention-compliant. Secondly, like my hon. Friend the Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten), I ask the right hon. Gentleman to keep the door open, to use a phrase that the Home Secretary used. If we are going to get agreement across parties, we need to be prepared not to close doors at this stage of the debate.

David Davis: I accept that and hope that the hon. Gentleman recognises that I have tried to speak in precisely that tenor. As he refers to keeping doors open, let me raise with him a serious problem that arose from the comments made by the hon. Member for Winchester. I was not going to deal with the matter, but I shall do so now. The Liberal Democrats are saying that they are going to vote against continuation of the part 4 order. That gives us one month to come to a conclusion on an issue that is undoubtedly one of the most difficult that the House has faced for some years. I am entirely open-minded in this matter. I have some very strong views about the principles, but we come to the matter with an open mind to try to get some sort of conclusion in the national interest. I have tried to lay out precisely why I have serious concerns, and I say to the Liberal Democrats that I have not come to a conclusion about what we are going to do on part 4, but I would not want to impose an artificial deadline on a decision about the liberty and safety of the British public on terms such as those that have been mentioned.

Mr. Oaten rose—

David Davis: I shall give way, since I have taken the hon. Gentleman on directly.

Mr. Oaten: As we are all trying to be helpful to each other, let me be helpful to the right hon. Gentleman. If we ran out of time and could not reach an alternative before the derogation was required, one of the things on which we would wish to engage with the Government would be seeking not an annual derogation, but some sort of ring-fenced period for the derogation, on the understanding that we would seek an agreement before the derogation was allowed to continue.

David Davis: I am glad that I have made some progress on behalf of the Government.

If we implement the Home Secretary's proposals, inasmuch as we know the detail at the moment, there are still likely to be terrorist acts. There is no doubt about that. If we do not implement the proposals, there are still likely to be terrorist acts. The raw truth is that whichever way we go, there will be terrorist acts. People from all parties have said, "Oh, surely you can't disagree with the Government on this, because you'll be blamed the next time there is a terrorist act." I think that that is ridiculous and I do not think that the Home Secretary would take that stance either; he has effectively told me so already.

My judgment is that, if we take the route of protecting our way of life, it will be the best way of protecting our lives as well. That is the way around the matter. Quite understandably given his task and job, the Home Secretary talks all the time about protecting lives, but we have to protect the way of life as well as lives. If we protect the way of life, we will create fewer recruits for terrorist organisations and actually protect our lives better.

Mr. Marshall-Andrews: Before the right hon. Gentleman concludes, will he speculate on one matter relating to the Government? Before the House of Lords judgment, there was no indication—perhaps he can help me on this—from the Government or anybody else that it was considered necessary to extend detention without trial to British subjects. The House of Lords judgment was then made and we are now told that it is necessary to extend detention without trial to British subjects. Can he speculate on what has happened in truth during that time?

David Davis: The hon. and learned Gentleman tempts me too much. I could speculate about the perverse effects of human rights legislation, but I shall not go down that route.

Terrorism is not new to this country and we have faced it down before without giving up our fundamental rights. We did not give up our fundamental rights after an almost successful attack on the Cabinet and the Prime Minister in the Brighton bombing, the assassination of a member of the royal family, the Omagh bombing or the deaths of many soldiers and civilians in Northern Ireland. We did not give them up then and we should not abandon them now. In this debate, we have tried to maintain an open and persuasive approach. We will try to be as constructive as possible in the coming weeks, because the issue is fundamental to all our constituents. I reiterate that the best way in which to defend our lives is to defend our way of life.

Mr. Tom Harris (Glasgow, Cathcart) (Lab): I shall begin by responding directly to some of the comments made by the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis). The fallacy that we have faced the threat of terrorism before and that we can face it this time has been raised on many previous occasions. People who make that claim fail to understand the nature of Irish terrorism, which we faced before, and Islamist terrorism, which we face now.

We were able to "face down" Irish nationalist terrorism because the previous Government, in which the right hon. Gentleman served, and this Government sat round a table with IRA representatives and reached a political agreement. Disagreements arose about exactly how to proceed, but given that the IRA had a political aim, it was possible for elected politicians to sit down with its representatives and ask, "What can we agree on? Where is the common ground?" Through that process, which has been long and hard, we have managed to face down the reality of Irish nationalist terrorism in this country.

I am amazed that the shadow Home Secretary has failed to grasp that, by definition, the people who now plan to engage in terrorism against our people and our nation cannot be reasoned with. On a number of occasions, Osama bin Laden has said that it is perfectly acceptable to kill all American citizens and all Jews, and to destroy the state of Israel. At what point do we sit down around a table to negotiate and ask, "Where is the common ground?" There is no common ground. For the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden to claim that there is any similarity between what we faced in the '60s, '70s and '80s and what we face now, especially since 11 September 2001, is wholly untrue, and I am surprised that he has tried to advance that particular argument.

I am disappointed that the title of the debate is "Belmarsh Judgment" and that the Home Secretary had to come to the House with new proposals to replace the existing arrangements on the detention of terrorist suspects in Belmarsh. I have absolutely no doubt that their lordships made the correct decision as far as the law is concerned, but I am disappointed that we must water down and compromise our arrangements.

Simon Hughes: I am surprised by the hon. Gentleman's view. I hope that all hon. Members accept that laws passed in this place must comply with our national and international obligations. If the Law Lords, who are judges from all over the United Kingdom, say that something is illegal, I hope that he accepts that that is the final say and that it is right for us to re-examine the matter.

Mr. Harris: Perhaps I did not make myself clear. I was not suggesting that the Government should ignore the House of Lords ruling—I was expressing disappointment that the Law Lords made that ruling in the first place, because I had hoped that taking the legal framework into account they would conclude that the existing arrangements were legal. However, I entirely understand that we are a responsible Government and have to abide by the rules and laws of the land as decreed by the House of Lords.

I have a question for my hon. Friend the Minister. In Belmarsh there are a dozen or so terrorists—people who were planning to kill and maim citizens of our country, but were free to leave the country at any time simply because they are foreign nationals. The nub of the Lords' objection to the new arrangements is that they do not apply to British nationals. Will my hon. Friend clarify the new arrangements that will apply to foreign nationals and to British citizens? Presumably, British citizens will not be able to escape control orders by leaving the country. Will the provision allowing foreign nationals to leave the country if they wish apply under the new arrangements? In other words, will they be able to escape tagging orders or house arrest by leaving the country?

Since this is the Liberal Democrats' motion, I should like to deal with some of the points raised by the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten). Many people taking part in this heated debate will claim that there exists no threat to our nation, and that these measures and others introduced by the Government are therefore unnecessary, or will claim, as I do, that there exists a very real threat and that not only are the proposed measures absolutely necessary, but we may have to consider even more strict measures in future if we are to protect our country.

Jeremy Corbyn: I am listening carefully to what my hon. Friend is saying. In the light of this threat, how does he justify the detention of people without trial and without knowledge of the charges against them, given that there is a danger that they have been incarcerated on evidence that would not stand up in court, which leads to the self-serving belief that the guilty are being held in jail, when they may well be innocent? That is a much greater threat than that which exists at present.

Mr. Harris: I am not entirely surprised that my hon. Friend expresses that point of view. Looking at the 12 detainees in Belmarsh, any reasonable person might think that there was not enough evidence admissible in court—that is different from flimsy evidence—to bring about a conviction, while others may think that they have been done bang to rights because they are obviously a clear and present danger to our nation, but it is difficult to understand how anyone could believe that the only reason that they are there is because a vindictive Government is picking on 12 innocent people.

Jeremy Corbyn: I did not say that.

Mr. Harris: My hon. Friend says that he did not say that, but that is what he suggested in his intervention.

Jeremy Corbyn: My point, which perhaps I did not make very clearly, is that security services information can be wholly inaccurate. It can be based on people pursuing a vendetta against somebody else in a particular community, and then becomes very dangerous when it gets a life of its own based on a fundamental inaccuracy. I am not suggesting that Ministers go around perversely saying, "I want to imprison X, Y or Z," but they might be advised that there is evidence against that person, and that ends up with their imprisonment.

Mr. Harris: The Home Secretary has already said that, as with the current system, the new system will be subject to independent judicial oversight. There is nothing more certain to obtain a round of applause during "Any Questions?" or "Question Time" than a member of the panel saying, "The security services got it wrong on Iraq, so they must be wrong here." That is a nonsensical argument. As we have seen, it is very difficult for the security services of any country to come to hard conclusions about the threat that a nation poses to another nation. It is a different ball game altogether to come up with the conclusion that an individual is planning to be a threat to a particular nation. That evidence is much easier to come by. It is wrong to compare the security services' record in Iraq with their record in the context of the Belmarsh detainees.

Mr. Allen: Does my hon. Friend accept that the risks in getting the matter wrong are immense for any Government and any responsible political party? If people perpetrated a 9/11-style atrocity in the UK and the Government had not taken advantage of the ability to take them out of commission, that Government would never be forgiven. However, does he accept that one of the best ways of gaining public and cross-party support is to ensure that our democracy defends itself in the most democratic way possible, given the constraints? Will he therefore keep his mind open to the possibility of pushing back the Government's view a little on some matters, on which we could achieve broad consensus and so keep our people on side on the important issue of ensuring that terrorists do not have a free rein in this country?

Mr. Harris: My hon. Friend has perfectly expressed the nub of the argument. I agree that it is important for the protection of our culture and our nation to defend our rights in as democratic a manner as circumstances allow. I believe that the Government's proposed measures do exactly that. That is our fundamental disagreement with the Liberal Democrats. Despite the new-found atmosphere of cross-party co-operation, of which I have never been a great fan, I do not have much confidence in the Liberal Democrats' claims to give the nation's security as high a priority as they should, given the comments of the hon. Member for Winchester.

Mr. Oaten: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Harris: Well—

Mr. Oaten: It is important to give way.

Mr. Harris: Of course I shall give way, but I note before I do so that the hon. Gentleman refused to give way to me twice. However, I shall show him the courtesy that he denied me.

Mr. Oaten: I appreciate that. However, I should like the hon. Gentleman to acknowledge that I spent four or five paragraphs of my speech emphasising that the Liberal Democrats do not for a single moment underestimate the security risk to this country. It is disingenuous of him to claim something completely different.

Mr. Harris: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman has thrown his rattle out of the pram. If he had not interrupted me, I would have got around to a more in-depth analysis of his comments.

I began by saying that people in this country will say either that there is no threat and the measures are unnecessary or, as I do, that there is a huge threat and they are necessary. The Liberal Democrats, unsurprisingly, say both. They claim that there is a threat but that we need to devise new measures. What measures? They spoke about the balance between security and civil liberties. It seems to me that they strike that balance much more at the civil liberties end. That is understandable, given the traditions of the Liberal party. There is nothing dishonourable in that position but I have the right to say that, if their proposals were implemented, it would have a negative effect on security. That is my position.

Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): The hon. Gentleman's understanding of Northern Ireland history is fascinating if rather different from mine. I remember that negotiation was based on hard-nosed military activity as well as other aspects.

I am interested to hear his comments given that, when the Home Secretary announced the new measures, the Government were most anxiously repatriating British citizens from Guantanamo Bay while the American Government were proving that some of those whom they had set at liberty from Guantanamo Bay had been either killed or captured in subsequent terrorist actions. Is not that an anomaly?

Mr. Harris: I am not clear about the hon. Gentleman's point. I have always rejected comparisons between Belmarsh and Guantanamo Bay. I receive many letters claiming that Belmarsh is Britain's Guantanamo Bay. That makes no sense and I have always avoided making that comparison. Would the hon. Gentleman like to intervene again to clarify his point?

Patrick Mercer: If I understand the hon. Gentleman correctly, he is suggesting an extremely hard line to protect this country by taking measures that some would view as illiberal, at the same time as the Government suggest that individuals who have been suspected of terrorism should be returned to this country and put at liberty.

Mr. Harris: Yes, the hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. I continue to oppose the US Administration's illegal detention of people at Guantanamo Bay. The Supreme Court of the United States has decreed that those detentions are illegal. Our Government, however, brought proposals to the House of Commons that were voted on, passed by the upper House, and became law. That is somewhat different from what President Bush did in regard to Guantanamo Bay, which was to detain combatants from the Afghan war in a geographical location specifically chosen because it was outside the legal remit of the United States. That is very different, which is why I have always rejected any comparisons between Guantanamo Bay and Belmarsh. I hope that that clears up the matter for the hon. Gentleman.

The hon. Member for Winchester came out with a curious phrase when he said that we should seek prosecutions "in the normal way". This brings me back to the fundamental issue in the debate that we have been having ever since 11 September 2001. I guess that most people said at the time that the world had changed and that it would never be the same again. A few months later, however, most people said, "I didn't actually mean that. It was the appropriate thing to say at the time. Now let's get on with our lives. Nothing has really changed." I like to believe that this Government—especially the Home Secretary and his predecessor, my right hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett)—actually meant it when they said that the world had changed for ever. That means that we now have to look again at some of our fundamental liberties, and to decide whether they will help or hinder terrorist networks.

Surely the purpose of any Government must be to try to obstruct and to collapse all terrorist networks operating in their country. Nothing that the hon. Member for Winchester said would lead me to believe that terrorists would be quaking in their boots at the thought of any new proposals introduced by the Liberal Democrats. Nothing that the hon. Gentleman is proposing would have a serious effect on the terrorists.

Mr. Beith: What would the hon. Gentleman say to the right hon. Members for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) and for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Joyce Quin), who served with me on the Newton committee, and who felt that, although there was a serious threat that required measures to deal with it, the measures that the Government had put into force—which we were reviewing—were unsustainable, and that other measures therefore had to be found?

Mr. Harris: That is why we are having this debate. The right hon. Gentleman should concede that my view on this matter is pretty unambiguous—[Interruption.] I am an elected Member of this House and I am entitled to my opinion. The decisions facing all democratically elected politicians since 9/11 were always going to be extremely difficult. We were not elected to this House to make easy decisions. We were elected to make very difficult decisions, and sometimes they are unpopular. My views on this do not concur with those of the right hon. Gentleman and his right hon. and hon. Friends—

Mr. Beith: And some of yours.

Mr. Harris: Indeed. I have no problem with that. I am prepared to stand up here and argue my corner. Let us have a vote on this, and we shall see whose view prevails.

The right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden said that a suspect's right to a trial and to know the charges against them were fundamental. He said that they were the fundamental rights of a free citizen in this country. Well, he was half right. Those rights are fundamental. People have the right to a fair trial and to know the charges against them, but another right has much greater priority: a far more fundamental right is the right to life.

Occasionally, I have been a tad unfair in this House to those who have had a legal training—I do not include myself in that number. I hope that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) will forgive me for saying this; she and I served on the Standing Committee for the Proceeds of Crime Bill—we sat through 39 sittings—and that was the first time that I had experienced this lawyerly culture. The Proceeds of Crime Bill was designed to allow the Assets Recovery Agency to confiscate such proceeds from people who had not been found guilty of anything in a criminal court, through a civil procedure based on the balance of evidence. That was the fundamental point of that Bill, and it was fought against root and branch by the Liberals and the Conservative party on that particular legal point.

It was claimed by those with legal training that it was unfair for the Assets Recovery Agency to confiscate anything from someone who had not been proven guilty in a court of law. Perhaps they were right; perhaps they were wrong. I certainly had no problem in supporting those measures, and today the Assets Recovery Agency—in Scotland the Crown Office—is confiscating millions of pounds a week from drug dealers who have not been found guilty in court. We do not have enough evidence to convict them, but nevertheless we are confiscating their homes and cars. We are freezing their bank accounts and taking money from them, then distributing it in the communities that their activities have most damaged.

Lawyers among us may say that that process is not particularly fair, just as they are making the same arguments today. If the priority of the Government is to safeguard the lives of our citizens and the fabric of the nation, arguments about due process are the equivalent of arguing about the number of angels dancing on the head of a pin.

Mr. Allen: My hon. Friend has been very generous in giving way a second time. Was he as surprised as I was to hear from Opposition Front Benchers the implication that none of the people in Belmarsh should have been detained, rather than a suggestion that there should have been greater democratic safeguards or a further judicial or parliamentary review, which some of us would be happy to see? I am sure that the hon. Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer) will jump to his feet if I am wrong in that assumption, but I got the strong impression that they think that all those people should be let out under some free market justice system to do what they may have intended to do.

Mr. Harris: I get the feeling that the hon. Member for Newark may be about to intervene. The Liberal Democrats challenged the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden during his peroration on whether it should be jail or nothing, and he agreed on that. That leads me to the inevitable conclusion that under a Conservative Government the legislation that all those Members voted for in December 2001 would be scrapped and all the people in Belmarsh, or those who might subsequently be held under house arrest, would be allowed to go free because the threshold of acceptable evidence that they say legal process demands had not been met.

Patrick Mercer: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his generosity in giving way. My right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden was making the point that, above and beyond everything else, it must be clear to the terrorist that our values remain constant and proper, no matter what threat is thrown at us If that means that we have to examine due process and the constitution as it stands, and if it means that those held without charge who cannot logically be brought to court have to be released, so be it. If we do not do that, we give away one of the fundamental freedoms that terrorists are trying to assault.

Mr. Harris: I am sure that the many dozens of people watching the debate live on television will reach their own conclusions based on what the hon. Gentleman just said.

I want to address the issue of wire tap or intercept evidence. I was extremely concerned when the Government announced last year that they were considering the possibility of allowing wire tap evidence in court. The security services were extremely concerned that a crucial source of counter-terrorist information would dry up if wire tap evidence were permissible in court. The right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden legitimately pointed out that many other countries, including some of our closest allies, allow intercept evidence in court.

Let us look at the American example. In many states in America where wire tap is allowed, that source of information has all but dried up because criminals—members of the mafia and terrorists—understand that things that they say on the telephone will inevitably be used against them in court, and are extremely careful not to say anything on the telephone. That is exactly why, I am glad to say, the Government have been very reluctant to conclude that the law should change.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): Had the current legislation continued, as the hon. Gentleman wishes that the Lords had allowed, would not such people say to themselves, "What I say on the wire tap could be used to hold me in Belmarsh"? Surely whether it is used in court, or as part of a wider net to capture them, they will still know, or assume, that they are being tapped.

Mr. Harris: One of the most unhelpful aspects of the wire tap evidence debate is that it has become so high-profile that what the hon. Gentleman says is probably half right. I would have preferred it if this debate about wire tap intercept evidence had a lower profile. I remain firmly of the belief, however, as do the security services, that admitting that type of evidence in court will do nothing to increase the number of convictions, and will result in information that the security services currently use to avoid terrorist atrocities no longer being available. That is a very important point. I firmly believe that terrorist attacks of the order of Madrid, Istanbul, Bali or even 11 September in New York and Washington have already been avoided in this country thanks to the measures introduced in the 2001 Act. I believe that all the 12 people in Belmarsh were involved in conspiring in some kind of terrorist activity, and at least some of them would by now have carried out attacks on this country.

Given that wire tap evidence is not admissible—and should not be admissible in my view—what should the Home Secretary do when confronted with evidence that a particular individual poses a genuine threat to this country? Should he say, "We don't have enough evidence to convict him in court, so let him go free"? Then, 12 months later, when we have an attack on the London underground or anywhere in the country, the Home Secretary could turn around and say, "Well, it could have been worse. We could have locked him up without trial." That seems to be the position of some Opposition Members, and people who are paying attention to this debate will find that incredible.

The people we are facing—the terrorists who hate our country and culture so much—are willing to risk everything: their possessions, their friends, their family, their lives. It is quite acceptable, and incumbent on us, to realise that in return we should accept a sacrifice. If that sacrifice compromises the level of civil liberties that we enjoy, that is what must happen. The Government are sometimes guilty of claiming that these measures do not represent any kind of compromise on our civil liberties. We must be honest and say that they do. That is what happens when we are in a fight against this kind of terrorism—we compromise our civil liberties, because the alternative does not bear thinking about. There is no point claiming that we have the same civil liberties today as we did three years ago, and neither should we have.

The hon. Member for Winchester said that the Government were given leeway for three years, following the passage of the 2001 Act. The mood to give the Government leeway, however—I presume that he means the derogation from the European convention—has disappeared. He should admit that the reason that that mood has disappeared—I agree that it has—is that we have not suffered that kind of terrorist atrocity in the past three years. Some, such as the New Statesman last week—a magazine to which I am ashamed to be a subscriber—argue that because there has been no terrorist attack on Britain in the past three years, the threat does not exist and we should not bother with any kind of framework for preventing terrorism. The fact that there has not been a successful attack on British soil does not mean that the threat does not exist—it means that the security services have been successful in preventing an attack. No one looking at the events of 9/11, Madrid, Bali and Istanbul could conclude that there is not a threat. That does not make sense. Instead of assuming that a threat does not exist—my comments are not directed at the hon. Member for Winchester—the editor of the New Statesman should run a feature next week paying tribute to the work of the security services, which have saved God knows how many lives as a result of their intelligence work.

In conclusion, the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden repeated something that is often said in this debate. He said that by compromising our civil liberties we are giving some kind of victory to the terrorists—that changing our way of life and giving up some of our freedoms is a victory for terrorism. No, it is not. [Interruption.] I am not speaking on behalf of the Home Secretary—I am expressing my own opinion. There would be a victory for terrorism if a massive bomb went off in a crowded location in one of our capital cities or in any other city. There would be a victory for terrorists if a jumbo jet crashed into the Palace or any other location in the country. Terrorism can be defeated by political, military and intelligence means. Claiming that we would give terrorists the final victory if we denied people held in Belmarsh a trial may receive a round of applause on "Any Questions?", but it does not sit right with the vast majority of my constituents or, I suspect, the constituents of other hon. Members.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Let me point out to the House that approximately 40 minutes are left, with four hon. Members seeking to catch my eye. Perhaps they would show a little more restraint than we have seen so far.

6.2 pm

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) (LD): The hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Harris) has invented a category of people—none of them have attended today's debate—who do not believe that there is a serious terrorist threat to this country. I have heard no such person speak today, and I have more reason than anyone else in the Chamber to be aware of the extent to which the work of our security and intelligence services has preserved us from major terrorist actions over a considerable period. My hon. Friend the Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten) made that point in opening the debate, and we all join together in paying tribute to their work. However, that does not absolve us from the need to examine the legislation and see whether it is right, whether it serves its purpose, whether it deals with the full range of threats and whether it is sustainable over a period of time.

The key phrase in the legislation is about the nature of the threat as a "public emergency threatening the life of the nation".

The threat that faces us is not short-term, and we cannot envisage its early cessation. Indeed, it is difficult to envisage the circumstances in which the loose al-Qaeda network and other groups loosely connected with it would want to desist from their terrorist activity. We cannot act, therefore, on the basis of emergency short-term legislation such as regulation 18B, which was used in the second world war. I was only a baby at the time, but people knew that the war would be over in two or three years, and that we would either win or lose it. We do not know when the present terrorist threat will end, so we need sustainable legislation. There are not many Members in the Chamber, with the possible exception of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart, who believe that the legislation that the Lords recently challenged and effectively overruled is sustainable. There is a widespread view that we cannot maintain a system of indefinite detention without trial on a ministerial decision. The Government clearly now accept that view, and are working on that basis to devise alternative proposals.

I served as deputy chairman of the Newton committee, but I did not have to work very hard in that capacity, as the committee was well chaired by Lord Newton and we were well supported by the group of senior Members, Privy Councillors of all parties, and one who had no political affiliation. It was wide ranging in its experience and there was no fundamental disagreement over the conclusions that were reached. I give away no secrets when I say that the only subject on which we had real difficulty reaching an agreed wording was what we debated last night—incitement to religious hatred, and how far legislation should go in attempting to deal with it. There was relatively little difficulty in reaching agreement on the matters that we are debating today and what we should propose to the Government.

We found many other things wrong with the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001. The Newton committee was set up because the 2001 legislation was rushed through both Houses of Parliament on the basis that its purpose was to deal with a short-term emergency. In fact, it was stuffed with measures that had nothing to do with short-term needs and nothing to do with terrorism, which further inhibited the ability of the two Houses to get it right at the time. The committee was set up because it became clear that the measure could not be passed through the other place unless some concession were made. The concession was steadily tightened up: first, it was a review committee, then a review committee whose report had to be debated in both Houses, then a committee whose report would, if it were not debated, lead to the entire lapse of the legislation. That reflected the degree of concern felt in both Houses that, because of the immediate circumstances, they were being pressed to push through a measure that they were deeply unhappy about, which required much further and more detailed consideration.

The one point of anger that I would like to express at this stage, before returning to the happy consensual atmosphere of the debate, is that the Government's initial response to the Newton report was misplaced macho posturing. Their initial reaction to the report seemed to suggest that none of the recommendations were of any value whatever and that the Government would carry on very much as they were. I realise that the present Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety took no part in that, but it set a tone for relative inaction over the next 12 months. The committee had proposed that the Government should prepare an alternative to the 2001 legislation, which would need to be renewed or replaced because the derogation would come up in just over a year's time and the legislation would lapse.

I am pleased that things seem to have moved on, largely because of the House of Lords judgment and the coincidental change of Home Secretary, which has also helped. I very much welcome the way in which the present Home Secretary is approaching the matter. That is not to say that I disagreed in all respects with the previous Home Secretary. He made it pretty clear on the record that, in respect of an issue that we shall come to in a few moments, he would have welcomed the ability to use intercept evidence in court, but had to be satisfied that he could secure general agreement among the various Government bodies concerned. He certainly showed continuing interest in intercept and set up further consideration of it even before the Newton committee had raised it.

The Newton package had two main aspects: making prosecution easier and more feasible, and proposing alternative measures where prosecution could not be pursued. The measures to make prosecution more practicable included new offences and offences that could be aggravated by connection with terrorism. The committee drew from experience in other countries and in other areas of law. One important aspect of pursuing prosecution was the idea of having a security-cleared investigating judge as part of the process, and another was using intercept evidence.

I continue to believe, as Newton recommended, that we should remove the blanket ban on the use of intercept evidence. The law should allow it, but that is not to say that it will solve either the existing Belmarsh cases or all the cases in the future. In many circumstances, it would be prejudicial to use it. The main purpose of intercept activity is the gathering of intelligence, which, as the Minister rightly said earlier, plays a valuable role in disruption. It is not collected on an evidential basis, but it is possible to collect it on that basis and use it in certain limited circumstances. We should not preclude it, because there may well be cases in the future where it would be both relevant and helpful. The present blanket ban is difficult to accept.

In my two capacities, I am aware of at least five different reasons why various parts of the system are uncomfortable about the use of intercept evidence in this way. I am not certain about the current balance of opinion about which reason the Government regard as the most important. They are important reasons, but in my opinion, none outweighs the benefits stemming from limited availability of the intercept option. It should be part of the package.

On the other side of the page, as it were, the committee proposed a series of measures that have been echoed by both the Minister and the Conservative spokesman, although the latter questioned them in one respect. The measures deal with people about whom serious suspicions exist, but in respect of whom there is insufficient evidence to lead to a successful prosecution.

The measures did not include house arrest, but did include restriction of movement. That was chosen because it allows potential links with other terrorist activists to be broken—links that could allow the person who would otherwise be detained to have a role in the preparation of further terrorist acts. The Government's proposals include many of the committee's proposed measures.

However, the question then facing the committee has been raised several times in the debate. It is, "What about UK citizens?" That is one of the most difficult issues. When we asked "Are there no UK citizens about whom similar suspicions are held?", we could not get a negative answer. That is, no one could say "No, we have only ever come across foreigners about whom we have such suspicions."

My judgment is that there are UK citizens about whom similar suspicions have been raised. They will have had to be dealt with in other ways, such as by prosecution for other offences, or by surveillance or preventive and disruptive activity of various kinds. There is therefore both an anti-discrimination argument and a practical argument against the use of measures exclusively against foreign citizens. The Government were really saying, "We can get this little group under these measures, but not really anyone else by the use of even remotely similar measures."

It must have been clear to everyone, as soon as the Lords' judgment was delivered, that we could not extend to UK citizens detention without trial on the decision of a Minister. That is so foreign to everything that we—with the possible exception of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart—believe and accept that there is no way that either House of Parliament could admit it into the range of anti-terrorism measures.

It is all right for Members of Parliament or television commentators to say, "This is an important thing that we have to do to fight terrorism." What about a Muslim who, by some happenstance of association, is threatened with Executive detention without any due process? The whole picture is very different for a person like that. The same was true for quite a few Irish people, both in Northern Ireland and in Great Britain, when they were subject to other limitations. In their situation, matters looked rather different.

It was essential to the basis of our civil liberties that other measures be found, and the committee felt that the Government should have been looking for measures appropriate for dealing with UK citizens about whom there was the suspicion of terrorist activity.

In the interests of time, I shall turn now to my final point—the key concern that we cannot be content with ministerial decision and subsequent judicial review, especially in respect of a process as hidebound as that of the Special Immigration Appeals Commission. The reason is that the people concerned are unable to see the evidence against them. They cannot produce an alibi against a piece of evidence used in SIAC, because they do not know that it is alleged that, say, they attended a particular meeting on a particular day. Therefore, because they do not know the evidence involved, even the most cast-iron alibi cannot be used.

My fundamental point is that making it possible for a Minister to lock up or otherwise restrict the liberty of a UK citizen because it is thought that that person might have terrorist associations—even though the evidence looks promising—will not be acceptable in either House of Parliament.

I therefore want to challenge an important statement that the Minister made. She said that, if this matter were to be given over to the judiciary, the Home Secretary would be abrogating his responsibility for the security of this country. That is not the case. We give the Home Secretary responsibilities to carry out, and he and the police have to bring people to court. He is not abrogating his responsibility for the safety of citizens against crime if he does not pick out a dangerous violent criminal or a repeated sex offender and say, "We're not going to try you because I know you're guilty, so I'm going to put you in prison."

That is not abrogating his responsibility. The Home Secretary allows the police to arrest a person and due process to take place. Therefore, it is no more true that he would be abrogating his responsibility if he ensured that it was a judicial decision and not an Executive decision that might lead even to the limitations that we have talked about today. Obviously, he or the police might initiate that process—it could go as high as the Home Secretary—and he might be abrogating his responsibility if he ignored the repeated pleas to set the process in motion for an individual or group. However, he is erecting a false argument—and he cannot be guilty of the charge—by saying that he cannot give the responsibility to a judge because that would be failing the nation. He would be serving the nation, although judges might not want to be put in that position. However, the public would have much more confidence, and the legislation would be more sustainable, if a judicial and not an Executive decision were made to take away someone's liberty in circumstances where they had not been found guilty of anything, but there were reasonable grounds for suspecting that they may be about to do something very dangerous.

We all recognise how difficult such decisions are, but we want a process in which the public and both Houses of Parliament can have confidence. We are starting a process that might lead us there within a reasonable period. I just wish that it had started when the Committee first reported.

Ross Cranston (Dudley, North) (Lab): I congratulate the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten) on the measured way in which he made his proposals, although I do not accept all of them. The only blot was when he bracketed us with Burma and North Korea, which is simply incorrect.

Much of the debate about this issue is simplistic. As my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Harris) said, it often equates Belmarsh with Guantanamo Bay, but they are entirely different. It also engages in rhetoric when the Government are accused of betraying human rights.

My hon. Friend the Minister was absolutely right to start with the threat, which is the position taken by many of my constituents when I talk to them about it. They start with the threat demonstrated by 9/11, Spain, Bali and Istanbul. They also refer to what is, in my terms, the pre-enlightenment, anti-democrat, religious fanaticism under which this country is targeted. They also take up the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) that, at most, this country has detained only 17 people. The comparisons with other countries, such as France and so on, are often false because considerably more people are detained there, even though there is an investigating judge. I am not suggesting that we should react in a populist or utilitarian way. We should approach the issue pragmatically, but as a matter of principle. The Government's critics often approach the matter in absolutist terms and do not engage with the debate.

The shadow Home Secretary started with Lord Hoffman and his account of individual rights, but that is only half the story. Too often these days, we focus exclusively on individual and human rights, but that fails to take account of the history of civil rights and liberties in this country. To put it crudely, in the 19th century, the struggle was for democratic institutions and for whole groups of people to vote, assemble and join associations of workers, so that everyone and not just an elite could benefit. We must take into account the fact that we have democratic institutions. We must also take into account the fact that when we talk about rights and liberties, we mean the rights and liberties of groups of people, not just individuals. The Labour party had difficulties with that during the 1930s when Sir Stafford Cripps said that the democratic legislature could overcome property rights. That was an unacceptable position. However, we have a democratic system—a great achievement. It may be flawed, but accounts that state that we have an overpowering Executive are lazy and do not take account of reality.

That 19th-century struggle was also about individual rights, which have of course been overlaid by the great human rights documents of the 20th century—the universal declaration and regional documents such as the European convention on human rights and fundamental freedoms. In the 20th century, we had to reconcile democracy and individual human rights.

The shadow Home Secretary spoke of the great harm caused to individuals by imprisonment. There is no doubt about that, but in our society we have always accepted that we can deliberately impose grave harm on individuals to lessen the risk to others—we do that every day in the criminal courts; I do that when I send people to prison— because it is done in accordance with certain fundamental principles. The human rights documents themselves accept that democracy and individual liberty have to be reconciled. For example, as we know, there are provisions whereby Governments can act in ways that are necessary for a democratic society, so rights have to give way to that.

It is possible for democracy and human rights to be reconciled, but my main point is that we must take into account democratic institutions and the great 19th-century struggle, so that we have a system in which all can participate democratically. Instead of seeing democratic institutions—in this case, the Home Secretary, accountable to Parliament—as a blot on the system, we should applaud them. As we are debating a Liberal Democrat motion, I shall quote what Lord Carlile said recently in The Guardian:

"A great deal of rhetoric has surrounded this subject. The demonisation by some commentators of"— he referred to my right hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett), the former Home Secretary—

"over the issue is totally contrary to my observation, occasionally at close quarters, of a Home Secretary giving honest primacy to national security and public safety."

I certainly agree with those sentiments.

How do we reconcile democratic institutions acting for the collective good with the human rights of individuals? There are three overarching principles. First, actions must be justified democratically, in Parliament and to the public. Secondly, we cannot put security concerns in an absolute and unqualified way, which accords with another principle—that of shared humanity, recognised in the Human Rights Act 1998. A corollary of that is that any response by the Government must be balanced and proportionate, and take individual rights into account. Thirdly, we must act in accordance with law. That does not mean that we must necessarily act in accordance with the way in which the ordinary criminal courts operate.

[Ross Cranston]

In the article to which I referred earlier, Lord Carlile said, when talking about the steps that might be taken to address the problem of the Belmarsh judgment:

"The second step might be to develop a trial procedure that would ensure the protection of sensitive intelligence. This may mean thinking beyond the conventional reliance on jury trial."

He went on to say that although he, as a criminal practitioner, believes fundamentally in trial by jury, in some cases that may have to give way. We do not necessarily need to have an adversarial system. The shadow Home Secretary said that it might be possible to have a two-judge process, whereby one judge screened the evidence before it went to court.

I do not have time to comment on the Government proposals in detail. The Liberal Democrat suggestion about deportation—that somehow we should have memorandums and framework agreements with other countries and not act until they are tested—is not sensible. We need also to think about creating new offences and a reformed judicial process. The control orders suggested by the Government also seem a sensible way forward.

I do not believe in absolute solutions to such difficult questions. There are no easy answers, but I am right behind the Government in their attempt to grapple with these difficult issues.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): I have no particular expertise to offer the House in relation to terrorism, and no legal qualification, but we all have a common duty to address the civil liberties of this country's subjects, as has been done eloquently in this debate. It has been generally accepted, with possible reservations, that we all know that there is a problem with terrorism, and it is possible to have slightly different interpretations about how best to deal with it.

I commented in an intervention that only a handful of people at Belmarsh had been subject to detention orders, and I am very doubtful whether that covers the whole population of potential terrorists—I think not—so that would not be a sufficient reaction even if it were necessary. There is an argument for having terrorists out in the community where they can be surveyed and we can keep an eye on them, but it is quite proper at least for the Home Secretary, who is a politically accountable officer, to consider whether detention should be part of the portfolio of measures that can be used against terrorism. I may have reservations about how to do that, and about the process, but it at least should be considered.

In some matters, Back Benchers and loyal Opposition parties have to defer to and trust Ministers in relation to the conclusions that they reach, if only because more evidence is available to them than to those outside the loop. I certainly do not question Ministers' motives, and I welcome the tone of the Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety in this debate. We are all trying to feel our way towards an acceptable solution, but the fact that we start with that presumption of trust should not entitle us to give Ministers a blank cheque to do whatever they wish.

Like my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis), I am concerned that there is a risk that we might stimulate terrorism in the act of trying to overcome it. Beyond that, there is also the possibility of paying too high a price for any element of extra security that we may gain by taking certain actions. I have experienced the uncomfortable position of lobbying Ministers and getting them to lobby the Egyptian authorities in relation to one of my constituents who was detained for a very long time and eventually tried and convicted in Cairo, on evidence that would not have been acceptable to the House or to the British courts, for membership of Hizb-ut-Tahrir, and then being told by an Egyptian official, "Well, you lock up people like that as well, don't you?" I found that very uncomfortable.

We should all remember that any action that we decide to take—even if we take it for good reasons—is not cost-free to the citizen. I had the interesting and somewhat disconcerting experience exactly a month ago of being peremptorily stopped in my car and being searched by Ministry of Defence police in uniform under the provisions of the Terrorism Act 2000. All I hope in that matter is that they acted perfectly correctly, that they were not acting on information relayed to them, and perhaps that their action was proportionate and targeted to the matter at hand—I had some doubts about that—but that shows what can happen to any of us. That was a very trivial matter, and I am willing to pay that price, but of course the process on which Ministers' views were overturned by the Lords, and which they are seeking in a sense to replicate with control orders, would greatly increase the inconvenience to citizens.

I must say, even as an amateur in the field of human rights, that at the time of the initial emergency legislation, when it was confined to foreign nationals, I anticipated what would happen in the Lords three years later, when it was struck down on the grounds of partiality. Of course, the collective approach of Ministers has been to say, the answer is to make whatever we come up with applicable to British nationals as well.

I emphasise to Ministers that, even if they do not intend, for example, to use powers to lock up the shadow Cabinet on 1 April—I notice that the Minister is responding with interest to that, but I am making a serious point—any redress by way of appeal would take place ex post facto by judicial review, and would not be immediate. If there were a delay, it would not be cost-free. Of course, foreign nationals have been detained under the existing legislation, with all the horror involved, yet they have had no redress for some considerable time.

Conservative Members have what my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition described as "serious misgivings" about the process. Given that there is a common objective, process is central to the debate. My reading is that the Government object not to the concept of a trial and judicial process but to the malign consequences that might arise from that, such as damaging sources or risking individuals, and the possible inability to adduce certain kinds of evidence to the satisfaction of a court.

I have taken some notice of the deliberations of the Newton committee of Privy Councillors of all parties, partly on the back of the extremely eloquent speech made by the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), and also because Lord Newton was my first boss nearly 40 years ago—I echo the accolades that have been given to him. The committee made a careful effort to examine the possible constraints in the use of intercept evidence and the judicial process, and tried to find out whether they could be overcome. The Government should consider more carefully the possibility of preparing or filtering evidence through a judicial process before it is considered by a judge.

If there is evidence out there, it must be considered by someone. We hope that it would be considered by a judge before any detention or serious constraint were contemplated. The alternative choice would be for a Minister to consider it, but I would prefer a judge to do that, given the right safeguards. Ministers must remember—as we all must—that however high they might be, the law is above them. Frankly, the Government, to put it delicately, have not been blind to the real threat to our society, but they have evinced an authoritarian attitude. I find that rather distasteful, and it is one reason why I have signed up to the Conservative civil liberties group. It is important for hon. Members on both sides of the House to take such matters seriously and to witness to them. Ministers should not have a free run in this.

Ministers, especially, should understand that there is no middle way between the right thing to do and authoritarianism—they must do the right thing. It would be much better to find a system that strives to achieve judicial results and goes on to punish wicked people for what they are doing wrong, but does not achieve that by extending the powers of individual Ministers. We need a measure of self-restraint. There must be a better way than allowing the Home Secretary to lock people up without giving us evidence that would stand up in court.

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): I want both Front-Bench spokespersons to be able to deal with all points raised, so I shall be brief. However, whatever hon. Members do, they should not think that I am being brief because my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Harris) said everything that I would have said.

Everyone agrees that prosecution is the game of choice. The Tories, however, have to accept that realistically there must be a fall-back position in case prosecution is not practical. Their inquisitorial model does not help in the slightest. It would be difficult to graft it on to our system. We have never had an inquisitorial model. Although we have coroners, both sides are represented during proceedings, so there is an adversarial aspect there. What would happen if there were an appeal under such a model? Proceedings in the Court of Appeal would be adversarial, as would an appeal in the House of Lords, so the model would not slide into the existing system.

The analysis of the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) did not help us. He seemed to think that the calibre of judge would somehow improve if the procedures were swapped. At present, the Special Immigration Appeals Commission gathers all the material, perhaps subject to public interest immunity certificates. However, no Minister would sign a PII certificate while knowing that it covered material of benefit to the defendant. SIAC in effect receives all relevant material, and then both sides get it, subject of course to the special advocate procedure. The Home Office gets it all and the defence, in one way or another, gets it all.

The special advocate has to take his instructions first, which is very difficult, and then cannot speak once he has seen the material. When not in closed session, the procedure is ordinary. The defence barrister deals with all the open evidence, and then the special advocate deals with all the closed evidence and tries to attack it as best he can on the limited instructions that he has been able to receive. Key to that is that SIAC is well aware that the material has not been properly and thoroughly cross-examined—it is aware of the limitations.

The right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden argued that an inquisitorial judge might somehow be able to make up for the deficiencies that fall to the defence, but that is not correct. SIAC knows that the material has not been scrutinised as fully as it would have liked, and must take it on that basis. I know the judiciary involved with SIAC, and I am satisfied that they also adopt an extremely high standard, and I will be very surprised if they do not insist that the material must satisfy them beyond reasonable doubt. Therefore, we must look, as everybody agrees, to prosecution, but we must do so within our own court system model.

I make the serious suggestion that it would be prudent for the Home Secretary to send all the material about all these people to the Director of Public Prosecutions as quickly as possible to see whether the appropriate independent key professional can decide to prosecute all, one, none or any of them. That would clearly appear to be an independent decision based on the evidence, which had nothing to do with the Home Secretary. That should be done straight away.

The Home Secretary also has the power to order further investigation. That is an important point, because it is far from clear that there has been a thorough investigation with a view to prosecution. One sees press reports and one hears lawyers acting for the Belmarsh detainees saying clearly that the detainees have not even been interviewed. If there had been an investigation with a view to prosecution, they would have been interviewed. I am not suggesting that they would have confessed, but interviews can be extremely important. If that position is correct—it comes from the mouths of lawyers whom I know well and who I cannot imagine are saying what is incorrect—there has not been an attempt to investigate properly with a view to prosecution in at least all the cases of the people in Belmarsh. That is crucial.

If the DPP finds in given cases that he cannot prosecute, he should be asked whether any of the proposals of the Newton committee assist him in doing so. He should make recommendations about that. If, even with all the widening that Newton advocates, with independent scrutiny by the DPP, and given the procedures under the Criminal Justice Act 2003, which allow more hearsay and bad character evidence to be considered, it is not possible to prosecute and we cannot deport all the people, we will have to fall back on some restraint. The Tories will have to accept that that is realistic, as they were ready to accept the point in debate on part 4 of the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act

[Vera Baird]

2001. They must keep an open mind on that, as the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden said they would.

The issue of control orders—possibly falling short of house arrest—may boil down to who comes first: the Home Secretary making a decision that is scrutinised by a judge, or the Home Secretary making an application and a judge conducting the initial scrutiny. I appreciate and understand why the Home Secretary thinks that the defence of the realm is a responsibility of the Executive and not of the court. I would prefer the first decision to be taken by the court, but if that is not the Home Secretary's view, and in the end he and the Government find that incompatible with their responsibilities, my right hon. Friend has a duty to shoulder the entire burden of safeguarding the defence of the realm. If it has to be that way round, and so long as there is an appeal that is automatic, immediate and covers all the facts, perhaps even such a suggestion could be acceptable.

I have a strong sense that somewhere in one or other of the strands that we have debated today we will find a common answer. The very fact that we are debating this issue and seeking consensus on it means not that our values have been undermined but that we are determined that democracy will find a way.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): What a fine note on which to end the Back-Bench contributions. With perhaps one exception, I am grateful to all the right hon. and hon. Members who spoke in an excellent debate, which shines as an oasis of rationality in the turmoil and pre-electoral bombast in which we so often indulge.

My hon. Friend the Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten) and the Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety set the tone of the debate in seeking consensus and points on which we could agree on the appropriate responses to what we all acknowledge is an extremely serious problem and a difficult dilemma for any Government. The right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) continued in the same tone and I am grateful to him for his remarks. He identified some of the same problems as we do with the present position and, indeed, some of the same responses to it. He stated the problem clearly at the outset when he said that the balance we had to strike was between defence of life and defence of way of life.

We have to consider the proposals before us and their deficiencies when measured against our norms of justice in terms of the standard of proof, reasonable belief and the rights of the accused to know the case against them, to argue the case and to be proved guilty beyond reasonable doubt. We would normally expect all those things of a judicial system in this country and we should surrender them only with great care.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) made a thoughtful speech, in which he brought to bear the knowledge that he has gleaned from and contributed to the Newton committee in his plea for sustainable legislation, which we have not had until now.

The hon. and learned Member for Dudley, North (Ross Cranston) spoke of reconciling the different pressures on the Government and referred to three tests of action—that it should be justified, proportionate and in accordance with law. I cannot disagree with his scholarly analysis.

The hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) made, as usual, a sensible and reasoned speech. We do indeed have to accept that there is a presumption of trust in the Minister and her colleagues. They are in possession of information that we do not have, so in some respects we have to trust their judgment of what is best. However, that does not remove from us the responsibility of questioning their judgment and testing it against the norms of a democratic society.

The hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) brought the Back-Bench contributions to a fitting conclusion. She restated our primary point, that prosecution must be the preferred option. It must always be better to put someone before a court of law, if we can find the right means of doing so.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Harris) had something of the air of a braggart swaggering into a bar looking for a fight with anyone he could find. He was to be disappointed. Today, we are looking not for a fight, but for a reasoned argument regarding the way in which we should proceed. Most of those present in the Chamber are not prepared to throw away 1,000 years of British history and British jurisprudence simply to satisfy what might have been interpreted as prejudices on the hon. Gentleman's part. We seek a more reasoned way through the morass.

What is in the proposals? My hon. Friend the Member for Winchester made a strong case that house arrest is not an acceptable option, but simply imprisonment by another means. We believe, and I think that many people would agree, that for that to be imposed by ministerial fiat, without judicial oversight and without the safeguards that we normally build into the law, is a dangerous course. If we are to imprison people, let us say that we are doing so and let us have a judicial process that makes it appropriate for us to deprive them of their liberties, but let us not pretend that we are not doing that.

I can understand why Labour Members bridled at the comparison with totalitarian countries that employ house arrest—we are not that sort of country, and neither should we ever be. But let us also recognise that if we were to ask, say, the Government of Burma what their system was for house arrest and they replied, "Of course, it is entirely done through judicial oversight, because although the decision is made by a Minister, it can be reviewed by a hand-picked panel of judges who will meet in secret and not tell the person involved what evidence is before them and what the charge is," we would raise our eyebrows. We would say that we were not convinced that that was an entirely democratic or judicial system.

There are serious arguments against house arrest, but control orders are a different matter. I was disturbed when the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden appeared to take what was described as a black-and-white view and said that we should either lock people up or let them go. There must be gradations below that and safeguards that we can use to protect our citizenship. If we are to have control orders, they must be under judicial oversight. My hon. Friend the Member for Winchester made the point that we should formulate them in such a way as to ensure that they do not require derogation from the European convention on human rights, which is clearly possible in light of the experience of other countries. If they are to be reviewed, we must be clear what the terms of the review are. Whatever form of judicial system is used to review, will it look into matters of fact or simply matters of law? That is a critical question on which the Minister needs to respond. If it is essential, as the Minister says it is, for the Home Secretary himself to control the process of control orders and initiate them, is it still the Government's view that an order should extend to the family and friends of the person upon whom it is placed? Is that an essential element of the Government's package?

By far the favourite option is that of prosecution, as the hon. and learned Member for Redcar said. We have had a series of debates about the use of intercept evidence and I still do not understand the arguments about the intrinsic difference between intercept evidence and electronic surveillance evidence, for example, and why one is admissible and the other is not. I am still not clear why such evidence cannot be used in some cases to ensure that somebody who should be prosecuted is prosecuted and imprisoned if they are found guilty. That extends well beyond terrorism to serious organised crime and other offences.

If we believe that terrorists do not think that their phones are being tapped, we believe in a very different world fron the one that I think we live in. Equally, if we need new offences, let us look at new offences. One of the problems is that we can prosecute for a conspiracy, but not for a conspiracy of one. If there is a lacuna in the law, let us fill it. Let us look at the suggestions from the Newton committee and do as the hon. and learned Member for Redcar said—pass the matter to the Director of Public Prosecutions and let him give an opinion as to what would make the prosecution that much simpler.

We need to look at novel judicial methods as well. The right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden said that he was not attracted to European models, and we know why. Let him look at Scotland, a jurisdiction a little closer to home. I mischievously suggested that we extend the jurisdiction of Scotland to England and Wales in order to have something on which we could build a part-inquisitorial model. Let us have the proposals at the earliest opportunity. Ideally, let us have them before 13 March, so that we can discuss them. If that is not possible, let us at least make progress in that direction.

I need no reminding about the dangers of terrorism: I was in Congress on Capitol hill in Washington DC on 11 September 2001 and saw the evidence of terrorist action with my own eyes. We face a serious threat, and the difficulty is finding an equilibrium between providing freedom from fear or worse for our citizens, which is every Government's duty, and providing freedom under law, which is what we are looking to the Government to provide.

Ms Blears: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall reply to the debate.

I shall try to address as many of the issues raised by hon. Members as possible. The debate has ranged across a number of important, complex matters that go to the heart of our legal and constitutional framework. I am not sure that I can do all those issues justice in the 10 minutes allowed to me, but I shall do my very best.

This afternoon's excellent debate has been filled with considered views, and some challenging issues that go to the heart of how we organise ourselves in this country have been raised. We have had the benefit of the expertise of hon. Members whose knowledge is more extensive than mine. In particular, the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) is a member of the Newton committee and the debate benefited enormously from his contribution.

A number of my hon. Friends have made useful contributions. Given his robust approach, I am pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Harris) sits on the Government Benches. I have no doubt that I shall call on him to be my champion when I face a formidable array of Opposition Members. I am delighted that he felt able to make such a robust contribution.

Several hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten), raised our move to obtain, where appropriate, memorandums of understanding with third countries on the deportation of some foreign nationals. We have made contact with several Governments and are now actively engaged in discussions. I am pleased to say that those discussions are going well, but more remains to be done. We want to secure an overarching memorandum of understanding with each country to allow us to make tailored agreements for individuals. Such agreements will not be legally binding, but those countries will enter into them. We cannot pre-test those agreements—I do not know how we could do so—but if we were about to deport somebody, they would have a right of appeal and the decision to deport under the memorandums of understanding would be subject to intense judicial scrutiny at that point.

Jeremy Corbyn: Will the Minister confirm that any agreement reached in those discussions with other countries will be compatible with the European convention on human rights, particularly in respect of the death penalty and the use of torture against detainees?

Ms Blears: Yes. That is exactly the kind of territory in which we are seeking proper assurances. The Government want to abide by our international obligations and we want reassurances on those points, which is why the discussions are so active.

My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Cathcart made some useful points about the different threat posed by international terrorism as compared with domestic terrorism, which we have faced in the past. He made three points. First, it is difficult to conduct political negotiations with people who want to destroy our way of life and values. Secondly, the terrorists whom we face are committed to mass civilian murders rather than small, targeted terrorist events. Thirdly, those terrorists are not averse to using suicide bombers. In the past, terrorists tried to maximise their chances of survival, but we now face mass civilian casualties and suicide bombing. The nature of the threat is significantly different from that which we have faced in the past.

My hon. Friend asked whether the travel restrictions would apply to British citizens and foreign nationals. In respect of control orders, we will consider the appropriate conditions to meet the threat that faces us. Travel restrictions on foreign nationals and British citizens would be part of that consideration, because we do not want to discriminate against people inappropriately. We would consider whether the conditions were targeted at the threat that we face from those individuals.

The right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed rightly said that the threat will go on for a long time. That is why we need sustainable legislation in this field, rather than simply responding and reacting to every event as it occurs. Through the legislation that we are formulating, we are trying to come up with a framework that can be adapted to events. That is why we are saying that it should apply to all forms of terrorism that face us—not only international terrorism, but domestic terrorism—and to British citizens as well as foreign nationals. In that way, we can tailor the control orders that we make in accordance with the threat.

I am pleased that the right hon. Gentleman acknowledged that intercept is not the solution in every case. He was careful to try to confine it, and I am glad that he said that it is limited in its use. The costs and benefits of using intercept are a matter of judgment. We have taken our decision, but we will keep the matter under close review. I was pleased that the Newton report made a number of recommendations, which the Government looked at carefully in formulating current policy, and that it said that steps short of detention, such as tagging, curfews and restrictions on movement, could well be appropriate. I understand the right hon. Gentleman's party's difference with us on who should make the initial decision and I am sure that that will continue to be a matter of debate. Clearly, as he suggested, judges will have a view on whether they welcome taking on the decision making or whether that might be appropriate for the Executive.

On intercept, it may be useful for the House if I say that America does not have the same co-operation between intelligence and law enforcement agencies as there is in the UK. In fact, in some cases the intelligence services in America are prohibited by statute from passing intelligence on to law enforcement. The unique, close relationship between the police and intelligence agencies in this country is not mirrored in America, and there is no evidence that America or other European countries can use intercept and get more convictions against terrorists than we can. The review considered that.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dudley, North (Ross Cranston), in an excellent and thoughtful contribution, showed us not only his knowledge but his insight into and understanding of the issues. His analysis of the justification for action, our shared humanity and the need for balance and proportionality was excellent, and I am grateful for his measured and sincere support.

The hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) made a typically thoughtful contribution. He said that he would trust Ministers, but not offer us a blank cheque. I entirely understand that he will want to scrutinise exactly what goes on. He raised the important issue of whether the control orders risk stimulating terrorism and further radicalisation. I am acutely conscious of that issue and one strand of our counter-terrorism strategy deals with prevention. That is not just about the harder measures, but working with the Muslim community in particular, and with young people, on solving some of the international issues that lead to radicalisation. It is important that we do that in conjunction with a range of other measures.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) again rightly emphasised that prosecutions are our preferred route. She said that the Conservative Opposition would need a fall-back position. We have all been worried by the polarisation of the Conservatives, who said simply that we should either proceed through trial and prosecution or release with no controls. That is not a tenable position.

We propose a spectrum of measures through the control orders to allow us to tailor the measures so that they are proportionate to the threat, thus meeting the concerns of the House of Lords about disproportionality. Simply having a system whereby we either lock people up through a conventional judicial trial or allow them to go completely free with no controls will not meet the threat, in the view of the people of this country. I am worried about that.

My hon. and learned Friend gave an excellent explanation of the Special Immigration Appeals Commission. We conduct investigations and we will refer matters to the Crown Prosecution Service, if that is the right thing to do.

We have had an excellent debate. It is always our approach to prosecute when we can. We believe that the control orders are a proper response to the House of Lords. They are proportionate and not discriminatory.

Standards and Privileges

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That this House—

(i) approves the Third Report of the Committee on Standards and Privileges (House of Commons Paper No. 233); and

(ii) accordingly suspends Mr Jonathan Sayeed, Member for Mid Bedfordshire, from the service of the House for two weeks.—[Gillian Merron.]

7.15 pm

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): I accept that a complaint was brought because of ineffective internal controls in a company in which I had an interest and that as a Member of Parliament I was negligent in not checking the actions of that company. For that I apologise unreservedly to the House.

To ensure that no such thing should happen again, I have relinquished my shares in the company and resigned as a consultant to it. As the commissioner's report suggests, I never became involved in the company to make money; rather I agreed to help a friend with a small business start-up.

It is a fact that I gave specific instructions to that company stating that nothing should be said or done by it that affected Parliament and furthermore that I was not permitted to use my membership of this House for personal gain. It is also a fact that my consultancy with the company was strictly limited in scope and did not include any element of company management or the vetting of promotional or other material including that on a company website in the United States.

However, while I had no contractual responsibility in those areas, and was assured that my instructions were being followed, I should have recognised that as a Member of this House I needed to do more. I should have checked what was being done by the company in the United States. I did not do that, and that is why this complaint has occurred.

In addition, I misclassified my constituency assistant. The misclassification did not attract additional allowances and had no effect on the public purse. There were late registrations in the Register of Members' Interests, and I accept that it is my responsibility to ensure that the register is accurate and kept up to date. However, I never sought to hide my involvement in the company. For both these errors, however, I apologise to the House

I am pleased and relieved that after a five-month investigation the Standards and Privileges Committee has confirmed that

"there appears to be no basis for the newspaper assertions that The English Manner Ltd. charged substantial"— and, may I add, nor any other—

"sums for arranging access to the House" and that

"there is no evidence that Mr Sayeed received any direct benefit from any of the occasions on which he entertained in the House guests who had links with The English Manner ".

That refutes the main part of the complaint that has been made against me.

I can assure the House that I have never used my access to the House or its facilities for direct or indirect commercial benefit and I have never solicited or received any payment for any tour or entertainment within the Palace of Westminster. I can also assure the House that the Palace of Westminster did not comprise any part of a programme offered to a guest or form any part of their expectation of their visit to the United Kingdom, nor did it constitute any part of a programme for which they paid.

Some colleagues may not be aware that the findings of the Standards and Privileges Committee are not seen by the subject of the complaint until one hour before their publication. Consequently, there is no opportunity to correct errors of fact. The report contains a few errors of fact. Paragraph 12 is materially inaccurate, the concluding line of paragraph 13 is wrong, and in paragraph 14 it is clear that there has been a misunderstanding between the Committee and myself.

Specifically, paragraph 11 states that the programme was circulated in advance to the group leader. That is wrong. The programme was not circulated in advance to anyone. As judgments appear to have been made as to whether I was an indirect beneficiary appear based upon these paragraphs, it is possible that the conclusions the Committee reached would have been different had I been able to correct those mistakes. The inability to correct errors of fact is a matter that the House might care to consider in the future. Whether or not that happens, I acknowledge that though I have acted in good faith throughout, a Committee of the House has found that I should have acted with greater care and that I may have risked damaging the reputation of the House. For that I apologise.

Had The Sunday Times, which ran the story nearly six months ago, been interested in the truth rather than its preconceived agenda it would have reflected accurately what it was told and would have disclosed that material it said was on the company website had been removed because it was contrary to my instructions. If it had acted responsibly, it would have found that no one who visited the Commons ever came because of the website, it would have recognised that none of the guests of The English Manner were under the impression or perception that they were paying for, and receiving, privileged access to Parliament, and it would have ensured that it contacted those who knew the facts before publishing a tissue of lies.

Whatever the deficiencies of The Sunday Times, I recognise that as a Member of Parliament I should have thought to do more to check what was happening in the United States than my contractual duties demanded. Although the specifics of the complaint have been shown to be false, had I been more vigilant the complaint might never have occurred.

I was first elected to this place in 1983. I have never even contemplated the possibility that anything that I did or did not do would call into question either my loyalty to the House or my use of it. That my lack of care has caused questions to be asked and judgments to be made about my conduct I find deeply humiliating, and for which I tender my profound and unreserved apology to the House.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): The hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Sayeed) acknowledged at the beginning of his remarks to some extent that the conduct that gave rise to the complaint fell below the standards of the House, and I welcome that. He has sensibly drawn back from last Thursday's complete public rejection of our report and, again, I am grateful for that. The Select Committee on Standards and Privileges will need to reflect on whether he has responded fully to our recommendations that he apologise fully to the House, in the light of some of his qualifications.

I commend to the House the motion to approve my Committee's third report, which it agreed unanimously on 1 February, and its recommendation that the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire be suspended from the House for a period of two weeks. In supporting the motion, let me briefly remind the House of the background to our current regulatory regime. A decade or so ago, a series of incidents in which Members sought to exploit their position in the House for commercial advantage ended the careers of a number of colleagues and injured the reputation of others. More importantly, those incidents seriously damaged the standing of Members generally and of the House as an institution in the eyes of the public. Public confidence had to be rebuilt, and following recommendations by the Committee on Standards in Public Life—then known as the Nolan committee—the House adopted much more rigorous procedures involving, first, a code of conduct and, secondly, an independent commissioner to investigate complaints. At the heart of the new arrangements was a recognition of the overriding need to maintain a proper and visible distinction between our public duties as Members and our private interests. That need is underpinned by the Register of Members' Interests, the main purpose of which is defined in the guide to the rules as giving "public notification on a continuous basis of those pecuniary interests held by Members which might be thought to influence their parliamentary conduct or actions."

I stress the words "might be thought", as the House accepts that there are occasions on which perceptions are a relevant factor.

As the code makes clear, Members must base their conduct on a consideration of the public interest, and avoid conflict between personal and public interests. They must also conduct themselves at all times in a manner that will tend to maintain and strengthen public trust and confidence in the integrity of Parliament as an institution, and never undertake any activity that would bring the House or Members generally into disrepute. Those two basic principles each have a bearing on the matter now before the House.

Before turning to the specifics of that matter, it might be helpful if I outlined the key elements of how the system works in practice. All complaints are made to the independent commissioner and it is for him alone to decide which merit further investigation and how they are investigated. The ultimate purpose of any investigation—he is an investigator, not a prosecutor—is to seek to establish whether or not the Member has breached the code of conduct. He seeks to agree with the Member concerned, wherever possible—and almost always does—the facts that have emerged from the investigation. He forms an opinion as to whether they reveal any breach of the code and he reports to the Committee, which always publishes his report in full, along with its own report to the House.

It is my Committee that reaches a decision on whether there has been a breach of the code and, in appropriate cases, recommends further action to the House. It reaches its decision on the basis of a thorough and critical examination of the facts reported by the commissioner and any further evidence that it has sought or that the Member has offered following confidential sight of the commissioner's full report. The Committee never simply rubber-stamps the commissioner's conclusions and recommendations.

I turn now to the specific case before us today. I have to say to the House that I was surprised that the hon. Member issued an embargoed press statement within an hour of seeing the Committee's report, denouncing the Committee's recommendations that he be suspended for two weeks as "wrong, unjust and contrary to the evidence accepted by the Commissioner and recognised by the Committee".

The hon. Member is entitled to his opinion and he has at least been consistent in that matter, both in his written evidence and at the conclusion of his oral evidence when he made it clear that, in his view, it would be a gross travesty if the Committee upheld the complaint.

The Committee, of course, gave full weight to the hon. Member's points, as it did to all the other evidence before it. It none the less unanimously agreed with the commissioner that the evidence bore out the substance of his conclusions. I hope that the House will understand that, in seeking to rebut some of the points that the hon. Member advanced, I may need to speak at greater length on this occasion than on previous ones where our verdict was not challenged.

The hon. Member for Harwich (Mr. Henderson) sought in his complaint an investigation of whether the hon. Member had abused parliamentary privilege in respect of his association with The English Manner Ltd.—a company in which he has a 30 per cent. shareholding. The hon. Member for Harwich also asked for an examination of whether it was ethical for the hon. Member to employ Mrs. Alexandra Messervy as his constituency assistant when she was also the majority shareholder of The English Manner Ltd.—a dual role that, in the view of the hon. Member for Harwich, may have resulted in an unacceptable conflict of interest.

In support of his complaint, the hon. Member for Harwich sent the commissioner material gathered by The Sunday Times on the basis of which the newspaper had published articles in August 2004, asserting that The English Manner Ltd. charged substantial sums for tours of Parliament guided by the hon. Member in question.

The complaint was thoroughly investigated by the commissioner, whose report is published together with the Committee's. On behalf of the House, I should like to thank the commissioner for the care with which he investigated the complaint and formulated his conclusions. Besides the commissioner's report, the Committee received further written submissions from the hon. Member and from Mrs. Messervy, who is also one of two directors of The English Manner Ltd. It also took oral evidence from the hon. Member, at his own request.

Having given careful consideration to all the evidence before it, the Committee unanimously accepted the conclusions of the commissioner regarding the conduct of the hon. Member. For his part, and despite the protestations in his press release, the hon. Member himself accepted in giving evidence to the Committee that he did not exercise sufficient personal control over a company in which he had a financial interest.

The basic facts are not in dispute. The hon. Member is a substantial shareholder in The English Manner Ltd.—an interest that he properly registered from the outset. He is also a remunerated consultant to the company on marketing strategy. It is clear that he recognised the potential for conflicts of interest between those roles and his duties as a Member, both because of his oral instruction that neither his name, nor the name of Parliament was to be used in promotional material and because of his ticking of the relevant box when booking dining rooms in the House when his guests had The English Manner Ltd. connections.

It is also common ground between the Committee and the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire that there was no evidence that he benefited directly from entertaining clients of The English Manner Ltd. in the House, nor any evidence that the company made a profit from that entertaining. The Committee states that explicitly at paragraph 40 of the report, and also that there appears to be no basis for newspaper assertions that The English Manner charged substantial sums for arranging access to the House.

Where, then, lies the root of the difference of view between the commissioner and the Committee, on the one hand, and the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire on the other? In essence, the hon. Member takes the view that, as there is no evidence supporting the key assertions by The Sunday Times regarding charging for access to Parliament, that complaint must fall. Likewise, he maintains that as there was never, in his opinion, a conflict of interest between the role of Mrs. Messervy as his constituency assistant on the one hand, and her directorship and majority shareholding in The English Manner on the other, that complaint must also fall.

On those grounds, the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire considers that the Committee should have explicitly rejected "the entire complaint, and that therefore the imposition of a penalty is unjust and wrong, and that the opinions of both the commissioner and the Committee fly in the face of the evidence.

I remind the House that the complaint, whose terms I outlined earlier, are set out in full on pages 40 and 41 of the Committee's report, and that they went far wider than the very narrow and specific points on which the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire seeks to argue. The commissioner and the Committee considered that a broader view—of how The English Manner promoted itself, and of the relationships between those running the company—needed to be taken than the one apparently taken by the hon. Member. Given that the company sought, in large measure, to market itself by word of mouth and personal recommendation, that broader view should also apply to the likely reaction of those clients who were entertained at the House.

The commissioner consistently presented the complaint to the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire in those broader terms, as did the Committee when it took evidence from him. In a nutshell, it is that different view of the scope of the complaint that lies at the heart of the different conclusions reached by the hon. Member on the one hand, and by the Committee and the commissioner on the other.

The hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire believes that the key question is, "Was either I or The English Manner paid for taking people round the House?" Both the Committee and the commissioner see the matter differently. They ask, "Did the hon. Member break the code by allowing his privileged access to the House and its facilities to be exploited for the commercial benefit of a company in which he had a clear financial interest?"

Much of the evidence, and many of the press allegations, centred on material placed on the company's website. The hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire does not dispute that some material on the website gave the impression that The English Manner could arrange privileged access to Parliament. However, he then contends that much of the material behind the complaint was posted on the website without proper authorisation, and that its removal by the company was recognition that it should not have been used in that way. That, of course, avoids the question about the purpose for which the company had prepared the material—something on which the hon. Member was silent.

Such evidence as there is suggests that the documents concerned did form part of the company's marketing strategy. More seriously, however, the review of a visit that included the Palace of Westminster, to which the Committee referred in paragraph 19 of its report, and which explicitly connected the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire, Parliament and the expression "fabulous English Manner adventure", was clearly written for promotional purposes by no less a person than the director of the company and a fellow shareholder. The hon. Member is also silent about how that happened. The evidence clearly suggested that the company—or, at least, its marketing end—considered privileged access to Parliament to be a marketing point, whatever the protestations to the contrary.

The first defence by the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire is that he had made it clear that neither his name, nor that of Parliament, should be used in the company's marketing. He argues that, having instructed that his name should not be used, why should he have had to check?

Is that view sustainable? The hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire is an experienced business man. As a Member of the House, he knew of the sensitivities and risks involved in being seen to market Parliament for commercial advantage, and he was remunerated as a marketing consultant to the company.

Both the commissioner and the Committee agreed that the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire should have done more to avoid such conflict, and that he should have taken a far closer interest in the company's marketing strategy in that respect, including its use of the website as a promotional tool.

The hon. Member's second defence was that, on all occasions except one, the guests he entertained in the House who were in the country as clients of The English Manner were entertained as personal friends and not company clients. We explored that in evidence with him, and he agreed that in fact on each occasion only "at least one" of the guests was a "good friend". In essence, the hon. Member was entertaining groups on the basis of "know one, know all". While he may have known personally the organiser of the Garden Club visit, there is no evidence that he had any personal connection whatever with the club as an institution. He also accepted that there was no discussion with guests that might help them to appreciate what he saw as the distinctive status of their visits to the House. Several of them also got a bill for the meal from the company—an act unlikely to reinforce any perception that they had been personally entertained by the hon. Member—although we recognise that there is no evidence that the company added a mark-up.

The most blatant example of commercial exploitation was the familiarisation visit, which, as a whole, was self-evidently designed to promote the company. Neither the commissioner nor the Committee found sustainable the hon. Member's arguments that that entertainment in the House was purely a personal matter. Both concluded that, taken as a whole, the effect of those visits was to give credibility to the company's overall marketing claim that it could gain access for its clients to institutions, people and places that would otherwise be difficult. The hon. Member, as a major shareholder, would therefore stand to benefit indirectly from that promotion of the company.

Nor does the hon. Member's assertion, repeated in his press statement, that a visit to the House did not form any part of a programme offered to the guests, hold water. The Committee saw the programme for the Garden Club visit. It clearly included a visit to the House, and must have been made available beforehand to some, at least, of the party, as it included an option that had to be booked six weeks before the date of the visit. The hon. Member, in his evidence, could give no satisfactory explanation of that. In short, both the commissioner and the Committee rejected both defences, and concluded that he had failed adequately to prevent The English Manner from exploiting commercially his privileged access to the House.

Two other matters came to light during the commissioner's investigation. The first, which emerged very late in the investigation, was that the hon. Member had made six, not four, registrable visits to the USA paid for by The English Manner. The hon. Member had previously twice assured the commissioner that there had been only four such visits. It is regrettable that he misled the commissioner in that way.

The hon. Member accepted responsibility for the late registrations, and explained that they had arisen as a result of a staff member's oversight. The Committee noted, though, that the two previous visits, recorded in the current published edition of the register, had also not been registered within the one-month period, again by substantial margins.

The hon. Member had also on four occasions given incorrect information to the Department of Finance and Administration about Mrs. Messervy's employment status. The information was apparently given in good faith at the time, but should have been corrected when anticipated developments did not materialise. Those failures could have led to an overpayment of the staffing allowance, but in the event appear not to have done so. Although, in that sense, no harm was done, those lapses suggest a less than thorough approach to those important matters.

In both respects, the Committee considered that the hon. Member could and should have done more. He has apologised for his oversights in respect of the staffing allowance and accepts that ultimately he is to blame for the failure to register, in a timely fashion, the two past recent visits.

The Committee has given very careful consideration to the Commissioner's report, and to the further evidence provided by the hon. Member and by Mrs. Messervy. It has discussed the case on three occasions, and deliberated on it for several hours. I stress that the Committee was unanimous in its conclusions. I believe that the hon. Member takes too narrow and selective a view of the nature of the complaint and appears unable to recognise the breadth of the issues raised by his conduct. I take the view that the Committee's recommendation, in the formulation of which it took into account recommendations made in previous cases, is a proportionate response to the facts revealed in the evidence. I see nothing in the hon. Member's press release that leads me to think that either the commissioner or the Committee came to the wrong decision.

Looking at decisions in past cases involving failure to observe strictly the registration requirements, it is likely that the non-registration of the visits and the incorrect information given to the Department of Finance and Administration, both of which the hon. Member accepts, would themselves have led the Committee to call for an apology. When we add in the other matters, which risked damaging the reputation of the House by giving the impression that its facilities were for hire, I think that a recommendation for suspension was inevitable given the extent to which the hon. Member's conduct, as revealed by the commissioner's investigation, had fallen below the standard the House expects.

I commend the report to the House and the recommendation it makes that the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire be suspended from the House for a period of two weeks.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): These are always unhappy occasions, but it is important that the House can operate proper and effective self-regulation. I thank my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) for his chairmanship of the Committee. I also thank the commissioner and the other members of the Committee who work so hard on these difficult cases on behalf of all of us.

It is clear from the report and exhibits that the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Sayeed) has conceded that he did not exercise sufficient control over the company he part-owned and that those using the company website had scope to believe that the company was in the business of providing access to the House of Commons. There was an appearance of conflict of interest in his staff employment arrangements. He has had to apologise for giving the Fees Office and the commissioner wrong information.

The Committee found that the hon. Member stood to gain financially from the benefits to the company of his involvement in visits to and entertainment at the House. As my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire said, the Committee concluded that the hon. Member's conduct was well below the standards expected. Hon. Members will know that my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition has described that behaviour as wholly unacceptable. I support the Committee's recommendation and the motion before the House.

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Peter Hain): It is generally accepted that the House should move quickly to resolve recommendations from the Committee on Standards and Privileges. The Committee published its report last Thursday 3 February, and the Government have provided time for debate at the earliest opportunity.

I thank the Committee for its examination of this matter, and the Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards for his investigation. I believe that both have operated with commendable thoroughness and scrupulous fairness to the hon. Member concerned. I pay tribute in particular to the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young), who has demonstrated yet again why he is so appropriate a Chairman of the Committee.

The House will welcome the apology by the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Sayeed) in what was a speech of some dignity, but as the right hon. Gentleman said, it is regrettable that the hon. Member's press release was so stridently different in content and tone. It is not clear whether he has actually accepted the Committee's recommendations.

In paragraph 15, the Committee found clearly that the hon. Member stood to gain, even if indirectly, from the benefits that accrued to the company from clients visiting the House. It found a clear risk to the reputation of the House, and the House has heard from the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire a clear explanation of its reasoning, which we welcome.

I urge hon. Members on both sides of the House to endorse the Committee's report and accept its recommendation. Matters of this kind reflect on the integrity of the House and on each of us who are Members of it. They affect the way in which the public look at Parliament, encouraging cynicism about politics and politicians. They undermine all the good work that is being done to increase public engagement. It is important that we should be seen to respond to matters of this kind fairly but robustly.

I commend the motion to the House.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): I, too, want to refer briefly to the Committee's report. I hope that the whole House will take this opportunity to express confidence in the commissioner, the Committee and the process for which they are responsible on our behalf. The integrity of our process is extremely important to the reputation of the whole House.

I hope that the Chairman of the Committee, the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young), may be able to confirm that the commissioner, as is normal practice, gave the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Sayeed) opportunities to correct any factual inaccuracy. A rather misleading impression was given by the hon. Member in his contribution earlier. I hope that it can be corrected.

In response to the comments of the Leader of the House, perhaps the Chairman of the Committee might like to comment on the subsequent press release, which followed publication of the Committee's report. Did the Committee take that into account in considering this case and will it do so in any future cases? Clearly, a press release issued immediately after publication of a Committee's report can itself damage the reputation of the process and of the House as a whole.

The House should declare its confidence in our carefully designed disciplinary process and we should express our full support for those who undertake these difficult and sometimes invidious tasks on our behalf.

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I seek your guidance on a matter, but I am not sure whether what I have to say is a brief contribution or a point of order. I speak as a former member of the Standards and Privileges Committee, although I was not involved in this case in any way. Normally, the procedure adopted on such occasions is that the Member against whom a finding has been made will agree his statement with Mr. Speaker before presenting it to the House, as the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Sayeed) has done—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. A personal statement was not made today; we are simply dealing with the report of the Committee.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House—

(i) approves the Third Report of the Committee on Standards and Privileges (House of Commons Paper No. 233); and

(ii) accordingly suspends Mr Jonathan Sayeed, Member for Mid Bedfordshire, from the service of the House for two weeks.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No.118 (6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

PREVENTION AND SUPPRESSION OF TERRORISM

That the draft Terrorism Act 2000 (Continuance of Part VII) Order 2005, which was laid before this House on 20th January, be approved.—[Gillian Merron.]

Question agreed to.

DRAFT CHILDREN (CONTACT) AND ADOPTION BILL (JOINT COMMITTEE)

Ordered,

That the Lords Message of 2nd February relating to a Joint Committee of both Houses to consider and report on any draft Children (Contact) and Adoption Bill presented to both Houses by a Minister of the Crown, be now considered.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

That this House concurs with the Lords that it is expedient that a Joint Committee of Lords and Commons be appointed to consider and report on any draft Children (Contact) and Adoption Bill presented to both Houses by a Minister of the Crown, and that the Committee should report on the draft Bill by 26th May 2005.

Ordered,

That a Select Committee of six honourable Members be appointed to join with the Committee appointed by the Lords to consider the draft Children (Contact) and Adoption Bill.

That the Committee shall have power—

(i) to send for persons, papers and records;

(ii) to sit notwithstanding any adjournment of the House;

(iii) to report from time to time;

(iv) to appoint specialist advisers;

(v) to adjourn from place to place within the United Kingdom.

That the quorum of the Committee shall be two; and

That Vera Baird, Virginia Bottomley, Mr David Chidgey, Ann Coffey, Jonathan Shaw and Mr Clive Soley be members of the Committee.—[Gillian Merron.]

Tree Protection

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Gillian Merron.]

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): It is a delight—I hope that the Minister agrees—to debate British trees. After all, they have been providing us humans with food, fuel, shelter, building materials, places of recreation and beauty in our landscape for millennia. Indeed, our quality of life is enhanced by the existence of trees, which absorb greenhouse gases that otherwise cause harm to us and our environment. Trees give us shade. They block out noise. They conserve biodiversity, as habitats for numerous animal and plant species. They aid the economy—timber and tourism, with visits to see trees, most immediately come to mind—and in my view, they make us happier.

Hon. Members can see a glorious row of trees close to the House in New Palace Yard. They can see an ancient hawthorn and a rare black poplar in Green park, and they can see the famous Elfin oak in a gilded cage in Kensington gardens. My constituency contains examples of the brilliance of trees—I am sure that those of many hon. Members are the same—and many contexts in which trees are valuable to our history. The Royal Oak public house is in Bishop's Wood in my constituency. Many pubs in the country have that name, but the one in my constituency is within a mile or two of the very oak where it is alleged that Charles II hid after his disastrous defeat at Worcester.

Trees are valuable to our heritage. My constituency contains parts of the wonderful Cannock Chase, which was once a great royal hunting forest but is today owned by the county council. It is a mass of sites of special scientific interest, an area of outstanding natural beauty and a special area of conservation for its heathland. Trees are valuable to our habitats. What a delight it was for me the day that I stood in Shugborough estate, viewing a lime tree that was home to enormous numbers of wasps. I assure the Minister that I watched from a safe distance. Trees are also valuable to housing—something that applies across the country. I refer in particular to urban areas: trees add to the delight of parks, grass verges alongside roads and housing estates.

I want to discuss the polices that we should implement to value and protect all kinds of trees, and the contribution that my hon. Friend the Minister can make in the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs. Let me start with the brilliant reforms that we have had to the common agricultural policy since June 2003. It is great to see that woodland and trees are recognised for the part that they play in farmed landscapes. We have a glorious toolkit: the cross-compliance conditions, the entry level and the high-level schemes for the forest stewardship and woodland grant schemes. For goodness' sake, let us ensure that we use all those schemes to improve the country's trees—for example, by buffering important woodland sites from surrounding intensive land use.

The Department has other tools, such as its biodiversity strategy, which covers the conditions that are set to maintain the condition of SSSIs and the number of agri-environmental schemes to manage land. Another of the Department's tools is the plant diversity challenge, otherwise known as the UK's response to the global strategy for plant conservation. The target for the sustainable management of plant products is relevant to that.

Training, skills and information services are a crucial tool for the Department. I believe that it is possible to fire the public's imagination and inspire people to work, including as volunteers, with trees. From my constituency experiences, I know that there would be a positive public response. When residents living near the ancient Fullmoor wood thought that it was under threat from works proposed by the Forestry Commission, they organised a huge campaign, which included public demonstrations and contact with their Member of Parliament. I praise publicly the response of the Forestry Commission because, through its openness and transparency, it resolved problems and soothed anxieties. It now has a positive partnership with the residents.

I shall cite a further positive example from my constituency. In the run-up to the millennium, all the residents of the village of Derrington got together to plant a millennium wood, which now stands as a fine tribute for centuries to come. It was a delight for me to join the residents one day in planting those trees, which they now tend to attentively.

The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister can make a contribution to all trees. I know that that is not my hon. Friend the Minister's Department, but I am sure that he can assist me. The current system of tree preservation orders is inadequate. There are explicit exceptions to their power. Trees that are dead, dying or dangerous are not protected. The removal of a tree can be authorised by an Act of Parliament—I suppose that the measures on high hedges in the Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003 would provide for that. An existing tree preservation order can be overridden by granting new planning permission for development. On top of all that, there is the obvious exception that a council may give permission to lop a protected tree, or even to cut it down.

In addition to those exceptions, there are obvious weaknesses and loopholes in the system. For example, only a fine can be imposed for breaking a tree preservation order and destroying a valuable tree. During my time as a councillor in Stafford, I knew of a developer who deliberately cut down protected trees and stood the fine because the profit on the houses that he subsequently built was miles greater than the fines.

Tony Cunningham (Workington) (Lab): Last Friday, my office received a phone call from a distraught villager of Clifton, which is just outside Workington, who asked me to make a visit. A large site was completely devastated because a developer had chopped just about every tree in it down. He had not received planning permission from the council and, indeed, the inspector had said that he should not get planning permission because the landscape and the trees, and especially the red squirrels that inhabited the trees, were too important. The developer destroyed all the trees either out of spite, or because he planned to put in a further planning application at a future date. The planning authority says that it is finding it difficult to prosecute the developer because he owned the trees and the land. Surely that example supports my hon. Friend's point.

Mr. Kidney: My hon. Friend is right, and I trust that he works hard to do his best to overcome such problems.

That takes me on to the second aspect of the weaknesses and loopholes in the system. Local authorities do not always enforce existing tree preservation orders. There can be a conundrum about whether accidental damage was caused during development, but local authorities often face other problems. I know from my casework of an allegation that a developer deliberately knocked down trees that were subject to tree preservation orders so that he could make way for houses.

There is a reverse side of the coin when considering tree preservation orders. Let us be fair to the owners of trees that are subject to such orders. I know from my casework about article 5 certificates, which allow local authorities to refuse permission to carry out work on trees, even for safety reasons. An article 5 certificate can be issued on a tree that is subject to an order made before 1999. The certificate absolves them from any responsibility for anything that goes wrong afterwards. That is clearly unfair. I note from my correspondence with the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister that the Government have a long-standing policy of ending that unfairness. I therefore ask the Minister: when will we end that injustice? While we wait to end it, can we not give local authorities guidance requiring them not to rely on article 5 certificates?

I also ask the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister to help local authorities rebuild their expertise in dealing with trees. Several local authorities have lost their ability to employ tree officers, because of previous financial restrictions, and although elected representatives are very willing to do more to help on the subject, they often lack the experience and expertise in officer support to do so.

I want to say something about ancient trees and ancient woodland in particular. It is estimated that the total area of ancient woodland in England is 334,000 hectares. Woodlands have some protection; felling licences are a good example, and there are designations such as SSSIs and special areas of conservation. I like to think that the UK has a special responsibility to look after ancient trees, based on the fact that about 80 per cent. of north Europe's ancient trees are in Britain.

Obviously, tree preservation orders do not protect ancient trees. I say obviously, because one of the exceptions to the order is if the tree is dead, dying or dangerous. Of course lots of ancient trees are dead or dying. There is an anonymous saying that an oak tree grows for 300 years, rests for 300 years and spends 300 years gracefully declining. The very fact that they are elderly and declining requires us to protect them.

I alert the Minister to the sometimes outrageous outcome of calling an old tree dangerous. I should like to give an example with a happy ending. The Redmire oak of North Yorkshire is said to be more than 500 years old. The Methodist preacher John Wesley was said to have preached under it in the 18th century. Despite the support of the parish council, there were increasing health and safety concerns about the tree. Although it is protected by a tree preservation order, the district council thought that it was helpless to save it because it was nearly dead. Yet, with a grant of just £200 from Yorkshire Water, the tree was protected and able to stand and continue to live. It is outrageous that an ancient tree could be lost for want of £200-worth of investment just because we do not have a robust system of protection. I suggest that the tree preservation order, which presently effectively excludes such trees, ought to be changed so that it explicitly protects them—perhaps with the new designation of an historic tree.

Although I was quick to praise the common agricultural policy reforms, I fear that in the case of ancient trees the CAP slightly misses the target. There is a welcome recognition of the value of ancient trees in the good agricultural environmental condition—GAEC—but, as I understand it, that covers felling licences, which relate to woodlands, and tree preservation orders. As I have just explained, tree preservation orders are not helpful to ancient trees. Will the Minister consider whether more needs to be done to ensure that ancient trees are covered by the CAP policy reforms that we have achieved? I accept that it is incredibly important to encourage the planting today of trees that will become the ancient trees of future generations. That is an important area of attention for the money from CAP reforms.

On the issue of planning law and protection for ancient trees, I refer briefly to what is to become planning policy statement 9. We currently have planning policy guidance note 9 on nature conservation, but that is soon to be PPS9 and entitled "Biodiversity and geological conservation".

Paragraph 10 represents a great step forward for ancient trees. It states:

"Aged or veteran trees found outside ancient woodland are also particularly valuable for biodiversity. Planning authorities should encourage the conservation of such trees as part of development proposals."

That is excellent. Paragraph 10 continues:

"Ancient woodland is a valuable biodiversity resource both for the diversity of species and for its longevity as woodland. Once lost it cannot be recreated. Local planning authorities should identify any areas of ancient woodland in their areas that do not have statutory protection (e.g. as an SSSI)."

All of that marks a welcome shift in policy, but it ends with a caveat:

"unless the need for, and benefits of, the development in that location outweigh the loss of the woodland habitat."

Does the Minister accept that there is no need for that caveat? After all, the planning system requires planners to take all material considerations into account when dealing with an application. The point of the paragraph is to protect ancient woods and trees. I hope that my hon. Friend agrees that the caveat should be lost from the final text of PPS9.

At last week's meeting of the all-party group on conservation and wildlife, which I have the privilege to chair, we received a joint presentation from the Woodland Trust and the Ancient Tree Forum, in which there was strong interest among Members of both Houses. They showed us two new website projects. The first, at www.ancient-tree-hunt.org.uk, involves mapping all the ancient trees in the country. The second, at www.woodsunderthreat.info, is excellent: not only does it show any interested member of the public where there are trees and woods under threat from harmful development, but local residents concerned about their ancient trees can mail in information about trees under threat, which can be added to the project. I ask my hon. Friend whether there is any chance of DEFRA joining friends such as the Forestry Commission in funding the projects, which I believe contribute toward meeting the biodiversity strategy indicators and the plant diversity challenge targets by which his Department abides.

At last week's meeting, I was delighted to be able to introduce as one of our speakers the world-famous author Bill Bryson—the Minister will know of his great commitment to Britain and Britain's heritage. He described ancient trees and woods as important markers of our cultural heritage and spoke of the "scandalous" loss of ancient trees and woodland. He also made a comparison with historic buildings, saying that while there is protection for historic buildings, there is certainly no protection for historic trees. I urge the Minister to take action to protect our trees for today's and future generations in the same way as we protect our historic buildings. I believe that that would be an extremely popular cause and that a Minister and a Government who took such positive action would be widely acclaimed.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) on securing a debate on an extremely important subject and on delivering with such passion a speech full of information. It was well worth waiting through the little bit of business of the House to respond to it.

I share my hon. Friend's passion for trees. I spent some of the happiest times of my childhood up trees, and I remain something of a tree hugger. I continue to admire trees, and I strongly endorse everything he said about the contribution that they make to our landscape, our biodiversity and our psychological health, and simply as objects of enormous beauty. This evening, we are thinking particularly of ancient and veteran trees, which provide an extremely important genetic link to the wild wood that covered much of our countryside centuries ago. He acknowledged how fortunate we in this country are by citing a statistic that I was unable to lay my hands on—that 80 per cent. of Europe's ancient woodland is in the UK. That has come about partly for cultural reasons and partly because, by and large, we have done a good job of protecting our wonderful trees.

We have also done quite a lot to encourage new woodland creation through the Forestry Commission's woodland grant scheme and projects such as the national forest and the community forest. Contrary to popular perception, the area of woodland in this country is growing fairly significantly every year. Nevertheless, we must recognise that whenever trees and woodlands are perceived to be under threat, the adequacy of their protection comes into question.

We have in place a wide range of measures to protect our trees. As my hon. Friend mentioned, they include tree preservation orders, which give local authorities wide powers to protect trees and woodlands in the interests of amenity. Work on those trees then requires the consent of the planning authority. I agree with him that the exemptions that he highlighted in the current system, which allow work on dead, dying or dangerous trees, should be tightened up, and not only in relation to veteran trees. I understand that, as he was kind enough to point out, a lot of the responsibility in this area lies with the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, with which we work closely. It has responsibility for tree preservation orders.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): Cross-cutting.

Mr. Bradshaw: Exactly: it is a good example not of cutting trees but of cross-cutting government. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is planning to address the issue as soon as parliamentary time permits. The Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs will certainly continue to press it to do so.

The removal of the exemption allowing work on dying trees would in particular boost the protection of veteran trees, which, as my hon. Friend also pointed out, often contain a significant proportion of dead wood, as they take a long time to die. He also mentioned the felling regulations, which require permission to be sought from the Forestry Commission when a landowner wishes to fell an area of woodland. These applications are carefully considered before a licence is granted. Restocking conditions can be attached to such licences, and in many cases, the new woodland that is established is an improvement in quality on that which it replaces.

As the House will be aware, many of our finest concentrations of veteran trees and ancient woodlands have extra statutory protection through designation as sites of special scientific interest. I am thinking, for example, of the New Forest, Sherwood forest and the trees of Windsor great park. More than a quarter of England's 4,000-plus SSSIs, making up more than 115,000 hectares, have significant woodland conservation interest. Almost three quarters of woodland SSSIs are in favourable condition, which is ahead of the average for all SSSIs. Some of the woodland SSSIs are also special areas of conservation under the habitats directive, which recognises their importance at European level.

Protection and enhancement of veteran trees and ancient woodland is, however, about much more than regulation and statutory designation. It is also about raising awareness—something that is partly helped by debates such as this—of the value of our trees and woodlands among all who can influence their management. That is why projects such as the one to which my hon. Friend referred, the Ancient Tree Forum's ancient tree hunt, is partly funded by the Forestry Commission, which is a member of the DEFRA family, as well as the work of the Woodland Trust to draw attention to the special value of veteran trees and ancient woodland, are to be applauded.

For our part, in 2002 we published the England biodiversity strategy, "Working with the grain of nature", which set out a programme of activity to ensure the integration of biodiversity into policy making and practice. One of the key aims in the strategy is to conserve and enhance the biodiversity of woodlands, and particularly ancient semi-natural woodlands, veteran trees and wood pasture. The woodlands and forestry workstream, which helped to prepare the strategy, is currently undertaking a detailed work plan to tackle important issues such as the protection of woodland from external threats, which my hon. Friend mentioned, conserving and enhancing the biodiversity of native woodland, and the conservation of woodland biodiversity in the wider landscape.

I turn now to one or two of the issues that my hon. Friend raised that are the specific responsibility of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. The new draft guidance in the planning policy statement for biodiversity, PPS9, which he mentioned, makes a big step forward in recognising the biodiversity value of ancient woodland. The draft PPS now requires local authorities to identify ancient woodland of highest biodiversity value that is not already protected by statutory designation. We believe that that identification process will assist local authorities in ensuring that the biodiversity value of such sites is fully considered in decisions on planning proposals. It will also ensure that development affecting ancient woodland is not allowed to go ahead unless any loss or deterioration is clearly outweighed by the need for and benefits of the proposed development.

I give my hon. Friend the assurance that we will not make any decision on the final wording of PPS9 until all responses to the consultation, including those from the Woodland Trust and the Ancient Tree Forum, have been fully considered. We expect to publish a final version of PPS9, together with its accompanying circular and a good practice guide, in mid-2005.

For many years, the Forestry Commission has recognised the value of our ancient woodlands, and it is preparing a new statement on ancient woodland policy. The new statement will confirm our commitment to the protection and enhancement of ancient woodlands and will be backed by new management guidelines for ancient and native woodlands that gives practical advice to woodland managers. The new English woodland grants scheme will provide a framework for the provision of incentives to encourage the management of ancient woodland and the creation of new woodland.

My hon. Friend referred to another way in which we are encouraging the management of individual trees and small groups of trees. DEFRA's new high-level scheme is one of our agri-environment schemes under common agricultural policy reform. It will provide incentives for various works to conserve and manage veteran trees, including pollarding, surgery and protection from encroachment. Although I appreciate my hon. Friend's concerns about designation, because we have such a large proportion of Europe's ancient and veteran trees—far more than any other country—our overall approach is concentrated on some of the very good schemes, rather than the labour and resource-intensive process of cataloguing every single veteran tree in the country. That policy is under constant review and I have heard his representations tonight. For the time being, however, our overall approach to building on our wonderful resource of ancient woodland and veteran trees is best done by building on the existing work, including tree preservation orders, planning policy statements, ancient woodland policy, agri-environmental schemes and woodland grants.

Tony Cunningham: My hon. Friend has mentioned tree preservation orders. I have heard of cases in which councils have received planning applications for 10 houses on a site that contains a tree. When people say, "We need a tree preservation order on that tree," the planning officer says, "That will cost the local authority £50,000 or £60,000, because the developer will say, 'I can only build nine houses rather than 10.'" At that point, councillors say, "That is a lot of money," and the tree is not preserved, although it is under a tree preservation order.

Mr. Bradshaw: My hon. Friend has made a good point—I was going to respond to his earlier point about a particular constituency case. It is extremely important that local authorities take their responsibilities for preserving ancient and important trees seriously. I take the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford about the need for local authorities to re-examine how they resource such work, and I undertake to ensure that the ODPM is aware of the concerns expressed today about how local authorities prioritise such work and the action that they take when developers behave unacceptably.

Rob Marris: Will my hon. Friend say a little more about what the Government are doing to encourage local authorities, particularly in England, to plant native species? We must protect ancient woodlands, but we must also protect native species. In recent years, there has been a trend to replace native species with non-native species, and I urge him to encourage local authorities to plant native species.

Mr. Bradshaw: We already encourage local authorities to plant native species. I am surprised by my hon. Friend's point, because my impression is that we have got the message across in recent years to both local authorities and private woodland owners that the grant schemes administered by my Department have moved towards the planting of native species rather than of non-native species.

The debate has been interesting and important. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford accepts that DEFRA and I take the matter extremely seriously. Forestry in this country has a great future, partly because of the historic reforms of the CAP and partly because of the enormous potential for the production of renewable energy through afforestation.

We all value our ancient and historic trees, but we can always do more, and the package of measures that I have outlined can always be revised and improved to become more effective. As long as I am Minister with responsibility for forestry, I will ensure that we do all that we can to encourage the management of our wonderful trees.

Oral Answers to Questions

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

The Deputy Prime Minister was asked—

Housing (Wales)

1. Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): What discussions he has held with the National Assembly for Wales Government on housing policy. [214868]

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Keith Hill): Ministers and officials in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister liaise with the devolved Welsh Assembly Government at regular intervals. In particular, we held wide-ranging discussions with National Assembly officials in the preparation of our Housing Bill.

Huw Irranca-Davies: I welcome the fact that my right hon. Friend has given that answer. I shall deem him an honorary Welshman for the next few minutes by virtue of his having studied at Aberystwyth university back in 1966.

In housing policy, we often look far afield to try to find solutions, but does my right hon. Friend agree that Wales and England have much to learn from each other and that the innovative use of such things as starter tenancies, community housing mutuals and home buy schemes will provide useful icebreakers in his next chat over a cappuccino with his counterparts in the Welsh Assembly at Cardiff bay?

Keith Hill: Well, Duw, Duw. I am delighted to be named an honorary Welshman by my hon. Friend, and delighted of course with the high level of co-operation between my Department and the Welsh Assembly Government in pursuit of the Labour party's aims of expanding both the supply of homes for social renting and low-cost home ownership for first-time buyers. I welcome in particular the big improvements to homes in my hon. Friend's beautiful Ogmore constituency, resulting from the housing stock transfer in the Bridgend area. Of course, my hon. Friend and I know that in Wales and in England the James review would mean massive cuts in housing investment if the Tories ever got back to power.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend) (Lab): Has my right hon. Friend had an opportunity to look at the green pastures scheme run by Pastor Peter Cunningham in Southport? In The Times yesterday, it was claimed that there were no homeless people in the Southport area because of his scheme. He has bought some houses in Flint in north Wales, so can my right hon. Friend discuss with his counterpart in the Welsh Assembly whether there is something in that scheme? If so, it will certainly make a huge contribution to dealing with homelessness.

Keith Hill: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his question. I did not spot that article in The Times yesterday, because my eye was caught by the front-page report of Labour's massive lead over the Conservatives in the opinion polls. Nevertheless, I undertake to follow up on the matter and find whether, working with the Welsh Assembly Government, benefits could be derived from that scheme.

Social Home Buy

2. Iain Wright (Hartlepool) (Lab): If he will make a statement on social home buy. [214869]

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. John Prescott): Our new home buy scheme will offer more social tenants the choice to own a home. Tenants will be able to buy as little as half their existing home at a discount, with the opportunity to increase their share and become full owners over time. Home buy will put home ownership within the reach of up to 300,000 more social tenants. Unlike right to buy, the social home stays in the public sector and the local authority will be able to invest the full 100 per cent. proceeds in new housing, rather than 25 per cent. under the present right to buy scheme. We will consult on the details of the scheme before Easter.

Iain Wright: I welcome the Deputy Prime Minister's comments because social home buy provides people on low incomes with a real stake in their home and their communities. It provides a great opportunity to regenerate areas of low demand and exclude unscrupulous and profiteering private landlords. Does he agree that the siting of such schemes and homes is vital? I am thinking particularly of previously run-down town centre areas. Social home buy needs to ensure that such areas once again become vibrant places to live and that the doughnut effect of all new homes being located in the suburbs is avoided.

The Deputy Prime Minister: I very much agree with my hon. Friend. Indeed, our policy since 1997 has been to achieve greater growth in towns. Our first job was to reverse the increase in out-of-town shopping, which we have done, and for the first time more retail shopping is now being done in town centres than outside towns. That has brought a new lease of life to the centres of cities and towns. The home buy policy, which is our current housing policy, as well as the brownfield policy and sequential testing have all led to exactly what my hon. Friend wants—the rebirth of towns, for which he is a doughty champion, especially in Hartlepool.

Mrs. Caroline Spelman (Meriden) (Con): At the heart of the Government's plans to solve the housing crisis is the provision of cut-price houses for £60,000 each. The Swedish retail giant, IKEA, has a name for properties of that sort: it calls them Bokloks. Given that the land that they would be built on has already been earmarked for sale by the Chancellor and the definition of "key worker" is at best muddled, does the Deputy Prime Minister agree that the term "Bokloks" just about sums it up?

The Deputy Prime Minister: Once again, the hon. Lady shows her ignorance of what is actually happening. If she had gone to the sustainable development conference, she would have seen the £60,000 house on display. It was a wow at that conference. The industry told me that it could not be built. We not only built it and displayed it at the conference, but it has now gone to Allerton Bywater and will be part of the development of a pit site of houses available at £60,000. It is a reality, and a lot of people who want to buy their homes welcome the fact that we have thought of new ways to provide affordable homes. That contrasts very well with the press report that I have seen in Kent on Sunday that the hon. Lady's first statement on housing arising out of the James review was that she would cancel the plans to build 130,000 new homes in Kent. That kind of message to the people in Kent and the south-east who are desperate for homes shows quite a contrast with what we are trying to do.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): The Deputy Prime Minister knows that the size of the discount for social home buy is crucial in understanding what that policy means and how it will operate, and he is rightly consulting on that. However, will he say now who will pay for the discount? Will it be the housing association or the taxpayer? If it will be the housing association, does he accept that social landlords will end up building fewer affordable homes, when we need more? If it will be the taxpayer, what provision did the Treasury make for that in the spending review?

The Deputy Prime Minister: The financing is the same as we had before. If the housing association pays, it will be compensated by the Housing Corporation, whose funds come from the Government. There are varying amounts of subsidies, as the hon. Gentleman knows. The right to buy subsidy can range up to £40,000, which is the reason why we have lost 1.8 million houses from the public housing sector. The right to acquire subsidy is down to £16,000. As he rightly says, we are consulting on the subsidies involved, but it is important that by allowing people to buy equity in such situations, they can afford the mortgage price, and that is available to about 300,000 more people, whereas if I had extended the right to buy to the right to acquire situation, it would have benefited only 60,000 people. We are giving more choice to more people and meeting their demands.

Lawrie Quinn (Scarborough and Whitby) (Lab): Will the consultation that my right hon. Friend has announced on this welcome policy also allow people who live in rural areas who are equally under pressure in trying to get the first foot on the ladder and very much in need of good social housing to be included in the roll-out of the policy?

The Deputy Prime Minister: Yes, those people certainly will be included. In fact, one of the great difficulties of the previous Administration's policy on rural housing was that they limited it in certain circumstances where they believed that there was a housing crisis. The houses were supposed to be available to people in the local area. The trouble was that the younger people usually did not have the money to buy the houses, which usually went to people who lived in the area who used them for holiday lets. That is not acceptable. The opportunity extends to rural areas, but I go further and call on all local authorities to do the same. Indeed, to be fair, my mate the Mayor of London has just discovered an awful lot of plots of land that he can build on. Local authorities and Government agencies could go round looking for those plots of land and take this opportunity to build good, high-quality houses—by the way, the £60,000 house is up to the highest standards, saving energy and water—and give a real opportunity to people in rural areas.

Dr. Howard Stoate (Dartford) (Lab): My right hon. Friend knows that one of the main issues that affects public sector recruitment in areas just outside London, particularly in Kent Thameside, is the cost of housing there. Will he show how his policies will make more houses available, particularly to those key workers in nursing, teaching and the police whom we so desperately need if we are to continue the regeneration of areas outside London?

The Deputy Prime Minister: Absolutely critical for sustainable communities is, first, that we should not cancel all the houses that are being built, which seems to be the Opposition's policy.

Mr. Edward Davey: It is not the Liberal Democrat Opposition's policy.

The Deputy Prime Minister: I mean the real Opposition.

We will keep to the building programme. The second thing that we would do is to provide the opportunity for key workers to buy using that form of equity. Under the present key worker policy, we pay up to about £100,000 in subsidy to provide a house to maintain a hospital or teacher service. Frankly, that is not the best way to use money. With the equity shares that we are now using or by separating the construction price from the land price and using the Government land that we keep to our advantage, we allow key workers to have a mortgage price that they can afford.

Social Housing (London)

3. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): What plans he has to increase the stock of council and housing association dwellings for rent in London. [214870]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Yvette Cooper): We are investing £1.5 billion over two years to provide more than 21,000 affordable homes in London, of which 10,000 will be social rented, with 7,000 for key workers and 4,000 for low-cost home ownership. London will also share in the additional £430 million of investment in new social rented homes by 2007-08.

Jeremy Corbyn: I welcome any new housing for people in London on low incomes or in desperate housing need. Does the Minister recognise that in inner London, especially, there is an absolute crisis due to the falling supply of council housing because of the right to buy and the small number of housing association properties being built? Many children live in disgracefully overcrowded conditions, but the only alternative that people are given by councils is to go away from London, and thus away from families, jobs and education. Does she realise that there is a crying need to invest in homes for rent for people in desperate housing need so that they can remain in their local communities rather than being forced out by wealthy, upwardly mobile people coming in?

Yvette Cooper: My hon. Friend is right that there is a need for additional investment in social housing in London. That is an extremely important issue, which I why I am surprised that there are only four Conservative Back Benchers in the Chamber for our discussion of it.

My hon. Friend referred to the need to provide affordable housing. We are increasing the rate of new social house building throughout the country by 50 per cent. over the next few years and we will shortly announce what that will mean for London. He is right that we also need to provide assistance for key workers and we are doing that to support our public services.

Mr. Mark Field (Cities of London and Westminster) (Con): Is it not the case that all housing in London is now less accessible and affordable than ever, thanks in no small part to the Labour Government's property taxes? Does the Minister realise that, since 1997, average stamp duty in London has risen from £1,280 to £9,296? What plans does she have to end that blatant discrimination against those who live in our capital city?

Yvette Cooper: I am intrigued that the hon. Gentleman is suddenly worried about housing in London, given that his party wants to cut the housing budget by £1 billion. When we accused the Conservatives of wanting to cut the budget by £400 million, they denied it, but that was because they actually wanted to cut it by £1 billion, as the James review says. The Conservative Front Bench must realise that houses cost money and we must invest in new houses. It would be utter madness to make the cuts that they propose.

Social Housing

4. Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): How many of the affordable rented houses to be built over the next three years will be council houses. [214871]

The Minister for Local and Regional Government (Mr. Nick Raynsford): The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister will be providing 75,000 new social rented homes over the next three years to 2007–08. Of those, we estimate that more than 3,000 will be provided by local authorities.

Bob Russell: I am grateful to the Minister, because the 3,000 council houses that he announced will match the 3,000 that new Labour has built in the past eight years, which is in stark contrast to the 350,000 that the Thatcher Government built over an eight-year period. Bearing in mind the success of the Attlee, Callaghan and Wilson Governments in building hundreds of thousands of family council houses, why is new Labour hostile to council houses through its systems of management, ownership and new build?

Mr. Raynsford: We are not. I am astonished that the hon. Gentleman did not refer to the Government's considerable investment in improving the stock in his area. We have invested £35 million to support the arm's length management organisation in Colchester, which will bring all the council houses in the area up to a decent standard by 2007. He would better serve his constituents if he argued the case for improving the condition of existing homes. He has forgotten that the Government inherited 2 million council homes in poor condition and one of our proudest achievements is bringing 1 million of them up to a decent standard.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend accept that we must not only build more affordable houses, but protect the affordable housing stock? Does he accept that the housing market has changed significantly in the past few years in areas such as Sheffield? As house prices have risen dramatically, more people have tried to rent and more have bought their council houses. The number of right to buys has gone up from about 400 in 1997 to more than 2,000 last year, which has created much longer waiting times. Will he consider extending the discount limits on the right to buy that apply to certain areas of the south to parts of the north in which there are real housing market pressures?

Mr. Raynsford: I had an agreeable visit to Sheffield recently and was delighted to see the impressive progress that is being made in renovating the existing stock and learn about the successful ALMO. I was also told about the opportunities for helping tenants to get an appropriate home through the choice-based letting scheme. My hon. Friend will know that people now want a range of choices and it is right that we should provide for people seeking good quality homes to rent, for those seeking homes to buy and for those seeking equity shares.

On right-to-buy discounts, my hon. Friend knows that the Government have taken steps to ensure that people should be able to acquire a home if they want to with a discount, but we also need to ensure that that is value for money, and that remains our objective.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): I think that the Minister may be able to anticipate my question, which is straightforward. Does he believe that local housing authorities—that is, those that manage council housing, such as Macclesfield borough council, which by the way is debt-free—should be treated on exactly the same basis as registered social landlords? At the moment, they are not. Macclesfield is being forced to transfer its housing stock because the Government will not allow it to retain adequate revenue to keep to the decent housing standard. Will he look at this request, because I believe that council housing is important?

Mr. Raynsford: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that council housing is important, but equally important is ensuring that housing is brought up to a reasonable standard. That is why we have required all housing authorities to carry out an option appraisal to look at the best way of ensuring that their housing is brought up to the decent homes standard in a reasonable period. I should have thought that he, like other Members, would want to support proposals that would achieve the decent homes standard in the quickest way, whether that is through retention by the local authority or a stock transfer to a registered social landlord. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is far too much noise in the Chamber.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): My right hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning recently visited North Wingfield in my constituency, in connection with its pathfinder scheme, which hopefully is making progress. Would one of the Ministers on the Front Bench like to revisit North-East Derbyshire? There is a place called Clay Cross, which has a great deal of experience of council housing and we would really like to get into detail with Ministers about the future of council housing and the role it should play in Government policy.

Mr. Raynsford: I apologise for the fact that my hon. Friend is getting an answer from me rather than from my right hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning, but I paid a visit to Derbyshire early in the lifetime of this Government and saw the terrible consequences of the dereliction by the previous Government, particularly in a number of former mining areas which had been abandoned and were disgracefully run-down. This Government have been investing not just in improving the quality of housing but in regenerating many of those former mining areas, including north Derbyshire, and I am proud of the record of trying to improve the conditions and prospects for people in such areas.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): If this Government's housing policy was not so tragic it would be funny. It combines dictating where people should live with the provision of low-value prefabs, like a mixture of Chairman Mao and Maplin's holiday camp. But what is not funny is that the Government are building half as many social houses as the last Conservative Government did and, under Labour, 100,000 people are stuck in temporary accommodation. Does the Minister understand that his Government's failure to build social housing deprives desperate people of the homes that they long for and that their only hope is his and his colleagues' swift and enforced return to the Opposition Benches?

Mr. Raynsford: What a risible contribution from a party with a disgraceful housing record and a current policy of cutting £1 billion out of housing investment while pretending that it can somehow offer more, even though it opposes the Government's actions to ensure that housing needs are met and has done nothing to support the improvement of the appallingly substandard council housing that it left as our inheritance. The Conservatives would serve the country better by a period of silence on this subject.

Asset Inequality

5. Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): What effect he expects the five-year plan will have on the level of asset inequality. [214872]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Phil Hope): Our five-year plans will help to reduce asset inequality by offering more choice and fairness in housing, including new proposals to allow thousands of tenants to buy a share in their home, by recycling public assets, by tackling disadvantage and by promoting more prosperous regions.

Dr. Iddon: Has my hon. Friend seen the Shelter report "Know your place" on housing wealth and inequality? Is he as concerned as I am that, if action is not taken urgently, in 30 years' time the 10 per cent. of children in Britain's wealthiest areas will be in families that own more than 100 times the housing wealth of the 10 per cent. of children born in the poorest areas of the UK?

Phil Hope: My hon. Friend is right to highlight those inequalities in assets, which is why the five-year plan published by my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister is called "Sustainable Communities: Homes for All". It contains new measures to help first-time buyers on to the housing ladder and to extend home buying so that council tenants and tenants of social landlords—up to 300,000 people—have an equity share in their own home. Those are radical proposals to redistribute the assets of this country to help the poorest the most, unlike the policies of the Conservatives, whose £1 billion cut in housing would deprive those poor communities of the housing that they desperately need.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson (Coventry, North-West) (Lab): Is the Minister aware that the Shelter report shows that home ownership—for those who have been able to do it—is a major factor in the growing inequality in this country? Is he also aware that his policies for social buy and affordable housing are welcome in Coventry, where I can assure him and his policies of a warm welcome and a total rejection of the Conservatives' proposed cuts of £1 billion?

Phil Hope: My hon. Friend is right. It is important that 100 per cent. of the proceeds of the sale of the new assets is reinvested in housing. Home buy will help social landlords to deliver new social homes for homeless households and others in priority need of housing. I am delighted that things are going so well in Coventry. I just hope that its people remember that when it comes to making a choice in a few months' time.

Housing Market (East Lancashire)

6. Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): What assessment he has made of the progress made by Elevate, the housing market renewal pathfinder in east Lancashire. [214874]

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. John Prescott): Elevate has made a good start in dealing with the long-term problems of low housing demand in my hon.

Friend's constituency and across east Lancashire. We have allocated £68 million to Elevate for the period up to March 2006 and I expect the levels of both public and private investment to increase in future years. This investment is in addition to the extra funding we are already making available to east Lancashire through our decent homes and neighbourhood renewal programmes.

Mr. Prentice: That is good news, but surely one of the great ironies is that house prices drift up as speculators move in and buy up properties, hoping to make a killing. I know that we live in a nasty, capitalist world, but is there anything we can do about that?

The Deputy Prime Minister: My hon. Friend makes a serious point, bearing it in mind that houses could be bought in his area, and, indeed, in Oldham when I visited it recently, for £1,500. That is a collapse of the housing market and many houses are empty. If we are to make those communities decent and sustainable, some houses will have to be knocked down because they are unfit to live in and other areas will have to be improved, with green space provided. We are trying to create sustainable communities in which people are proud to live. One of the consequential effects of that is that house prices will rise from under £1,500.

Student Housing

7. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak) (Lab): What problems he has identified in communities where a large proportion of residential property is occupied by students. [214875]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Yvette Cooper): The Government are funding a study to look at the impact on local communities of an expanding student population resident in the area. It will report this spring.

Lynne Jones: Students bring vitality to an area and attract new business, but I am glad that the Government are beginning to recognise the difficulties that arise from a transient population. Will my hon. Friend introduce planning measures such as those being implemented in Northern Ireland to control the density of houses in multiple occupation, especially small HMOs, which are the norm in Selly Oak, and ensure that those areas get their share of neighbourhood renewal and other funding to recognise their special needs, which are not included in the normal indices of deprivation?

Yvette Cooper: My hon. Friend is right that there can be pressures in areas with high student populations. We recognise that. She will also know that it is difficult to address the problem through national planning rules because the pressures that arise are often local. She may be interested to look at the work being done in Leeds, which is attempting to find ways to address concerns about these issues. We will be watching its progress.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [214853] Ross Cranston (Dudley, North) (Lab): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 9 February.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall have further such meetings later today.

Ross Cranston: I want to ask my right hon. Friend about identity cards. All the evidence on the doorstep and on the phone in Dudley, North is that more than 80 per cent. of people support ID cards. Obviously, they do not want a "Show me your papers, please" society, and that is not what is being proposed. The one issue raised with me is cost, in particular to the less well-off. May I ask for an assurance that the cost of ID cards will not be disproportionate for the less well-off?

The Prime Minister: The point that my hon. and learned Friend makes is right. It is important to realise that the cost of going to biometric passports, which we should do because other parts of the world are doing so, will be about £70. The additional cost of the ID card is only about £15. That is why it represents a sensible way of proceeding. In our view, identity cards, with the new technology that is available, are necessary in the fight against illegal immigration, organised crime and terrorism, and in order to protect our services. Their introduction is the right thing to do and I hope that, rather than facing both ways, all the Opposition parties will support us on that proposition tomorrow.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): Last week the National Audit Office said that the Government had spent nearly £900 million on improving behaviour in schools and reducing truancy, but as we know, behaviour in schools has not improved and truancy has increased. Was the money well spent?

The Prime Minister: The amount of money that was spent on truancy specifically was a tiny proportion of the £860 million. Let me explain how it was spent. The vast bulk of it was spent on pupil referral units, in order to educate pupils excluded from schools. When we came to office, there were only 7,000 such places, many of them for only a couple of hours a week. There are now 13,000 such places and those pupils get full-time education. Yes, that money is well spent.

Mr. Howard: But large numbers of children still do not spend all the school day in pupil referral units, as the Prime Minister well knows. Last week we had an Ofsted report saying that nearly one in 10 secondary schools have unsatisfactory levels of behaviour, and the number of schools where behaviour is unsatisfactory shows no sign of reducing, so the money is clearly not well spent.

Let me ask the Prime Minister about something else. This week the Public Accounts Committee said that £500 million could have been saved if the Government had managed the surge in asylum applications in 1999 and 2000 more efficiently. Was the PAC right?

The Prime Minister: First, I should like to go back and answer the right hon. and learned Gentleman's question about truancy. He cited the Ofsted report. Let me give the quotation in full:

"Parents in England can and should take heart at the considerable improvements in our education system over recent years. We have made a move from a system that educated a few superbly and the rest indifferently to one that is attempting to educate everyone very well"— the difference between Tory and Labour policy.

As for the report on asylum, the allegation is that instead of spending the money on removals we should have front-loaded it to deal with applications. We believe, however, that increasing the proportion of removals is also a very important way of getting asylum applications down, which is why we do not agree with the report. The difference between this Government and the administration over which the right hon. and learned Gentleman personally presided is that in 1996 about 5,000 asylum seekers were removed and in 2003 it was 18,000—not good enough, but a darned sight better. Before people talk about the numbers, let me also tell him that the latest asylum figures indicate that when he was Home Secretary applications went up 50 per cent. and the numbers were roughly what they are today.

Mr. Howard: If there are fewer asylum seekers, obviously fewer will be removed. It is no use the Prime Minister trying to throw back to the past. The permanent secretary at the Home Office said:

"The truth of the matter is that we got into real difficulties at the end of 1999."

Now let us get back to the billions of pounds of taxpayers' money that this Government have wasted. Two weeks ago, the independent Institute for Fiscal Studies said that taxes would have to increase by £11 billion if there were another Labour Government. Yesterday, the Prime Minister said that he would not put up the top rate of income tax. Will he give the same pledge on national insurance contributions?

The Prime Minister: First, I want to return to the point that the right hon. and learned Gentleman made—[Interruption.] Oh yes, just to pin him down exactly. He was saying that the proportion of people removed to the numbers of asylum seekers was the same. Wrong. Actually, he only ever managed to remove about two in 10 failed asylum seekers. The figure is now five out of 10—yes, a long way to go, but a lot better than his system.

Secondly, no. We will make our commitments on tax plain at the time of the manifesto, as we have done before. While we are talking about waste, though, let me tell the right hon. and learned Gentleman about waste that this Government have never incurred—the waste on the poll tax, the Black Wednesday waste, and the waste of 3 million unemployed when he was Employment Secretary. Yes, we never engaged in that waste, and we never will.

Mr. Howard: It is no use the Prime Minister talking about keeping his tax pledges for the manifesto, because he gave one yesterday, and everyone now knows that yesterday he gave a pledge on the top rate of income tax and today he has refused to give a pledge on national insurance contributions. So billions of pounds have been wasted, taxpayers are not getting value for money, and everyone knows that taxes would go up under another Labour Government. Is it not now clear which tax it would be?

The Prime Minister: I will tell the House what is clear. There was one party that gave a pledge that it would not put VAT on fuel—a specific election pledge—and the right hon. and learned Gentleman and his party voted for it, and if it had not been defeated in the House of Commons that would have hurt pensioners and some of the poorest people in our country.

I will tell the right hon. and learned Gentleman exactly why we have been able to sustain a strong economy and put money into public services, and I do not accept that this money is wasted. When we have money going into extra teachers and nurses and better equipment in schools and hospitals, that money is not wasted. When waiting lists are not up by 400,000 but down by 300,000, that is not money wasted. When we have 2 million extra jobs and 1 million helped by the new deal, that is not money wasted. When we have the lowest inflation, mortgage rates and unemployment for decades, that is a successful economic policy, not the boom and bust that people remember.

Barbara Follett (Stevenage) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend join me in commending the bravery of two young firefighters, Michael Miller and Jeffrey Wornham, who lost their lives in Stevenage last Wednesday trying to rescue a resident from a blazing block of flats? Will he also join me in extending condolences to the families of all those who lost their lives in this tragedy?

The Prime Minister: I entirely concur with the sentiments expressed by my hon. Friend, and I am sure that the whole House will want to join in paying tribute to the two firefighters killed tackling a fire in her constituency last Wednesday. They died doing an extraordinary and heroic job, and I know that we will all wish to send our sympathy and condolences to their families.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Inverness, West) (LD): The Prime Minister asserted again a few moments ago that he saw identity cards as essential in the fight against terrorism, but given that identity cards did not prevent the Madrid bombings; that the 9/11 bombers travelled under their own identities; that they will not be compulsory in this country for 10 years; and that visitors to this country will not require them, how will they make such a difference to the fight against terrorism?

The Prime Minister: The reason why this measure is supported not only by the Government but by the police and the security services is that people believe that, particularly when we have biometric passports and the biometric technology available, we can construct an identity card that gives us the best possible protection against crime and terrorism. No system will prevent all crime and all terrorism: the question is whether it actually enhances the security of our country. When this technology is available, and when we are going to apply it in any event to visas and passports, it seems to me to make sense to use it to give us an identity card and bring us in line, frankly, with best practice around the world.

Mr. Kennedy: But the Prime Minister must recognise that 10 million people in this country, many of them pensioners, do not possess a passport and do not have the intention or the need to get one in future. Under his proposals, those 10 million will be required to travel distances to centres to have the tests carried out, and then to pay for the privilege. That is a further reason why we will oppose identity cards tomorrow, as we have before—unlike some others.

The Prime Minister: It is for that very reason that we have said that the Identity Cards Bill is enabling legislation. We have always made it clear, under pressure from all quarters in the House, that before there is a final move to compulsion, there will be a rigorous evaluation and a chance for this House to debate it again, but the Bill allows us to get this project under way. I believe that many people now recognise, particularly, as I say, with the possibilities of the new technology, that we can genuinely make a difference to our own security, to the fight against crime, and to the protection of our public services. In the world in which we live, where there are people who will cross borders to a far greater degree than ever before, and organised crime and terrorism are far more sophisticated than ever before, I do not think it is wrong or a breach of anyone's civil liberties to say that we should have an identity card. Most people carry some form of identification anyway. I think it is long overdue, and we should get on and do it.

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend accept an invitation to visit the Rutherford Appleton laboratory in my constituency to see the new Diamond synchrotron, which is nearing completion there? It is the biggest single investment in the history of British science, made by this Government, and it is a very apt symbol of the commitment that this Government—and the Chancellor and the Prime Minister—have made to the future of British science.

The Prime Minister: I thank my hon. Friend for that question. The synchrotron is a very important innovation indeed, and I can assure him that the increase in the science budget, which is a vital part of this country's future prosperity and competitiveness, will be maintained under this Government.

Q2. [214854] Mr. Richard Bacon (South Norfolk) (Con): The former Home Secretary said that there is no obvious upper limit to immigration, and the current Home Secretary agrees. What does the Prime Minister think?

The Prime Minister: As I have said on many occasions, I do not believe in the quota system that would be applied by the Conservatives. We should have a system whereby we welcome in people who are genuine refugees and people whom our economy needs to work here, and whereby we tackle and weed out the abuses. That is far more sensible than the arbitrary quota system that the hon. Gentleman supports, although he cannot actually tell us what the number is.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): Will the Prime Minister take this opportunity to assure the House and the rest of the world that he intends to continue an engagement with Iran, rather than joining in any American-led military attack or military threat towards Iran, either in the near future or the distant future?

The Prime Minister: We are pursuing the policy of engagement, which we have conducted with France and Germany, and indeed with the United States' full support. I have to say to my hon. Friend that it is important also to make it clear to Iran—I hope this is a message that he will join in sending to the Iranian Government—that it cannot breach the rules of the International Atomic Energy Agency and cannot develop nuclear weapons capability. That is the very clear wish of the entire international community. I happen to believe, however, that it can be pursued by diplomatic means of engagement.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): Under the proposals that the Home Secretary announced on Monday, will net immigration rise or fall?

The Prime Minister: The abusers will be weeded out, and as a result of the end of chain migration, the numbers will probably fall, because it will be clear that those who come in either abusing the system or without being covered by the restrictions that the Home Secretary is placing on them cannot settle here. The right hon. and learned Gentleman's proposals for a fantasy island for asylum seekers—again, it might be nice to know where it is—and literally halving the immigration service budget will simply make the problem worse.

Mr. Howard: I am interested that the Prime Minister has again raised overseas processing centres. I have a letter from him to the President of the European Council. It reads:

"Dear Costas,

I am writing to ask for a very short discussion at the Brussels European Council . . . of an idea we have been developing . . . asylum seekers arriving in the UK and other EU member states could be transferred to a transit processing centre where their claims would be assessed . . . The centre would be located outside the EU."

So the Prime Minister is interested in overseas processing centres, too. The difference between us is that he will do it only with the EU, and we will do it on our own; and he is all talk, and we will take action. Is not the difference between us the fact that we will impose an annual limit on immigration and he refuses to do that, so that only a Conservative Government can be relied on to bring immigration under control?

The Prime Minister: First, the letter to which he refers was publicised at the time. Let me point out the two important differences. The vast majority of people claiming asylum do so now not at port but in country. They could never be covered by any processing centre. In any event, neither all the other countries in the European Union nor the United Nations could agree on a way forward. I therefore ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman: which country is prepared to take Britain's asylum claims and process them? There is no such country. That is why, for the four years when he was Home Secretary and asylum claims rose by 50 per cent. and applications took 20 months to handle, he never did any of that. If it was such a good idea, why did not he do it?

Sir Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton) (Lab): Since my right hon. Friend has stated that bringing about peace between the Palestinians and the Israelis is his top international priority, will he take encouragement from the developments that reflect his determination and pressure? Will he also ensure that there is no backsliding by any of the parties involved? Since he has spoken of it as a priority of his premiership, may I congratulate him on breaking the record of my old boss, Harold Wilson, for length of service as Labour premier?

The Prime Minister: I thank my right hon. Friend for that. The middle east peace process is at an important juncture and I hope that it will be possible to make progress. Yesterday's meeting was of historic importance, but it is important that we do everything that we can to build on it. I greatly hope that the conference that we shall call and hold in London in early March allows us to give the Palestinians the plan that they need, so that when Israeli disengagement from Gaza and parts of the west bank happens, they have what they need in terms of the beginnings of an independent viable state. Only if that can be agreed have we any chance of reaching the solution that I think everyone wants: two states, with a secure Israel and an independent Palestinian state, living side by side in peace.

Q3. [214855] Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): Does the Prime Minister recognise the authorship of the following promise, made just before the 1997 election?

"The party I lead will carry out in government the programme we provide in our Manifesto beforehand. Nothing more, nothing less, that is my word."

Does he recall that that immediately followed a firm commitment to direct elections to the House of Lords and a firm commitment to a referendum on a fairer electoral system for the House of Commons? Which of those two broken promises does he now most regret?

The Prime Minister: As I recall, we set up a commission under Lord Jenkins that gave us various options for electoral reform. In respect of the House of Lords, I have come to the conclusion that the only way we are ever going to get House of Lords change is if there is an agreement in this House on a free vote. The fact is that there are different views right round the House on the best way to reform the House of Lords, but I think that that is the more sensible way through.

Mr. Iain Luke (Dundee, East) (Lab): I welcome the decision by the Ministry of Defence to increase the death in service payment from April this year by four times the pay level of the deceased. Will the Prime Minister consider backdating the payment to the time of the outset of hostilities in Iraq, so that the families of the servicemen who have given their lives in the supreme sacrifice for their country will get the benefit of that payment?

The Prime Minister: Once again, let me pay tribute to the work that our servicemen and servicewomen have done in Iraq. It has been quite superb. I said yesterday to the Liaison Committee that a discussion now has to take place in Government. We are reviewing the compensation payment arrangements and I hope that we can make an announcement on that shortly.

Q4. [214856] Mr. Adrian Sanders (Torbay) (LD): Since the privatisation of the water industry, 30 per cent. of the nation's coastline has to be cleaned up by 3 per cent. of the nation's population. Consequently, water bills are disproportionately high in the south-west region, and they are going to increase. Will the Prime Minister meet a delegation of south-west Members to look at ways of mitigating the impact of the nation's highest water charges on some of the lowest-income households in the UK?

The Prime Minister: I am always content to meet people to talk about issues such as these. Of course, this is a question of balancing the amount of money that has been put into the water industry and the investment that is there, with the necessary quality controls. I am not saying that the situation that the hon. Gentleman described does not exist or cause concern in the south-west—I know that it does. On the other hand, it has caused concern for a considerable period. The difficulty is that this will, in the end, be a question of finance, and of ensuring that we did not disadvantage another part of the country, were we to change the system.

Q5. [214857] Mr. Stephen Pound (Ealing, North) (Lab): May I tell the Prime Minister that there has never been a better time to be a school pupil in Ealing, North? The 18 years of leaking roofs and cold comfort in the classroom have been banished by a massive schools programme. However, we have concerns for the future of the excellent excellence in cities initiative. What can the Prime Minister say to reassure me and Paul Patrick, the headmaster of Cardinal Wiseman high school, who has instructed me to appear in his study after assembly on Friday?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend and I should probably hope that such instructions and their consequences have changed since we were at school. The point that he makes about investment in our schools and classrooms is absolutely right: it has been of tremendous importance. We have only to go to a school in any constituency to see the investment that has gone in. The excellence in cities programme has also driven up results significantly, and it is important to recognise that we now have the best ever primary school results, the best ever GCSE results and the best ever A-level results. These are certified by the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority. It is also important to recognise that every single penny piece of the additional investment was opposed by the Conservatives.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): Is the Prime Minister aware that, at about the same time as he came to office, the Norwegian Government decided to devote a portion of their oil and gas revenues to a fund for future generations? That fund is now worth £80 billion—the income from it is greater than the Norwegian oil and gas revenues—and it stands as a permanent legacy for the people of Norway. We know that BP, Shell and the Chancellor of the Exchequer are doing very well out of oil revenues this year, to the tune of billions of pounds, but what permanent legacy for the people of Scotland from the oil and gas round their coastline can the Prime Minister point to?

The Prime Minister: Surely what is relevant is a legacy of stable economies with low mortgages, low inflation, low unemployment, many more jobs and record investment in Scotland. None of that would have been achieved without this Government's actions. The worst thing that could possibly happen to Scotland is the separatism advocated by the hon. Gentleman, which would do immense damage to Scottish jobs, Scottish business and the Scottish economy.

Q6. [214858] Mr. Nigel Beard (Bexleyheath and Crayford) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating the Metropolitan police in Bexley on becoming one of the two safest London boroughs over the past 12 months? Residential burglary and motor vehicle crime are down by 18 per cent. and the number of special constables recruited is higher there than in the rest of London put together. Will he also—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is just a question, not an Adjournment debate.

The Prime Minister: First, I offer my hon. Friend a word of congratulation to the police, community support officers and the communities themselves on the work that they are doing. The increase in police numbers, backed up by community support officers and neighbourhood wardens, is making a difference to community policing in many parts of the country. That, combined with new laws on antisocial behaviour, is giving communities a chance to fight back for the first time. Those communities have to use the powers and extra investment, and as his constituency shows, many are doing precisely that, and to great effect, for their local communities.

Q7. [214859] Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): The Extradition Act 2003 allows UK nationals to be removed to the US without prima facie evidence and without reciprocity. If extradited, the so-called Bermingham three and my constituent, Mr. Giles Derby, being non-Americans, face little prospect of bail under US law. That means that they will have to spend many months in a Texas jail before they are finally brought to trial. Is it not about time that we stopped acting as America's poodle and revisited our unbalanced and unfair extradition arrangements with the US?

The Prime Minister: The modern Conservative party never ceases to amaze me. First, the extradition agreement that we entered into with the United States was, of course, post-11 September, and I happen to think that it was justified and right. Secondly, as for talk about our being America's poodle, I think that it is time we recognised that the American or transatlantic alliance has served this country well. We should support it, and hon. Members who have some sense of this country's history and future should stop denigrating it and start supporting it.

Q8. [214860] Mr. Parmjit Dhanda (Gloucester) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is unfair for only people like myself with a Sikh background and those from the Jewish faith to receive protection by law from abuses of religious hatred? Does he further agree that we should do whatever is in our power to ensure that all religious faiths, including the thousands of Christians and Muslims in my constituency, receive similar protection? Does he also agree that both sides of the House should support that legislation?

The Prime Minister: I hope people do. It is an anomaly when faith groups associated with a single race are protected from incitement to hatred, but multi-ethnic faith groups are not. The legislation was requested by key leaders in all the major faith communities and it has to be said that it prohibits the stirring up and the incitement of religious hatred. Prosecutions will have to be brought, of course, through the Crown Prosecution Service, with the Attorney-General's consent. I really think that the idea that it will interfere with comedy and the normal run of things as part of our way of life is absurd. The fact of the matter is that incitement to racial hatred has ended up with none of those problems. Incitement to religious hatred represents a change to the law that is long overdue. It makes the law fair. I hope that we can give sufficient assurances, as the Bill passes through the House of Commons, so that people realise that there is no intention to curb proper freedom of speech, but there is an intention to ensure that all parts of our community are treated fairly.

Q9. [214861] Mr. Archie Norman (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): Does the Prime Minister recall, prior to the 1997 election, making a pledge to do something about the anomaly of prescription charges for cystic fibrosis sufferers? Does he remember reiterating his support in the House both in 1999 and in 2001, and does he realise that many thousands of sufferers spend their entire lives struggling to live on expensive medicine? It was his words that gave them hope, and delivery is now a matter of trust.

The Prime Minister: I understand the suffering that people go through and the need for extra help for them. We are helping in different ways, through the extra investment going into the NHS. We must ensure that, whatever we do for one group of sufferers, we can justify in respect of other groups as well. That is the reason for the delay and hesitation, but we continue to keep the matter under review. I shall be happy to write to the hon. Gentleman on this subject, but I assure him that we have put a lot more help into treating the sufferers of cystic fibrosis.

Q10. [214862] Clive Efford (Eltham) (Lab): The single regeneration budget money that has been invested in my constituency has allowed a flexibility in funding to meet the needs and aspirations of my local community. Sadly, however, many of the initiatives that have come from the local community face an uncertain future because SRB funding will come to an end in the next two years. Will my right hon. Friend investigate how we can provide some sustainability for those initiatives in the future?

The Prime Minister: The point that my hon. Friend makes is absolutely right, and it is why we are looking at ways of sustaining that investment. However, it is worth pointing out that the SRB and the money going into the regeneration of local communities are having a tremendous impact. That is exactly why the point that he raises is something that the Government are looking at. I hope that we can find ways of ensuring that we protect as far as possible the money that is going into local communities and doing such a fantastic job for them.

NHS Funding

The Secretary of State for Health (Dr. John Reid): With permission Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement about allocations to primary care trusts in the national health service in England.

I am today allocating revenue resources to England's 303 PCTs for the financial years 2006–07 and 2007–08. PCTs have already been informed of their allocation for 2005–06, so they will now be able to plan for the medium term, knowing with certainty their allocation up to March 2008. I have written to all hon. Members with details of the allocations to the PCTs that serve their constituencies.

This Government believe in the NHS. We believe in its founding principle that there should be equity of access, free at the point of need, for everyone. Furthermore, we believe that the NHS can be reformed and transformed as well as improved, so that health care can be delivered to the standards of, and in a way expected by, today's public. That is why in 2002 the Government outlined our plans for an unparalleled increase in expenditure in the NHS over the five years from 2003–04 to 2007–08.

Today, I can tell the House that I am allocating more resources to the NHS front-line services than have ever been allocated before—£64 billion in 2006–07 and £70 billion in 2007–08. That contrasts with £45 billion only four years ago. That means that PCT allocations will grow in 2006–07 by no less than 9.2 per cent., and in 2007–08 by 9.4 per cent. On average, PCTs will have, compounded, 19.5 per cent. more resources in 2007–08 than in 2005–06. The increases between 2003–04 and 2007–08 represent a faster growth in resource allocation than ever before in the history of our NHS.

The distribution of those resources has had regard to four main principles under this Labour Government. The first is that the increase will allow the NHS to take significant strides in improving access to health services for everyone throughout the country. Secondly, places with greater need will receive an even greater allocation of resources. Thirdly, for the first time, this allocation will allow significant resources to be used for the prevention of ill health and for health improvement. Finally, there will be a floor to the allocation to each primary care trust today. No primary care trust will receive an increase in funding over the two years of less than 16.8 per cent. Not one primary care trust in England will receive less than a 16.8 per cent. increase over the two years.

For the five years between 2002–03 and 2007–08, allocations to primary care trusts will increase by more than 56 per cent. In terms of real people, by 2007–08, £1,388 will be allocated per head, compared with £907 in 2002–03—an increase of 53 per cent. in allocated resources for every single man, woman and child in England. We have done more than just increase our investment; we have made the distribution of resources more fair than ever before.

A key factor in distributing funding fairly is the count of the number of people served by each primary care trust. Since the last allocation round, the population data based on the 2001 census has been revised, so we now have a more accurate population count. In addition, the allocations that I am announcing today include projected increases in populations. That means that we are properly taking account of the challenges faced in areas of rapidly increasing populations.

If allocations are to be fair, they must also be based on need. Following advice from the independent Advisory Committee on Resource Allocation, I am making some improvements to the formula to provide the same access to health care where there is the same need, and to support the reduction in health inequalities. I have also changed the way in which funding for primary medical services is distributed to make that fairer. For the first time, the majority of funding for GP services will be allocated according to the relative need for primary care services. The formula that we are using reflects the most up-to-date and best measures of differences in need for those services. The House will be glad to hear—many hon. Members have made representations to me—that I have also tackled the unfairness inherent in some areas being significantly under target in terms of the previous resource allocation.

Following the introduction of the new formula in 2002, we realised that, despite progress, some areas were still not receiving their fair share of funding. At that time, some areas were more than 22 per cent. below their fair share. We made some progress in reducing that unfairness in the previous allocation round, but despite that, in 2005–06 some primary care trusts are more than 5 per cent. or 10 per cent., and in one case more than 15 per cent., beneath their fair share. Such a disparity is unfair and unacceptable, so I have decided in the 2006–07 and 2007–08 allocations to accelerate progress towards a fair-share distribution. To reach that outcome, primary care trusts at the greatest distance beneath their fair share will receive more than those who were already receiving their fair share or more.

With the allocations that I am announcing today, based on need and fairness, by 2007–08, no primary care trust in England will be 15, 10 or even 5 per cent. below target. Indeed, I am able to tell the House that under today's allocation no primary care trust will be more than 3.5 per cent. away from their optimum fair share of the allocation. That is as substantial a move as I can make commensurate with the stability of the whole system.

Our general approach, therefore, has been to balance a significant and substantial increase in resources for every area, and for the PCTs of every Member throughout the House, with an even greater improvement in funding where there is greater need. No primary care trust in England—north, south, east or west—will receive an average increase of less than 8.1 per cent. Over the two years, that is an average increase of 19.5 per cent. for every one in England. That will ensure that all parts of the country will receive sufficient funding to see considerable further improvements in their health services.

At the same time as providing a 19.5 per cent. average and an 8.1 per cent. a year minimum, the funding formula rightly moves more funding to where it is most needed. I have already identified 88 primary care trusts as those that need the most urgent action. Since those are the most needy areas, they will receive a higher level of funding than other areas. By 2007–08, the funding per person in a spearhead primary care trust will be £1,552, compared with a national average of £1,388.

I can also tell the House, however, that by 2007–08, as a result of the fairer distribution, the 5 per cent. most needy areas and those facing the greatest need for funding, in both the north and the south of the country, will receive an average of £1,710 per person. The 5 per cent. most well-off areas with less need for funding will receive an average of around £1,190. That means that I am putting additional funding where it is needed to reduce health inequalities. That should help to ensure that by 2010 there will be a 10 per cent. reduction in health inequalities, as measured by infant mortality and life expectancy at birth. We will also see further reductions in killer diseases. We have already reduced premature deaths from heart-related disease and from cancer by 27 per cent. and 12 per cent. respectively in the past six years. By 2010, there will be a fall of at least 40 per cent., from 1997 figures, in death rates from heart disease and stroke, and a 20 per cent. fall in death rates from cancer.

We also want to improve the experience throughout the NHS for all patients. By the end of 2008, for their planned hospital care, as a result of these allocations, all patients will be able to choose between a range of providers, including NHS foundation trusts and NHS and independent sector treatment centres. And because the investment announced today will be matched by the reform in working practices undertaken by staff, patients will be admitted for treatment in England within a maximum of 18 weeks from their first appointment with their GP to the door of the operating theatre, with no hidden waits. Having halved waiting times, we will halve them again and halve them once more for patients in England.

In addition, we can move away from treating illness and towards preventing it and encouraging health improvement. These resources will also allow us to make progress on prevention towards the original vision of the NHS as a true health service, rather than just a sickness service. Today's allocations include public health funding of £211 million in 2006–07 and £342 million in 2007–08 to help make that happen. All areas will receive their share of this funding, but again, a higher proportion will go to the most deprived areas, including the spearhead PCTs.

Of course, this is not all the funding available to deliver the health improvement agenda, but it is a significant proportion of it. It is being allocated directly to front-line PCTs to allow them to implement key initiatives such as improved school health and improved sexual health services. For example, we are providing funding so that by 2010, every PCT in England will be resourced to have at least one full-time, year-round qualified school nurse working with each cluster or group of primary schools and related secondary schools. And not before time.

Our public services must respond to what the public want by giving quality care at the public's convenience. Under this Government, the NHS's founding principles will remain firmly in place and will be enhanced by today's investment, thus giving equal access free at the point of need. But the way in which the services are organised is being transformed, giving patients a more convenient, personalised and responsive service within a system that is not only fair to all, but personal to each of us. That is a key aim for today's NHS.

The biggest ever investment in our national health service, the fairest ever distribution of resources and a massive programme of continued reform by staff will together give the increased capacity and diversity of provision that will offer patients faster access to better quality health services than ever before, all free at the point of need under a Labour Government. All those improvements are opposed by the Conservatives, who plan to divert money away from the NHS and to introduce for the first time into NHS commissioning charges for operations. Let the people make the comparison between the two offers and let them make their choice. I commend the statement to the House.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): I am of course grateful to the Secretary of State for advance sight—a typically generous 30 minutes—of the statement. It consisted of 25 paragraphs but he could have said it in one, because in fact, there is no extra money when compared with known planned NHS expenditure through to 2007–08. This is simply an attempt by the Secretary of State to divide the cake differently and—surprise, surprise—there is an election coming, so we are to have "spearhead" primary care trusts. [Interruption.] I wonder whether those trusts are located in the Labour-held seats that the Government are worried about.

One pity—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have said it before and I will say it again: Members who shout are damaging only themselves, because I shall simply say that the Minister has delivered his statement and that the Opposition have responded. Those Members who want to ask supplementaries had better be quiet. I will be watching.

Mr. Lansley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. One of the pities is that we did not get an opportunity to see the text of the statement, which includes sub-headings that the Secretary of State did not read out, until he had finished delivering it, because the sub-heading before paragraph 18 contains an important truth:

"What the funding will deliver—inequalities".

Yes; inequalities between different parts of the country. To defend Labour-held seats, the Secretary of State will take away money from primary care trusts that are running deficits today in order to promise jam tomorrow for his spearhead primary care trusts.

The overall level of allocations to PCTs reflects the increase in NHS budgets, and to that extent no new money has been announced today. The NHS needs the assurance that under a Conservative Government or a Labour Government substantial increases in NHS budgets are planned. My right hon. Friends and I have committed ourselves to an increase of £34 billion by 2009–10 compared with the levels that we would inherit in the next financial year. We have made that commitment because we support the NHS and its values, which include the provision of comprehensive, quality heath care for all on the basis of need, not on the basis of ability to pay. We value the work done by NHS staff, and we intend to give them not only the resources, but the support and freedoms to ensure that they deliver the highest standards of care for patients.

A key point is not only to promise, but to deliver high quality care for the 17.5 million people who live with long-term conditions. That will require substantial investment in primary care services, and as we set out to the House in our debate on 11 November, family doctor services are at the heart of that delivery. The Secretary of State said nothing about opportunities to develop family doctor services. Genuine reform is required to back up the development of standards with resources and to give general practitioners the power to commission services and to support patients' right to choose. At the same time, we should ensure value for money by cutting bureaucracy, which currently consumes many resources that should be in the front line.

The Secretary of State's statement fails the test of reform. Over the next three years, for example, scheduled care in hospitals should increasingly be determined by patient choice, and GPs should exercise choice on behalf of patients, with money following the patient. Why does it make sense for that funding to form part of the PCTs' unified allocation in 2007–08? If GPs cannot manage the budget, they should not be expected to hold it, and if they have the power to commission services on behalf of their patients, they should receive their budgets directly.

Through the development of the general medical services contract, we have learned that GPs have populations with long-term conditions, like the asthma and diabetes registers. Should we not progressively move money from the general demographic assumptions that underpin the Secretary of State's proposal to specific factors determining GP budgets? The Secretary of State discussed assumptions about need rather than actual need.

The Secretary of State discussed cancer services, but the lack of progress in commissioning cancer services, which has been illustrated within the past fortnight by the Public Accounts Committee and Doctors for Reform, demonstrates that PCTs are not necessarily delivering progress on cancer services. A combination of clinical networks, GP commissioning and patient choice should deliver services more effectively. Those budgets also do not need to be routed through PCTs. The Secretary of State has failed to set out how NHS funding flows will be reformed. Instead, we have seen an old-fashioned exercise in dividing up the cake.

I have a number of specific questions for the Secretary of State. The previous intention was to move to target allocations by 2010. Is that still the Government's intention? In this financial year, the combined distance from target of PCTs is £1.1 billion. How much does the Secretary of State propose to reduce that total figure by in 2006–07? How much will PCTs that are currently above target be expected to contribute? The Secretary of State implied that there is no ceiling, and therefore every other PCT must contribute to the floors. Will he tell us the percentage contribution towards floors from other PCTs?

Last week, we heard that the Government are not incorporating 2001 census data in the local government finance settlement until 2006–7, but the Department of Health proposes to do so in the next financial year. Why are the Government taking one view on local government and another on health?

As the Secretary of State will know, many areas have fast-growing populations. The removal of type 2 funding for general practice left a serious gap that the Department had to plug. The Secretary of State did not refer explicitly to the growth area adjustment, which is contained in the new formula. Will there be an ability to fund the costs of infrastructure not only in the growth areas designated by the Deputy Prime Minister, but wherever large increases in population occur; and will the money arrive in time to match the population growth? In Milton Keynes, the infrastructure has been insufficient to deal with the increases in population experienced up to now, and the PCT is running a projected £6 million deficit.

The Secretary of State did not discuss the market forces factor, which continues to fail accurately to reflect NHS costs of provision in all areas. Has the Secretary of State considered moving from a general labour market approach to one based on benchmarked costs of efficient providers once the doctors' contracts and the "Agenda for Change" have been fully introduced? The Secretary of State should understand that promises of jam tomorrow are all talk, if at the same time NHS trusts are running deficits and the money that the trusts need is being eaten up in bureaucracy.

The administrative costs of strategic health authorities are more than £600 million, and of PCTs, more than £700 million. By cutting bureaucracy in both, we can get sufficient money through to the front line to meet the £1.1 billion distance from target of PCTs today. Putting resources and accountability into the front line is essential if Government-imposed cost pressures are not to mean continuing deficits.

Since the new year, one third of SHAs have published their forecasts for the end of this financial year based on figures from the end of December. The total forecast deficit from just nine SHAs is £227 million: all 10 PCTs in Hampshire and the Isle of Wight are forecasting deficits; North East London SHA has a £22 million deficit in the year to date; Thames Valley SHA has a £41 million deficit; and Surrey and Sussex SHA is forecasting a £33 million deficit, half of which results from the working time directive, new contracts and the "Agenda for Change".

In my area, Norfolk, Suffolk and Cambridgeshire SHA has forecast a £56 million deficit. That deficit includes PCTs such as my local one, South Cambridgeshire PCT, which is currently 8 per cent. above target. It is forecasting deficits and is above target, but in the Secretary of State's fantasy world it has more money than it needs. Across the country, PCTs are running deficits, demonstrating that the formula is way out by comparison with actual need.

The Secretary of State is promising money tomorrow while the NHS has deficits today. We could clear the deficit if the billions eaten up in bureaucracy got through to the front line. The Department of Health is imposing costs on the NHS with no idea of the effects. The statement does not deliver reform or urgently needed value for money, which it will be for us to do.

[Mr. Lansley]

I have one final point for the Secretary of State, but Labour Members, and particularly Manchester Labour Members, may be interested. The Greater Manchester SHA board papers state:

"the year to date financial position for the Trust sector continues to worsen".

They also state:

"although trusts and PCTs are forecasting deficits, the SHA continues at this stage to report to the Department that overall financial balance will be delivered" for Greater Manchester. The Secretary of State does not know what is going on, and it is about time that he moved aside for a Government who do.

Dr. Reid: I have waited a long time to hear with what ingenuity someone could turn a 10 per cent. expenditure increase into a bad news story. Today we have heard an attempt at that. I have to tell the hon. Gentleman that it is not Labour that is out of touch either with addressing people's needs or with improving the national health service; I fear that it is the Conservatives.

I shall deal with some of the points that the hon. Gentleman raised. As usual, there was a dig at vast administrative costs, bureaucracy and waste. There is always a sting in the tail, with an attack on the staff of the NHS—but Labour will defend them. I shall give a couple of figures. In fact, PCT management costs are 1.5 per cent. of total expenditure. The costs of senior managers in the NHS, who number about 38,000 out of 1.3 million staff, are between 3 and 5 per cent., which is about a quarter of the management costs in private health care and about one fifth of the administrative costs in the American health care system, so is it not time that we praised the NHS for its efficiency?

The hon. Gentleman raised the issue of deficits, as he has done before. I have two things to say to him on deficits. The first is that they are forecasts: every year for the past few years there has been a forecast deficit in the NHS, but in fact over the past four years the NHS has been in financial balance at the end of the year.

The hon. Gentleman wants to talk about forecast deficits, but I can tell him that the problem occurs when there are actual deficits. The last time there was a significant actual deficit—£500 million, twice the size of those forecast deficits, in a budget half the current size—was in the last year of a Conservative Government. In other words, the actual deficit then was three times higher than the forecast deficit the hon. Gentleman is worrying about now.

The hon. Gentleman asked me if we would reconsider the market forces factor. We keep it under review, but as he knows, the market forces factor was identified by the resource allocation working party as far back as 1976, so it is not new. Its development is overseen by the Advisory Committee on Resource Allocation, and it is the result of many years of analysis by academics. The population figures from the 2001 census that we are using are, first, more accurate and, secondly, adjusted to pay some degree of attention to forward projections. There are four areas, including that of my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) and the Thames gateway area, and they will be glad to know that we are taking account of that projected need. I was asked whether deprivation would be taken into account. The answer is that the projections take account of actual as well as assumed need. I could go on at length about that but I do not think that we need to take up more time, because for the past five years we have taken independent advice on the matter.

I finish on this point: the hon. Gentleman started off by challenging the methodology for, and thus the legitimacy of, the allocations. Does that mean that he intends to revisit them? Is he going to tell Members that these huge increases may be taken away from them? If so, he should say that today, because that will be another reason for people to be extremely careful about even considering voting Conservative when the election comes along. The truth is that under the plans of a Conservative Government, £1.2 billion will be removed from that expenditure: £4 million will be taken from every single PCT to subsidise the relatively well-off to jump the queue and go to the private sector if they can afford half the cost of their operation. That is an attack on the founding principle of the NHS, and I am sure that people out there will recognise the difference between investment in the NHS and an Opposition party committed to the virtual destruction of the ethos of the NHS.

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam) (LD): I thank the Secretary of State for early sight of his statement. As ever with these statements, the devil is in the detail. In broad terms, the Liberal Democrats welcome the allocations announced today and the increased investment that they imply. We see it as our task to continue pressing the Government to make sure that the investment going into the NHS is spent as wisely as possible.

The Secretary of State talked about primary care trust allocations. Can he tell us when he plans to make announcements about central allocations, too? He had a lot to say about improving public health and tackling health inequalities. In earlier proposals, he set out his plans for a partial ban on smoking in public places. If the intention really is to protect people's health, why does the health of customers and workers in pubs not need protection unless they are consuming food? How will that policy close the health gap between the richer and poorer areas of our country, which is, it seems, a Government priority?

Given that the latest National Audit Office report found that many GPs were seriously worried about the effects of the Secretary of State's patient choice policy on equity in the NHS, can he tell us what measures will be taken to address the real concerns of practitioners up and down the country? Does he agree that the NHS at local level should have the maximum possible freedom to decide how best to meet the health needs of local people, and that meeting those local health needs rather than hitting politically dictated targets should be the priority?

The Secretary of State said that there would be no more hidden waiting lists, but when will that be? Will he agree to publish, before the election, the hidden waiting times for scans and tests so that people can judge the Government's record for themselves? Will he also confirm that his target is that by 2008 up to 15 per cent. of procedures paid for by the NHS will be undertaken by the private sector? Does that not mean that in future the private sector will no longer simply be adding extra capacity to the NHS but replacing existing quality NHS provision?

What assessment has the Secretary of State made of his targets for PCT budgets? Will he confirm that the guaranteed contract payments for independent treatment centres mean that they will be paid regardless of the work they do, and that that is why 73 per cent. of NHS chief executives say that that does not offer good value for the taxpayer? Will the Secretary of State tell us why he thinks that after eight years of Labour Government, top NHS managers describe his approach as political, prescriptive and bullying?

More people are getting sicker in the NHS because of superbugs. More people are having difficulty in finding dentists on the NHS. More people are struggling to get appointments with GPs when they want them, and more people are waiting on hidden lists for scans and tests. That is the Government's real record, and that is what will count with our constituents.

Dr. Reid: The estimate that up to 15 per cent. might be added to capacity, or might be private operations, is just that—an estimate; it is not a target and it is not being driven. It will depend on patient choice. We are expanding the NHS and diversifying the type of treatment, making it much more efficient. It is free at the point of need, and in addition we are buying in bulk to push the price down and to give the patient the choice of quicker access to services. That is precisely why we have halved waiting times, and why we have taken 340,000 people off the waiting lists that we inherited from the Conservatives. Ultimately, it will be the choice of the individual—[Interruption.] I cannot hear what the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) is saying from a sedentary position. If he is asking whether that is a substitute for NHS operations, I can tell him that when the Government came to power NHS operations were below 5 million, and that about 6.5 million operations will be carried out directly through the NHS, so we are not taking anything away. In addition, there will be another 500,000. That is good for patients. For heaven's sake, I wish that for once the Liberals would think of these things from the patient's point of view, rather than always from the producer's or the provider's point of view.

For 60 years, no Government of either party have measured hidden waits, and we do not have the mechanisms to do so at present; but I have pledged that if the Labour Government are re-elected not only will we ensure that the maximum wait is 18 weeks, as opposed to 18 months under the previous Government, but that that will be the time for the whole patient journey. Previously, one third of the journey took up two years, we shall now pledge the time right through from the GP to the door of the operating theatre.

The hon. Gentleman asked about local decision making. At present, 75 per cent. of all money is distributed to PCTs, and they take responsibility for it. He asked about GP front-line engagement. Yes, we need more GP engagement in a range of areas, including the introduction of IT, which is why, recently, I put not only more effort but £95 million into that.

The hon. Gentleman asked about workers in restaurants and pubs. They will be protected to the maximum where smoking is banned completely. No restaurants will allow smoking, but even in the minority of pubs that continue to allow smoking, there will be restrictions around the bar area to protect all workers.

Finally, I thank the hon. Gentleman for what he said when he started: he appreciated the 8.1 and 8.2 per cent. increases in his constituency—£35 million followed by £37 million. He was not in the least bit churlish, and he should not be, because he is getting an 8.1 per cent. increase. To put that in context, the person who was churlish—the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley), the Opposition spokesman—is actually getting a bigger increase: 8.2 per cent. I thank the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam for his charitable and non-churlish response.

Mr. Kevin Hughes (Doncaster, North) (Lab): I warmly welcome the statement and wholeheartedly congratulate my right hon. Friend on what he is doing with the fair shares initiative—it shows the clear difference between us and that lot on the Opposition Benches—but do the increases contain any special recognition for areas such as mine that are having difficulties in recruiting GPs?

Dr. Reid: Not for the first time, we have extended the integration of the moneys provided for primary care services, including GPs, and I hope that that will help my hon. Friend's constituency. He may wish to know that in his case, the increases are 9.4 per cent. in 2006–07, and 9.3 per cent. in the following year, producing an additional two-year cumulative increase of 19.6 per cent., so his local services will have £21 million more. Those are the figures for the Doncaster, North area, and over in Doncaster, Central, there will be another £25 million—an even bigger compound increase of 19.7 per cent.

Mr. Malcolm Moss (North-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): It would be churlish not to welcome these increases, particularly in my constituency, but does the Secretary of State not accept that if my local PCT, the East Cambridgeshire and Fenland PCT, had received its proper funding allocation—it had a shortfall of £8 million last year alone—it would not now be colluding with the Cambridgeshire and Peterborough mental health trust in closing a 16-bed mental health in-patient unit at Alan Conway Court, Doddington hospital? Perhaps my constituents can take some comfort from the Secretary of State's statement today when he said, "We must give the public what they want."

Dr. Reid: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for going so far as to say "thank you" at one point. One of his PCTs is getting the third largest increase in the country.

Mr. Moss: Long overdue.

Dr. Reid: Yes, it may be long overdue, but for 20 years under the Conservative Government, such an increase was never given. The hon. Gentleman is now being given a 31.2 per cent.—[Interruption.] I shall repeat that, lest he miss it: one of his PCTs is getting a 31.2 per cent.

increase. He gets up and says, "We should have had this before," but has he forgotten that he actually voted against the increases?

Mr. Ronnie Campbell (Blyth Valley) (Lab): My right hon. Friend never mentioned dentistry. He will be aware that there is more dentistry in the private sector than in the health service, so can he tell us whether he is encouraging dentists to return to the national health service?

Dr. Reid: Yes, indeed, I can. My hon. Friend is kind enough to point out that even the fairly huge aggregate figures that were allocated today do not include the £368 million extra that is being put towards our attempt to cope with the huge challenge of dentistry, particularly the fact that although there are more dentists, few of them want to do NHS work. The Minister of State, Department of Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton) has been tackling that issue robustly. We do not pretend that it is easy, but I hope that it will be made easier by the fact that in my hon. Friend's area, Northumberland PCT will receive a £69 million increase over two years, which represents increases of 9.1 and 8.9 per cent.—18.8 per cent., when compounded over two years—so there are 69 million reasons why he and his constituents should feel that improvements in the NHS will continue in his area.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): Like my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Moss), I welcome increased commitment to the NHS from whichever political party it may come. Is the Secretary of State aware that the two PCTs in my constituency are running at a substantial deficit, which is why, in turn, two hospitals were unable to become foundation trusts? Is he concerned about the gap between the rhetoric in Westminster and the reality on the ground in constituencies such as mine, where ill people read of financial recovery plans, ward closures, closed GP lists, fewer NHS dentists and a worse out-of-hours service? Is he not concerned that the increased allocation that he has just announced may simply be used to pay off the accumulated deficits?

Dr. Reid: No, I am not concerned about that. I thank the right hon. Gentleman—I thought that I caught a "Thanks" just at the beginning of his remarks—and I am sure that he will welcome the extra £30 million for the Mid Hampshire PCT, which represents a compounded increase of just under 17 per cent. There is also another £34 million for the North Hampshire PCT, which represents a 17.7 per cent. increase. I do not believe that those increases will be spent on the deficit—I have talked about the difference between forecast and actual deficits—but I ask the right hon. Gentleman to contemplate what the local management in his constituency would have to think about if they knew that instead of getting such an increase, they were facing the equivalent of £24 million being taken away to subsidise the Conservative party's policy of the patient's passport, which would go to about 8 per cent. of his local constituents, and the 92 per cent. of people who depend on the NHS would be £24 million worse off, rather than £64 million better off.

Mrs. Lorna Fitzsimons (Rochdale) (Lab): I thank my right hon. Friend for this continued investment in the increased health care provision in the health economy in Rochdale. He will know that Rochdale has one of the most profoundly difficult areas in terms of poverty. The new hospital and the recent announcement of £35 million under the LIFT—local improvement finance trust—project represent much needed increased investment. However, in relation to the uplift going to the spearhead areas under the accelerated fair share scheme, are the Government looking at the areas that have been historically underfunded for the past 50 years that did not gold-plate their services but undertook them at cost, and at the effect that that is having on issues such as investment in mental health?

Dr. Reid: As for whether we can help to compensate for historical deficits built up by decades of under-investment, even with the huge amount of money that we are investing based on deprivation, need, population growth and projected population growth, it is not possible to compensate everyone for what was effectively underfunding during the years of the Conservative Government. I am sorry that I cannot wave a wand and do that, but we are now giving fair shares. For example, my hon. Friend will find that her constituency is within 0.5 per cent. of the PCT target, because of a 19.6 per cent. increase, resulting in an accumulated £33 million extra over the two years 2006–07 and 2007–08. I hope that that will at least go some way, under this Labour Government, towards tackling the previous underfunding under the Conservative Government—although Conservative Members are apparently criticising this large investment today.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): I agree with our Front-Bench spokesman, my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) that these increases are welcome, and far more generous than we ever received in Kingston, or elsewhere in south-west London, under the Conservative Administration. However, does the Secretary of State accept that Kingston is yet again at the bottom of the growth league for spending increases? For example, if Kingston hospital's budget had increased in line with health spending across the country, it would have £10 million more than it now has. He talks about fairness in health spending, but is he taking into account the massive increase in population in areas such as Kingston and the rest of south-west London? When will we get the health funding to match that increase in population?

Dr. Reid: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his thanks, but he should have pointed out that his area will still be about 8 per cent. above target. If we compare the need, the population and the projected population of Kingston with those of others, the people there are better off because many others live in areas that are up to 3.5 per cent. beneath target. There is a £120,000 project to upgrade the operating theatre at Surbiton hospital in May to increase capacity, and work has been carried out on the day surgery at Kingston hospital. The hon. Gentleman's area was roughly 11 per cent. above target. It will now be about 8 per cent. above the target for identified need, and as it will get 8.1 per cent. increases in both years, he would be churlish to try to pretend that his constituents are not doing rather well. No doubt while he is complaining about that here, he will claim the credit for it back in his constituency.

Mr. Brian Jenkins (Tamworth) (Lab): I thank my right hon. Friend on behalf of the people of Tamworth for today's excellent settlement of 9.4 per cent. this year and next year. I have no problem with that—apart from one small niggling issue. As he knows, my town is developing and has been accepting increased population numbers for many years. Our population will rise again this year. When he talks about money per head of population, is he talking about this year's population, or the population five years ago? Will he accept representations from me on behalf of my PCT so that we can get the figures right?

Dr. Reid: The short answer is that we have updated the projected population figures. I hope that that goes some way towards reassuring my hon. Friend.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): The Secretary of State will know that NHS dentistry has largely collapsed in Lincolnshire. Does he agree that a sensible way forward would be for the primary care trust to pay a premium to NHS dentists to open in constituencies such as mine, where it is now impossible for a person to register with an NHS practice? If he does not agree with that proposal, what positive suggestions can he make?

Dr. Reid: This may astound the right hon. and learned Gentleman, but I do agree with that. We put more than £60 million into the access fund precisely to encourage people to do the sort of thing that he suggested. I have never pretended that we have perfection in the NHS, despite all the progress that we have made. We have a shortage of dentists, radiologists and radiographers, and we could do with more midwives. We have only started our building programme, and we still have long waiting lists, although they are almost 500,000 below their peak. Labour Members welcome any ideas, because we do not approach the matter dogmatically. We have already taken action similar to that suggested by the right hon. and learned Gentleman this year.

Mr. Keith Bradley (Manchester, Withington) (Lab): I thank the Secretary of State for yet again recognising the historical inequalities in health care provision in the city of Manchester with a massive 15.5 per cent. increase in allocation for South Manchester, which will enable even better services to be provided in the new Withington community hospital, which opens in April. He is right to point out that the figures are based on the 2001 census projection. Will he confirm that they are now based on the 2001 census figures that had to be revised because of the failure of the Office for National Statistics to count the number of people living in Manchester?

Dr. Reid: My hon. Friend has been an avid advocate for his constituents, as have our other Manchester colleagues. Although we cannot offer compensation for mistakes made in the past, the fact that we now use a more accurate and verifiable version of the population figures goes someway towards providing recompense. As he pointed out, there is a 15.5 per cent. increase for South Manchester, which is compounded over the two years at 28.2 per cent. Of course, Central Manchester is receiving 26.4 per cent. There will be an additional £113 million over the next two years for those areas, which I hope will be welcomed by my hon. Friend's constituents and others in Manchester.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): The Secretary of State's statement said that the figures accommodated both current and future projected housing growth. However, if we look at the detailed lists, we see that Southend PCT, in the Thames gateway area, gets the bare minimum, while Castle Point and Rochford PCT gets only a fraction more. May I tell him, without rancour, that given the massive house-building programme envisaged for the Thames gateway by the Deputy Prime Minister, the increases, while welcome, are nowhere near enough to provide—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] They are not enough to take account of the scale of house building that will be required. May I, in all sincerity, ask the Secretary of State to reconsider?

Dr. Reid: When the hon. Gentleman refers to the bare minimum, I take it that he means the 9.1 per cent. and 10.1 per cent. increases that he is getting. It is news to me that that is the bare minimum, especially compared with the amounts handed out in the years of the Conservative Government. I hope that he welcomes the £35 million extra for Castle Point and Rochford PCT and the £17 million for Maldon and South Chelmsford PCT. [Interruption.] I think that there was a nod over there, Mr. Speaker. We have again refined the formula to try to make it fairer. The four areas outlined by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister are precisely those on which we have been most engaged with the ODPM in trying to ensure that the figures are fair and take account of future development.

If the hon. Gentleman is really worried about deficits, he should worry about the £24 million that would be taken from the two primary care trusts that I cited to subsidise his party's policy of the patient's passport. I hope that he is being honest enough to tell his constituents that that £24 million would be taken away from the money that the PCTs already have. Additionally, NHS Direct would be closed down, as would the primary care trusts, as far as I can see from the James report. All the work done by primary care trusts would thus have to be done by the hon. Gentleman's local general practitioners, but they would receive no extra money. Has he told his GPs that?

Mr. Liam Byrne (Birmingham, Hodge Hill) (Lab): My right hon. Friend knows from first-hand experience how badly we need new money in Washwood Heath and Hodge Hill. He also knows from first-hand experience the specific needs of the Kashmiri community in Birmingham, and I put on record our thanks for the time that he and his team have made available to hear our arguments for new money. Can he tell the people in east Birmingham what the settlement will mean for us? Can he tell us what it will mean for our campaign for two new health centres and more cash for front-line doctors? Will he tell the House what the consequences might be for constituents such as mine if the cash did not arrive?

Dr. Reid: If the cash did not arrive—fantasy though it may seem, let us consider the prospect of a Conservative Government—my hon. Friend's constituents would be millions of pounds worse off. They would have no access to NHS Direct and his local GPs would have the burden of all the commissioning of health care without any extra remuneration. Thankfully, that prospect is diminishing almost by the day, if we look at the opinion polls, so perhaps we can turn to the good news, which is that there is £69 million extra for my hon. Friend's constituents, or an increase of 22.3 per cent. over two years. That money will go to an area that badly needed it, because it was 6 per cent. beneath the assessed need expressed in the target. I would have liked to bring the figure on to target, but that was not possible. The area will be 3.5 per cent. beneath target, however, so I hope that that goes some way towards recompensing the efforts that my hon. Friend and his constituents have made to meet me and convince me of the need in their area.

Mr. Adrian Flook (Taunton) (Con): Many surgeries in my constituency operate from cramped and outdated buildings. Does the allocation that the Secretary of State announced today include money to help GPs expand and improve their premises? If it does not, when will they receive such funding?

Dr. Reid: We are making £1 billion available for that. The hon. Gentleman will know that the LIFT scheme is now in full swing after a slow start, although I would have liked it to move quicker. The Minister of State, Department of Health, my right hon. Friend the Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Hutton), is overseeing the refurbishment occurring throughout the country, and I think that some 2,000 to 3,000 premises are being refurbished. The hon. Gentleman can tell all who are interested in their local health care, quite apart from the GPs who are integrally involved in it, that there will be an 11 per cent. increase in the first year and a 13 per cent. increase in the second year, which is compounded at 20.3 per cent. There will be £23 million extra, so although the area will be in roughly the same position in relation to the target, it will be substantially better off for resources. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be explaining to his constituents that the extra money is coming as a benefit of the Labour Government.

Jeff Ennis (Barnsley, East and Mexborough) (Lab): May I remind my right hon. Friend that my constituency has the highest level of disability of any constituency? More than one in three households contain at least one disabled person, which is quite clearly a legacy of the former mining industry. I thank my right hon. Friend for today's announcement and the improved funding situation for health provision in Barnsley. I remind him that historically, under the previous Government, Barnsley was the worst funded health authority in the whole Trent region, despite having some of the highest levels of health problems not just in the Trent region but in the UK as a whole.

Dr. Reid: Yes, indeed; and I can tell my hon. Friend that Barnsley, for instance, is now closer to target than it was previously. It is just 3.5 per cent. beneath, and a £61 million increase is going in over the two years; that is a 21 per cent. increase for Barnsley. I hope that that will assist in an area where there has been terrible deprivation. I know that there are a series of one-stop primary care centres, which have improved health care in my hon. Friend's area, and there are other developments. For instance, I think that some additional GPs have come into the area recently.

We must never forget that although we have spent a lot of time today talking about the allocation of moneys, which is what this is about, at the end of the day this is about improving patient care, and there is no doubt in my mind that all the signs on the ground now are showing that, month by month, we are getting much better patient care. This morning I was in Newham, where five years ago there was one consultant in accident and emergency; there are now five. Where there were 50 nurses there are now 80. Where they were waiting 10 months for a scan only two years ago, now they are waiting less than a week. That is where this money is going—it is going to the patients, and that is as it should be.

Several Hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am obliged to move on.

Points of Order

1.32 pm

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I should like to raise a point of order, of which I have given your office notice. Anyone who reads the third report of the Standards and Privileges Committee and the debate that was held on the Floor of the House last night cannot fail to conclude that the subject of that report, the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Sayeed), did not properly apologise to the House for his conduct as the report required. Indeed, the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young), who chairs the Committee, said as much in his report.

The response of the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire was, effectively, "I did not do it but I will apologise anyway". Surely that was a discourtesy to the House. Is this a matter on which you will rule or on which the House needs to take a stand? If it is referred back to the Standards and Privileges Committee, does there have to be a complaint of its own standing or can the Committee carry on the investigation?

Mr. Speaker: I notice that in his speech during the debate, the Chairman of the Standards and Privileges Committee made the following comment:

"The Committee on Standards and Privileges will need to reflect on whether" the hon. Gentleman

"has responded fully to our recommendation that he apologise fully to the House in the light of some of his qualifications".—[Official Report, 8 February 2005; Vol. 430, c. 1465.]

I am content to leave this matter to the good judgment of the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) and his Committee.

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Have you or your office received any requests from the Prime Minister's office for the Prime Minister to come to the House and make a statement on the subject of the wrongful convictions of those who were blamed for the IRA bomb attacks in Guildford and Woolwich? You may be aware that it was widely reported on television this morning that the hon. Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady) would be seeking to catch your eye, and apparently after discussion with the Prime Minister's office anticipated that such an apology would be made.

The hon. Gentleman was not able to catch your eye—we all know that it is not always possible—but we now learn that the Prime Minister has made such an apology. It is reported on the BBC website that Mr. Blair said:

"I am very sorry that they were subject to such an ordeal and injustice" and that this apology was made in a statement recorded for television. Surely, if apologies of this nature are to be made, they should be made here, in the House. The House deserves rather better treatment than this.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am sure that I speak for many in the House in saying that you handle these matters impeccably. Nobody should be able to announce on the radio that a certain question is to be asked to the Prime Minister and answered in a certain way, and I would like to thank you for upholding the dignity of the House.

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Can I ask you to confirm, in ruling on the point of order raised by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael), whether there is in fact no procedural obstacle to the Prime Minister notifying you that he would wish to make a statement on this subject at the close of business today, or indeed later this week during Parliament's proceedings? May I suggest to you, Sir, that many of us in all parts of the House would welcome the opportunity to listen to the Prime Minister make such a statement and to question him on it afterwards?

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann) (UUP): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I endorse entirely everything that the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack) has said, but also make the point that had such a statement been made by the Prime Minister in the House, that would have enabled other hon. Members with constituents and people they know who have also suffered from injustices to question the Prime Minister as to why he has been so selective in his recollection of matters?

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I follow up the matter raised by the right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble)? I agree with that, in the sense that there are thousands of victims of IRA terrorism and other terrorism in Northern Ireland whose cases are going by default and whose voices are not heard. A statement as suggested would have allowed the opportunity to question the Prime Minister on the continuing delay in the appointment of a victims commissioner.

Mr. Speaker: What I can say to the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) on this point of order is that the Chair is now being drawn into the argument as to whether the Prime Minister should make a statement or not. It is for the Prime Minister or any Minister of the Crown to seek to make a statement before the House, and as right hon. and hon. Members know, when a Minister seeks to make a statement, the request is rarely refused. I therefore do not want to say any more on this matter. The Prime Minister will be able to read Hansard in the same way as everyone else and will have heard what has been stated.

I thank the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack) for his support in this matter. Perhaps it is an opportunity to say to hon. Members that no one is entitled to demand to speak at Prime Minister's Question Time except when I call them, so no one is entitled to make a statement, prior to PM's Question Time, that they are going to raise this, that or the next thing. I think that we can safely end the matter at this point.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am totally and absolutely convinced, if I may say so, that your attitude is right in terms of the House of Commons, but I may have incurred your wrath because I appeared for five minutes at 7 o'clock on ITV, and on Sky later on, on precisely this subject. I promise you it was on the basis that there was going to be an announcement anyway. Whether it was at Question Time was not quite clear, but there was the certainty—I think in good faith—among the media that there would be an announcement.

Mr. Speaker: All that I can say is that the Father of the House once again has my admiration for the fact that he is willing to wander the streets of London and go into television studios at 7 in the morning.

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim) (DUP): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would like to associate myself with the remarks that have been made in your support. I think that you have had the dignity of the House and the laws of the House at your heart, and certainly you are in complete control. We all know that, and we have to bow to that. You are infallible when you are in that Chair.

Mr. Speaker: The reverend Gentleman has gifted me with infallibility. I am very pleased by that.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. At the heart of my point of order are value for money in Government contracts, the suspicion that the Government have unfairly subsidised Swan Hunter, and their frankness in answering questions on the subject.

The matter is well known—I raised it on the Floor of the House on 4 November in debate and four Labour Members criticised me for my comments. Indeed, the Under-Secretary of State for Defence "utterly rejected" my comments. So the issue of subsidy to Swan Hunter is known to Ministers and the House. I tabled a parliamentary question asking for the amount of support given by the Government to Swan Hunter. The Minister of State's reply was:

"The Ministry of Defence does not provide financial support to the defence industry."—[Official Report, 11 January 2005; Vol. 429, c. 381W.]

The response to a separate question to the Department of Trade and Industry said that the DTI had given just one grant of £1.2 million to Swan Hunter. There the matter may have lain had there not been further discussion and questions.

The Government are now saying two different things. To my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth), the Minister of State repeated his statement:

"The Ministry of Defence does not provide financial support to the defence industry."—[Official Report, 4 February 2005; Vol. 430, c. 1178W.]

But in reply to the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock), he said:

"I regret that a clerical error in the Ministry of Defence led to an answer being laid which had been overtaken by events."

We now know that on 10 December the Government agreed to give a further £84 million to Swan Hunter. One has to ask: when is a pre-election bung not a pre-election bung? I am afraid that the answer seems to be when it is an adjustment to

"£84 million"

"the contract with Swan Hunter following value for money considerations".—[Official Report, 3 February 2005; Vol. 430, c. 1017W.]

The fact is that the Minister told me, on the record, that the Ministry of Defence has not supported Swan Hunter, yet it has, in fact, given it a further £84 million. Would it not be appropriate for the Minister to come to the House to respond to this point of order?

Mr. Speaker: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving me notice of his point of order. I have examined the answers given to him and other hon. Members. It is clear to me that the original answers to the two questions asked by the hon. Members for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) and for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) did not give a full or up-to-date picture of the facts relating to the contract in question.

I remind Ministers of their duty to give accurate information to this House and to correct any errors at the earliest opportunity. I also remind them that pursuant answers should be used only to correct errors of fact or printing errors in an earlier answer. They should not be the vehicle for a wholly new answer. I have asked the Table Office to check closely with Departments the nature of the correction to be made before authorising the use of such pursuant answers in future.

Audible Motor Vehicle Alarms

Mr. Norman Baker, supported by Mr. Alan Meale, Mr. John Randall, Bob Russell, Mr. Nigel Jones and Tony Wright, presented a Bill to establish requirements about the noise levels of, and the duration of noise emitted by, audible alarms within motor vehicles; to make provision about tests on motor vehicles in that connection; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 18 March, and to be printed [Bill 58].

Road Safety (Pillion Passengers)

1.43 pm

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne) (Con): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make provision about protective helmets for children riding on motor cycles as pillion passengers; to make further provision about motor cycle construction and use in relation to pillion passengers; to make it an offence to carry a child as a pillion passenger without parental consent; and for connected purposes.

My constituent Sean Pearce-Weston was only eight years old when he was tragically killed in a motorcycle accident in May last year. It happened on the Pevensey bypass. He was riding as a pillion passenger on a 750cc Honda motorbike owned by a friend of the family. The bike collided with a Ford Fiesta. Sean suffered serious head, neck and back injuries. He was airlifted to the local district general hospital, and later transferred to King's college hospital, where ultimately his life support machine was turned off. His parents were unaware that he had gone for a ride. He was wearing a helmet that was either ill fitting or with the strap undone. In any event, I understand it was not a specially designed child's helmet.

I was contacted by Sean's mother Cassie and her friend and neighbour Clare Lacey. Despite the terrible grief suffered by family and friends, Cassie's main priority since the terrible accident has been to campaign for better regulations to try to ensure that what happened to Sean cannot happen again to anyone else's son or daughter. I pay tribute to Cassie and the whole family for their bravery and determination.

Cassie started a petition in my constituency. It rapidly attracted not hundreds but thousands of signatures. Currently it has more than 7,000 signatures. There were very strong feelings on the matter in my constituency, especially in the Langney area. I was left asking: how did Sean come to be on this pillion seat without proper protection and without his parents' knowledge or consent? Would a change in the law help to avoid a similar tragedy?

I have to admit that my initial reaction was to press for a blanket ban on children being carried as pillion passengers. I am still of the view that very young children have no place on motorcycles. I have delved into the legal and practical issues very carefully, and I met a range of organisations and bodies. I would like to pay particular thanks to the British Motorcyclists Federation, in particular Mr. Richard Olliffe. It is a responsible organisation that has been working hard through the Advisory Group on Motorcycling to develop a national motorcycle strategy.

I do not wish to demonise motorcyclists. During this campaign, I have received e-mails and letters from bikers across the country — indeed, across the globe. As the BMF says in its mission statement, motorcycling is a legitimate means of personal transport and form of recreation. About 1 million motorcycles are registered for use on our roads.

I recognise that the vast majority of bikers are responsible people who take particular care when carrying their own children on their pillion seat, but the case of young Sean suggests to me that there is a minority who are less responsible and that some changes to the existing law are required. From the outset, I was determined that any change in the law should be fair, proportionate and enforceable. I am not interested in empty gestures and neither are Sean's family. Some accidents are unavoidable.

Among the other organisations I consulted were the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents, Brake — the road safety charity — the Motor Cycle Industry Association and Sussex Police. I am grateful for all the expert advice that they have given.

The existing laws of direct relevance to this case can be summarised as follows: a motor bike must be equipped with suitable supports or rests for the feet of the pillion passenger; pillion passengers must be capable of sitting astride a proper seat securely fixed to the motorcycle; a pillion passenger must wear a safety helmet; and the decision to carry a passenger remains with the rider, who is legally responsible for ensuring that the passenger is safely supported.

On 21 July last year, I went to the Department for Transport with Cassie and her daughter to present the petition. A few days earlier, I had sent a letter setting out my concerns following the accident and asking Ministers to review the legal position. The Under-Secretary of State for Transport, the hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Mr. Jamieson), who is on the Front Bench, was otherwise engaged, but was good enough to write the following day expressing his condolences to the family. In his letter he stressed that the Government were concerned about motorcycle safety and made the point that "Motorcyclists are our most vulnerable road users and are some 30 times more likely to be killed on the road than car users and 4 times more likely to be killed than cyclists."

However, he concluded:

"The Government believes that present regulations do not make it necessary to amend the legislation."

The Minister's review of the legislation cannot have been too comprehensive because that was in reply to my letter of 8 July. Very prompt, but suggesting, perhaps, a not too deep and long-standing review.

I have concluded that rather than a blanket ban, three things are required. First, there should be a clear legal obligation that where a child is to be carried as a pillion passenger by anyone other than a parent or legal guardian, the consent of a parent or guardian must be obtained. That should be backed up by stiff penalties. Had that obligation existed and been enforced before this tragic accident, it is more than likely that Sean would not have been on the bike in the first place. Parents have a right to know that their children will not be placed in possible danger without their knowledge and consent.

Secondly, it should be crystal clear that a child must wear a properly fitting and specially designed child's helmet. The best information I have been able to obtain is that Sean was wearing a full-face adult lady's helmet. It was the smallest size available, and although it probably fitted the diameter of Sean's head reasonably well, the differences in the jaw of an adult female and a child meant that the strap did not fit properly, so the helmet came off on impact. So wearing a helmet was of no use at all.

It must make sense for the law to require that specially designed children's helmets are worn. I understand from ROSPA that it plans to seek funding to create an advice leaflet for parents on taking their children on their pillions, which would look at all these issues. The BMF tells me that it would support moves to ensure that helmets approved to current UK and EU standards are readily available in child head sizes.

Thirdly, the regulations governing the design of foot rests, or "pegs", must make it clear that the very youngest child could not legally ride pillion, and that the manufactured position of foot rests cannot be modified. At present, as I have explained, the law requires that the passenger must be able to reach the foot rests. But certain sports bikes have the rests in more accessible places, and there seems to be some evidence that owners may modify their bikes, including the position of the rests. In fairness, I should say that the BMF does not support a ban on modifying the position of foot rests, but in a constructive spirit, it has told me:

"The BMF is however concerned that raders may not be aware of their obligations to pillion passengers and would therefore support a Department of Transport publicity campaign to ensure that riders and pillions are aware of their obligations under the current regulations."

What has been the legal aftermath of this tragedy in my constituency—the very sad death of young Sean Pearce-Weston? The rider of the motorcycle has not been prosecuted. The driver of the car was prosecuted and admitted driving without due care and attention, rather than dangerous driving. He was fined £500 and banned from driving for six months. Sean's mother pointed out in the local paper at the time that £500 was less than the cost of organising Sean's funeral.

I understand that the coroner's court in this case is due to reconvene on 5 April. Only after that final hearing does the Coroners Act allow the release of the formal police report on this tragic incident. It will, I am sure, make interesting reading. It is quite possible that the coroner may decide to make recommendations relating to the carriage of child pillion passengers on motor bikes. I hope that he does, and if he does, that the Government will seriously consider acting on those recommendations and on mine.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Nigel Waterson, Mr. John Horam, Mr. Peter Ainsworth, Mr. Robert Walter, Mr. Roger Gale, Mr. Julian Brazier, Mr. Richard Spring, Mr. Harry Barnes, Mr. Edward O'Hara, Tom Cox, Mrs. Jacqui Lait and Mr. Bill Wiggin.

ROAD SAFETY (PILLION PASSENGERS)

Mr. Nigel Waterson accordingly presented a Bill to make provision about protective helmets for children riding on motor cycles as pillion passengers; to make further provision about motor cycle construction and use in relation to pillion passengers; to make it an offence to carry a child as a pillion passenger without parental consent; and for connected purposes. And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 18 March, and to be printed [Bill 59].

Orders of the Day

European Union Bill

"Order for Second Reading read.—[Queen's consent, on behalf of the Crown, signified.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I should inform the House that Mr. Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition. He has also placed a 10-minute limit on Back-Bench speeches.

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I have it in command from Her Majesty the Queen to acquaint the House that Her Majesty, having been informed of the purport of the Bill, has consented to place her prerogative and interest, so far as they are affected by the Bill, at the disposal of Parliament for the purposes of the Bill.

In view of the time limit that Mr. Speaker has placed on speeches, and in view of informal representations that I have received from both sides of the House, I will, if I may, not take the usual number of interventions. I do my best in all debates to take as many as possible, and I make myself available, as I did yesterday, to the European Scrutiny Committee for interrogation by Members on both sides of the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I should explain to the right hon. Gentleman and the House that Mr. Speaker's decision was perhaps related in part to the well-known generosity of the Foreign Secretary in that regard.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Some of us feel that as Parliament has not gone through the European constitution line by line on the Floor of the House, the Bill lacks the legitimacy that it would have, had that process been enabled. I hope the Foreign Secretary will not allow us to miss some of the gems of explanation that he would otherwise have put before us.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is a case of special pleading.

Mr. Straw: I thought I was helping the Chair a moment ago, but obviously one can be wrong.

The Bill has two linked purposes: to enable the United Kingdom to ratify the European Union constitutional treaty, and to decide that ratification can take place only if there is a positive vote in a United Kingdom referendum.

Before coming to the Bill itself, let me first put it in context and explain why the new treaty is needed. The European Union's institutions and rules were designed some 50 years ago, for just six members. Since then, a succession of amendments in overlapping treaties has been agreed by the EU's member nations. But with the EU's biggest enlargement last year taking its membership to 25, and with the prospect of further expansion, it was clear that those successive treaties had to be consolidated and clarified. In addition, there was a need for reform of the European Union to make it more effective, efficient and accountable.

When the first draft of the treaty was produced in the Convention, I published a detailed White Paper setting out the changes that would be required by the Government and the House if we were to sign up to the treaty. Over the following 10 months of intensive negotiations, we achieved every one of our negotiating objectives—a success that was widely recognised across Europe. The French newspaper Le Monde called the treaty "a British victory". Corriere della Sera in Italy declared that "the British won the day".

Laurent Fabius, leader of the French "No" campaign, said that "the British concept has won".

Those comments reflect the nature of the new constitutional treaty—a framework for our kind of Europe, which gives us a strong role in a Union of free and sovereign nations.

The new treaty spells out in clearer terms than before that this is an organisation of freely co-operating nations—free to decide where to work together, free to stop doing so if they agree that it no longer makes sense, and free to take at any time a sovereign decision to pull out of the EU entirely. The constitutional treaty puts Europe's members firmly in control. It replaces the current system of six-monthly rotating presidencies of the European Council, the body in which the EU's member countries set the organisation's priorities, with a full-time Chair to ensure that it is we, the nations, who set the EU's agenda and get it implemented. That is a widely supported reform, and its supporters include, I am pleased to say, the new leader of the Conservative party in the European Parliament. The only opposition to the reform appears to have been led by the former European Commission, not the present one, and the British Conservative party.

The new treaty slims down the size of the European Commission. It states that the EU's common foreign and security policy will remain fully under the control of Europe's nations, who can agree a common approach only when every one of those nations wishes to do so. One person, accountable to the EU's members and taking orders only from them, will implement this policy, replacing the disjointed system that we have today involving a high representative and a member of the Commission whose loyalties are ambiguous and are to the Commission, not to the European Foreign Ministers of nations.

The new treaty ensures that national Parliaments must ratify any future changes to the EU's arrangements. The Bill gives that statutory effect in clause 2. For the first time, the treaty gives national Parliaments the power to send draft EU legislation back for review if one third of national Parliaments believe that the draft law infringes the principle that the EU should act only where it adds value—the so-called subsidiarity principle. That is an important and welcome reform, to which the Bill gives further statutory effect. It is not directly reflected in the treaty, but in the Bill I have added to the provisions of the treaty so as better to assist Parliament in that task. Under clause 3, the relevant Minister will have a statutory duty to lodge a written statement with Parliament certifying whether or not a given draft EU law, in the Government's view, complies with the subsidiarity principle.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): We have that power at present, as we can object on subsidiarity grounds. I am a member of the European Scrutiny Committee. The Commission can ignore our objections, and that will also happen under the constitution. The Commission already has to justify its proposals on subsidiarity grounds. It can overrule our objections, and it will be able to do so under the draft constitution. What, therefore, is the advance?

Mr. Straw: There is a big advance, because there was a power on paper in the Maastricht treaty, but it did not have any procedure behind it. As every lawyer in the House knows, if we do not have procedure, we cannot access rights. By making provision for one third of national Parliaments to raise a yellow card to a proposal, the treaty ensures that in future there will be a proper procedure. Moreover, with help from Members from all parts of the House, I have sought to strengthen the role of the House and Parliament in scrutinising EU legislation. In my judgment, legislation is always improved if there is effective scrutiny, and that is as true of EU legislation as it is of domestic legislation. I wanted to introduce a duty on Ministers, and therefore officials and Departments, to check EU draft legislation to see whether or not it accorded with the subsidiarity principle. That is what we will have under the Bill, but we do not have it at the moment.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con) rose—

Mr. Straw: I shall give way later to the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow).

The treaty provides Europe with a fairer and clearer voting system for making decisions, giving the larger member states relatively more power. One of the many improvements that we achieved during the intergovernmental conference was the raising of the thresholds for qualified majority voting from 50 per cent. of EU member states and 60 per cent. of the EU population to 55 per cent. of member states and 65 per cent. of population, which helps this country. The treaty sets out arrangements known as "enhanced co-operation" to allow groups of member states within Europe to work together more closely in certain areas without everyone having to take part, but it ensures that there is a level playing field. Such co-operation is allowed only if it does not harm the interests of those nations not choosing to participate. Last year, that policy was advocated by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) (Con): The Foreign Secretary said that the House would have far more power to refer matters under subsidiarity, but when I asked the Leader of the House a question just a couple of weeks ago, I was told that no such proposals are yet in place and that the Government do not have any idea about the way in which that would operate. The Foreign Secretary is trying to suggest that we have new procedures and would have more power, but the Leader of the House made it clear that that is not the case.

Mr. Straw: I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman is misinformed. First, the Bill makes provision for a new procedure and, secondly, I have already made proposals to the House, the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs and the European Scrutiny Committee about ways in which the House can better improve scrutiny arrangements. It is not for the Government to tell the House how it should exercise its scrutiny responsibilities. That is a matter for the House, and I look forward to receiving its recommendations. I simply say to the hon. Gentleman that he is pushing at an open door.

On immigration, asylum and frontier controls, the new treaty sets out effective provisions for working together across borders, but it gives Britain the choice to opt in to those measures in which we want to participate and to stay out of those in which we do not. The new treaty extends the application of qualified majority voting in the EU in that area and others to ensure effective decision making where it is in our interests. I am unapologetic about that extension, and I hope that that is the case, too, for the whole House, including Members who served as Ministers in previous Governments such as the right hon. and learned Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram). It was Baroness Thatcher who, as Prime Minister, spelled out the case for qualified majority voting when it is in our interest. Majority voting stops individual countries blocking vital reform. If the status quo is against us, we must be at the head of reform. That is exactly what we have done with reform to the common agricultural policy, which we could never have achieved if countries with a vested interest in the status quo were able to veto any changes.

There are about 50 so-called improvement changes resulting from the change from veto to majority voting. Most are frankly trivial. They extend from procedures for repealing measures relating to the past division of Germany to the appointment of the executive board of the European Central Bank, neither of which affects the United Kingdom. At the end of the documents that have been laid before the House there is a complete table of such changes. Changes have also been made on asylum and immigration, although most of those were made under the Amsterdam treaty, and on criminal procedural law, but we have an emergency brake in certain areas and an opt-out in others.

Crucially, the new treaty sets limits on the European Union's powers and, for the first time, they are listed clearly. The powers of the EU are limited to those given freely by its members. Again, for the first time, there is a procedure to modify or reduce the exercise of those powers. The treaty guarantees that the national veto is maintained on crucial issues on which we need it, such as tax, social security, fundamental aspects of criminal law, the financing of the EU, treaty changes, foreign policy and defence. By incorporating the charter of fundamental rights, the treaty includes a consolidation of existing rights, freedoms and principles, thus limiting the scope of the EU institutions. The charter makes it clear that the EU must respect the fundamental liberties of our citizens whenever it acts. The treaty itself spells out the fact that the charter is not, and cannot, be used as a source of new human rights in this country. My right hon. and noble Friend the Attorney-General put it well when he described the charter in a speech last year as "a brake not an accelerator".

Sir Michael Spicer (West Worcestershire) (Con): The Foreign Secretary is suggesting that increased national powers are involved. Surely, however, the whole point of the new constitution is that it will remove Parliament as the root of our legal system.

Mr. Straw: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has raised that, and I invite him to look at the treaty, the White Papers that I have produced, the evidence that I have given and the detailed commentary. There is absolutely no provenance for his statement. Remarks by hon. Members sitting next to him and by his Front-Bench team show that part of the Conservative party is trying to pretend that the proposed treaty changes the position of the primacy of European law in relation to the United Kingdom. It does not. The primacy of obligations laid out in international treaties arises in principle not from the treaty or previous EU treaties but from article 27 of the Vienna convention on the law of treaties. I urge hon. Members on both sides of the House to consider this: if a country entered into solemn treaty obligations but could then ignore them, there would never be any point in agreeing international treaties. Some countries have to incorporate every single part of international treaties directly into their domestic law — that is the case in the United States — but other countries, including the United Kingdom, take a dualist approach. The issue of primacy is present in international obligations. It was present when we joined the European Union, and it was at the heart of the argument during the 1975 referendum campaign. The position has not changed, and as one of the first articles in the treaty makes clear, European law, in respect of European competences but nothing else, has primacy. It is made clear that that is simply a restatement of the existing jurisprudence of the European Court of Justice.

Tony Wright (Cannock Chase) (Lab): Does not this exchange reveal that in practice the proposed referendum will not be about the terms of the constitution but will be a vote about whether or not we want to be a member of the European Union? In that sense, it will be a defining moment for this country and our relationship with Europe.

Mr. Straw: One can never tell exactly the basis on which individuals vote in the privacy of the ballot box. I hope very much that the vote will be about the merits of the treaty. I am confident about its merits, and the fact that it works for Britain and makes a European Union that is much more in the image that we seek. My hon. Friend is right to imply that some in the Conservative party — by no means all of them — wish to use a no vote in the referendum on the treaty as a Trojan horse to drive the United Kingdom towards withdrawing from the European Union altogether.

The new treaty fulfils every one of the commitments that I set out in the Government's White Paper in advance of the negotiations. All the institutional changes are beneficial to Britain and to the British people: a limit on the uropean Union's powers, a better-managed European nion, greater say for national Governments and arliaments, and flexible arrangements to allow some embers to go at a different speed from others. All those anges are proposals for which the Conservatives have alled separately, but to which they now, incredibly, bject, as illustrated in the rambling, rather oxymoronic easoned amendment that they have tabled. That is why e have heard a litany of distortion and inaccuracy from em about what is in the text.

Let me be clear about what the new treaty will not do. does not change the United Kingdom's position with espect to joining the euro. It does not hand control of ur borders, foreign policy or armed forces to the uropean Union. It does not take away our seat at the nited Nations, and nor—perhaps the most absurd laim of all—does it replace Her Majesty the Queen as lead of State. I can understand that the British public re concerned when they hear such claims about the reaty, but as discussion has gone on, so the myths and istortions have been exposed. People can increasingly ee the reality, which is that the treaty will set a stable, redictable and limiting framework for the European nion.

Let me now turn to the second purpose of the Bill: a eferendum in the UK and in Gibraltar to decide hether to ratify the constitutional treaty. I should oint out to the House one of the many manifest bsurdities of the so-called reasoned amendment tabled y the official Opposition. It asks that we decline to give he Bill a Second Reading. If there is no Second eading, there is no Bill, and if there is no Bill, there will e no referendum. Having called for a referendum for nonths and months, the Conservatives have nanoeuvred themselves into the extraordinary position f deciding to vote against it the moment they are ctually offered one.

The provisions in part 2 fall under the general ramework of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000, which many hon. Members will ecall. I recall it in every particular because I was a ponsor of that excellent Bill as Home Secretary. The European Union Bill sets out who will be entitled to vote n the referendum, the terms for any legal challenges to ts result, and provisions on the conduct of the eferendum. It also includes the question to be posed, which is a simple and straightforward one:

"Should the United Kingdom approve the Treaty establishing a Constitution for the European Union?"

am glad to say that the Leader of the Opposition has aid

"we do accept the question".

nd the Electoral Commission has now approved it.

In addition to the legislative provisions in the 000 Act, we shall publish and make available to the House guidance on Government conduct, which will pply throughout the referendum period. It will take ccount of the requirements of the ministerial code, the ivil service code, the special advisers code of conduct nd guidance on the work of the Government nformation system.

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): Yesterday the Foreign Secretary told the European Scrutiny Committee that he did not see any need for the Bill to be repealed should there be a no vote in a referendum. That being the case, would the Bill remain on the statute book to be used for a second referendum on the treaty?

Mr. Straw: The Bill cannot be used for a second referendum. There would be no point in repealing it in such circumstances, because its purpose would have come to an end. I understand the question, but because he asked it—

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): I asked it.

Mr. Straw: The hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) asked me that question. I have double-checked the matter, and I refer the House to clause 10 (4) and (5). Parts 1 and 2 of the Bill can come into force, and an order be made, only if there is a yes vote. There cannot be a second yes vote; that is absolutely clear.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): Does the Foreign Secretary accept that some Labour Members who will vote for the Bill welcome the referendum, although they will argue against the Government's case during it, but do not accept, as my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Tony Wright) has argued, that it will be a defining moment for the country if it is lost, although it will clearly be a defining moment for the Government?

Mr. Straw: I am glad that my right hon. Friend is being consistent in his position, and I hope that his advice will be accepted as wiser counsel on the Opposition Benches. I look forward to a continuing discussion with him and one or two other hon. and right hon. Friends about the merits of the Bill. What we know of the public mood is that the more they see the good parts of the treaty, the more likely they are to support it.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke (Rushcliffe) (Con): There are those of us who support the treaty but think that the decision to hold a referendum was one of the weakest U-turns that the Government have performed on any issue in their history. Were I to vote for the Bill tonight, would the Foreign Secretary take it that I had been inconsistent in voting for the referendum? Would he advise me to vote against it, so that at least the dignity of Parliament and its right to determine the issue might be restored?

Mr. Straw: The right hon. and learned Gentleman has taken a consistent position on the matter—he is against a referendum—and I respect him for that. Those on the Conservative Front Bench, however, are in a completely absurd position; he knows it, and so do they.

The Bill presents a choice on whether to approve the new constitutional treaty. It is important to be clear about the nature of that choice. If Parliament and the British people approve the treaty, we will fix the framework for our sort of Europe, with the reforms that I have described, but if we reject it, we are in unknown territory, and I suggest that we will be weak and isolated in Europe. We would have no option but to go cap in hand to Brussels to ask our partners to start all over again, reopening negotiations in which we had secured such a good result. If we got any deal at all, it would be a worse and not a better one, negotiated from a position of weakness, not of strength. The long-term effect would be Britain falling into a semi-detached position in Europe while others went ahead without us. We would be left without influence, out on the margins and with no say in Europe's future direction.

The choice is genuinely this: strength for Britain or isolation and weakness. We shall either endorse the reforms that we have secured, guaranteeing a strong Britain in our kind of Europe, or reject the treaty and step into the unknown, with all Britain's power and prosperity and all we have achieved in recent years at risk. Yet the official Opposition explicitly want to provoke just such a crisis in our relations with Europe. Indeed, just as many other nations are queuing up to join the EU, many in the Conservative party are doing their level best to reject it.

Mr. Allen: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Straw: I apologise to my hon. Friend, but I am coming to the end of my remarks.

Let us be clear. The Conservatives say that they want not only a rejection of this new treaty, but a renegotiation of the texts of the existing treaties as well. At best, that is pure fantasy, and most will see it as deceit. Such an approach—to use the process as a Trojan horse to deliver renegotiation of existing treaties—is literally undeliverable. It would require the agreement of every other of the EU's 24 member states. Yet the Leader of the Opposition cannot point to one other member state that supports the Conservative party's position.

The Conservatives' kind of Europe is what Lord Willoughby de Broke, a former Conservative peer, described thus in a speech last June:

That is, it is very nice to have, but it is simply "not on the menu". That is the truth of the matter. If the Conservative party's policy on Europe reflects nothing else, it reflects a deeply felt pessimism about its own future and the future of this country. The Conservatives say that their policy is about sovereignty, and that that is the purpose of their reasoned amendment, but it is not so. Their policy could represent only an inexorable weakening of Britain's power and influence. The Conservative party mistake isolation for sovereignty. By definition, a castaway on a desert island is sovereign, but he has no power. By playing a strong role in the EU, Britain strengthens the power of this nation. The alternative, offered by the Conservative party, is exactly the isolation and weakness that would be so damaging to our power and prosperity.

If, as I believe we do, we in Britain want to enhance our power and influence in the world, to shape global markets in our interests and to protect the British people from global threats—if we want to do all or any of those things—we must build strong alliances, not cut ourselves off. We have to be inside our largest market, shaping our rules, not outside it. With great respect to them, we are not Norway or Switzerland: we are one of the largest economies in Europe and in the world. The idea that we could simply take instructions from Brussels by fax, which is the alternative offered by associate status, is simple nonsense, but very dangerous nonsense.

Whether it is in getting proper elections in Ukraine, or in taking part in negotiations with Iran to suspend the processes that could produce fuel for a nuclear bomb, Britain is stronger when we work with others in Europe. We have to maintain that power and influence, not put it at risk.

There is a clear patriotic case for this constitutional treaty—for a strong Britain in a reforming Europe, for increasing our prosperity and our security, and for promoting our values and enhancing our power. As the debate continues in the House and in the country, I am confident that the patriotic argument for Britain in Europe will win against the narrow, pessimistic isolationism of the anti-Europeans. I say that because this is an argument about this country's future, about choosing to take our opportunities, to lead by engagement and to work with others to increase Britain's prosperity and Britain's power. I commend the Bill to the House.

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes) (Con): I beg to move, To leave out from "That" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

That this House declines to give a second reading to the European Union Bill because, whilst it enables the broadly-supported and necessary Referendum to be held on the Constitution for Europe, it also provides for the implementation into UK law of that Constitution for Europe; it enshrines the primacy of European Union law and puts in place many of the elements of a state; it transfers further powers to the European Union institutions and further promotes the concept of a common foreign and security policy and a common economic policy; it further encourages the over implementation of European regulations; it extends the powers to legislate by order; it extends the competences of the European Union in many areas including asylum and immigration, criminal and civil law; and it therefore further diminishes the sovereignty of the United Kingdom.

Despite the welcome provisions in the Bill for the holding of a referendum, our amendment shows clearly why we will decline to support this Second Reading today. The Bill seeks to do two very different things and deliberately ends up confusing them, and the Foreign Secretary's speech has in many ways tried to increase that confusion. First, it seeks to import into our own law the provisions of the constitution for Europe, and, secondly, it enables the referendum to be held. There should have been two separate Bills. As with devolution, it would have made sense for Parliament to know the public's mind before legislating to implement.

We were told in last week's White Paper that

"the process of Parliamentary scrutiny will inform the public debate" on the constitution. What did the Foreign Secretary mean by informing public debate—surely not the propagandist speech to which he has just treated us?

It is clear from the Bill and its timetable, and—I have to say with a certain amount of respect as this is probably the shortest speech that the Foreign Secretary has made on Europe—the length of his speech itself, that far from informing the public debate, the Government are desperate to keep it as short and as propagandist as possible. They have started already.

Last week—he did it again today, and I am sure that he will do it over and over again—the right hon. Gentleman boasted that he had delivered a constitution that every other country in Europe is calling a great British success. Once again, he quoted one or two French sources, but he is obviously selective in his reading.

On the UMP website, President Chirac, the leader of France, says:

"this Constitution was wanted by France, and is largely inspired by France."

On the same website, Alain Lamassoure, one of France's constitution draftsmen, described the constitution—this is important in this context—as

"the coronation of what we call the French vision of Europe, as opposed to the Anglo-Saxon vision".

Even Nicholas Sarkozy, the leader of the UMP, has said that "if the French said 'no' in the referendum, it would be the British . . . who would triumph".

There appears to be a severe breakdown of communications between the Foreign Secretary and his French colleagues.

The truth is, as Mr. Sarkozy suggests, that this constitution is bad for Britain and for all those who seek to retain and develop a Europe that is a true partnership of sovereign nations. That is why this reasoned amendment seeks to distinguish between the welcome prospect of a binding referendum, which we have long sought, and the rest of the Bill, which sets out to impose upon the United Kingdom a European constitution, which leads us through that gateway towards a country called Europe where we do not want to go.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Grantham and Stamford) (Con): Will my right hon. and learned Friend give way?

Mr. Ancram: I will give way in a second.

Last week's White Paper made the astonishing claim that this treaty makes Europe "easier to understand". What nonsense. It establishes a constitution of considerable obtuseness, 500 pages of it, so easy to understand that a fortnight ago the Government produced a commentary on the constitution of another 500 pages. That is aside from all the propagandist bumf on the treaty that the Government have been producing during the past six months that we are now told makes it easier for Europe to understand.

I should like to see a detailed parliamentary analysis of the constitution—

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Denis MacShane): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ancram: I will in a moment.

—a line by line examination, as I think the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) mentioned, in the course of the legislation. Yet proceedings on the Bill in this House are to be gravely curtailed to a day and half in Committee. Clearly the Government are frightened that the more we debate it, the more the British people will see it for what it is—a significant change in the relationship between the United Kingdom and the European Union, the first formal step towards a politically united Europe, and, to coin a phrase, the capstone of a federal state.

Mr. MacShane: Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman recall that it was one of his colleagues, I believe—I am not sure—the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), who asked the Prime Minister if the Government would produce a commentary setting out the old treaties and the new one side by side? That is what we have done. We do what the Conservative party wants and he should welcome that.

Mr. Ancram: I asked a question on how widely that had been circulated, to which I received an answer, and if the Minister looks that up, he will find that not a lot of people in Britain will see that particular document. In an earlier debate I challenged the Minister to send a copy of this constitution to every elector, and on that occasion he was very encouraging in his reply, but I see that that has now disappeared from the Government's agenda.

Mr. Allen: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is getting to one of the core problems here, which is that we started with a treaty, which is essentially a deal between various Governments, and have turned it into a constitution. Some of us favour a written constitution. We think that written constitutions are so good that they should not just go to Iraq or Europe, but to the UK as well. But will the right hon. Gentleman accept that there is now a contradiction, because instead of trying to win people to an inspiring written constitution for a very large project, whether he agrees with it or not, we now have a highly technical, treaty-oriented, Euro-babble-ridden document that will make it even harder for those of us who support a written constitution for Europe to sell it to the British people?

Mr. Ancram: I have a great deal of sympathy for the hon. Gentleman in the difficulty that he will have in selling this to the British people. But the point about the treaty is that it is a treaty that, in its own terms, establishes a constitution for Europe. That is why we have to deal with it in terms of it being the constitution that the Government seek to implement, and deal with it in its detail. But from now on, rather than parliamentary scrutiny—we will have only a day and a half in Committee—it will be propaganda, mostly at the taxpayers' expense, on what the Government call "making the case for the Constitution".

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: May I ask my right hon. and learned Friend a question to which I am genuinely not sure of the answer? What is the position of the Conservative Front Bench on the parliamentary scrutiny and a referendum if, as I trust, a Conservative Government are returned in a few weeks' time? Will there be a full parliamentary process before a referendum is held, and would that parliamentary process be conducted on an altogether more sensible timetable than is suggested for this, or is it the Conservative Front Bench's policy that we have no parliamentary process and go straight to a quick referendum on the whole thing?

Mr. Ancram: Our policy, which we have made clear, is that after the election we will hold a referendum before the end of September of this year. We would take advantage of the example of the devolution referendums, where the legislation took place after the referendums, so that the House was aware of the feelings of the people who had voted in those referendums before the case was made.

The taxpayer should wake up to the extent to which they will be fleeced to pay for this shameless one-sided propaganda exercise. The Minister for Europe said that the Government plan to spend "serious money" promoting the EU constitution, and we now discover that for once he was not joking. A written answer on 17 January revealed that the Government have tripled their budget for spending to promote the EU constitution from £200,000 last year to more than £600,000 this year. What on earth has happened to this recommendation by the Neill Committee on Standards in Public Life:

"The Government of the day in future referendums should, as a government, remain neutral and should not distribute at public expense literature, even purportedly 'factual' literature, setting out or otherwise promoting its case"?

This Government are not taking account of that serious recommendation.

But that is not all. Last month, the PR company, Geronimo, was hired to run 'an extensive communications campaign costing the taxpayer another £40,000 by April. Apparently, its brief is to promote the idea that the EU constitution is a "success for Britain". Even the Electoral Commission has inferred that the current practice is "undesirable" and that "in fairness the Government should operate under the same restrictions as everyone else."

We look to the Government to stop using taxpayers' money improperly in the run-up to a referendum that will, even on their own terms, be delayed for a very long time.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ancram: I should like to make some progress.

The combining of the paving measure for the referendum and the adoption of the constitution into our law is simply an attempt to muddy the water. Of course, we welcome the Government's belated U-turn on the holding of a referendum, which the Prime Minister once told us would be "a gross and irresponsible betrayal of the true British national interest".

However, the Bill should be about the referendum and nothing else—that, I say to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), is what we would do in these circumstances. I accept that with amendments this Bill could still achieve that purpose, and I invite the Government seriously to consider that. In that case, a day and a half in Committee would probably be more than enough for the purposes of seeing the legislation pass through.

Then there is the question of the timing of the referendum. We have been told that it cannot be held during our presidency of the EU later this year. Why on earth not? Now that the final terms of the constitution are known, it would be better for the EU to get on with the referendum. It would also be better for the stability of Europe and better for Britain, which will become increasingly frustrated and suspicious at what is clearly unnecessary delay. I have heard no convincing reason for delaying until next spring, and I now hear rumours that the Government are considering October next year. The only conclusion that I can draw is that they are running scared of the British electorate.

Keith Vaz: The right hon. and learned Gentleman will remember that there was no referendum on the Maastricht treaty. He will also recall voting for the Maastricht treaty, which extended qualified majority voting, as does the constitutional treaty. Does he regret doing so?

Mr. Ancram: As I have said before, I think in retrospect that there was a case for holding a referendum on Maastricht. In this case, where there is a fundamental shift in the relationship between the EU and the United Kingdom, a referendum is absolutely essential. I repeat that when we are on the Government Benches, after May, we will hold that referendum before the end of September.

Mr. Frank Field: Some Labour Members have been laughing at the right hon. Gentleman's saying that he would have voted in favour of a referendum on Maastricht. His embarrassment, if he has any, in changing his mind—which the electorate might welcome—is surely no greater than the embarrassment of many of my colleagues, who said right up to the last moment that we should not have a referendum but will vote for one tonight.

Mr. Ancram: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman, but to save time I had not intended to rehearse points that we have made before—for example, reminding the Foreign Secretary of the days when he was not only against membership of the then Common Market, but campaigned vigorously to keep Greece out of Europe. He has changed his mind, and we can change our minds.

I turn to the matter of the referendum question. The Foreign Secretary said that it has received approval. I have asked him, in writing, for an explanation of why the question in the Bill refers to "the Treaty establishing a Constitution for the European Union"

when the treaty itself refers to "a Constitution for Europe", but so far I have received no answer. It is vital that there is no ambiguity in the question, and it must therefore be logical that it uses the same descriptive terminology as the treaty, namely: "A Treaty to establish a Constitution for Europe". Indeed, this week the Electoral Commission commented that it "believes that it is important to refer to the name of the treaty in the referendum question."

It notes that the proposed question is a modification of the treaty title rather than the exact title. Its own model question, produced in October 2004, uses the correct name. If there is no significance, as I presume that the Foreign Secretary will eventually tell me when he replies, he will have no difficulty in accepting the amendment that I will table in Committee to achieve the same effect. It is interesting to note that the French question, which has been made public today, uses the precise title of the treaty by referring to the treaty that establishes a constitution for Europe. It would be sensible if our question did the same.

Turning now to the rest of the Bill, it will come as no surprise to the House that we vigorously oppose what is being proposed. We are against a constitution for Europe, and we are against this constitution for Europe. The Bill uses the existing machinery of the European Communities Act 1972 to give legal effect to the treaty under UK domestic law.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley) (Lab/Co-op): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ancram: I am going to develop my theme; I will give way to the right hon. Gentleman later.

The Bill does not seek ratification—it seeks implementation. Even if its implementation depends on an affirmative vote in the referendum, it is nevertheless unacceptable to us, and we will vote accordingly in the Lobby tonight.

Mr. Foulkes: The right hon. and learned Gentleman used to be my pair. My latest pair has crossed the Floor, I am glad to say. The right hon. and learned Gentleman should take a leaf out of his book.

I find it difficult to believe what I am hearing. The right hon. and learned Gentleman is explaining what he is against, but I understand that he is in favour of a major renegotiation of our involvement in Europe. Can he name just one out of the 25 countries that is in favour of the position that he is advancing?

Mr. Ancram: The right hon. Gentleman will have to wait until I reach that part of my speech. I remember with affection the days when the right hon. Gentleman was not trying to ingratiate himself as much as he is at the moment, and when he and I—and Sir Malcolm Rifkind—signed a letter to The Scotsman calling for a free vote on the 1972 legislation. I am not certain that we would have that support and co-operation from him today.

I will come shortly to the reasons for our objections to the constitution and to the myths with which the Government have sought to surround it, but I want first to deal with several points arising from the Bill. It automatically extends the scope of directly effective EU law to the additional areas, such as criminal justice, that are covered by the constitution. In addition, the fundamental provisions of the constitution, including those relating to legal primacy—to which we have long objected—will be given legal effect within our law. There is also a major extension of the Government's power to legislate by statutory instrument. Ironically, that extension of bureaucratic power at the expense of Parliament is not mandated by the adoption of the constitution. It is simply a Whitehall power grab; it is gold-plating the constitution on a grand scale. That from the Foreign Secretary who told us a year ago:

"Transposition of EU legislation into national law also needs attention. The risk of gold-plating the original texts . . . is real."—[Official Report, 11 February 2004; Vol. 417, c. 1417.]

I suggest that he looks again at the Bill in that context. Perhaps he has been too busy drafting pathetic attacks on our policy to notice what his own officials are doing. Far from dealing with gold-plating, the Bill is a new milestone in its onward march.

On top of that, parliamentary approval for constitutional changes in the EU, such as extending qualified majority voting still further, which until now has required primary legislation, will now only require an abbreviated procedure. Contrary to the Government's assurances, European Court of Justice decisions on the common foreign and security policy could have legal effect. We shall want to explore all those issues more deeply in Committee, but the Government's attempts to use time constraints to stifle proper debate may make that difficult.

The Bill is certainly not the inoffensive measure that the Government would have us believe. It sets out to create something that has not existed in this country that is of fundamental importance and creates a fundamental change. The Government know that, which is why they seek to hide it in a miasma of myths. I may have misjudged the Government in one respect. I had thought that their assertion that the real choice facing the British people is whether they want to be in or out of Europe—the Foreign Secretary was rather less assertive about it today, but the Minister for Europe keeps returning to it on the radio—was pure propaganda. I am beginning to conclude that they have become the victims of their own spin and that they genuinely believe it. That could explain why they surrendered on so many matters on which they told us that they would stand firm. It would explain why they are so prepared to sell out our sovereignty and our rights of self-determination.

When will the Government realise that the successful countries in the EU are those that are prepared to fight their corners and stand up for the national interest? France would never have stood by and watched while the EU destroyed a basic national industry, as we have watched our fishing industry being destroyed. No wonder the Government's record on Europe is such a dismal litany of caving in.

Angus Robertson: A moment ago, the right hon. and learned Gentleman mentioned the common fisheries policy. I have asked the question three or four times: will he take the opportunity to apologise on behalf of the Conservative party for signing up to it in the first place?

Mr. Ancram: We have made our current position clear and we intend to pursue such a policy after we win the election in May.

No wonder we are considering a Bill that asks us to sign away yet more of our sovereignty. We have a Government of the white flag and black propaganda. From the Government of the dodgy dossier, we got another dodgy dossier yesterday. It was based on false premises, coloured by false analysis and riddled with false conclusions, but then I read that Alastair Campbell is back. It was not about weapons of mass destruction but our EU policy. The Government use tactics of false myths, which we must expose again and again.

[Mr. Ancram]

The Government claim, incredibly, that the constitution means more power for member states. Former Italian Prime Minister Signor Lamberto Dini was much nearer the truth when he said that, under the constitution

"the Union: . . . will become an institution and organisation in its own right."

I heard the Foreign Secretary on the radio this morning responding to a comment that I had made by saying that what we were experiencing now was not irreversible. I refer him to the remarks of the Prime Minister of France, Monsieur Raffarin, who said in October:

"For the first time, Europe has a shared Constitution. This pact is the point of no return. Europe is becoming an irreversible project, irrevocable after the ratification of this treaty."

The Government claim that the constitution is essential to manage enlargement. Yet five years ago, the Prime Minister was arguing that it was not needed. Six years ago, the Foreign Secretary's predecessor went so far as to tell the House:

"For the record, we are not proposing a constitution of Europe."—[Official Report, 25 May 1999; Vol. 332, c. 184.]

There have been even greater myths. The Prime Minister declared that "we have won every single thing we wanted to secure".

Who was he trying to kid? Of 275 Government amendments to the constitution's text, only 27 got through. That is a success rate of one in 10—hardly "every single thing we wanted to secure".

The charter of fundamental rights, which the Government promised would only ever be a political declaration, is now legally binding. The Prime Minister said that giving the EU a single legal personality would be damaging and boasted after Amsterdam that he had blocked it. Yet under the constitution, the EU gets a single legal personality.

At the convention that drafted the European constitution, the Government tried to strike out the new chapter on energy policy. They failed. They said that the creation of a European Foreign Minister would be "unacceptable", yet in article I–28, there he is. In 1996, the Prime Minister promised, as Leader of the Opposition, that

"we restate our agreement to justice and home affairs remaining outside Community competence"—[Official Report, 16 December 1996; Vol. 287, c. 617.]

Yet the constitution gives the Union jurisdiction over justice and home affairs. The Prime Minister claimed that

"we are not giving up the power to set our asylum laws".—[Official Report, 15 December 2003; Vol. 415, c. 1334.]

He said:

"we will retain complete control over our asylum policy".

However, the European Commission made it clear two weeks ago that that is simply untrue.

In another desperate piece of spin, the Government invented the famous "red lines", which would not be surrendered. However, they broke them, too. They failed to stop the potential establishment of a European public prosecutor. They gave up our veto on criminal procedure law and some penalties and definitions of crime, and they gave up our veto over social security.

Perhaps it is the depth of the Government's failure that explains the extraordinary myths that they have been prepared to propagate. The Prime Minister even claimed that "national Parliaments . . . can in fact block Commission measures".

Even the Foreign Secretary said today that we are considering a yellow flag, not a red flag. All that can do is ask the Commission to review the position; it cannot force it to repeal legislation.

Behind the myths, the reality is that the constitution represents both a strategic defeat and a defeat in detail for the Government. Their trouble is that they have no real vision for Europe, other than a vague one of integration and a desperate fear of being isolated.

Mr. Foulkes rose—

Mr. Mark Hendrick (Preston) (Lab/Co-op) rose—

Mr. Ancram: I shall not give way. The result of the Government's policies has been drift and failure. Hon. Members should not take my word for it but listen to Derek Scott, the Prime Minister's trusted chief economic adviser for six years. [Interruption.] It is wonderful that someone who leaves Downing street becomes a subject of mockery after being regarded as a guru throughout the time spent there. He said:

"The British Government never really thought through its own position."

He should know—he was in the centre of everything. He continued:

"First, it opposed a written constitution and then it put forward its own draft, which was treated with contempt. Then there was all that nonsense about 'tidying up' and the need to produce a clear document that could be tucked in your pocket."

The Foreign Secretary will remember that phrase.

Mr. Scott went on:

"The Government never saw the discussions on the constitution as an opportunity to stand back and think clearly about the appropriate political and economic framework to sustain the EU. There was no strategic thinking. The Government drifted into negotiating over specific details."

The result of that damning indictment is the document that the Government are trying to sell us today.

However, the most worrying aspects are in the detail of the constitution's effects. The charter of fundamental rights will lead to the European Court of Justice making decisions on matters from asylum law to employment law that are currently the province of elected Members of Parliament. As the president of the Court of Justice said, the constitution

"will bring new areas and new subjects under the Court's jurisdiction."

In this country, we are currently debating which party has the best policies to deal with the problems of asylum and immigration. Under the constitution, that debate would be redundant. The relevant decisions would be taken not here but in Brussels. The constitution will vastly extend the EU's powers over our criminal justice.

Mr. Straw: The right hon. and learned Gentleman's comments on the charter are simply untrue and he must know that. Article II-III-2 makes it clear that the provisions of the charter can be justiciable only in respect of interpretation of Acts in relation to EU law. As the Attorney-General said, it acts as a constraint and a brake on the scope of what the EU can do, not an accelerator. Why does the right hon. and learned Gentleman perpetuate something that is incorrect?

Mr. Ancram: The man who will apply the constitution—the president of the European Court of Justice—said that the constitution would bring new areas and new subjects under the court's jurisdiction. He does not accept the Foreign Secretary's point of view. When the right hon. Gentleman talks about a brake, he should consult the opinion of Professor Sir David Edward, who said that the charter was not, in effect, a brake. We should discuss that in Committee because it goes to the heart of the Government's case.

Mr. Quentin Davies: My right hon. and learned Friend has mentioned asylum and immigration policy several times. I find some difficulty in following his argument and, indeed, the argument in the reasoned amendment, to which he put his name. As I read the document, the protocol on page 130 removes from the United Kingdom the application of the new provisions on asylum and immigration law. In other words, we are completely protected and allowed under the protocol to go on legislating about that for ourselves. In what way and why are provisions that explicitly do not apply to this country on asylum and immigration a reason for not acceding to the treaty?

Mr. Ancram: My hon. Friend must learn from experience. We learned in the past three weeks that the Government have already opted into several protocols, which have removed from the House the ability to legislate on that subject. The constitution makes that easier and more likely in future.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab): As the right hon. and learned Gentleman knows, David Edward is a distinguished Scottish lawyer, who is also a pretty ardent European since his time at The Hague. What exactly did he say? I suspect that the quotation was out of context.

Mr. Ancram: He spoke to the European Scrutiny Committee. If I may, I shall write to the hon. Gentleman. I have the quotation in the bundle of papers and I believe that my recollection of Professor Edward's comment is accurate.

Despite protestations that foreign and security policy will not be harmonised, a new European Foreign Minister and diplomatic corps will appear under the constitution. There is even an extension of qualified majority voting in foreign affairs and the Foreign Minister, whatever the Foreign Secretary may say, would, in some circumstances, speak for us at the United Nations. In many other important areas of national interest, including energy policy, employment law and the entrenchment of the common fisheries policy, this constitution means that decisions will no longer be taken in this national Parliament but in the European Union's institutions. Above all, as Derek Scott says, this constitution would "entrench Europe's failings and drag Britain down too. The constitution is a heady brew of bad politics and bad economics . . . its proponents are being disingenuous in their presentations to the British people."

Let us face it, the European Union is not performing as it should. If it had the same record as the United States on creating jobs, 28 million more people would be in work in the European Union today. It is time to take a fresh look, and rejection of this constitution would allow us to go back to the drawing board. The reality is that a European Union of 25—and possibly more—member states can work only if it is generally recognised that different countries want different levels of integration. Why should we not let each country find the level of integration with which it feels comfortable? We need a new, imaginative structure for the European Union, and a flexible approach would ensure that we could create a made-to-measure Europe in which the institutional arrangements comfortably fitted national interests, rather than an off-the-peg Europe that is ill fitting and, as we now know, splitting at the seams.

The Foreign Secretary holds the bizarre view that it is a fantasy to call for the return of powers from the EU to Britain, but surely the real fantasy is to assert that everything that the EU does is best decided at European level and that everything that it has done in the past is now set in stone.

Mr. Foulkes: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ancram: No, I have given way to the right hon. Gentleman before.

There is a growing belief across Europe that some things that the EU does would be better done at national level. I know that it embarrasses Labour Members, but I am going to quote Derek Scott once more.

Mr. Foulkes: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You and my hon. Friends will recall that, in answer to my earlier question, the shadow Foreign Secretary specifically said that he would say which countries supported his line on fundamental renegotiation. He has not yet answered that question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The right hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) knows that that is a matter of debate, and the right hon. and learned Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) has not yet concluded his speech.

Mr. Ancram: You are very percipient, Mr. Deputy Speaker; I was about to come to the point that the right hon. Gentleman asked me about.

Before I do so, however, I want to quote Derek Scott once more. He said that "the point is there are alternatives to the EU constitution. Its proponents argue that returning competences is not on anyone's agenda beyond a narrow euro-sceptic fringe. This is patently not true . . . it should have been on the agenda of the Convention of the Future of Europe. If it was not, it was because the government was too gutless to put it there."

In answer to the right hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) Bernard Bot, the Dutch Foreign Minister has said that "the EU . . . should look expressly at those parts of common policy for which member states could take responsibility again."

[Mr. Ancram]

And Commissioner Margot Wallström has said that

"in the European Commission, we must accept that more power is moved back to the member states".

So the Government's argument that there is no alternative to the constitution, and that it is absurd to call for powers to be brought back to the nation state, is simply bunkum. We, like the Dutch, think that we are better off out of the social chapter, which is adding red tape to British business. And it is because we want our fisheries to thrive like Norway's rather than continue to endure an unsustainable plundering that we believe that national and local control should be restored to our fisheries. By rejecting this constitution, and through negotiation, we can develop a European Union that works better for Britain and better for itself.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton) (Con): On renegotiating existing treaties, surely the question should not be what the EU thinks about that, but what the British people think. An ICM poll in November showed that the British people want renegotiation, and that even more younger people than older people support that proposal.

Mr. Ancram: My hon. Friend makes an important point, and there is a further one to add to it. We have renegotiated successfully in the past. An example would be Lady Thatcher going to secure our rebate. The key to that renegotiation was determination and political will. The problem is that the Labour party has no determination and no political will in this regard.

Mr. Straw: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Europe is facing relative decline. The constitution embodies the ossified thinking that lies behind it, and it is time for a fresh start. The new Commission President's call for jobs and growth to be the priority is welcome evidence that at last new thinking is emerging. Our view is that the European Union is worth renewing. The single market has, despite its faults, been a force for wealth creation. Our air is cleaner as a result of European co-operation on pollution. Old enemies have been reconciled and young democracies have found a stable home through the European Union. We actually want the EU to succeed. But it will not succeed if it is railroaded by a political elite with an overweening ambition to create a European superpower, clinging to an outmoded social model.

The way forward—"forward" is a word the Government use frequently these days—is to reject this constitution. Opposition to it is widespread and growing. Yesterday's Institute of Directors poll of its members found that 49 per cent. were against the EU constitution, with only 29 per cent. in favour. A MORI poll of 100 of the UK's 500 largest firms in January this year found that 60 per cent. of Britain's biggest businesses were opposed to the EU constitution.

We shall now redouble our efforts to remind the British people that they have before them a clear choice between the Government, who are hellbent on giving Brussels more control over our lives, and the Conservative Party, which will reverse that conveyor belt and bring powers back. This Bill represents a defining moment for our country. It is bad for Britain, and I call on the House to support our reasoned amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I see that the right hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) is trying to catch my eye. May I remind all right hon. and hon. Members that the 10-minute rule now starts to apply for Back-Bench speeches?

2.56 pm

Mr. Robin Cook (Livingston) (Lab): I speak to the House as a survivor of the negotiations on the Amsterdam and Nice treaties. As such, I fully understand the complexity of the task that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has had to face. I can share with the House the fact that we managed to get agreement on the complex voting formula at Nice only because, on the last night—and I do mean "night"—I smuggled in a laptop so that we could explain to the delegations how everything added up. I therefore congratulate my right hon. Friend on having at least produced a voting system that can be explained without the use of a laptop.

I sympathise with the patience with which my right hon. Friend has had to endure the 22-carat nonsense that has been talked about the treaty with which he has returned. One of the great instruments of our free press has said that this European constitution represents the greatest threat to English freedom for 1,000 years. Well, 1,000 years encompasses an awful lot of threats. Personally, I would have thought that Hitler, the Kaiser and King Philip of Spain's armada presented a greater threat than Valéry Giscard d'Estaing.

The right hon. and learned Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) has just referred to the section on energy. Attempts have been made to suggest that if we signed up to the constitution, we should have to give away control of our North sea oil. Indeed, I have heard Members on this side of the Chamber argue that case. However, the section on energy could not be more crystal clear: there is nothing in it that affects the right of a nation to control the exploitation of its own energy resources.

It would be a tragedy if the debate on the constitution became dominated by rebutting the myths, fantasies and canards that are told by those in the no camp. It would be a tragedy because there is a powerful, positive case to be made for the constitution—a case, I am bound to say, that should be particularly appealing to those who are critics of the European Union.

I heard the shadow Foreign Secretary on the "Today" programme this morning, which rather interfered with my concentration on brushing my teeth. He claimed that we were once again on the one-way escalator towards giving greater power to Brussels. I have to say to him that that is not what is in the treaty. The treaty ought to be welcomed by those who want to put a limit on the creep of competence to Brussels. It specifically defines, limits and sets down what the competences of Brussels are. Indeed, if the right hon. and learned Gentleman cares to look up article I.13, which lists the exclusive competences of Brussels, he will find that they are modest and short. There are only four such exclusive competences, and only three of them apply to Britain because we are not a member of the euro. There is no substantial expansion of competence anywhere in the constitution. That is why I can understand that Romano Prodi expressed disappointment with the outcome. I cannot, however, understand why those who are worried about powers creeping to Brussels should be disappointed by an outcome that not only places a limit on those powers, but places a limit on them where they already are.

The shadow Foreign Secretary spoke about paving the way for a country called Europe, but this constitution does nothing of the kind. It is explicit that the power of the European Union comes from competences that are conferred by the member states. That is in the first sentence of the first paragraph of the first article of the constitution. One does not need to read 500 pages, just the first sentence, to grasp that elementary principle.

One of the big shifts in the balance with Brussels that the constitution will bring is the result of one of the new big beasts in the Brussels jungle—the full-time President of the European Council. Until now, we have had a deeply unsatisfactory system, with presidents who not only changed every six months—just when they were getting a grip on strategy and direction—but tried to run Europe in the spare time left over from running their own countries. Now we will have something totally different. There will be a full-time president, permanent for two and a half years, probably for five years because it is renewable, based in Brussels with his or her own staff—someone who will actually provide a change in the focus of Brussels to keep tabs on the Commission, initiate proposals and, as it says in the constitution, "drive forward the agenda". For the first time, the member states in the Council will have a full-time, permanent figurehead to set the agenda on behalf of the member states. That is a major shift away from the present balance held by the supranational institutions.

It is also very welcome, I have to say, that we will now know what goes on in the Council of Ministers. For the first time, as a result of the constitution, the Council of Ministers will meet in public whenever it passes legislation. I would have thought that everyone in this Chamber could welcome that, because it ends what was, frankly, an embarrassment. Since the collapse of the Soviet Union, the only legislative body left in Europe that met in secret was the Council of Ministers. It will now meet in public and we can see what is done there, which will make it more accountable, in turn, to the national Parliaments.

I am conscious that this infant constitution gets buffeted on both ears. It gets buffeted on the right ear by Conservative Members, who have a nostalgic yearning for the glory days of the old free-standing nation states, and it gets buffeted on the left ear by some of my hon. Friends who believe that the EU is not sufficiently aggressively socialist. I would encourage my hon. Friends to have a touch of humility when they address the question. Speaking as someone who was Foreign Secretary and, for a while, president of the Party of European Socialists, I know left-wing colleagues on the continent quite well. It may surprise my hon. Friends to hear it, but our continental partners do not think of Britain as a beacon of pioneering left-wing government—[Laughter.] It may astonish colleagues to know that most of the continental parties believe that we are not sufficiently aggressively socialist, and view Britain as being the strongest voice in the Council of Ministers for deregulation and market fundamentalism.

I also have to say that it is our partners, not us, who have insisted on language in the constitution that should be welcome to my colleagues. Among the European values listed in the early pages are combating social exclusion and discrimination, promoting social justice, achieving full employment and social progress. Half of the charter of fundamental rights, which I welcome being written into the constitution, is about economic and social rights, including the right to collective bargaining and collective action, freedom from discrimination, the right to equal pay, paid holidays and reasonable working time. My hon. Friends might like to reflect on the fact that it was precisely because of the prominence given to those rights in the charter that the CBI long vigorously opposed it, which is a reason why Labour Members should be supporting it as a progressive step rather than resisting it.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): My right hon. Friend is trying to seduce the last dinosaurs on this side of the House, but does he accept that we have to reflect on the single market and all that it brings? That is why some of us—revisionists though we be—view this development as an unpalatable move that will lock us further into even more centralisation.

Mr. Cook: I would say gently to my hon. Friend that there is nothing in the constitution that represents increased centralisation. It certainly consolidates existing measures, but the Single European Act was passed a good two decades ago. Another reason why this development should be welcomed is that there are 3 million people who work in Britain on goods that are exported to the EU, which is the market for the great majority of our exports. I personally do not believe that it is a viable long-term strategy to say to our continental partners, "Go and jump into the channel—but do keep buying British". That would not be welcome news to the 750,000 British companies that export to the EU.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, Pollok) (Lab/Co-op): Will my right hon. Friend give way on that point?

Mr. Cook: I happily give way to my hon. Friend, who has made me drop my toothbrush on many occasions.

Mr. Davidson: I am not quite sure about the point of the toothbrush.

My right hon. Friend mentioned 3 million jobs in this country, but does he accept that the EU exports more to us than we do to them, and that in the eurozone there are more jobs dependent on trade with Britain than there are British jobs dependent on trade with the eurozone? In those circumstances, they would not cut off their noses to spite their faces.

Mr. Cook: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his Olympian confidence that Britain has much greater economic weight than the entire eurozone, but I suspect that if he gets down to negotiations it may not look like that, and I would invite him to reflect on the relative percentages. The exports that we send to the eurozone amount to some 10 per cent. of our total gross domestic product, but the exports sent from the eurozone to Britain amount to fewer than 3 per cent. At the end of the day, we need them—I put this gently; I do not want to exaggerate—at least as much as they need us. It may be a bridge too far for my hon. Friend, but I invite him to reflect on the fact that since the euro was created, inward investment coming to Britain as a share of European investment has tumbled to a quarter of the previous level. My hon. Friend should reflect further on what he said, before the economic consequences of that start to affect his own region.

Mr. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Cook: I am terribly sorry, but I have now taken my two interventions for which I get injury time and I have no injury time to take any more. Fortunately, I am capable of counting to two.

I want to return to a point that was implicit in the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) on the Single European Act. Much of it is indeed consolidated inside this text, but although there some new matters are included, I would stress that 80 per cent. of it comprises the existing five treaties to which we have already signed up. Those who want Britain to vote no must be honest and tell people that they would not be voting no only to the new matter, but to the whole basis on which we have been a member of the EU for the last 30 years.

I listened carefully to what the shadow Foreign Secretary said about renegotiation, but when he claimed that Mr. Bot would agree with him to renegotiate, I would point out to him that Mr. Bot signed this constitution. His name appears in the early pages of the document; the idea that he is now going to start renegotiating something that he has already authorised and signed seems to me to be pure fantasy and delusion. In the end, if another dozen European countries have referendums and vote yes, we should not imagine that their Governments are then going to settle cheerfully down and have a look at renegotiating the terms that they commended to their own people.

Lastly, I want to say that when I was Foreign Secretary, I was impressed by the extent to which we live in an interdependent world. Our prosperity, security, freedom from organised crime—even our weather—depend on our success in achieving common approaches with the rest of our continent. The EU is an intelligent progressive model for trying to achieve such agreement. Of course, it is a condition of membership that compromises have to be accepted and that the option of going it alone has to be given up, but those are not just the conditions of membership of the EU, they are conditions of life in our modern interdependent world. In trying to reject the conditions of the EU, those hon. Members who are saying no to the constitution are also seeking to say no to modern reality. That is the case for voting yes to the constitution—for the sensible improvements that it makes to sensible arrangements for the modern world.

3.9 pm

Sir Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife) (LD): We have heard a lot of quotations so far in this debate. I wonder whether, during his time in No. 10 Downing street, Mr. Derek Scott was aware that he had acquired such an extraordinarily authoritative influence over the proceedings of the House of Commons. I shall not follow the style that has been established, other than to refer to a quotation to which the right hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) animadverted a moment ago. Title I of part I of the treaty states that

"this Constitution establishes the European Union on which Member States confer competences to obtain objectives they have in common. The Union shall coordinate the policies by which the Member States aim to achieve these objectives and shall exercise on a Community basis the competences they confer on it."

Those two especially well written sentences contain the essence of the document that we are invited to consider today. I welcome this Bill, and I especially welcome its provisions for a referendum. When Mr. Bryan Gould, as he was then, introduced what I think was new clause 51 of the Bill ratifying the Maastricht treaty—the new clause called for a referendum on that treaty—my Liberal Democrat colleagues and I, and other hon. Members from all parties, voted to support the proposal.

As I have said often in the House before, I believe that it is right, for constitutional and political reasons, to seek the endorsement of the people of the UK when the intention is to change the relationship between Brussels and Westminster. I very much hope that the Bill will pass into law before what we understand to be the date of the general election, although I have some doubts whether sufficient legislative time is available in both Houses of Parliament. If the general election is called for 5 May, I believe that it would be right to fight it on the provisions of this Bill, and in particular on the proposal that the constitution should be ratified.

As far as I know, at no time in history have any British Government signed a treaty that has not been ratified subsequently. However, the logic of those who would reject the Bill and the constitution seems to be that there are no circumstances in which this country would ratify a treaty entered into by our Government. That would be a very novel constitutional position to adopt. It would almost certainly put into very sharp contrast our relations with our EU allies. Therefore, rejection of the Bill would immediately provoke something of a constitutional impasse with the EU, and perhaps worse.

Many people say that the debate on the referendum, when it takes place, must be on the terms of the constitution itself, but I think that they are guilty of wishing for something that cannot be achieved. Does anyone seriously believe that the debate on the referendum, once it begins, will be conducted both in the country and in those newspapers that are most violently against the EU on anything other than the question of whether membership is good for us or otherwise? It will be beholden on us to argue for the principle of EU membership, as well as for the terms and merits of a particular document.

On many occasions I have argued in this House that we should never allow ourselves to forget the turmoil out of which the European Coal and Steel Community was formed, and the purposes of it and its successors.

The aim was to avoid the continent of Europe being subjected to the destruction, war and loss of life that had disfigured it three times in the preceding 80 years. War between EU member states is now inconceivable. That is neither incidental nor fortuitous; it is a consequence of the EU—and, yes, of NATO as well. It is something of which I think that we are too often careless. We too often forget the genesis of the EU, and what it has achieved.

The Foreign Secretary said earlier that our membership of the EU allowed us to join France and Germany in seeking to influence the policies of Iran, in an area that is of vital importance for our security. The remarkable handshake that we saw yesterday may presage a new chapter in the relations between Israel and the Palestinians. The EU, collectively, will have an enormous influence on the outcome of the journey on which Israel and the Palestinians appear to have set out. That influence will stem from what we can contribute and from the political influence that we can bring to bear.

The argument for the EU that will inevitably form part of a referendum campaign must not be allowed to go by default. It is also worth reminding ourselves that only a few years ago eight of the new members of the EU were satellites of the Soviet Union, and that three member states—Spain, Portugal and Greece—were dictatorships. It is inconceivable that those countries would revert to dictatorships, or that the former Soviet satellites would do anything other than adhere to the principles of democracy and open markets that we in this country have taken for granted so long but to which they have sought to aspire.

Mr. Foulkes: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is making a good, logical and well argued case, but is he not worried that his approach will not get over to the British public, because of the media? For example, The Sun would have us believe that 2 million people would be unemployed, that we could not have acted in the Falklands or the Gulf without President Chirac's approval, and that we would lose our seat on the UN Security Council. How can we counteract the myths, lies and rubbish peddled by The Sun and by people such as my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. Davidson)?

Sir Menzies Campbell: The hon. Member for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. Davidson) and I disagree, but I have never yet heard him compared to The Sun newspaper. If I may say so, the comparison is rather a brave one.

However, the right hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) is right to say that there is a case to be made. As the Foreign Secretary will know, I have been critical of the Government in this matter. Since 1997, they have missed too many opportunities to make the European case. It has sometimes been said of the Prime Minister—perhaps a little slightingly—that he thinks that being at the heart of Europe means making a speech in Warsaw every two or three years. The Government could have done more since they have been in office, but I still believe that the referendum campaign can be won, so long as those in this House and outside it who believe that the EU project is worth while and that the constitution is in our interest fully engage in the argument. The campaign can be won, but it will require a great deal of application. We have not seen that application so far.

On the question of myths, we should take our lead from the right hon. Member for Livingston. Earlier, he underlined the importance of the EU in terms of prosperity, economic advantage and inward investment. That approach is more hard-headed than the historical case that I was trying to make earlier, but the two are not mutually inconsistent. Both approaches can march robustly side by side in the campaign for the constitution.

People are able to work, study, live and go on holiday in the EU. More than 750,000 Britons live abroad in EU member states, and at least 100,000 of them work in the EU. People understand the opportunity that the EU gives them, but the case for Europe cannot stand without an openness to reform. Europe has to enhance its democratic accountability, streamline the EU's powers and achieve political stability. The constitution is a necessary part of that.

Since we joined in 1973, there have been four treaties and four further waves of enlargement, from six founder members to 25 members today. That may rise to 27 with Bulgaria and Romania on the doorstep and other countries, such as Croatia and Turkey, knocking on the door.

The EU has more than 20 per cent. of world GDP, a powerful currency, of which the United Kingdom is not a member, and potentially a strong foreign policy role with the opportunity to promote freedom, stability and prosperity beyond its borders. The project is certainly worth while. I hope that we will not conduct our discussion on these matters as if we are engaged in some grand ideological contest, or a form of political combat in which victory is always equated with the successful defence of sovereignty in what is essentially a 19th-century concept, or even older.

In a modern and connected world, sovereignty is not preserved by disengagement. It is undermined by isolation and enhanced by co-operation. In trade, economics, crime, the environment, security, immigration and the campaign against terrorism co-operation is not merely beneficial; it is imperative. As the recent United Nations high-level panel report observes, there has been globalisation not just of opportunities, but of threats and challenges, and only co-operative action will equip us to meet those challenges. Some say—perhaps portentously, but there may be some truth in it—that those challenges have the capacity to damage the very values upon which our nation is based.

I believe that the treaty will provide institutional clarity. As I said, the competences are those conferred by a union of nation states upon the European Union, and those powers and competences now seem to be more clearly defined than before.

On primacy, the Foreign Secretary referred to international law. Going back to 1973, it is clear that under the instrument of accession passed by Parliament, European law has primacy, but to extrapolate from that the notion that somehow our criminal law will now be subjugated to Brussels is wholly contrary to principle and makes no sense whatever. On subsidiarity—I wish that the treaty had gone further—the so-called yellow card principle is worth while, but there would have been a lot to be said for a red card. I have heard the Foreign Secretary's answer to that point, but if we are considering the matter from the point of view of the extent to which domestic Parliaments are controlling what happens in Brussels, a provision that provided for prohibition rather than delay would have greatly enhanced the credibility of the idea that domestic Parliaments can exercise control over what is happening in Brussels.

Mr. Davidson: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Sir Menzies Campbell: I give way to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Pollok, but I will not characterise him as a newspaper of any kind.

Mr. Davidson: The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that he would have liked national Parliaments to have a red card. Surely that is equivalent to a veto. One of the objections to the constitution is that Britain has given up its red card—its veto—in so many areas.

Sir Menzies Campbell: I pause to think, but I cannot immediately bring to mind areas in which the veto has been given up. My understanding is that we have retained it for foreign policy, defence, taxation, social security and own resources. The so-called red lines seem to be eloquent examples of where the veto has not been taken away.

Mr. Straw: May I take the right hon. and learned Gentleman back to the issue of the yellow card? We have had this debate before, and if one third of national Parliaments—effectively, one third of national Governments—tell the Commission that they do not like a proposal, it will have to be reviewed. Moreover, if 45 per cent. of national Parliaments—national Governments—tell the European Union that they do not like a proposal, there is a veto. However, we cannot have the system of yellow cards replacing the system of qualified majority voting.

Sir Menzies Campbell: I understand the constitutional point and I see Labour Members nodding, but I am considering the matter from the point of view of politics, and telling people in the United Kingdom that this is not an irreversible escalator. It would have had some advantage in that regard.

Mr. Allen: In support of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's point, may I add that had we involved this House in more detail with certain areas in which there was a red card, pro-Europeans would have liked that because it would have removed many of the problems—some of which are justified and some of which are merely found by Conservative Members—and undercut the argument against a written constitution. My fundamental point is that we would have been trying to sell the constitution on the basis of an overarching common law instead of going for a referendum on the basis of political expediency.

Sir Menzies Campbell: I have no doubt that the hon. Gentleman will develop that theme if he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

In answering the point made by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Pollok about vetoes, I did not acknowledge the fact that we have accepted qualified majority voting in a number of areas, but that was when it was in our interests to do so. As the Foreign Secretary pointed out effectively, the possibility of reform of the common agricultural policy depends on the exercise of qualified majority voting. If every country possessed a veto in that area, the prospect of making progress with reform would be remote.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory: May I assist the right hon. and learned Gentleman on the point about majority voting? I have a list of 63 new areas, which the Library has confirmed, that have been transferred to majority voting. They include the whole area of criminal justice, including criminal procedures, rules of evidence and rights of the accused. Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman not think that that is a significant advance into a new area by the EU, particularly as such matters will be decided by majority voting, perhaps in defiance of this House? [Interruption.]

Sir Menzies Campbell: Well, as the Foreign Secretary says—not sotto voce, but magna voce from the Treasury Bench—we have either the right of veto or the opt-out. Let us suppose that the House decided to abolish jury trial. None of the provisions to which the right hon. Gentleman referred would prevent it from doing so. I hope that it is highly unlikely that the House would want to do that. [Interruption.] I hope that the Home Secretary is not listening to that. In such areas, the process and principle on which our criminal law systems are based, north and south of the border, are not being attacked by the provisions to which the right hon. Gentleman referred.

As for the presidency of the Council, continuity and coherence in the Council can only be enhanced by the proposals to be made for that office. The Commission is much maligned, sometimes justifiably, but it is worth reminding ourselves that it is half the size of Birmingham city council and has a budget of just over 1 per cent. of European Union income. It is not the monolith as which it is sometimes characterised.

Mr. Richard Bacon (South Norfolk) (Con): If the Commission is so small, why does it have such trouble keeping an eye on its accounts, and why did the Liberal Democrats in the European Parliament congratulate the Commission on the way in which it dealt with Marta Andreasen?

Sir Menzies Campbell: On the accounting procedures of the European Union, if the hon. Gentleman had been present on previous occasions, he would have heard me criticising the fact that the accounts were not signed off. However, a more effective system of auditing the EU's accounts would have some implications. The auditors do not, at the moment, have the right to go to individual countries, but a more effective system would mean extending the auditors' powers to enable them to examine the books here in the United Kingdom. So far, there has been no particular enthusiasm for that. If the hon. Gentleman's point is that the use of public money should be subject to proper scrutiny, that applies as much in the European Union as in the House of Commons—and in that regard, we are at one.

I want to say a word or two about the security and defence policy. This is an important and significant development and already has practical application. The European Union has taken over command and responsibility for peacekeeping in Bosnia, which will be an enormous opportunity as well as an enormous test. It is important to remind ourselves, as it has not featured so far in the debate, that NATO is still affirmed as the bedrock of our collective defence. Indeed, the treaty says:

"commitments under NATO, which, for those States which are members of it, remains the foundation of their collective defence and the forum for its implementation".

I make that point because I do not believe that there is anything to fear in this document, nor do I fear its consequences.

The Guardian, in an editorial this morning, says that the European Union constitution is not a document "to die for". That seems to be a pretty accurate judgment. It also seems to embody sensible reform, which is why I am willing to justify it here, and ultimately in a referendum of the British people.

Joyce Quin (Gateshead, East and Washington, West) (Lab): It is a great pleasure to be able to speak in this debate in support of the Bill, and to follow the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell), whose approach to these issues I often agree with. It is also a pleasure to follow the sparkling contribution of my right hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), who, along with the Foreign Secretary, started to debunk some of the myths about this constitutional treaty.

My starting point is the opinion poll published in The Times yesterday, which showed that Europe was well down the list of issues that people felt were important. Indeed, it was in ninth place, with apparently only 10 per cent. of voters citing it as important. I was pleased that the Labour Government's approach was more popular with voters on this issue. None the less, despite the excitability of large sections of the press, the public do not seem to be very engaged with the issue, which should cause us concern given that those of us who are present for this debate are keen to give a wide public airing to issues on which the public will ultimately have the responsibility to judge.

I understand the public attitude as cited in the opinion poll, however, because despite all the alarmist comments, it seems that many of the issues that are uppermost in the public's mind at the moment—health, education, crime and other matters—are ones on which the European role is almost non-existent. In Prime Minister's Questions today, even though Members knew that the rest of today would be devoted to the European Union, Europe was hardly mentioned if at all, whereas identity cards, crime, the importance of British science and many other issues were much more prominent. We must recognise that, and realise that all of us, despite our own interest in this subject, will have to rise to a huge challenge to make it interesting to the public. Certainly, I hope that the constitution will be disseminated widely, although I sometimes worry that it might become a national cure for insomnia in the process.

Many comments have been made, especially in interventions, about the referendum question. I have not changed my attitude on that—I feel that this particular constitutional treaty was not an appropriate subject for a referendum. It is no different from Maastricht, Nice and other treaties on which we have not held referendums. I sometimes worry, given the increasing number of referendums that we are holding in our country, whether we should at least have some ground rules about the principles according to which we proceed to holding a referendum. After all, we have welcome legislation on the conduct of referendums, but nothing on the statute book—of course, we have no written constitution—to say in what circumstances it is appropriate to hold national referendums. I feel somewhat uncomfortable about the way in which we are proceeding in that respect.

Mr. Hopkins: My right hon. Friend talked about the ground rules for referendums. Does she agree that making sure that both sides in referendums have equal resources and limits on their spending in campaigns would be fair ground rules?

Joyce Quin: On this issue, I generally support the provisions contained in the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2004, which provide a fair framework. Having been on the wrong side of a referendum in the north-east of England recently, I am well aware that both sides in that referendum felt that they at least had equal access to the media and that they were able to raise funds on an equal basis. There were not many grumbles about the conduct of the referendum, even though, to my mind, the result was a great disappointment.

Mrs. Browning: Does the right hon. Lady think that it is fair that the yes and no campaigns in referendums have only a six-month period, but the Government can continue spending money until 28 days before the referendum takes place? After all, the Government are already spending a lot of our money on this campaign.

Joyce Quin: The hon. Lady should reflect that Government policies are continually tested in the House and in the media, and a wide public debate always occurs, as we found on the devolution question. Generally, the rules adopted on the conduct of referendums are satisfactory. I am not opposed to considering possible amendments in future, but the framework for holding a reasonable referendum exists.

This is a difficult subject for a referendum, however. I strongly support the idea of a referendum on the single currency, but that is on a fairly straightforward principle, with a fairly straightforward choice to be made. This constitutional treaty, which includes so many different aspects and, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Livingston pointed out, is 80 per cent. dominated by the existing treaties, is a particularly difficult issue on which to hold a referendum.

Ideas have already been put forward in the debate as to whether the referendum is about whether we should be in or out of the European Union or what issues will be involved. I well remember dealing with the Maastricht treaty and talking to some people who were understandably keen on animal welfare. They urged us to vote against the treaty if it did not have a strong reference to animal welfare. A huge treaty that deals with many different issues poses a danger that the debate can be hijacked by isolated subjects in an unhelpful way. I have real worries about that.

Having accepted that we are having a referendum, however, and that there is little point in crying over spilt milk, those of us who support the constitutional treaty will have to consider ways of making the arguments to the public and of trying to give as realistic and accurate a picture about what the treaty involves as we can. In that respect, I follow the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Livingston and the Foreign Secretary. I believe that this treaty, in so far as it makes changes, makes sensible and welcome ones. It simplifies some of the existing text, delineates the areas where the European Union can and cannot act, provides for an increased role for national Parliaments and generally involves sensible institutional changes as a result of the welcome enlargement of the European Union.

It also gives us the opportunity to debunk the various myths about the Queen being replaced as our Head of State. In that respect, I was interested that The Spectator said way back in 1972 that if the Queen signed the then European Communities Act, she would be signing away her birth rights. Thirty or more years later, there seems no danger of that happening or being likely to happen in any kind of foreseeable future.

Indeed, some of the scare stories about taxation need to be debunked. It was established in the treaty of Rome that the European Commission has the power to make taxation proposals, but in reality, such matters still require unanimity. Rather than steamrollering towards a common taxation system, progress down that route for those who want to make such progress—has been incredibly slow.

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon) (LD): Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Joyce Quin: I have already given way twice and I am afraid that I am unable to do so again. I apologise to the hon. Gentleman.

The reality is that in a common market, taxation tends to approximate over time, not because people are being forced down that route by the European Commission, but simply because of the logic of the working of that internal market.

I hope that we will discuss today the regional considerations relating to the EU and the constitutional treaty. In my own area, the debate on Europe is sometimes somewhat different in tone from that in certain other parts of the country, perhaps partly because one of the major employers in my constituency is the Nissan car plant, which does most of its export trade with Europe and thinks along very European lines. The attitude towards the EU of my constituents who work in that plant is often different from that of others. It is important that we discuss during the referendum campaign not just the importance of Europe to our economy in general, but the way in which such importance breaks down in different areas of the UK.

The Labour Government have made many solid achievements in their approach to Europe. We negotiated very successfully in Amsterdam, at the Berlin summit and during discussions on the Nice treaty, when the disagreements were between the French and the Germans, rather than with us. We have therefore achieved what we set out to achieve, which is important, but I should point out respectfully to Ministers that sometimes, we overstate the case for a victory for Britain, as if we had secured such a victory against everyone else. In reality, on most issues, most of the time, we have many allies. I attended several Council meetings as a Minister with various areas of responsibility, and I was always struck not by the amount of conflict but by the great consensus that dominated such meetings. As a result, most of the time they proceeded very smoothly indeed.

The challenge of the referendum is daunting, but through that process we should aim to give our citizens more information, provide a more realistic picture of what the EU does, rebut some of the sillier myths that seem to abound, and put forward a vision of sensible, practical co-operation that is good for Britain and for Europe. I hope that we can prove successful in this task.

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks) (Con): It is always a pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Joyce Quin), who has further illustrated that this issue always causes divisions within parties, as well as across them. There are Members who are in favour of the treaty but against a referendum, while others take the opposite view. Reference has already been made to many British traditions being under threat, but this debate shows that the splendid British tradition of being utterly inconsistent and unpredictable, as the right hon. Lady has pointed out, on the question of when to hold referendums is fully alive, as it will be at the conclusion of this debate and when the Bill completes its passage.

That said, I welcome the fact that the Government have concluded that there should be a referendum. Like my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram), I believe that the matter should have been dealt with in a Bill separate from that implementing the treaty, but it is good that the Government have executed this handbrake-turn just before the European elections.

I want to draw our attention to people outside this House, who will be puzzled by the criteria that we apply to this issue, to the question of the constitutional treaty. It is common ground in this House that there is a great deal of public disaffection with the political process, and that disillusionment with politics has grown greatly in recent decades. To the shame of all of us who were candidates or leaders of our parties, the turnout at the last general election was 59 per cent. Comparable figures in polls today show that the percentage of people who are certain to vote at the next election is perhaps in the lower 50s. Such great disaffection is partly the result of the increased gulf between the people of this country and the decisions that are made in their name. The increasing integration of political power in the EU, which is a key part of that process, is a fundamental part of my objection to this treaty and a fundamental test against which constitutional change should be judged.

We must ask whether, at a time of disaffection, such change makes matters better or worse. This constitution will make matters worse. Those who have followed the political debates of the past few weeks will have noticed that powers have been transferred to the EU in an alarming number of areas. When my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition proposed a limit on the number of immigrants to this country a couple of weeks ago—there will be different opinions in the House about the merits of that proposal—the European Commission made it clear that he would not have the power to implement such a limit. [Interruption.] The Minister appears to be contradicting that interpretation, which would be important news.

Mr. MacShane: I think that the Commission simply pointed out that under the 1951 convention, to which we are committed, Britain cannot limit the number of refugees. It was talking not about economic migrants but purely about the terms of the 1951 convention, by which we are treaty-bound.

Mr. Hague: There is clearly a difference of opinion between Government and Opposition Front Benchers on this issue, which it is important to clarify. As I understood it, despite all the assurances about opting out, because the Government had signed the qualifications directive, thereby opting into the latest EU arrangements, this country was now committed to the additional immigration policies adopted by the EU.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: What is beyond doubt is that the constitution would make it permanently impossible to leave the 1951 convention; indeed, such a principle is entrenched not only in the constitution itself, but in the EU charter of fundamental rights. So from that point on it would be impossible for any incoming Government, after winning a general election, to do anything about that convention.

Mr. Hague: My right hon. Friend has immense knowledge of this subject, and that sounds like the correct interpretation. [Interruption.] I hope that the Minister listened to it, although he is not showing much sign of having done so.

Let us consider other subjects, small and large. A couple of weeks ago, we debated in this House the European food supplements directive, of all things. People may wonder why on earth it is the business of any level of government to be supervising such a thing, let alone a layer of government beyond the control of the people of this country. Now, if people ask their Member of Parliament to do something about that issue, the answer is, "We cannot do anything about it." Even if we vote against the measure, it will still take legal effect.

A tax case is being heard in the European courts this very week. Marks & Spencer is in dispute with Her Majesty's Treasury, and that case may have bigger implications for taxation in this country than even anything that the Chancellor might wish to introduce in his forthcoming Budget. We are talking about vast sums of money. In that case, the European Court will decide British tax law. Marks & Spencer is taking the case under provisions that were never intended to transfer rights over taxation to the European Court.

Whether it is an enormous subject such as immigration or taxation or whether it is something much more minor in our national affairs such as food supplements, which are important to hundreds and thousands of people, people see each day that more and more power has been drained away from our national Parliament and is now under the control of the institutions of the European Union. The separation between the people of this country and the ability to decide the laws that are made in their name is very dangerous for a democracy. The power to set such policies is among the attributes of a nation, and the people's power to control the setting of such policies is among the fundamental attributes of democracy.

We come across relevant examples all the time. The working time directive was introduced years ago under qualified majority voting and against the opposition of the British Government, and years later, it has many different effects. Those of us who represent rural constituencies have seen services within the NHS become more difficult to maintain because of the working time directive.

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage) (Lab) rose

Mr. Hague: I will not give way to my former hon. Friend, because, as the right hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) said earlier, injury time is up.

This country did not agree to the working time directive. This country would never have initiated the directive, which was dreamed up by officials who do not live in this country and who know nothing of the circumstances in our health service. Although the Foreign Secretary can give assurances on occasions such as this, more and more power has been given away across a wide range of policies. The situation is dangerous, and the constitution will give away more power—the President of the European Court has said that the charter of fundamental rights will open new areas and subjects to the Court. The hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) knows the charter very well because we often tease him about it. A few years ago, he said that it would have the legal force of the Beano. Now, the President of the European Court says that it takes in new areas and new subjects.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) has pointed out, the list of areas that have been added to qualified majority voting and from which the veto has been taken away is long. I am astonished that the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell) is not familiar with that list, because it is a very long list indeed.

Large parts of the constitution are, of course, incomprehensible, and one cannot know what it will mean in the future. However, we know from our experience of the working time directive what such legislation can come to mean over time. The separation between the people, who are meant to exercise their democratic rights, and the institutions working in their name continues. In the United States' constitution, the separation of powers means the separation of the Executive, the judiciary and the legislature. In the European constitution, the separation of powers means the separation of the right to make laws from the people, who should decide democratically the laws that are made in their name. That separation will result in catastrophe in due course.

The Foreign Secretary has provided the reassurance that subsidiarity will come into play. However, the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife gave the game away when he said that subsidiarity should have been strengthened for political and presentational reasons. One gets the sense that the whole thing is for political and presentational reasons.

Subsidiarity has been described as a "yellow card", which sounds like a forceful sanction, but there is no referee to exercise it. Instead, one must get members of the crowd to agree to show the yellow card and to get other members of the crowd from other countries to show the same yellow card at the same time, as a result of which nothing can happen. A blocking provision—a red card—would have been better, but that would conflict with the destruction of the veto across a wide range of policies, so it is clearly impossible to introduce a blocking provision within the framework of the constitution.

We have been told that a new safeguard will be introduced against the abuse of European Union power, but it is unlikely to be used in practice in this House. It is highly unlikely that a majority in this House, which would normally mean a majority over the Government of the day, would object to an EU directive at the same time as the same thing is done in the Bundestag or the French National Assembly. Even if it were to happen, under the constitution the European Commission could turn round and say, "No; we maintain our previous opinion. You can all go away." Where will our country's democracy stand when we arrive in that situation?

Those are fundamental objections to the ever-growing power of European institutions, but there are many other objections. For example, those European institutions have a scandalous inability to control expenditure. That point has already been referred to, and when I raised it in this House a couple of months ago, the Minister for Europe shrugged his shoulders and said that a lot of the fraud occurs in the national Governments of the European Union. However, some of the worst fraud occurred in EUROSTAT, which is under the direct control of the European Commission. The right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife compared the European Commission to Birmingham council in its time, but if the district auditor had come back here and told us that for 10 years running, 95 per cent. of the expenditure of Birmingham city council had been open to fraud, corruption and abuse, we would have shut down Birmingham city council by now.

It is absolutely intolerable that this situation exists and I want to know from the Minister—as I asked him two months ago—when he winds up the debate, what he has been doing about it in the meantime, and when a British Minister will go to the Council of Ministers, bang the table and say, "If you want money from the hard-working British taxpayer, you have to show how it is being spent." It cannot be right to give more power to European institutions; this is the latest example of a string of treaties that do so, and they are not even fit to exercise the power and the money already placed in their hands.

There is a long list of other important objections, but I shall rest on that one and the more fundamental one that I have put forward—that a separation between the people who live in a democracy and the way that they are governed and the laws made in their name will be deeply damaging in the long run, and we will regret it.

Mr. Bill Tynan (Hamilton, South) (Lab): I am delighted to follow the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague). I have listened to the speakers from both sides of the House; I am in exalted company today.

I believe that the constitutional treaty was a success for the Government, and I think that we were successful because we led from a strong position, because we are integrated with Europe. A treaty is necessary simply because when there are 25 states—when there is an enlargement of that degree—there is no choice but to look at the constitution and the existing treaties. The intention was that the treaties would be used to bring government closer to the people and bring Europe closer to the people. If we can effectively implement the treaty as has been suggested, I think we will give clarity to the European Union and could help to reduce people's disenchantment with Europe. Taxation, foreign policy, public services, the economy and defence were separated out, and in each case that separation was maintained by the Government. There were red lines that we decided we would not cross, and they have been secured; that was of the utmost importance.

The new treaty is important in itself. I accept that it establishes a constitution for Europe. I had some doubt about whether we should hold a referendum; I did not think that we needed to, because I did not believe that the changes were significant within the treaty itself. But we have taken a decision. We will have a referendum and we should move in that direction.

Much of the content of the new treaty is already set out in the existing treaties, and basic principles, such as the primacy of the treaty and the law made under it, remain the same. The primacy of Community law has been with us since 1964, and it is not a novel doctrine, as far as I am concerned, since a state has never been able to plead a provision of its own law as a reason for not complying with a treaty obligation. The 1964 provision existed, but we are not changing it in any significant way.

I believe that the new treaty is less integrationist than the existing treaties. For example, the new treaty confirms unambiguously that the Union has only the competences conferred by the member states. That point has been made by a number of speakers. The European Court, it is generally accepted, has been reluctant to develop any concept of "implied powers", and I believe that the new treaty may well discourage that further. Secondly, the new treaty makes express provision for a state to leave the Union, and the point is made that if we are so concerned about the powers of the European Union, the opportunity is still there for us to withdraw if necessary.

It may have been implicit in existing treaties that states had a right to withdraw, and I think that that will be confirmed. The new provisions confirm that member states are principal actors. The case of Costa v. ENEL in 1964 spoke of the permanent sharing of sovereignty. That would no longer be the case with the new treaty. It is also clear that no state could be forced to accept it against its wishes.

Much has been said about how bad the treaty will be for Britain and how we should be greatly concerned about it. We have to deal with the myths that have been perpetrated and consider the federalist proposals that have been rejected. They are: the EU should be named the united states of Europe; the EU should have certain competences organised on a federal basis; there should be EU-wide taxation; the Commission President should be elected by EU citizens; there should be majority voting for deciding EU foreign policy; there should be majority voting for treaty amendments and an end to ratification of treaties by national Parliaments; the Commission President should chair the European Council, with his presidency and the European Council presidency merged into one; there should be a European mutual defence guarantee, separate from NATO; unanimous voting should be abolished and replaced with qualified majority voting; and the EU Foreign Minister should be accountable to the Commission, not national Governments.

We have to deal with the issues before us today and those that are important to the people of this country. We talk about human rights. I wanted the European charter to go further and extend equal rights to trade unions and trade unionists in this country. We have maintained our dignity and peace in this country for a long time, and the EU has played a vital part in that.

In response to the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks, we should be deciding whether the constitution makes things better or worse. I think that it will improve matters for this country. It will make things easier to understand. The treaty does not alter significantly what has been endorsed by previous Governments. I ask the House to support the Government because the concept is worth while.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke (Rushcliffe) (Con): I am a strong supporter of the new constitutional treaty for the European Union and I shall vote in favour of the Bill's Second Reading. However, I want to express, and this is probably the last suitable occasion on which I can do so, my strong reservations about one part of it. I shall vote for that part with great reluctance because I strongly disapprove of the provisions on the referendum.

The greatest change that we are making to our tradition of parliamentary democracy in this country and the role of this Parliament in our national life is the concession to determine the decision in a referendum. We will never again win back for Parliament the right to control the nature of our relationships with the European Union. The only other European referendum was widely regarded on all sides as a cynical manoeuvre by Mr. Harold Wilson, who had to finesse his party and to get around it to endorse our continued membership of the EU. He pretended to hold a referendum on a financial deal of no great importance that he had renegotiated when he came into office after 1974.

I very much regret the then Prime Minister of my Government persuading me to agree to a referendum on the euro. I am not going to go back on that. We may, in due course, have one, but I agree with the right hon. Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Joyce Quin) that at least it would be on one narrow finite judgment. I am not sure that a modern industrial democracy should be entrusting its monetary policy to a referendum, but so be it, and I shall take part in that debate, if and when it ever arises.

Mr. Cash: Is my right hon. and learned Friend proposing to vote on the reasoned amendment, which lays such emphasis on the supremacy of this Parliament in respect of the implementation of the treaty? Does he not recognise that if the part of the Bill that deals with implementation is defeated, there will be no need for a referendum?

Mr. Clarke: Out of deference to the party system on which this Parliament is based, I almost certainly will remain seated in my place when the reasoned amendment is put. As the opinions of so many of my colleagues and of my party have changed so much over the years, I shall wait for them to veer back in my direction. I quite concede that my hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) has as good a record for consistency as I have on the subject, but he will know how unpredictable our course can be.

Going back to my point about the referendum, I support the treaty and I believe it is an important document, but I do not believe it makes such important differences to our relationships with Europe as did the European Communities Act in 1972, the Single European Act in the late 1980s or the Maastricht treaty in the early 1990s. They were all far more significant pieces of legislation determining our constitutional arrangements.

Parliament had more than one day for Second Reading on most of those. There was huge resistance to the idea of guillotining even a day's debate, let alone timetabling the whole thing, which was all taken on the Floor of the House of Commons. I took an active part in all that. I was one of the two Whips designated to be in charge of the original 1972 Bill, so I listened to hours of debate, even if I was silent during it. A huge, protracted, important, high-quality debate took place about the principle of the primacy of European legislation over British legislation in areas of European competence. That is what it was all about, and similar debates took place thereafter.

There was a free vote in 1972. Here we all are, proud parliamentarians, and what are we saying? The vote in the House is not going to decide the issue at all. At the general election, people can freely vote for their party, regardless of their views on Europe, because the general election vote will not determine a damn thing. We can have, if we wish, a treaty negotiated by the British Government, and we can have it ratified by the British Parliament, but the decisions on this treaty will be determined by a popular plebiscite in which the national media will endeavour to play as large and as influential a role as possible. I cannot allow that to pass without comment, even though it takes part of the 10 minutes which, under our present arrangements, we are allowed to express our views on the future of our relationships with the European Union.

The referendum will be a huge disappointment to practically everybody, not least to the side that loses. It will be a lottery. The history of referendums shows that they are a lottery. They have been a lottery in the rest of Europe, where most of the countries saddled with the need to hold referendums deeply regret it, but of course I hope the referendum lottery goes my way. It will be very difficult to get large numbers of people to vote in it. Most people will continue to say, as they do now, that they are not quite sure what it is all about and what the treaty will do. We will all infuriate the public as we debate it in ever more strident terms, because as is clear from this debate, there will not even be agreement within the two sides of the argument about what the treaty does.

We have had the most ferocious arguments. I have already debated the issues several times with my right hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory), and as many audiences can testify, the two of us are quite incapable of agreeing on what the consequences of the treaty are. As that goes on, the danger is that even my right hon. Friend and I will lose adherents on all sides as people get exasperated by a Parliament so foolish as to put such a huge and complex subject to a popular vote.

How will British Governments negotiate in future, when everybody who negotiates with the British Government on anything with a European tinge will know that the Government can agree, the Government might have a parliamentary majority behind them, but the Government can guarantee to deliver nothing because they must go to a plebiscite on any deal they do? Far from strengthening the hand of a Minister, it is my judgment, and the former Foreign Secretary, the right hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), may agree, that that will weaken the hand of every Minister in negotiations. Any negotiating partner will think, "We've got to watch these fellows. Anything they agree will get overturned afterwards."

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con) rose—

Mr. Clarke: I still have injury time, so I shall take an intervention from my hon. Friend, who is a particular old friend of mine.

Sir Patrick Cormack: Does my right hon. and learned Friend not concede that his argument applies to most Governments in the European Union which, when they negotiate something of fundamental importance, have to hold a referendum? I do not particularly like those instruments, but my right hon. and learned Friend's argument is rather weak.

Mr. Clarke: In my experience, referendums did not strengthen the position of Irish or Danish Ministers. Whatever they were arguing for, we knew they would have considerable difficulty in getting anything past their public when they got home. They were asked to go back and persuade the public to change their mind. It is a pity that the British, who have one of the strongest traditions of parliamentary democracy in the western world, are moving towards that position. I am resigned to fate. Such is the power of the media that all three major political parties have endorsed enthusiastically the idea of a referendum. The last to agree was the Prime Minister, and his was the weakest gesture, because he had already revealed his true opinion. Who am I to do anything but protest about the further sad decline of Parliament?

Mr. Hopkins rose—

Mr. Clarke: I am afraid that I do not have any more injury time.

The importance of the treaty has been hopelessly exaggerated. I am genuinely surprised that it has become the centre of controversy, but the referendum is likely to prove a cathartic moment in this country's relationship with the European Union. I did not see it coming, because every supporter of the enlargement of the EU always assumed that there would have to be a revision of the treaties. There was an unsurprising declaration in Nice that we would have to readdress fundamental aspects of the consolidated treaties once enlargement had taken place. We all supported enlargement and noted the need for subsequent constitutional change to improve the efficiency of the union.

Enlargement is, after the collapse of the Soviet Union, one of the most dramatic political events of my lifetime. One of the objectives of the EU, which no longer needs to stop wars breaking out between us, is to consolidate parliamentary democracy, liberal values and market economics across the continent. Just as the three former fascist states of Spain, Portugal and Greece were admitted to entrench those values among their populations so, most importantly, eight former members of the Soviet empire have joined for the same purpose. That is the great political objective of most of the other 24 member states and, I hope, ourselves. The orange faction in Ukraine and the popular Government in Turkey aspire to join the EU while we debate the constitutional changes made to facilitate its enlargement.

I shall not go back over the efficiency gains that are the obvious and desirable consequence of enlargement. The end of the rotating presidency, for example, is an advantage. We could not have 25 six-monthly presidencies changing the agenda all the time, although that would be the result if we rejected the treaty. There will be one foreign affairs spokesman rather than two, and foreign policy, according to the treaty, will be determined by the Governments of member states and their Foreign Secretaries in council. I faithfully supported the extension of majority voting when it was proposed by Margaret Thatcher as Prime Minister, and I advocated it when the Single European Act was passed in the late 1980s. The extension of majority voting to all the new areas is essential, otherwise there could be a Maltese or Latvian veto on details of business that we are trying to administer.

Most of the treaty restates the consolidated treaties. As the right hon. Member for Livingston said, 80 per cent. of it is simply a restatement of the great previous treaties, each and every one of which I supported. Most of them were supported by the Conservative party and negotiated by Conservative Governments. The treaty also makes it clearer than ever before that this is a union of nation states, not a superstate, that power is devolved to the union by the member states, and that there is an enhanced and clearer role for national Parliaments on subsidiarity.

I want finally to comment on the merits of the treaty in response to all the extraordinary negative claims, most of which I have heard voiced before, every time we have had a European treaty over the years. It has always apparently meant the end of our monarchy, the beginning of higher taxation, the end of our control over our criminal justice system and all that other stuff. The reinforcement of the Union of member states and of the market economy is the concept that has caused the biggest reservations elsewhere. Recently, I met Laurent Fabius, the former socialist Prime Minister, who makes me look like a Eurosceptic, and I expressed my astonishment about his proposal to vote against the treaty. He said, "It is la Britannique; it is not European enough." That is the true opinion in France—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. The right hon. and learned Gentleman is out of time.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): It is always a pleasure to follow the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), partly because his views on Europe are identical to mine. Maybe that is due to the influence of Caius college on us during our education; all the MPs in the House today produced by it are pro-European.

I urge the right hon. and learned Gentleman not to get cross about the fact that we have a Bill on the referendum, or indeed, about the referendum itself. I urge him to save his energy for the referendum campaign because he is a voice of reason on the Conservative Benches. What has been important in the debate is the large number of speeches of high quality. We do not agree with some of the views expressed today, but it is important that we continue the debate in the country.

During the past few years, we have not had a sensible debate on Europe and European policy in the country at large, although we have, of course, had such debates in the House. We regularly hear from the Foreign Secretary and the Minister for Europe about forthcoming summit meetings, and the relevant Adjournment debates are usually attended by some of the hon. Members who are here this afternoon. If we are to explain what Europe is about and deal with the myths that have been created, partly by some Conservative Members, but especially by the tabloid media, which hate anything to do with the European Union, we have to have this debate outside the House.

I commend the Foreign Secretary and the Minister for Europe on the work that they have done in advancing the debate, but I say this to the Government: if we are to succeed during the next 18 months in explaining to people what we are planning to do with regard to the European Union, we ought to encourage other Ministers to do what the Foreign Secretary and the Minister for Europe do so well—go out into the country and explain how their portfolios are related to the way in which Britain has benefited from being part of the European Union.

Sitting next to my old boss, the former Foreign Secretary, my right hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), reminds me of events in Nice. I shall reveal a secret about my right hon. Friend and how he conducted policy. It was, of course, brilliantly conducted, but those of us who worked for him knew when he was getting frustrated about the way in which the European Union operated, because officials were asked politely, as I was sometimes asked, to get him some frothy coffee. Frothy coffee was the drink that he had when he needed to be calm about the frustrations of the European Union.

It was because of the frustrations that I and other former Ministers for Europe witnessed that I welcome the European constitutional treaty. It will do what has not happened during the past few years following enlargement: it will reform the way in which the European Union operates. My right hon. Friend the Member for Livingston will recall, as will all former Ministers, the frustration of having to deal with a European Union of only 15 members; it now has 25, with the possibility of even more joining. The right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe mentioned Romania and Bulgaria, which will join in 2007. Croatia is set to begin negotiations on 17 March, subject to the conditions laid down, and there is a possibility that Turkey will begin negotiations later this year. The right hon. and learned Gentleman also mentioned Ukraine. All those countries are desperately trying to join the European Union, but there are still those in the House and the country who want to take us out of it. It is therefore vital that we have this referendum and that we have a discussion about the way in which the EU can perform better. By reforming the way in which it operates, we will get better results for the British people.

My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. Davidson) said that the EU does not deliver any services, that it is not as good as Birmingham city council. As I have said before, the British people will never learn to love the EU until it learns to love reform; the organisation and the institutions have to be reformed. It is doing what Britain has wanted it to do under the two outstanding Foreign Secretaries who have represented our country during the last eight years—my right hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Livingston.

The whole agenda of Europe has changed. When we arrived at the negotiating table in 1997, Britain was isolated. The agenda has moved forward because Britain has engaged positively; Ministers have engaged positively in the way in which the EU has operated. That is why, on EU policy, we have nothing to fear from qualified majority voting. We are right to be reminded that the Maastricht treaty extended QMV in 30 areas, and that treaty was voted for by probably the majority of the right hon. Members on the Opposition Benches. There was no call for a referendum on Maastricht when that was being discussed.

Mr. Cash: Oh yes, there was.

Keith Vaz: I give credit to the hon. Gentleman, because he did call for one, but I meant from the then Government Front Bench. There was no call from the then Prime Minister, or from members of the Cabinet, including the current Leader of the Opposition, for a referendum on Maastricht. They were in favour of the House of Commons deciding on that treaty without the need for a referendum.

[Keith Vaz]

We should not fear QMV. Look at the results of decisions taken by QMV—this is Britain's agenda! They are what we have sought to do. We are rarely isolated on policy decisions with QMV, because we are in the majority.

I welcome the fact that we will have an EU Foreign Minister, because it is vital that one voice should speak on foreign policy when member states have made a decision.

Mr. Burnett: The hon. Gentleman has shared with the House the secrets of the former Foreign Secretary's coffee-drinking habits. May I share another secret with the House? At the behest of the hon. Gentleman, I attended a dinner some years ago to celebrate the emasculation of the EU charter of fundamental rights. Was the dinner premature? Is he happy that we celebrated a success or failure?

Keith Vaz: I will come to the charter in a second, because I want to answer what the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) said about me.

One thing that we foresaw was possible tension between Javier Solana and Chris Patten, but the fact is that that never happened, because both gentlemen carried out their jobs with great distinction. It is absurd, none the less, to have two people speaking on foreign policy on behalf of the EU. The then American Secretary of State said that if he wanted to find out Europe's view on foreign policy he had to ring 15 Foreign Ministers. Now, an American Secretary of State will be able to talk to one person. It will, of course, be up to the member states to decide what that foreign policy will be, but it is essential that we have some kind of strategic approach to the way in which foreign policy is worked out. That began, not at St. Malo, but with Maastricht, the treaty signed by Opposition Members. They signed up to the start of the common foreign and security policy, which is now represented in this constitutional treaty.

The right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks teased me about the charter of fundamental rights, but he should be careful whom he teases, because he should recall that I gave him his first break in politics when I made him secretary of the all-party leather and footwear industries group when he had been here for only six months. That was not because of a personal interest in leather and footwear industries; it was a constituency interest that he shares with me, and look how well he has done.

The point about the charter is that it was negotiated by our present Attorney-General. He had conduct of that policy. When he went into those negotiations, he was on his own, and he managed to convince all the other people and countries represented to turn towards this country's point of view. The point that I made at that time, many years ago—I remember where I was when I made it—was that the charter, like any other legal document or any other publication, can be produced before any court in the land.

The fact is that the charter is not being extended to include more rights. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan) wants it extended to make such provision, but what is to be incorporated does not do that: it consolidates what is there and talks about the proper and appropriate rights that my right hon. Friend the Member for Livingston mentioned—rights of which we should all be proud.

It is not enough to pass the Bill. What is important is the campaign that follows it. That means that right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House who believe that Britain's place is right at the centre of Europe—engaged in it rather than isolated—need to come out and fight for the right to be part of the European Union. Unless we do that, and unless the Government are prepared to do it, I fear that we might do badly in the referendum campaign. Let the Bill not be an end: let it be the start of a proper campaign that will bring to the attention of the people of this country the real benefits of Britain being right there at the centre of Europe.

Mr. David Curry (Skipton and Ripon) (Con): I have seen the European Union as a journalist, as a Member of the European Parliament, from the perspective of the Council of Ministers and from the perspective of a Select Committee. The conclusion that I have drawn from all that is that Europe ought to be a great deal more about politics and a lot less about religion.

Europe does not have an indelible character, and it does not have a predetermined route. It is a product of member states that have joined at different times with different cultures, political traditions and priorities. So those who say that they want to know where the train is going before they are accused of missing it will never have a permanent destination on the engine, because it goes to different places simultaneously. That is the nature of the beast. People who are looking for the sort of coherence that we hope for in national politics will never find it in the European Union. It is an absolutely unique organisation with its own chemistry, and we have to apply different rules to it. Of course, some rules must be the same, such as the rules of sound accountancy, but it is very many years since the Department for Work and Pensions was acquitted by its auditors, so we might look at the motes in our own eye as regards finance.

I shall vote yes tonight on Second Reading, for the simple reason that what this treaty proposes is better than what is there now. It is not as much better as I would like, but, none the less, the role of national Parliaments, the coherence of decision making, the European Union's ability to operate external policy, the safeguards for member states, and the increasingly intergovernmental philosophy are positive gains.

I understand the criticisms that the constitution reflects what people believe to be too inward-looking an institutional regulatory attitude on the part of the European Union, and that it fails to establish clear enough frameworks to compete in a global world. However, by and large those are much more failures of the member states than of institutional arrangements in Europe. They call for political will. The painful steps that the French Government are taking to liberalise the 35-hour week and the flak that Chancellor Schröder has taken in Germany for what we regard as relatively modest steps to free up the pension system show how difficult that is.

Those who advocate voting no have not demonstrated to me that any of those problems will be solved by doing so. My own Front-Bench spokesman talked of going back to the drawing board. It is fantasy to think that the European Union will go back to the drawing board in response to a British no in order to fashion a treaty that many of them think reflects British priorities even more than we do. One need only look at the demonstrators in Paris to see how much opposition is born from precisely the opposite interpretation to that of the United Kingdom.

Voting no would risk the Franco-German creation of an inner core and I do not subscribe to the view that it is in Britain's interests to encourage a sort of implicit disintegration or fragmentation of the European Union through everybody doing the bits that they like at their own pace, and ad hoc movement. That would lead progressively and incrementally to the United Kingdom's being on the margin of more and more activities until we were on the margin of the entire institution. Such fragmentation would also lead to the absorption of the EU in internal repair and maintenance at the expense of promoting the very policies—the economic liberalism—that we want, which at last are beginning to come from the Commission.

The second reason to vote yes is to enable the United Kingdom to seize the historical opportunity to change the terms of trade in an EU of 25. Enlargement has tipped the scale against French hegemony. It is no use our trading individual quotes from French politicians. What do people expect President Chirac to say about the treaty? If we examine the continuing dialogue and commentary in the French press, it is clear that France is preoccupied with its decline. That is the current debate in the political class and it dates from the treaty of Nice, when the French used the expression "the end of the French hegemony." A no vote would therefore betray the new member states, many of which look to Britain for their ideas. They bring a liberal economic model and an Atlanticist attitude to the EU, which we welcome.

I do not believe that a no vote would somehow liberate the United Kingdom from what some perceive as the chains that are forged in Brussels. It would lead to colossal dislocation in our national political life. Some people would push for associate status and others would advocate leaving the EU. We would not resolve the persistent neurosis and ambivalence about Europe that prevails in the United Kingdom. We would simply ensure its prolonging.

I see no shadow of a superstate. Too often, the EU is incoherent and disunited. Frankly, a few more of the attributes of coherence would have been welcome in past years. The primacy of Governments and the increasing favour of intergovernmental models of co-operation are reinforced, not challenged in the treaty. Of course, I would prefer a treaty that did not contain the charter of fundamental human rights, but the charge that that will enable Luxembourg judges to rewrite the entire body of national labour laws represents an unjustified elevation of current fears into what Milton called "horrible imaginings."

The next reason to vote yes will not be shared widely in the House. It is a special reason. I believe that a yes vote will go a long way towards exorcising the demons about Europe that reside in my party. We keep talking about the new society and a changed Britain yet we also keep discussing things that manifestly disconnect us from a large part of the new Britain. I would like to exorcise the phantoms that lurk in the party's psyche and liberate us so that we can start challenging effectively for government by devising policies for the things that people want—the aspirations of contemporary society. I expect that some Labour Members, who want a Parliament with an effective Opposition, share that view.

Mr. MacShane: Since it is 4.33 pm and anything that I say here will remain so secret that not even the Freedom of Information Act 2000 will get it into the public press, may I say that what frightens me, as a Labour politician, more than anything else is the prospect of the Conservative party becoming sensible again on Europe?

Mr. Curry: I am delighted that that prospect, which I regard as inevitable, terrifies the hon. Gentleman. This Government's sheer lack of guts on Europe, the sheer unwillingness of the Prime Minister to get out there and argue his case, and their absolute refusal to take on this challenge mean that, if the referendum is lost, the Prime Minister will have only himself to blame. The right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell) suggested that the Prime Minister gave a speech on the European Union only about once a year, usually in Warsaw. It would be a bit more helpful if he spoke more frequently on the subject in the United Kingdom and argued his case more effectively.

An awful lot of idiotic claims are made about Europe, both for and against. The sword and shield of our post-war world have been provided by NATO, not the European Union, but the European Union has been its ploughshare. The rooting of democracy in Europe and the establishment of civil society in previously dictatorial and communist regimes represent a colossal achievement for Europe. That civil society would not exist had the aspiration to join the European Union not existed, and had not the rules been laid down to specify what criteria had to be met in order to do so.

We are now seeing that aspiration, that impulse to move towards the European Union, in Ukraine and Turkey—two extraordinarily different countries. That should tell us how fundamental a part that institution has played in the organisation of the post-war world. The six have become 25, and the Balkan states are knocking on the door. Such countries increasingly see the European Union as the anvil of their modernisation. In Britain, however, we are still impaled on the ambivalence resulting from a resentment at what Brussels does to us and a fear of exclusion. The constitution will not solve that problem, but it will take us one step down the road to the solution.

4.35 pm

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, Pollok) (Lab/Co-op): I rise with some joy to make my speech as the first Labour Member to speak against the constitution. It is important to make it clear that the Government party is divided on this issue, just as the main Opposition party is. I am going for the treble here. It is important to recognise that the people who are most enthusiastic about the constitution are also those who wanted to give us the euro. We were successful in beating that proposition back. Indeed, I was disappointed that my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) did not repeat the comments that he made only last week when we were on the radio together. He said that he wanted the referendum on the euro to be held on the same day as the referendum on the constitution. Bring it on, I say. At a time when 5 million people are unemployed in Germany, the more we can link those two together, the better it will be for my argument.

The second question on which I was glad to be able to persuade the Government was whether there should be a referendum at all. I am glad that my side won. Some of the arguments heard today against consulting the people smack of sheer snobbery. The implication seems to be that people are too stupid to understand the issues, which is presumably also a strong argument against having general elections. That might be the position of some Opposition Members, but it is certainly not my view.

I recognise, having listened to the speeches of some of my colleagues, that I am in a minority among Labour Members. All that I have on my side are the facts and the people, and I look forward to proceeding, with them, to a victory in the referendum. I recognise, however, that the results of some recent polls show that we should not be complacent. Those on my side of the argument have perhaps taken too much for granted. So, as far as I am concerned, there will be no more Mr. Nice Guy. We need to step up the argument against the constitution.

Mr. Hopkins: My hon. Friend talked about the elitism and snobbery of Governments throughout Europe who think that their peoples cannot make the right decision. Has not a lesson been learned in that regard in Sweden, where the elite and the establishment took one view, while the people took another and gave them a bloody nose?

Mr. Davidson: Indeed. Not only did the people of Sweden give their Government a bloody nose on the question of the euro, but their Government have now decided that they are not going to take the chance again. They are therefore going to refuse the people the right to a referendum on the European constitution. That will certainly spare them the possibility of a bloody nose, but it is not particularly democratic or illuminating. It shows us that so many of those who are in favour of the constitution are against consulting the people in a referendum.

I recognise that this Government have lumped two issues together here: the referendum, of which I am in favour; and the constitution, which I oppose. There is therefore a dilemma about which way to vote. In the circumstances, I shall vote for the referendum, because I shall have my opportunity to defeat the constitution in the referendum thus achieved. I will be able to ask all my colleagues in the Labour party and the labour movement who are opposed to the constitution to vote enthusiastically for the Government in the general election, especially in marginal seats, and then to poke them in the eye when it comes to the constitution. If anyone wants to send a message to the Government on a variety of issues, the time to do it is when we decide on the constitution.

We heard earlier some talk about myths and the question of the monarchy was raised in that context. If anyone could provide me with more information on how the monarchy could be abolished under the new constitution, I would be very happy to receive it. Also in the context of myths, the question of the United Nations seat was mentioned. That is not simply a myth, because the relevant European Commissioner said within the last month that the Commission wants Britain to give up its UN seat in favour of an EU place on the Security Council, so there is substance to that accusation. We also need to be clear about the myths peddled by the yes side. The issue of withdrawal is not, in my view, on the table.

Mr. Quentin Davies: The hon. Gentleman seems to have misread the text. Many people want us to give up our Security Council seat, but that is no change and has probably always been the case. The constitution simply provides that, in the event of agreement on a common foreign policy—under the treaty, it must be unanimous, so we would be in favour of it by definition—the European Foreign Minister would be allowed to borrow one of the permanent seats in the Security Council held by Britain and France in order to present the policy on behalf of the EU. If we are in favour of that—as I said, we should be by definition, as agreement has to be unanimous—surely we want that foreign policy to be expressed with the greatest possible force, so it makes sense to deliver it in that way on behalf of the European Union as a whole. That is what the treaty says and any claims that it goes beyond that are simply myths generated by the tabloids.

Mr. Davidson: It is very helpful to hear the yes side clearly support the idea that the EU should be able to borrow, when it so desires, Britain's UN seat. We would never be quite sure when we could get it back again, but giving it on a temporary basis is the thin end of the wedge and will end with us giving it up altogether. It is very helpful to have that view put on the record.

I return to the issue of the myths peddled by the yes side. Those who are against the constitution—on the Labour party side, at least—are not in favour of withdrawal. If we were in favour of withdrawal, we would say so. We are not in favour of it, so those on the yes side should stop peddling that suggestion. They should also stop peddling the suggestion—my right hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) raised it—that there are 3 million jobs at risk. More jobs in the EU are dependent on trade with Britain than British jobs are dependent on trade with the EU. Under World Trade Organisation or other world trading rules, there is no suggestion that we could be cut off from access to those markets, so let us not have that myth peddled either.

I believe that the constitution is about the creation of a European superstate. It is not an isolated event, but part of a wider process, as those who drew up the constitution have made clear. Another constitution or a revised version of this constitution will be along in a while. The accession of Bulgaria and Romania lies ahead: a degree of renegotiation will be necessary, and then another constitution.

What of Turkey? When that country joins, as the British Government hope, changes will undoubtedly be made to the constitution. I look forward to hearing from the Minister for Europe whether he proposes amending the constitution or producing a wholly new constitution, going through the same sort of process as this one. There are important implications and people need to know what they are letting themselves in for. Is a vote on Turkish accession included or will it be the subject of a separate parliamentary vote later?

We have to be very careful about how the Government run the referendum. Every opportunity will be taken to influence and manipulate it. Mention has been made already about how the question is to be worded. It will be interesting to hear from the Minister for Europe whether the wording resulted from focus group research or opinion polling, or whether it was merely plucked out of the air at random. It is clear that it has been chosen to try to manipulate the outcome.

It is interesting too that the Bill allows the referendum to be held as a joint vote, perhaps on the same day as local elections. That is a deliberate attempt to blur the division between the yes and no camps in the constitution argument by means of the partisan battle that will take place during the local elections.

My final point in respect of the referendum has to do with propaganda. Recently, the Minister for Europe gave me a wonderful answer to a question about Government propaganda. He said:

"the Foreign and Commonwealth Office works to ensure that all information it issues on the subject of the EU and the EU Constitutional Treaty is objective, explanatory and is in line with and supports Government policy."—[Official Report, 19 January 2005; Vol. 429, c. 1020W.]

That Government propaganda can be objective and at the same time support Government policy is a claim that belongs in some sort of Orwellian world, where it is assumed that anything said by the Government is objective and that politics applies only to what other people say. We must be careful about that, just as we must be careful about the extent to which the EU is free to spend enormous amounts of money, either directly or through the various front organisations that it funds.

Mr. Robin Cook: I am listening intently to my hon. Friend. He has made it clear that he is robustly against the European constitution, but I am having difficulty in understanding exactly why. The only reason that he has adduced so far is that it might put our seat on the UN Security Council at risk, and I believe that he is mistaken about that. He has produced no other argument to explain what is wrong with the treaty. What is it he objects to? Is it the charter of fundamental rights, or something else?

Mr. Davidson: I was too generous in giving way, as I was about to say that the constitution is not all bad. I have always supported EU expansion, and I look forward to further expansion in the future. I accept that the EU can be a force for good, and I recognise its influence in spreading democracy throughout eastern Europe. I hope that it will do the same elsewhere in the world in the future.

I and others have three main reservations about the constitution, and they can be headed Thatcherism, militarism and centralisation. The constitution is Thatcherite in that it is formulated in such a way as to open up free markets and drive down the social wage, and it does not give trade unions and other organisations extended powers. It is militaristic in that it clearly favours the establishment and use of a European armed force, and it is centralising in its approach to taxation and immigration, as we have heard already. People granted residency papers in Spain will be able to come to the UK, just as Somalis granted papers in the Netherlands are able to come here.

I want there to be reform and renegotiation. I want the CAP and the fisheries policy to be renegotiated, and the same applies to the EU's aid programmes and its structural and cohesion programmes. I want an end to fraud. Moreover, I find variable geometry in the EU to be acceptable, as the present structure is outdated and based on myths originating in the second world war.

Fortress Europe has had its day, and I look forward to defeating the constitution.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): The hon. Member for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. Davidson) and I do not agree on many issues. However, we do agree that a democratic system exists to resolve differences, so the choices made by electors should lead to definable outcomes in accordance with democratic principles. It follows from what he said—I agree with him here—that all that will be at risk if those decisions are transferred to another jurisdiction so that the link between choices and outcomes is fractured for ever. Therefore, I agree with the hon. Gentleman's strictures about the constitution.

Constitutions have gone in and out of fashion over the centuries. Napoleon said that a constitution should be short and obscure, so the European constitution is only half right: it is certainly obscure, but at more than 500 pages long, it breaks the first rule of a constitution—that it should be comprehensible to the public. The European constitution is not; it is a document written for politicians by politicians, and there is no chance of our electors reading or understanding it, let alone giving it their allegiance. The instruction given to the Convention, which drew up the constitution, to close the gap between the rulers of Europe and the people of Europe has been ignored.

The constitution should never have been. The Government did not want it and said so, but when the Convention started to it draw up, the Government said that they wanted one after all, provided that it was short. When it became a long one, the Government tabled more than 200 amendments, only a fraction of which were adopted. It is odd that we are getting a written constitution in this country for the first time since the 17th century, and we have not even written it ourselves. It was written for us by others.

Mr. Hopkins: When Poland and Spain sunk the previous attempt to create a constitution, was not the relief in Downing street palpable?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Yes, I could almost hear it from my office. The relief was not just in Downing street but in the Foreign Office. That was a much unloved document, but the Government must now make the best of it, and the Foreign Secretary was at it again in his speech.

[Mr. Heathcoat-Amory]

Surely, the first job of any constitution is to solve the problem of who does what and to draw a distinction between what Europe does and what member states do. It should also overcome the wide perception, which happens to be true, that the European Union obtains more powers with each treaty, and that we have an activist Court in Luxembourg, which always interprets documents in a way that is in favour of more centralisation. The first job of a self-respecting constitution is to solve that problem, but this one does not. I shall give just one example. Most of the familiar policies that make up the daily work of this House are listed in article XIV of the constitution, but they will be so-called shared competences, which is Eurospeak for shared powers. The definition of "shared" is that when the European Union legislates in those areas in future, we will lose the right to legislate.

What is more, only the principal areas have been listed. Anyone reading the constitution will not have the slightest idea of who does what in five years or so, particularly when almost all those policies will be decided by qualified majority voting. It may be news to the Liberal Democrats that 63 new areas will be subject to majority voting, but it is a fact.

Another point that the Government have ignored is that the definition of majority voting has been changed in the constitution, which makes it much easier for a majority vote to be obtained. That means more legislation, more regulations and more interference. The European Scrutiny Committee, on which I serve, examined more than 1,000 new measures last year. That will accelerate and we will have more legislation, but less chance of stopping anything.

We heard again the tired argument about this new power for national Parliaments over subsidiarity. That is not new; we can object already. It is certainly not a power; as we can object all we like, and the Commission can go on ignoring us. All that we get in this constitution is a new right to be ignored. The Government know that, as they tabled an amendment to try to upgrade the power for national Parliaments to a so-called red light, and were overruled and ignored.

We have heard about the EU charter of fundamental rights, and I will not have more fun at the expense of the Government about how they promised that it was only of declaratory value and no more important than the Beano, whereas they must now make the best of it, as it will not only be legally binding but form the whole of part II of the European constitution. Another point about the charter is the uncertainty. The European Scrutiny Committee has received witness statements and taken evidence from constitutional lawyers about the charter. They agree that the ambiguities in the charter make it quite impossible to know what the future European Court will make of it. What they say is that the so-called safeguards trumpeted from the Treasury Bench, in order to prevent the charter seeping into national laws, will be inoperative and no safeguard whatever.

Mr. Cash: Does not my right hon. Friend also agree that those same witnesses were extremely concerned that our judges, when faced with competing jurisdictions with the European Court, could go in the wrong direction—towards giving too much power to the European Union?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Yes, that is the so-called primacy point, which asserts unconditionally that everything in the constitution, all the laws flowing from it, and the charter, have primacy over the laws of this country. There has been a stand-off, which nobody has resolved—but if a Parliament and a people sign up voluntarily to that assertion, it is certain that national courts will start to interpret national laws as inferior to everything that comes out of the constitution. What this charter does, at the very least, instead of ending an uncertainty, is to extend and create one.

Mr. Quentin Davies: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: No, I have used up my allowance of interventions.

We have heard today about the need for reform in Europe. Some criticism has been expressed of my party's position that we will seek a renegotiation of the treaty. Why should that be such a shock? We are engaged in a colossal renegotiation. The Convention on which I served was undertaking the most fundamental reform of the European institutions ever attempted. All the existing treaties are repealed by this constitution. We are therefore engaged in an enormous renegotiation. The point, however, is that that reform and renegotiation failed. Instead of creating that democratic simple Europe which was to be closer to its citizens, we have created a centralised, technocratic, legalistic, undemocratic Europe. If we say no to this constitution, the brief will return to the drafters of the constitution—but next time they will have to listen to the instructions given to them, instead of creating a Europe in their own image. Today, however, this House will have to decide.

Of course we will have a referendum. I notice that the Government have already rewritten the rules on funding to ensure that they can go on spending taxpayers' money up to a month before the referendum, whereas the rest of us will be limited. The wording on the ballot paper refers to the constitution for the European Union, which implies that it is simply a rule for the existing Union—which, incidentally, simply gets abolished if the constitution comes into effect. They do not like the idea of the true wording, which is "a constitution for Europe", which perhaps sounds more ambitious and threatening. They cannot even get the wording right on the ballot paper.

Our task today is to decide what this House does. It is not our power that we are giving away, but that of the people whom we represent. What is British history if not a long struggle to get power under the control of people who are accountable to the electors, and who can be removed by those electors? What is British history but a long struggle to secure a parliamentary democracy, so that policies can be changed after elections and people can give effect to their democratic choices through a political system?

This constitution and this Bill reverse all that. We will be giving up these powers and transferring decisions about criminal justice, asylum and immigration, external relations, social security and everything else upwards, to the most remote tier of government of all—the new Union. Indeed, we heard a very good example concerning asylum and immigration. It really is outrageous, but when my party win the next election on a clear pledge to do something different about asylum and immigration, we will be told that doing so is illegal even under the existing treaties, because of everything that the Government have signed up to. Such action will be constitutionally illegal once we have adopted and ratified a constitution, because the UN charter on refugees is embedded in that constitution, and withdrawal will not be possible. So people will not vote at all. Why vote—why express choice?—if such choice cannot, by constitutional law, lead to different outcomes? That is the democratic reality that we must face up to today.

We do not have a serious choice. We are being invited to give up powers that are not ours, so I ask this Chamber and this House to strike the first blow for the people whom we represent, and for democracy, by saying no to this constitution and this Bill this evening.

5.1 pm

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby) (Lab): This is a very curious Bill; in fact, it is a Bill of two halves. Five clauses deal with the referendum and just five with the treaty—the constitution is actually a constitution masquerading as a treaty—thereby establishing the treaty in British law. Today is the only opportunity that we will get to discuss this issue, because today is the only opportunity to pass legislation on the new European treaty before the referendum. In effect, if we pass the Bill, we pass the treaty. We have prepared the way for implementing it in British law, if the people give their consent in a referendum.

That is a very curious way to proceed, because as a result the House is not contributing its skill and knowledge, testing the argument or debating the issues. Nor is it examining the treaty at the same length or in the same detail that we examined the far less important and less substantial Maastricht treaty, which had far weaker effects on British polity and did not pose as a constitution. We are being asked to accept something that will change this country's constitution, and which establishes a European constitution affecting this country, on the basis of this Bill and three days' discussion on the Floor of the House. Frankly, that is not good enough for a major change such as this.

Those of us who do not like the constitution and who will oppose it are being asked to vote for it because we will then get a referendum—which we should have been given anyway from the start. The powers that are being handed over and the roles that are being imposed on us are matters for the people to decide on. They should be able to decide whether to give their consent in any case, so the blandishment that we will get a referendum—if we vote for the treaty—means nothing. A referendum on an issue as big as this is essential. We are talking about the people's power, and they have to give their consent before any of it is handed to Europe, or any other changes are made.

This approach was taken in order to get the issue out of the way before the general election, and it is true that we have had a lot of fun. The spectacle of my Euro-enthusiastic friends standing on their heads has been fascinating. My hon. Friend the Minister for Europe did so particularly elegantly. First he said, "No, we don't need a referendum; it's unimportant." Now he says that we must have one—but we should have taken that view from the start.

I support the provision to hold a referendum, but I have some doubts about the wording. A referendum is a conservative device that supports the status quo, and the Bill presents the constitution as the status quo:

> "Should the United Kingdom approve the Treaty establishing a Constitution for the European Union?"

That suggests that the constitution is a fait accompli, that it is pristine, new and gleaming in the distance, that everybody else is accepting it, so it would be churlish to turn it down. It would be better to ask the people whether they want Britain to accept the "proposed" European constitution—a more honest wording, which would favour my side of the argument.

It is crucial that the referendum include equal funding and equal time for both sides of the argument. That period of equal funding and equal time should be extended, because I do not want the Government telling a series of half truths and distorting the argument in the long period before the referendum. A balance must be maintained for a longer time than just the simple campaign. We do not want my hon. Friend the Minister for Europe rampaging around the country in his red socks putting across an incorrect view of the constitution. I do not want to see a massive outpouring of Government propaganda, and the votes should be published by constituency at the end of the referendum.

The constitution is an unnecessary, unwanted, unloved product of the European elite that has been foisted on the electorates of Europe, who are being conned into accepting it. The Convention on the Future of Europe started out loaded with Euro-enthusiasts, which was a condition for membership. The American constitution proudly states "We, the people", but all the European constitution can say is, "We, the Euro-enthusiast Euro-elite" think that this or that is self-evident.

The document is turgid, unreadable, stolid and legalistic. It has all the intellectual excitement of cold porridge; it weighs 2½ lb; and our two representatives on the central councils of the Convention, my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Ms Stuart) and the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory), both rejected it.

I cannot accept the constitution, which strengthens the centre and is another step towards ever closer union. It also represents further progress towards the creation of a state with a full-time permanent President, a full-time permanent Foreign Secretary and an agreed security and defence policy, which will strengthen the ability of that state to overrule UK law.

The effects of the constitution are unpredictable and I do not believe any of the forecasts. If anything, I am inclined to believe Martin Howe's argument that the constitution will create uncertainty, which will create more opportunities to overrule British laws because of the surrender of our veto in so many areas. Although my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary might be right that we will do better with qualified majority voting, he might also be wrong. The Government say, "There has been a change of mood in Europe. Britain is now more respected." Mood is, however, effervescent, and the psychology and nature of the European Union has not altered fundamentally.

Many new clauses have been added to the constitution. One trivial example concerns the common fisheries policy, which originally concerned the marketing of fish. The policy then became a matter of equal access to a common resource, and under the constitution it would become an exclusive competence over the marine biological resources of the sea. The Fisheries Committee of the European Parliament rejected that as unnecessary, but the provision remains. Why? Why should seals or jellyfish, vertebrates or invertebrates, be part of a constitution? Why do they have to be there? Is it some extension of power? What is it all about? It is simply madness on the part of those drafting the constitution.

Those are my fears. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary tells me that I am wrong. I always listen to him; he is a wise and sage individual and I am a big admirer of his. He tells me that my fears are wrong, that things will not work out that way and that the constitution is a triumph for Britain. Fortunately, he did not come back saying "Game, set and match", as people have said before him. But it is always the job of the British Foreign Secretary to make the best of a bad Eurojob, and my right hon. Friend is falling into that role.

The constitution does not allow for the uncertainties of the European Court of Justice—whether it will assert its power or whether its composition will be affected. However my right hon. Friend tells me that I am wrong, so let us put the argument to the test. Putting it to the electorate is no way of doing that, because the argument is likely to be detoured into simple half-truths, such as, "If we vote against it we shall be alone in the world," or, "We shall lose 3 million jobs," and all that kind of nonsense. The arguments to be put to the electorate must be prepared through argument and long discussion in the House, by our testing the argument to show what is happening.

As that is not the case, it will be difficult for me to vote for the Bill. In fact, it will be impossible for me to vote for it, because I am flatly opposed to this European verbiage-mountain of a constitution. My Eurosceptic friends have put it to me that I should maintain the ranks—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I say to the hon. Member who is trying to leave the Chamber—[Interruption.] Order. I think enough has been said.

Mr. Mitchell: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. There were bells ringing in my head, so I was glad of your intervention.

As we have an understanding that we do not want to divide the party before the election, I should vote for the Bill—but I cannot. I shall devote the rest of the debate to deciding whether to bring the Government to their knees by voting against the Bill or, sagely, to abstain.

5.12 pm

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim) (DUP): I had 25 years in the European Parliament and I saw its evolution, if I may use that term. Those who, like me, went there to represent the people and to try to get a deal for those who needed one discovered that the powers that be had other objectives and aims. Slowly but surely, those aims are coming to fruition.

I am opposed to this constitution because it changes a treaty-based agreement between nation states to a supranational entity based on its own constitution. We must face the fact that there is a distinct difference between democratic Parliaments deciding matters that they need to decide for their own people and the coming together of a number of states that determine that they should decide what is best for the people.

I do not know what the people of Brussels know about a place called Ahoghill, which is in my constituency. In fact, they know nothing about it; when one of them visited my constituency they pronounced it "A hog hill". Those people are not interested in the ordinary people who need our representation; they have a policy of their own. This constitution formalises the primacy of EU law over national laws. The Foreign Secretary will remember that in a debate last year I asked him which came first, the supremacy of EU laws or the supremacy of laws in this House. He told me rightly that the laws of Europe have supremacy. That being so, Parliament deteriorates into a subordinate council of Europe and, over and again, we can see that powers are being taken to give more power to Europe.

The constitution bestows legal personality on the European Union, so that it can make treaties and binding international agreements on its own. That policy is the basis for its own Foreign Minister and common foreign and defence policy. In other words, there is no doubt that an organisation is being constructed in Europe today that will be in complete control of our people and our nation. It also puts in place the apparatus and trappings of statehood.

People ask me why Europe has not cleaned up its act with regard to fraud. I was in the European Parliament when we decided to put the former leader of the then Labour Opposition in charge of that. I had every confidence that he was a man of integrity and strength who would certainly do a good job, but he had to return and tell the European Parliament that he had come to an impossible impasse because the Governments of Europe were not prepared to face up to their own folly. So if the Governments are not prepared to face up to fraud, who will face up to it? That was not because of any non-diligence on his part and those associated with him, but because a blockage was put in the way, yet that is where we are asked to put our faith.

We know that, as we look upon the present situation, the devolution of powers to Europe reduces the powers of national Parliaments. More and more, we have creeping out of the national Parliaments those items and business that should be strictly under the sole authority of the nation, but outside interests from Europe seem to be able to exercise a strange, mystic power over those who attend to represent the various nations, and Brussels becomes stronger and stronger each day. We need to face up to that.

On the powers that we had, I remember that when we heard about going into Europe, everyone said that all was well because we had the veto, and if Britain did not like what was going to be done, just one vote and Europe could not do it—it would be stopped. Now, we have the wonderful words, "qualified majority voting". One has only to look at the list of matters where the previous rule of unanimity does not apply: the election of the President; the election of the Foreign Minister; setting conditions for control by member states of the Commission's exercise of implementing powers; approximating national laws to achieve an area of freedom, security and justice, which is vital to asylum control—that is an interesting one; authorising annual expenditure; and proposals to promote social and economic cohesion. There is a whole list more: freedom of movement for migrant workers; measures necessary for the use of the euro; matters of particular interest for economic and monetary union; the prioritising of structural funds; measures on border controls, and so on. Those matters will all be covered by the new rule of voting, but qualified majority voting makes it impossible for one Government with strong views to stop such measures.

Anyone who has been to Europe knows that a lot is done by trading off, through which one country gets something and another gets something else, so they reach agreement. Before we know it, countries that have made deals stand by them, but other countries get no deal and go to the wall. That is happening over and over again.

Several aspects of the charter of fundamental rights are good, but others are bad. I was interested to read the other day that some people in France say that they should not go back to the days when the British won victory over Napoleon. They say that the keeping of Trafalgar day should be abolished in England altogether. That reminds me of things that are said in my country about great historic events—usually those that happened around 1690, as my friend along the Bench, the right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble), will well understand.

In France today, the situation surrounding civil and religious liberty is dicey. I am sure that many hon. Members from the various cities and towns of England will know of the Elim Pentecostal Church. I had the great pleasure of knowing the founder of that Church, Mr. George Jeffreys. France is now moving along the lines of the charter of fundamental rights and has decided that the state has the power to determine whether a Church is a sect, or a Church.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman has had his 10 minutes.

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage) (Lab): After a European debate a few months ago, the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin)—I still think of him as an hon. Friend—remarked to me that it was interesting that the supporters of the measure that we are considering always refer to the "European constitutional treaty", while its opponents refer to the "European constitution". That theme has emerged extensively during the debate, not least in the speech made by the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory). For myself, I say that it is just another European treaty, and I am glad that the question to be put in the referendum brings that out clearly. We have had the treaty of Rome, the Merger treaty, the Single European Act and the treaties of Maastricht, Amsterdam and Nice. We now have the latest treaty in the series. In typical European language, it will probably end up being called the treaty of Rome bis, and I can well understand that the hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) would oppose it for that reason, if no other.

Each of those treaties moved the European furniture around in different ways, and as it has been pointed out, some did so more drastically than the one now before us will. For example, the Single European Act, which was passed under Margaret Thatcher, extended qualified majority voting more widely than this treaty will.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: There were extensions into 12 areas under the Single European Act, but the constitution goes into 63 new areas.

Mr. Jackson: I shall be happy to discuss that point with the right hon. Gentleman. Of course we must consider not only the number of areas, but their weight and significance. He must accept that qualified majority voting on nominations to the European Court of Auditors is not quite as serious as other matters.

The Maastricht treaty gave a treaty base to various forms of interstate co-operation among member states, and thus did more than this treaty will to extend the sphere of European responsibilities. But the basic reason why I regard this as just another treaty, rather than a constitution, is that it leaves many constitutional questions unresolved, which is why I think that the language of the Opposition, particularly in their amendment, is unwarrantedly exaggerated.

The fundamental constitutional question must be whether the European Union is to remain as it is—an association of sovereign states, pooling their sovereignty in certain limited areas—or whether it will become a new political entity, somehow transcending the member states and reflecting a new European citizenship. On this fundamental question, this treaty maintains the radical ambiguity of the earlier treaties, going back to the treaty of Rome. To put the point more positively, this treaty preserves intact the unique hybrid nature of the European Union: not a federal state, but using shared supranational institutions for certain limited purposes. As long as this radical ambiguity—this unique hybridity—persists, none of the arrangements for shared decision making upon which the member states may from time to time agree by treaties between them can accurately, in my opinion, be described as a "constitution". Nor, therefore, can they be rejected in the fundamentalist terms that have been adduced by, for example, the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague), who seemed in his remarks to discard the possibility even of common rules to apply to a common market. I thought that that at least was part of the acquis communautaire accepted by the Conservative party, but the right hon. Gentleman now seems to reject it.

The political reality of Europe remains what it has always been—that power rests with the member states. Let me give two instances. The stability and growth pact of 1997 imposes legally binding constraints on the budgetary policies of those countries that have adopted the euro as their currency. Indeed, those provisions are embodied in the treaty that is now before the House. It is notorious, however, that they are not being observed by France and Germany, for the simple reason that it does not suit them to do so.

In 1992, the Maastricht treaty introduced legally binding requirements for mutual consultation and common action in the field of foreign policy. Those are retained in the current treaty, and its opponents make much of the constraints that that will supposedly impose on foreign policy. For example, we have had a discussion about Britain's Security Council seat.

Mr. Jackson: I want to finish this point.

Two years ago, we saw no evidence of such constraints having any effect at all when the chips were down over Iraq. There were no such constraints either on the foreign policy of the majority in the enlarged Union led by Britain, which supported the war, or on the foreign policy of the minority, led by France, which opposed it.

Europe will have a "constitution" only when it has acquired a real-world identity of its own—an identity that is more than the limited fiction of "legal personality" contained in this latest treaty. It will have a "constitution" only when there are genuine European citizens, as opposed to citizens of member states carrying a common-format passport. Neither of those things is actually happening, and with each successive enlargement of the European Union the prospect becomes more and more remote. The Opposition's fantasies about "a country called Europe" are simply that—fantasies.

In conclusion, let me sum up the question that the country will have to decide in the referendum, as I see it. The Leader of the Opposition has told us that Britain has no interest in the political development of continental Europe. He says, "If they want to federate, let them get on with it—so long as Britain is not involved." What an abdication! What ignorance of the lessons of history! Will the country heed that siren voice luring us on to the rocks, or do we want Britain to go on as it is now, exerting a growing influence from within a European Union in which the balance of real-world forces is steadily moving in the direction that suits Britain and Britain's historic national interests? That is the choice that the British people will have to make in the referendum on the treaty, and I am confident, in the words of what used to be a Conservative slogan, that they will once again vote for "a strong Britain in a strong Europe".

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. As a significant number of hon. Members are still seeking to catch my eye, in accordance with the Order of the House of 26 October 2004 on shorter speeches, a time limit of six minutes will apply from now until half-past 6 o'clock. I remind the House that in the period of shorter speeches, no added time is allowed for interventions.

5.29 pm

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex) (Con): I would love to debate this subject at length with the hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson), and I am grateful to him for mentioning me. The fact that I am not able to do so underlines the extremely unsatisfactory way in which his new party is handling the legislation.

I believe in the basic principle of democracy: that a people have the right to govern themselves. Article I of the UN charter sets out the principle of "self-determination of peoples". It is not envisaged as something that requires the permission of a higher authority; it is an absolute.

Only three fundamental questions are raised in the context of a constitution for the EU. First, what constitutes "self-determination"? Secondly, what constitutes "a people"? Finally, does the constitution respect the self-determination of peoples? The Opposition's reasoned amendment is absolutely right to lay emphasis on the question of primacy. Ultimately, government is not about identity or particular issues, events or interests, but about the framing and implementation of laws. Therefore, to have self-determination, the people must have the means to frame and implement their own laws and system of government. In turn, that system of government must have the means to sustain and protect itself. That means it must be sovereign—it cannot be subject to a higher authority.

I note that my hon. Friends' reasoned amendment uses the term "sovereignty". This is very basic stuff, but let us define our terms because the word has been misused. Sovereignty is not power, as the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell) suggested. It is a different quality from power. It is not authority. Power is the ability to produce intended effects. It need not be legal power—to exercise power legally, one requires authority. The various written and unwritten laws of this country grant authority to our Ministers to exercise power legally. Where does that authority come from? The sovereign authority is the ultimate source of our law. Sovereignty is, therefore, a narrow legal concept. It is another absolute—it cannot be shared or limited. We either have it or we do not. Legal self-determination rests on the ability of a people's absolute authority to frame their own laws and to have the final say.

The second question is: what constitutes "a people"? Clearly, the EU is made up of many peoples. There is no such thing as a European people. I have always considered that the credibility of the so-called European People's party is somewhat undermined by its insistence that the apostrophe is in the wrong place. The flaw in the idea of the European Parliament is that politics remains national. At European elections, people elect MEPs on the basis of national political considerations, which is why the European Parliament remains such an utterly obscure and irrelevant institution.

The many peoples of the EU are properly represented by the Governments and Parliaments of its member states. It is the nations of Europe that are the democracies. To comply with the UN charter, therefore, we must strive to maintain the self-determination of the peoples of Europe.

Whatever the EU is or may become, it is not a democracy, but a bureaucracy. Governments from the Single European Act onwards have been much too eager to hand over more and more powers without regard to proper democratic scrutiny. Every time we do this, we take power from democracies and give them to a bureaucracy.

Despite that, I have never had a problem with the principle behind the existing legal basis of our membership of the EU. That is the principle of the delegation of national powers to the EU institutions. However problematic our relationship with the EU has become, it has only ever been a voluntary association of sovereign nation states. In the context of this debate, the only question that we must answer is whether the EU constitution represents a fundamental change to that principle of voluntary delegation of powers. Of course it does. Article I-6 states:

"The Constitution and law adopted by the institutions of the Union in exercising competences conferred on it shall have primacy over the law of the Member States."

The Government will say—we have heard this already—that that merely reflects the existing precedence of the European Court of Justice, whose views on primacy are intended by the constitution to have full effect. The ECJ's view is that EU law has primacy over all national law, including national constitutional law. However, our courts rejected that idea, as recently as the "metric martyr" case in 2002. Our courts do not recognise the primacy of European law. By ratifying the constitution, the United Kingdom would effectively be committing constitutional suicide. Everything becomes subjugated to the ultimate sovereign authority of the EU. That is the intention that our courts will read, because we have enacted it on our statute book. It is utterly untrue for Ministers to claim, therefore, that the constitution is not a fundamental change. A secession clause needs to be added to the European constitution, because the present implicit right of secession would be compromised.

If the Government allow an honest debate on the subject, there is no possibility that the British people will vote for the constitutional treaty, but I fear it will fall to opponents of the EU constitution to make that explanation. Of course the Government will try to frighten people into believing that this is some kind of "in or out" debate, but the Minister for Europe has contradicted the Foreign Secretary by insisting that the constitutional treaty is not the final resting place of the European Union and that there will be further treaties. Why did he contradict his right hon. Friend?

Mr. Peter Kilfoyle (Liverpool, Walton) (Lab): I support the Bill. I am a strong advocate of both its form and its content. I represent one of the many areas in the United Kingdom that has benefited hugely from the positive outcomes of the European Union. I note that the hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) is a resident and a representative of a similar area, and I do not understand the position that he takes.

We should concern ourselves with the attitude of the Opposition. I was intrigued by the contribution from the right hon. and learned Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram). After telling us about Geronimo scalping the taxpayer for propaganda purposes, he made an extraordinary statement. He criticised the Government for not allowing enough time for discussion, debate and scrutiny, but in answer to an intervention from the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), he made it clear that in the unlikely eventuality of the Conservative party being returned at the next election, there would be no scrutiny of any sort. That leads to a great deal of confusion not only in the minds of right hon. and hon. Members, including Opposition Members, but outside.

In another intervention we heard that in the Scrutiny Committee the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) had legitimately asked whether the Bill could be used as the basis for a future referendum. I assume that implicit in that question is the belief among at least a section of the Conservative party that whatever is done as a result of the Bill will be undone at some future time. That underlines an almost visceral opposition to the European Union in any form that it might take.

I was equally taken by the exchange between the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe and the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory). The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that they go round the country and debate these matters, and I do not doubt the sincerity with which their opposing views are held. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said he did not understand why they could never get to the basis of the argument. That is because of the difference in their visions of the future of Europe. They are so different that it is like trying to compare the vision of Michelangelo with that of Hieronymus Bosch. The right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe and the right hon. Member for Wells see the world from totally different perspectives, and that colours their outlook on everything to do with Europe and the EU.

Mr. Robert Jackson: And wider.

Mr. Kilfoyle: And far wider, as my hon. Friend suggests.

Those who oppose the Bill always fail to draw attention to the irreconcilable tail that is wagging the Conservative dog. They fail to say what they would put in place of a United Kingdom which, in their heart of hearts, they want out of Europe. Will we no longer be the bridge to America? Are we supposed to be a dwindling and irrelevant piece of real estate floating off the edge of Europe? Will we increasingly become a client of America, and will the notion of the United Kingdom as an American aircraft carrier hold true? All the Opposition's views are vague and indeterminate, but they stem from a visceral antagonism towards the European Union and things European.

I take great pride that on issues as disparate as the environment, Iraq—even allowing for my personal view on war against that country—arms trading with China, and the preference for diplomacy over military muscle in the case of Iran, I look to Europe for support, succour, help and common sense. That is not to deny Europe's failings and failures. I acknowledge them, but I also take on board the overwhelming advantages of the European position. I hope that we make expeditious progress on the Bill and that when we go to the country we can convince people of the good sense of such things as an improved presidency with greater continuity and objectivity. There are obvious benefits, as has been said, in not having two representatives to deal with foreign affairs. Preconceived notions are not endangered by the proposal that Javier Solana should be, for want of a better description, the first Foreign Minister under the constitution. Qualified majority voting on measures against criminal activity is also desirable. I just wish that the previous Government had introduced proposals on better co-operation with Europe, as that might have prevented leading criminals from being able to escape jurisdiction and being held to account before 1997.

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann) (UUP): Once again, we have a thoroughly unsatisfactory procedure whereby a new 500-page constitution will be made part of our law in just five clauses. We can only debate those clauses and not the 500 pages. I repeat that it is thoroughly unsatisfactory that agreements made through the exercise of the treaty-making power deal with Europe as if it were a foreign country on the other side of the Pacific. That is not appropriate, and it is using the royal prerogative to change our constitution. That is quite unacceptable in this day and age, and I hope that the Government will reassess such matters in future.

There are clear differences of opinion on the construction of parts of the measure. It is no longer purely about consolidation. The Government argue that they are moving things back towards the nation state, but others regard it as yet another step in the long trail towards a federal state. When the original statement was made, I said that it does not matter what view the Government or others express because, at the end of the day, the European Court of Justice will decide these matters, and we know what its bias and approach are. After I made those comments, a Government supporter told me that I should not worry, because the Government had managed to remove the phrase "ever closer union" from the new treaty. Because they were no longer committing themselves to ever closer union, the European Court would cast a different eye on things. After finally getting hold of the text, I can confirm that "ever closer union" has gone, only to be replaced with the phrase "united ever more closely". If that does not make it clear that there is an absence of significant change, there is an express reference to continuity in the acquis communautaire. That continuity will be accompanied by continuity in the drift towards greater federalism in these provisions.

When we were presented with the treaty, I told the Government that they had missed a huge opportunity. What we really need in Europe is fundamental reform, but we do not have it in the treaty. There is a little tinkering around the edges, but that will not stop the progress towards a federated Europe. If the Government had plucked up the courage to veto the constitution, they could have started to argue for fundamental reforms, as they would no longer be trammelled by the report from the European Convention.

We need fundamental changes. Europe exists, and we will continue to be a part of it in one form or another. We need a democratic Europe, and the Europe we have is not democratic. For example, we have a situation in Europe where a group of unelected people have a total and absolute veto on legislation; that is another way of describing the European Commission's exclusive right of initiative. The only legislation that can be enacted is legislation proposed by the Commission, which in itself shows the absence of democracy.

I concur entirely with the comments of the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) about the danger we are in when there is a gap between the people and those who make laws affecting them. That is why we need reforms to make European institutions more democratic and more democratically accountable.

I shall just touch briefly on economic matters, which is another area in which we need huge changes. How many years ago did the Union commit itself at Lisbon to making changes? Has it made any? Is Europe more competitive or productive? No. The economic failure of the European Union gets worse, and it is important to realise that we are dealing today with economic failure. The right hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) was worried that a British no vote would lead to a Franco-German inner core. France and Germany are economic failures, and their failures are getting worse because of their failure to change their economies. The lower performance in those countries' economies dates from 1992 and it flows from Maastricht. The Minister may shake his head, but that is the case, and until major economic changes take place there, particularly with regard to the euro and the European Central Bank, the economic failure of Europe will get worse.

The Bill also provides for a referendum, and I welcome the fact that we will have a referendum, and that it will give whoever is in Government at that stage a second chance. I believe and hope that the people will reject the constitution, and flowing from that rejection will come an opportunity to look at the matter again. Europe cannot afford to treat the United Kingdom in the dismissive way it has treated Ireland and Denmark by telling people to go back and think again.

A rejection of the constitution will provoke the opportunity for some real changes in Europe, which are clearly needed. I hope very much that the British people will take that opportunity when it is presented to them. That is, of course, if the opportunity is presented; I still have a thought at the back of my mind that we might never see a referendum.

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East) (Lab): It is a pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble), but sadly I totally disagree with him. His analysis was very pessimistic and it may have more to do with the problems that he has had with other parties in Northern Ireland than with the constitution. He missed one thing completely: he was totally wrong to suggest that those in the Commission are the only people who can propose changes and legislation. The new powers given to the European Parliament through co-decision making will strengthen the democratic nature of the European Union; some of us have waited a long time for that and hope to see more of it.

I welcome the Bill and the proposed referendum, and I welcome the wording of the referendum, because it refers to establishing a constitution for the EU. People should recognise that it will be for the EU, not for Europe. Europe is a much bigger concept that is not necessarily covered just by the people currently in the EU.

On balance, I welcome the treaty. I say "on balance" because there are still some flaws in it, some of which were created by the Conservative Government. There were good arguments for shared competence on fisheries, for example, which we did not press for because the issue was not covered by any of the original treaties, but it might have been a useful move forward.

What worries me most is the combination of what I would call the anti-European zealots—those in my party and the group led by the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) and his colleagues, with their "Be afraid; be very afraid" argument about the European Union—and the humbug and hypocrisy that I hear from those on the Conservative Front Bench. Is it opportunism rather than fear that I smell from them? Is it fear of the United Kingdom Independence party that is making them take the position that they have taken? We should never forget that the Opposition, when in government, not only signed up to a treaty that sold out the UK fisheries policy, but later, under Mrs. Thatcher, traded much of the Irish box to get the rebate, destroying a lot of the British and Scottish fisheries.

I was disappointed in some contributions. I will refer again and again to the attack by the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) on the working time directive when I speak to trade unionists and working people in this country. The EU led the way in the working time directive, and it should not be forgotten that it has been a great improver of the working conditions of many people in Britain.

The right hon. Member for Wells sadly is not here. Again and again the European Scrutiny Committee discusses these matters, and shifting the balance of power of co-decision making to Members of the European Parliament will be welcome. They made it plain in their evidence to the Committee when I chaired it that they saw the constitution as a very positive thing. They included Members from Finland, born only 30 or 40 years ago, and from Hungary, born in 1939. They all had a vision of the constitution as a way forward for a balanced Europe.

Mr. Bercow: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Connarty: I am sorry, but I have no time to give way, even to my good friend.

It is important that we counter all these scary stories about the EU courts. The evidence that we received showed that it was still a matter of balance. With regard to primacy, if the European courts think that our laws are not compatible, it is for us to amend our laws; we are not overruled. The override that is referred to in both amendments, one selected and one not, will not undermine the will of the UK Parliament, contrary to what the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) said, and it will not further diminish the sovereignty of the UK, because eventually we in this Parliament must decide what we do when there is a conflict between our laws and interpretation of the laws in the EU.

If hon. Members take the trouble to read the evidence given to the European Scrutiny Committee, they will see that the academics disagreed on the possible behaviour of the EU courts. That is not a surprise; there would be no academic debate if that were not so. But even the most obviously Eurosceptic witnesses, some of whom were quoted today, said that the UK Parliament would have the right to decide if and how to respond to any of those decisions in the courts.

I come now to some Labour Members who are opposed to the measure. It is new words for old arguments; new weapons to fight old battles; and, unfortunately, old warriors dressed up in new uniforms. The treaty and the referendum that will follow are not about holding back the free-market process, or the common market process as it used to be called. They are not about challenging the right or the left-wing balance of opinion within the Commission. They will not be about the UK rebate. All those matters will be trotted out, rather than there being an argument about the constitution.

The Bill is not about the euro, immigration or the common fisheries policy, but, in the view of the hon. Member for Stone and his colleagues, it is about the possibility that if the Government are defeated in the referendum, the European Communities Act 1972 can be renegotiated and we can pull out of the EU. That is the real agenda for those on the Eurosceptic wing, and the official Opposition are in serious danger of being trapped into that argument because it is the only argument that they have to play towards.

I do not believe that the British people will respond to that. They realise that this is a mature and difficult treaty between countries, all of which want to hold on to their sovereignty as much as we do and to build a balanced, strong EU. I am not afraid of the fact that in treaties one has to give to receive, and in most cases QMV in the 53 areas that we are talking about will be to our advantage, as has been the case in more than 95 per cent. of cases to date. This is a treaty that I look forward to taking to a referendum and to supporting in the country. I support the Bill tonight.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Grantham and Stamford) (Con): It is disgraceful that the House has such a short time to debate such an important matter.

It is clear that with the referendum during the next year or 18 months Britain will face a defining moment in our history. Over that time, 25 Governments will be going through the ratification process. It is virtually certain that 23 or 24 of them will achieve ratification through their Parliaments, or, many of them, through referendums. The idea that when they have achieved ratification and have democratic mandates, including in many cases through a referendum, those countries will simply be prepared to tear up the whole project to accommodate this country is absurd. It would also be extraordinarily arrogant to assume such a thing.

Those who talk about renegotiation cannot therefore mean renegotiating this treaty but the EU's continuing on the basis of this treaty and our renegotiating something other than full membership. We might be able to get back into the European Free Trade Association or to negotiate the kind of special associate status that the French recently proposed for the Turks, and which the Turks rejected because it was so insulting, but we certainly would not be full members. Above all, we would not be part of the decision-making structures or the structures of democratic accountability.

I am always amazed when colleagues say, "Well, we could always negotiate some access to the single market." They appear to be happy with a situation in which we would have to observe the rules and the laws decided by the European Union while playing absolutely no part in it. We would find ourselves paying over taxpayers' money without any representation, as do current associates in the North American Free Trade Agreement, Switzerland and elsewhere. The prospect of taxation without representation seems to worry my colleagues not at all.

The European Union is a formidable achievement. I need not dwell on the single market, because even Eurosceptics admit that it is vital that we remain part of that, whatever happens, but we do not talk about the human importance of the Union—the fact that it provides a larger stage for all of us, and our children, to conduct our lives and to exercise our liberties: not merely to trade, but to work, live and study on a much wider field than merely on this island.

Over the years, it has proven a remarkable engine of peace. Let us consider some of the sources of conflict and bloodshed over centuries that it has dissolved over the past generation or two, such as Alsace-Lorraine and Alto Adige. As shadow Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, I came to the view that the only way of reconciling the views of those who want to remain part of this country and those who think it absolutely essential that they become part of the Republic of Ireland was within the context of a successful European Union, where the precise line of the frontier is no longer an existential matter, and certainly not one to die for.

The EU represents the only way in which we can exercise any influence in the world on key issues for the future such as world trade, international stability, sources of tension and potential conflict, nuclear threats, terrorism, and sources of migration. We cannot possibly influence those things standing alone in this country, and it would be absurd to think that we could.

Should we really walk away from all that because of this constitution? It would be completely crazy to do so given that 80 or 90 per cent. of it is a consolidation of what we have already signed up to, leaving six key changes, all of which seem to be very much in our favour. There are two substantive changes, the first of which is the mutual defence pact. We already have such a pact with 21 out of the 25 countries—it is called the Washington treaty. This simply removes the anomaly whereby we do not currently have a mutual defence pact with the Republic of Ireland, Sweden, Finland and Austria.

The second substantive change concerns the common foreign and security policy and the Foreign Minister. This is triggered under the treaty only by unanimity. It makes no sense at all to say that we want to leave the mainstream of the European Union because of a common foreign policy, because we have a veto on every occasion before a such a policy can emerge.

In addition, there are four procedural changes. On the two-and-a-half-year presidency, we all know that it does not make sense to continue with the six-month presidency and to have Malta and so forth as President of the Union. I have to tell my right hon. and hon. Friends that their system of shared responsibility, as occurs in the Council of Ministers, makes no sense. In the Council of Ministers, responsibility can be divided up—one country can chair the trade and industry committee, another can chair the agriculture committee, and so on. The presidency cannot be divided up in that way.

On double majority voting, I understand that the Spanish and the Poles did not want that because they had the artificial advantage of a weighting in their favour under the previous system, but I cannot see why it is in the British national interest that the Poles and the Spaniards should have that advantage.

The yellow card system has been denounced as inadequate, but only a fool or a fanatic does not go for half a loaf instead of no bread. It would be nice to go further in giving national Parliaments an even greater role, but this is a major change in a positive direction, and I cannot believe that it is a reason for opposing the Bill.

As for the new withdrawal procedure, I should have thought that my Eurosceptic colleagues would be delighted about that. Of course, Parliament is sovereign, and we always could have withdrawn, but that is now recognised in the treaty.

All in all, I fail to understand the rationality of opposing this treaty from the point of view of the British national interest.

5.59 pm

Mr. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): I am pleased to participate in the debate because I tabled the first early-day motion that called for a referendum in May 2003. I was delighted when the Government decided to hold a referendum and I congratulate them on that. I understand that there was a little soul searching in Downing street before it happened, but the right conclusion was reached.

Mr. MacShane: For you, anything.

Mr. Hopkins: I am pleased that my hon. Friend and I agree on that—as we do on so much.

However, I remain profoundly opposed to the constitutional treaty. Along with millions of Labour supporters and trade unionists throughout Britain, I shall vote no in the referendum. I have often spoken about EU matters in the Chamber and I shall not dwell on all the issues today. I have reservations other than those that I shall express but other colleagues, including my hon. Friends the Members for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. Davidson) and for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) have covered them.

The constitutional treaty is, at its heart, hostile to social democracy. The thrust of today's EU is deeply anti-socialist and the neo-liberal philosophy is being driven forward. There has been a conflict in the EU between the two forces and, unfortunately, the neo-liberal force is winning against the social democratic force. I want to reverse that drift.

The drive to marketise and privatise public services under the bland-sounding term of liberalisation threatens to turn back the clock and unpick the fabric of social democracy, welfare states and social protection that has transformed the lives of working people in post-war Europe.

We hear the term "flexible labour markets." A couple of years ago, I was on holiday in Portugal, and although my Portuguese is not good, I understood a sign on a building site that said, "No to flexible labour markets". The Portuguese construction workers understood perfectly what labour market flexibility means. The Swedish no in the referendum happened because Swedish social democrats and trade unionists perceived the threat and voted no.Where countries are already advanced in liberalising service areas, article III-148 of the treaty commits them to "undertake liberalisation of services beyond the extent required by the European framework laws".

It gives the Commission more powers to promote privatisation of key public services.

Even without the treaty, the new Commission attempted this week to relaunch what it described as the flagging Lisbon agenda. There is serious anxiety, especially among trade unionists, that that will be to the disadvantage of working people. The European Trade Union Confederation, which is now led by John Monks, a good friend and former colleague, stated:

"This is a disappointing start for the new Commission because it risks presenting Europe as an agent for lower social standards, worse welfare states and poorer environmental standards".

That is happening in the EU now and the treaty will reinforce it.

The treaty will consolidate Maastricht and the Single European Act, both of which I opposed. I believed that the Common Market or European Community was jogging along nicely before the Single European Act, which constituted a step change towards a much more neo-liberal construct. That is where things went wrong. I would be happy to revert to the position before the Single European Act and I would probably complain only about the common agricultural policy and the common fisheries policy. We could work happily with our European colleagues on that basis.

My colleagues have made several points about the referendum. I believe that the Electoral Commission has criticised the wording although it has acquiesced in what the Government have done. We probably will not be able to persuade the Government to make the wording more neutral, but it is significant that the Electoral Commission questioned it.

It is right to place limits on campaign spending. I remember the 1975 referendum when the amount of money spent on the yes side was grotesque when compared with that spent on the no side. I was on the no side at the time, and I remember well the pathetic resources that we had, compared with the massive resources used to persuade people to vote yes. We want to see more balance this time.

This referendum should not be held on the same day as other elections. We want a separate day for it, so that people can focus on the issue, rather than thinking, "Oh, well, it's just another election", which might lead them to vote yes or no in a casual way. They need to focus specifically on this important decision that Britain has to make. I also want a constituency count. My constituents know very well what my views are on these matters, but I would like to know what their views are. They might be different from mine, but I would like to know what they think. Every other hon. Member should also be aware of what their constituents are saying, so a constituency count would be important.

It has been said that the constitutional treaty is just a "tidying-up exercise". If that were the case, it would not be that important if we did not adopt it, would it? We should still have what we have now, and it would not be that significant. However, so much effort is being put into ensuring that the whole of Europe votes for the treaty that I suspect that it is rather more important than just a "tidying-up exercise". There is a lot more to it than that.

I have said before in debates on European matters that the constitutional treaty includes references to eurozone institutions. Those references should be taken out and voted on separately—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. The hon. Gentleman's time is up.

6.5 pm

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton) (Con): I am very pleased to follow the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins). I have listened carefully to this afternoon's debate. I have had the opportunity to speak on this subject twice in the past year, and I do not want to repeat a lot of what I have already said. I would, however, like to build on some of the points that have been raised today.

I do not regard the treaty as just another European treaty, and I certainly do not regard it as benign. We have to look at the end agenda. There are legitimate debates to be had on both sides of the argument. I say "both sides of the argument", rather than "both sides of the House" because this is not a party political issue. It is a matter of national importance involving our future relationship with the European Union. I have no problem with people who do not share my view that we have already gone too far down the road of European integration. However, I say to the Government—and I reflect on this in regard to previous Governments—that I have difficulty with the fact that, over the years, politicians have not spelled out clearly what they were signing up to in the name of the people. That has caused the feeling that we, as a nation, have lost control of our right to govern ourselves in many important areas of policy.

I do not share the view that signing up to the common market, as it then was, led to peace in mainland Europe at the end of the last century. I respect the views of those who genuinely believe that, but I personally do not think that the common market prevented France and Germany from tearing each other apart as they have done in previous centuries. I believe that it was the presence of the Soviet bloc, the cold war and the formation of the NATO alliance and the link with north America that kept the peace in mainland Europe.

We are talking about the type of relationship that we want with Europe. I fully share the views of those who have flagged up the additional powers in the treaty—the euro-creep, as it is euphemistically called. These significant powers are being given to people who have not been elected by the people of this country, and who are not answerable to us as our elected representatives.

[Mrs. Angela Browning]

We cannot call them to the Dispatch Box to answer our questions. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) so eloquently spelled out earlier, this illustrates the democratic deficit that we are experiencing.

I know that this subject is not the public's idea of a hot political topic. They have more important things to concern them. However, if we do things by stealth in one treaty after another, and if we erode people's right to elect through the ballot box every four or five years those who make decisions on their behalf here, when they suddenly wake up to the fact that that right has gone, it will not simply be a matter of their not turning out to vote in general elections. Voter apathy will not be the only price that this country pays for such stealth; I believe that there will be a reaction on the part of the public when they realise that their democratic rights have been taken away from them. Yes, we all take our democratic rights for granted and it is already possible to see in some countries what can happen when extremism feeds on the lack of democratic accountability. It is a very dangerous path to go down.

I say to Ministers and colleagues that, whatever side of the argument they are on and whatever they believe the right relationship between this country and the EU should be, at least be honest in telling people what is being done in their name. Let us not have spin or gloss; let us not keep telling people that they have not really signed up to this or that. They know. We all receive hundreds and hundreds of letters about it. The phone rings in the office: it is another small business; it is another person who wants to know why they have to do such and such, why they are bound by various rules. As their MP, I have to tell those people, "I am very sorry, but there is nothing I can do about it, because these decisions are not taken in the House of Commons. The people who have put these decisions before us are not the people"—

Mr. Quentin Davies: Blame No. 10.

Mrs. Browning: My hon. Friend says, "Blame No. 10". Well, I was a Minister in the last Conservative Government and I have to tell him that, as a Minister, I had great difficulty trying to argue the case when some of these proposals were made.

We talk about competition within the single market and I am a great believer in free trade, but there are 22 other countries out there that have free-trade agreements with the EU and a further 69 countries are currently negotiating such agreements. None of them is shackled by the regulation and statutory requirements that we have to face here. That is apparently the price that this country has to pay in order to be a member of this club. We hear all these euphemisms about where the train is going, what the destination is and so forth, but I say it is time to pull the communication cord.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak in the debate, albeit at a somewhat late hour and with just six minutes to run. I am glad to see that the reasoned amendment that we shall vote on this evening bears fair comparison to the one that I tabled a few days ago. I am equally glad that the issue of supremacy, extensively discussed today, relates closely to the decision taken last week by my party to support a proposition that I tabled in an amendment to the Constitutional Reform Bill.

The problem with the constitution, as I have said many times before, is the question of primacy. I do not need to repeat the argument today, as I have already explained it in my own terms over and over again. The plain fact is that the Foreign Secretary is blatantly wrong about the effect of the constitution on the United Kingdom. He mentioned the Vienna treaty, particularly article 27, but it is inconceivable that the people of this country could be governed on the basis of a decision taken by a treaty.

I return to what the Foreign Secretary said about 18 months ago—that international treaties took precedence over national laws. That led to an exchange of correspondence, and a series of questions, between myself and him. At the end of that 18-month period, on 8 or 9 September last year, he effectively conceded in a debate that it was true that statute took precedence over treaty—as, indeed, Lord Diplock had made absolutely clear in an important case in 1967. It is good law.

The way in which the Foreign Secretary replied to me yesterday in the European Scrutiny Committee is also inconceivable. I put it to him that the treaty could receive a no vote when the referendum is called and I asked him whether, if that happened, he would repeal the legislation that is being pushed through Parliament now because of the massive majority. He said that he would not repeal it, and then said—twice—that to do so would be a waste of time.

What arrogance. The Foreign Secretary would not repeal this legislation, even though it had been rejected by the British people. He relies on his prerogative powers to tell the country what laws will govern it and the extent to which Parliament will be governed by the new EU constitution.

The hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson) suggested that this treaty was just one in a series. That is arrant nonsense. Article 1.6 of the treaty states clearly that the EU constitution will take precedence over the laws of member states. When I put it to the Foreign Secretary that that precedence also included this country's constitution, he said that of course it did.

On the question of European Court of Justice case law, the treaty makes it clear that article 1.6 reflects the Court of Justice's existing status in that respect, and of course it does. Yesterday, I discussed with the Foreign Secretary the matter of the competing jurisdictions that flow from the European Communities Act 1972. Evidence from distinguished academics on constitutional law makes it clear that our judges are duty bound to give effect to decisions made by the House of Commons on behalf of the British people. However, the European Court maintains that existing case law—such as Enel v. Costa, or the Simmenthal verdict—means that it has the right to decide questions of law in this country.

The fundamental question is one of political will. Who governs this country? People have fought and died over that question.

The Bill should be rejected. The referendum should be the subject of a separate Bill so that we can ensure that this country is governed by legislation passed by this House, whose composition is determined by the will of the British people as expressed in general elections.

Mr. Robert Walter (North Dorset) (Con): Some intriguing polls have been published in the past few days. In The Times, a Populus poll showed that 36 per cent. of people would say yes to the question whether we should approve the treaty, with 29 per cent. saying no. However, an ICM poll showed that 39 per cent. of people would respond negatively to the official question and that the same proportion—39 per cent.—would respond positively. When the same poll asked people whether they would sign up to the European constitution in a referendum held tomorrow, 54 per cent. said no and 26 per cent. said yes.

A poll by the Institute of Directors found that 49 per cent. of its members intended to vote no in the referendum, with only 29 per cent. planning to vote yes. That caused IOD director general Miles Templeton to say:

"Business leaders remain ready to hear the case for both sides."

I shall use that as my starting point.

I have been a great supporter of Britain's membership of the EU ever since we joined 30 years ago. However, I am seriously concerned that in that time we have failed to take the people with us on the journey that has been the EU's development and evolution. We have now reached the stage where most people have little understanding of, and little confidence in, what is being done in their names.

Euroscepticism is not unique to Britain. It exists throughout Europe and the democratic deficit seems to be worse in some other European states, where people feel that it is inevitable and that they can do nothing about it. However, they will have the opportunity in referendums on the constitution to send a message to the political elites of Europe saying that they would like an explanation of what is going on and what has been done in their names during the past 30 years in this country, and somewhat longer in some other member states.

For all the Foreign Secretary's spin on the treaty, it does not provide the answer. When I read the Laeken declaration back in 2001, I thought that we were beginning to go in the right direction and to pose some of the right questions. However, when I read the treaty—all 511 pages—I remembered one phrase from the Laeken declaration, which mentioned "Simplification of the Union's instruments".

There is no simplification in the constitution, and it contains so much detail that it can hardly be described as a constitution: it is a management textbook. The explanatory commentary, which runs to 500 pages, is supposed to explain it to anyone who does not understand the first 500 or so pages. The constitution is nowhere near being a simplifying treaty. It contains minutiae of management detail that one would expect those responsible for looking after our interests to come up with as their modus operandi.

Much of what is in the document could soon be out of date. What we now need is what the Laeken declaration referred to—the creation of European institutions that are closer to their citizens. The right hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) referred to the fact that the Council will make decisions in public. That goes some way towards making the institutions more transparent and accountable. However, what is the point of making the decisions in public, but not holding the general proceedings of the Council in public? That is rather like putting cameras in the Division Lobbies here but taking them out of the Chamber, so that we can carry on our business in secret.

Most of our citizens support the broad aims of the Union, but they do not always see the connection between those goals and the Union's everyday actions. We all know that Europe has changed and is changing. With the 10 new countries that joined last year, it now has 25 member states. The enlarged Europe needs to be more effective and democratic, so we need a simple and transparent constitutional treaty, which is what the document was supposed to provide.

An effective European Union is in Britain's interest and it is in our national interest to be a member of that Union, because we have so many aims in common. We need a new treaty that spells out in black and white the powers of the various parties. It should state explicitly that the EU has only the powers that member states choose to grant it. It should clarify what the EU can and cannot do.

The constitution is unacceptable, but that does not mean that I have become anti-European, that I do not want the European Union to succeed, or that I want us to be relegated to the position of Norway and Switzerland, with an expensive, subservient and passive relationship with the European Union. That is not an option for the British people. We need a tidying-up and simplifying treaty, but that is not what we have. I can happily say that the leaders of Europe should go back and reconsider the constitution.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for North Dorset (Mr. Walter), who put his pro-European case against the constitution before us. It may be helpful if, at the outset, I put on the record the reference for which the Father of the House asked my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram). It was a reference to comments made to the European Scrutiny Committee by Professor Sir David Edward. On the subject of the so-called emergency brake, he said in reply to a question from the hon. Member for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan):

"The procedure involves going up to the European Council but the brake is not absolute. I think it is at that point that politics would overcome law, so to speak."

That is the reference that was sought.

We have had a splendid debate, with a good tone to all the contributions. We enjoyed particularly the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) revealing the secret about the right hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) frothing at the mouth during difficult EU negotiations on the treaty of Nice, and the right hon. Member for Livingston saying that the treaty did not involve any significant extension of competences. As he must well know, however, the list of 63 extensions of qualified majority voting is on the record. It includes such things as social security, structural and cohesion funds, agriculture and fisheries, transport, space policy, energy, culture, tourism, sport, civil protection—and much more that I do not have time to read into the record. Those are all new transfers to qualified majority voting—[Interruption.] The right hon. Gentleman says from a sedentary position that they are not new competences—but they are new to qualified majority voting. I hope that he now accepts that point.

Mr. Robin Cook: The hon. Gentleman's reference is accurate in that I said that there was no substantial extension of competence. None of the list that he has given argues that I was in any way wrong about that. He is talking about something entirely different: an extension of qualified majority voting. In the European Union, 85 per cent. of all decisions are already taken by qualified majority voting, primarily because the 12 extensions of qualified majority voting under the Single European Act, passed by a Conservative Government, are the basis on which the great majority of decisions are taken in the Council of Ministers.

Mr. Brady: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for making it clear that we are both talking about an increased transfer of powers from the House and the United Kingdom to the European Union—[Interruption.] He is starting to froth at the mouth again; he really should try to contain himself.

The right hon. Member for Livingston also made much of the public meetings that the Council of Ministers will hold. I heard the Foreign Secretary's comments in front of the European Scrutiny Committee yesterday, however, and he made it clear that decisions must still be made behind closed doors, and that the decision-making process would not work if it was in public. We are therefore hearing different things from different Labour Members.

The right hon. Member for Livingston also said that a vote against the constitution was a vote against the modern world. In 1999, however, on 25 May, at column 184, he also said:

"For the record, we are not proposing a constitution of Europe."—[Official Report, 25 May 1999; Vol. 332, c. 184.]

Was he then saying no to the modern world?

The right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell) seemed to suggest that Parliament could not exercise powers not to follow the decision taken by the Executive to endorse this treaty, putting the Liberal Democrats firmly under the royal prerogative and apparently denying the right of the House to make such decisions.

One of the greatest pleasures in the debate, however, was the contribution of my right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) who spoke about public disaffection with the political process and the extent to which the public see a gulf between the people and the institutions of Government. As he said, this constitution will make it worse, citing instances from food supplements to asylum policy.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) spoke of his strong opposition to referendums. We differ from his views but respect his principle and consistency in these as in other matters. He put the view that Ministers are weakened by the use of referendums. All that I would say on that is that Ministers are weakened only if they are out of tune with the views of the people. We are in tune with the views of the British people, and we will be strengthened by the referendum if we see that no vote, whenever it may come.

The House has, in the short time allowed, been discussing a momentous decision. Contrary to the Government's claims, the new constitution would be a decisive step towards political integration. If we talk to politicians or diplomats anywhere in Europe, they will tell it to us straight: the constitution is part of the process of creating an economically and politically integrated Europe. Only in Downing street or the Foreign Office is the pretence maintained that this is a mere codification of existing treaties.

Mr. Cash: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Brady: I will not, because I have limited time. I apologise to my hon. Friend.

But even as the Government try to flog this outrageous porkie to the British people, they cannot get their own story straight. On the "Today" programme this morning, the Foreign Secretary said that the constitution

"literally limits the powers of the European Union".

and that

"What this does is say 'this far and no further'".

That directly contradicts the Prime Minister, who claimed in Cardiff on 28 November 2002 that "we must end the nonsense of 'this far and no further'".

It also contradicts the Minister for Europe, who said at Durham university in November that "this treaty"—the constitution—

"won't be the last word".

The Government maintain that the constitution is a great triumph for Britain, but as we heard earlier, the French are giving the game away. We have heard the views of President Chirac and of Alain Lamassoure, both of whom have made it clear that the constitution is regarded as a victory for the French vision of Europe over the Anglo-Saxon vision. Nicolas Sarkozy, leader of the UMP, said:

"If the French said 'no' in the referendum, it would be the British, who want a fiercely competitive market, who would triumph".

The fact is that whatever this untrustworthy Government say, the British people have the good sense to see through it, and so, I am thankful to say, does British industry.

There is emerging evidence that the referendum question may need changing, but we welcome the fact that the Bill does provide for a referendum. Indeed, the British people are being allowed one only because of the pressure being applied by the Opposition. This Government saw no lofty principle in the idea that the voice of the British people should be heard. They struggled, blustered and resisted, but then, as the Minister for Europe told the New Statesman—I am paraphrasing, but one can imagine the scene as he and the Foreign Secretary sit there side by side—"I turned to Jack and I said, 'Jack, we're stuffed. We've got to give a referendum. I don't think we can hold out.'"

Now we have the Government's grubby attempt to push the referendum back to autumn 2006—the very last moment—to prevent the people from having their say. What rich irony there is in a Prime Minister who once boasted of wanting Britain to lead the way in Europe now being found cowering in a corner, hoping and praying that the French vote no and get him off the hook. Even now, as the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) has said, the Government are trying to pull a fast one by smuggling the 448-article European constitution through Parliament via five clauses of an incomprehensible Bill that is supposedly about the referendum.

In promoting this constitution, the Government are missing the real challenges for Europe, including sorting out the mess of the EU institutions, which are riddled with financial mismanagement and fraud and have not been approved by the auditors for 10 years. Moreover, Britain's net contribution to EEC institutions is projected to rise, according to the Chancellor's own figures, from £2.4 billion in 2003–04 to £4.5 billion in 2007–08. Perhaps the Minister will explain in his response why such an increase is necessary.

Mr. Quentin Davies: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Brady: As I said earlier, I do not really have time to give way. I apologise to my hon. Friend.

Why have the Government done nothing to tackle the scandal of the EU accounts, and why, when I asked in November, had the Chancellor and Foreign Secretary not even bothered to discuss the problem that needed to be tackled?

Mr. Davies: Will my hon. Friend give way on that point?

Mr. Brady: On that point, yes.

Mr. Davies: I am most grateful. My hon. Friend will doubtless be aware that the auditors have invariably signed off the accounts of the Commission and the Union's institutions; the problem has been that many of the disbursements are carried out through the mechanisms of the member states. I do not imagine that my hon. Friend is proposing the very federalist and centralising idea that the Commission take over responsibility for disbursing all these sums, even if that might lead to greater transparency and a better audit record.

Mr. Brady: My hon. Friend is right in at least one respect, in that I do not propose that idea. But I should point out that one of the most scandalous examples of fraud in the EU involved EUROSTAT, and money that was directly controlled by the Commission. Indeed, it was one of the most startling instances of financial mismanagement and malpractice. Amazingly, the Chancellor has not taken the trouble to talk to Marta Andreasen, the whistleblower who exposed EU fraud and who was fired for her trouble.

The real challenge is not—as my right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks said so powerfully—creating a constitution that cedes more powers to Europe and takes decisions further and further away from the people, but tackling the massive burden of cost and regulation that is holding back our businesses and making them compete against China and India with one hand tied behind their backs. That is why such a large majority in British business oppose the constitution. An Institute of Directors poll found that 86 per cent. of its members believe that the constitution would mean more red tape, while 3 per cent. of them believe that it would reduce red tape.

The EU economy has stalled. A few weeks ago, the United States National Intelligence Council issued a devastating indictment of EU economic prospects:

"The current EU welfare state is unsustainable and the lack of any economic revitalisation could lead to the splintering or, at worst, disintegration of the EU, undermining its ambitions to play a heavyweight international role."

It adds that the EU's economic growth rate is dragged down by Germany and its restrictive labour laws. Structural reforms in Germany, and to a lesser extent in France and Italy, remain key to whether the EU as a whole can break out of its "slow growth pattern".

The only action proposed by the EU is yet another relaunch of the Lisbon agenda. The response is set out in the joint statement by the Irish, Dutch, Luxembourg, UK, Austrian and Finnish presidencies called, "Advancing regulatory reform in Europe":

"The four Presidency statement drew attention to the economic cost of poor and excessive regulation, and the benefits that respected and independent research shows could flow to European growth and productivity from improvements to the regulatory framework . . . . The Spring Council focused in particular on refining the integrated impact assessment process, by enhancing a competitiveness dimension, and on developing a methodology to measure administrative burdens for business. It also invited the Commission to take account of the Council's views in relation to priority areas for simplification and invited member states to commit to accelerated implementation of national regulatory reform initiatives . . . This statement, presented at the end of the Dutch Presidency of the EU"—

this is priceless—

"builds on the valuable progress that has been made by the European Commission, Council and Parliament over the course of the year and sets out our objectives for reform in the coming years."

Instead of action, we get statements filled with vague aspirations and meaningless words—the EU just does not get it.

Only by rejecting the constitution can we lead Europe to a better, freer and more prosperous future. Astonishingly, however, this clapped-out Government have no plan for the way forward if one or more of the member states votes no. Ministers even admit that they have no plan B. Having started off opposing the constitution, they have no idea what to do when there is no constitution.

We know what to do. A Conservative Government would lead the way towards a more flexible, less regulated Europe that recognises the differences between 25 different cultures and economies. Some 20 years on, there is a widespread acceptance in the EU that for Europe to compete, it needs the kind of economic reform and deregulation that Conservative

[Mr. Brady]

Governments brought to this country in the 1980s and 1990s. The tragic lesson of the Lisbon process is that Europe does not know how to do that. Given the choice between real deregulation and increasing the jurisdiction of EU institutions and adding new layers of bureaucracy, the wrong decision has been taken yet again.

Conservative Members will be proved right on today's big constitutional question, just as we won the economic arguments of the past 20 years, and the rejection of the constitution presents a huge opportunity for Britain, and for Europe as a whole. In a recent debate, the hon. Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Ms Stuart)—it is sad that she is not here today, because she contributes well—said that the proponents of the constitution often seem like old men talking about their dreams. Those dreams may have had a place in post-war Europe, but they have no relevance to the Europe of today.

The real challenge in modern Europe is not internal aggression, but external competition, a challenge that the EU is disastrously failing to meet. Instead, we have the so-called Lisbon agenda, which halfway through its 10-year programme was described by the President of the Commission as a "catalogue of worthy aims". Europe is subject to continuing economic stagnation, over-regulation and rising costs. In the words of Derek Scott, a popular figure in this debate and the Prime Minister's former chief economic adviser, the constitution would "entrench Europe's economic failings and drag Britain down".

However out of touch the metropolitan clique around the Prime Minister may be, I know that many Labour Members are not so out of touch with the people whom they represent. Those Members know that their constituents do not want this latest shift of powers from our democracy. They know, too, that this constitution would be bad for Britain. If they vote for the amendment, they, like us, will be able to stand on the doorstep at the forthcoming election, look their constituents in the eye and say that they have represented the interests of their constituents and of our country.

I urge all hon. Members to do what is right this evening, and to vote to reject this outdated and unwanted constitution.

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Denis MacShane): We have had a good debate: 26 colleagues, right hon. and hon. Members, have spoken. It is the most enjoyable European debate that I have listened to during the decade or more that I have been a Member of the House. Colleagues have responded to one another and taken forward proper dialogue and discussion. For the most part, there have been no set-piece, speak-your-weight, pre-written speeches.

The debate is part of my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary's clear commitment to bring these issues to Parliament. Since the intergovernmental conference of October 2003, we have had no fewer than 16 debates, 14 of them on the Floor of the House, which have dealt wholly or in large part with the EU constitutional treaty. There have been a further 13 debates in the House of Lords. Commons European Scrutiny Committees and House of Lords European Committees have undertaken detailed inquiries into aspects of the treaty. Ministers, including myself, have given evidence. There have been Westminster Hall debates and, of course, the unprecedented creation of a Standing Committee on the Intergovernmental Conference—the only time in parliamentary history when Members have been allowed to question Ministers about the negotiation of a treaty while it was under way.

We want to maintain that, which is why I welcome the part of the new treaty that strengthens the role of national Parliaments. It is true that we shall have to adapt our ways of thinking. We shall need to talk and communicate with colleagues in other national Parliaments, but Labour and other Members will want to use the occasion of the treaty to strengthen parliamentary accountability for what is done in our name in Europe.

Angus Robertson rose—

Mr. MacShane: The hon. Gentleman has been in the Chamber throughout the debate but has not spoken, so I shall give way. I do not, however, want to take many interventions because I want to answer the points made in the debate.

Angus Robertson: I want to pick up on a point that has not been covered so far. Part of the Bill that I very much welcome is the innovation that, should the treaty go through, any future amendment must go through the House. As the Scottish Parliament will be involved in that, under the yellow card arrangements, will the Minister tell us what thought has gone into the involvement of devolved institutions in aspects where sovereignty is shared between them and the European Union, and not the House?

Mr. MacShane: The yellow card issue is for national Parliaments. As the hon. Gentleman will know, there is a procedure known as a Sewel motion that allows the Scottish Parliament to take forward relevant matters under the treaty. I hope that we can have a full discussion of that.

I have some good news for the Conservatives. Yesterday, the Conservative—believe me, it is very conservative—party in Denmark won a thumping victory in their national elections. The new Prime Minister, Mr. Fogh Rasmussen, who is a very conservative European gentleman, said that the first priority for his new Government was to get the constitutional treaty through in Denmark. I am sure that all Conservatives in the House will join us in wishing him full speed.

There are three broad questions we have to consider. This has been a wide-ranging debate, but, my goodness, it has not actually been on the Bill itself. We have been up and down the highways and byways of the problems of Europe: how Europe is run, the economies of Europe, and the fraud and mismanagement of accounts in Europe. Those are all important issues, but they are not remotely relevant to what we shall have to vote on shortly.

The second part of the Bill relates to the referendum, while the first part gives effect to the part of the treaty that requires a change in our domestic law. That is normal in treaties. The question of "the question" has been raised. I am glad that, in a statement to the Press Association on 26 January, the Leader of the Opposition said:

"We do accept the question."

On the same day, the shadow Foreign Secretary said:

"The referendum question seems straightforward."

I am glad that we have their agreement on that.

Mr. Ancram: I have written to the Foreign Secretary to ask about the terminology that describes the treaty. Why does the treaty refer to the establishment of a constitution for Europe, when the question refers to the establishment of a treaty for the European Union? I am sure that there is a very simple explanation—it would be nice to have it.

Mr. MacShane: The right hon. and learned Gentleman seems to be resiling from what he said a few weeks ago.

Mr. Ancram: Answer the question.

Mr. MacShane: I will answer the point in my own way. The Electoral Commission has considered the intelligibility of the question against its published guidelines, and it said:

"The Commission welcomes the brevity of the proposed question . . . The Commission is content that the question is structured in such a way that it prompts an immediate response and encourages each voter to interpret it in the same way . . . The Commission is satisfied that the referendum question makes it . . . clear what decision the voter is being asked to make."

If the right hon. and learned Gentleman turns to article I-1 of the treaty, he will see that it says that

"this Constitution establishes the European Union."

So it does seem fairly sensible to put that question to the British people.

The third point is that this is a treaty under international law. Winston Churchill notably said that jaw-jaw was better than war-war, but in a sense what we have been developing in the United Kingdom, particularly since 1945, between the parties is the idea that there is obviously one thing better than war-war—jaw-jaw—and that there is one thing better than jaw-jaw, and it is law-law: we can shape the rule of law that governs many of our international relations. Churchill himself signed 162 multilateral treaties. Lady Thatcher signed 316 multilateral treaties—she really was a treaty queen—and the present Prime Minister has signed only 153 multilateral treaties, but he has a number of years in office to continue, and that 153, of course, includes the new treaty of Rome.

Let me now turn to what is actually on the Order Paper. Forgive me, Madam Deputy Speaker, if I refer to what we must vote on tonight. The Conservative party in the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition says that the treaty "provides for the implementation into UK law of the Constitution for Europe".

The right hon. and learned Gentleman is perfectly right: every time that we have signed a treaty, we have had to change domestic law. The amendment continues:

"it enshrines the primacy of European Union law."

Again, he is perfectly right: that has been the case since 1972. As is made clear in article I-6 of the treaty:

"The Constitution and law adopted by the institutions of the Union in exercising competences conferred on it shall have primacy over the law of the Member States."

That has been the case now for 32 years.

Mr. Cash rose—

Mr. MacShane: Hon. Members will also note that, under article I-11 of the treaty,

"the Union shall act within the limits of the competences conferred upon it".

Mr. MacShane: I am trying to reply to the points made in the speeches. A number of colleagues referred to fisheries policy, which has been included in all the treaties since 1972.

Mr. MacShane: Other colleagues have referred to directives under the Single European Act. The right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) made a powerful point, but he was talking about what is contained in the Single European Act. As other hon. Members noted in the speeches that they made after he left the Chamber, the thrust of his speech was very much against the Single European Act. That shows the huge danger that we now face.

The Conservative party is embarked on saying no not just to this treaty, but to the treaty before it, the treaty before that and, above all, the crowning jewel of Lady Thatcher's achievement under the Single European Act, which was to make market economic relations the norm in the European Union. That is buttressed by the social chapter, and in a powerful speech that set the tone for our debate, my right hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) cited the treaty at length and showed the extent to which it contains references to what citizens want to hear: the guarantee of their social rights and the guarantee of full employment.

Mr. Cash: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. MacShane: No, I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister has made it clear that he does not intend to give way.

Mr. MacShane: The amendment contains the extraordinary allegation that the new treaty "promotes the concept of a common foreign and security policy".

What a surprise! That has been in every treaty since Maastricht. The whole idea of a common foreign and security policy was first put forward by Lady Thatcher in a famous speech in 1984. Here we are, 21 years later, and the Conservative party finds that the new treaty refers to a common foreign and security policy.

May I especially pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Joyce Quin), who will be leaving us after the election? In a characteristically calm, measured and steady speech, she showed just how much she has contributed to the House for a number of years on Europe—we will miss what she has to say. Similarly, my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan) will not be coming back to the House after the election. He spoke by representing his trade union, Amicus—it used to be known as the Amalgamated Engineering and Electrical Union—which has always taken a constructive and positive position on Europe. We have heard the opening shots of the giant campaign on whether we say yes or no to Europe through the referendum, and I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends will play a part in it.

I cannot let the speech made by the shadow Foreign Secretary go by. Most of it was a kind of Lord Rothermere rant. The right hon. and learned Gentleman would have been a perfect Chamberlain-ite during the 1930s with his obscure conversion to isolation, because we know that he is a pro-European and a one-nation Tory. Although the right hon. and learned Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) might have to toe the party line today and say no, the Marquis of Lothian will say yes when the referendum comes.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman prayed in aid Ben Bot. I agree with Mr. Bot because I think that we need more power for Parliaments—there is a way forward for that in the constitution. However, Mr. Ben Bot, the Dutch Foreign Minister, of course signed the constitution. The right hon. and learned Gentleman also prayed in aid Mrs. Thatcher's sturdy work to secure the abatement, but she achieved that only because she won a majority set of votes in the then Council of Ministers and the measure was not written into the treaty. That shows exactly why we have to keep negotiating on the many great interests that we must defend in Europe, but we would not be able to do that if we followed the advice of the Conservative party and isolated ourselves permanently from it.

I pay tribute to the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell). He located the debate in history and recalled why the European Coal and Steel Community was founded. Some dismiss the question of peace, stability and democracy as irrelevant, but is it not interesting that Lithuania, Slovenia and Hungary, the three member states that have already ratified the treaty, are all countries that know the effect of the absence of the European Union, the rule of law and democracy?

The House must make a decision tonight. I am grateful for the measured tone of much of the debate, although I cannot address all the issues raised by hon. Members. I am especially grateful for the tone of those who said that we should vote for the referendum tonight and perhaps leave debate on the constitutional treaty itself for another day. Tonight the House must fundamentally decide whether it wants to move Britain forward, not back. Forty years ago, a Labour leader announced that entering Europe would mean the end of 1,000 years of English history.

Rab Butler, a Conservative leader, said that while he respected the reference to 1,000 years of history—[Interruption.] He was the best Prime Minister the Conservatives never had. He said that while he respected the reference to 1,000 years of English history, the Conservatives believed in the future. That was then; today they do not. Like the fantasy island where all the asylum seekers will be placed, they believe in a fantasy Europe—a Europe to which they can say no, and then the rest of Europe will quietly say yes to the demands of the Conservative party. To read the Conservatives' language and to listen to some of their contributions today is to enter a world of make-believe.

Reference has been made to the length of the treaty. I have it here in a reduced form. It is about 150 pages long and quite readable. It is half the length in words of the excellent biography of William Pitt by the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks and a lot shorter than the latest book by the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), "Singing the Blues", in which he discusses the view that, in negotiating with Europe, the threat of withdrawal should be used only as a last resort. He writes:

"I liken it to the use of nuclear weapons before you have tried invasion by conventional forces."

What a remarkable metaphor. His friend and fellow European, the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory), who has taken part in this debate, goes a step further. Speaking at the Conservative party conference, he said:

"If we vote 'no' in a referendum on the constitution, the world is at our feet. We could unilaterally call for the repatriation of the Common Fisheries Policy and dictate to the rest of the EU".

Dictate to the rest of the EU? Even if there is a no vote, it still leaves us with the existing constitution of Europe, a mishmash of treaties, so we could repatriate the fisheries or other policies only by being in breach of existing treaty obligations. But I leave that for a later debate.

What an amazing language this is: the nuclear option from the right hon. Member for Wokingham and the world at the feet of the right hon. Member for Wells: pressing the nuclear button and dictating to Europe. Wokingham and Wells, the Ant and Dec of the anti-European movement. At least Robert Kilroy-Silk, our former colleague, was honest when he described—[Hon. Members: "What?"]—when he described the people that he worked with in the United Kingdom Independence party as a bunch of right-wing fascist nutters. UKIP responded by putting out an immediate statement saying that it was true that UKIP had a right-wing fascist nutter element, but Robert Kilroy-Silk had now left the party.

What, alas, we have heard today in too many speeches from the main Opposition party is language to appease UKIP and not promote Britain. I would say to the Conservative party, appeasement and isolation is never the way forward. Every other mainstream Conservative party in Europe understands the need to support this new treaty. I have to say, on the day after President Bush sends his Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to open, as she put it, a "new chapter in the relationship between" the United States and Europe, we hear from Conservative Front-Bench Members only arguments about isolating ourselves from Europe.

What a message to send to the world—to the investors who want to come here and to those who have already ratified the new treaty. The Conservative party wants to plunge Britain into a feast of hostility to Europe over the next few months and the next year. Little wonder that the Leader of the Opposition is totally unwelcome in Washington, just as he is unwanted in Europe and unelectable in Britain. This party, this Government, and I believe a majority of us in the House and the nation, will not allow the Tories to turn the clock back to their vision of Europe—a Europe of conflict instead of co-operation, of beef wars and empty chairs, of rejecting partnership.

This treaty is good for Britain. We will defeat the isolationists. We will move forward with Britain and not back to the anti-European isolationism of the Conservatives. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

EUROPEAN UNION BILL (PROGRAMME)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 83(A),

That the following provisions shall apply to the European Union Bill:

Committal

1. The Bill shall be committed to a Committee of the whole House.

Proceedings in Committee

2.—(1) Proceedings in Committee of the whole House shall be completed in three days.

(2) Those proceedings shall be taken in the order shown in the first column of the following Table and shall be brought to a conclusion (so far as not previously concluded) at the times specified in the second column.

(3) Standing Order No. 83B (Programming committees) shall not apply to the proceedings on the Bill in Committee of the whole House.

TABLE

| Proceedings | Time for conclusion of proceedings |
|---|---|
| First and second day | |
| Clause 1, Schedule 1, Clauses 2 to 4, Schedule 2, new Clauses relating to Part 1, new Schedules relating to Part 1 | Three hours after the commencement of proceedings on the Bill on the second day. |
| Clause 5, new Clauses relating to Part 2, new Schedules relating to Part 2 | The moment of interruption on the second day or three hours after the commencement of proceedings on Clause 5, whichever is the later. |
| Third day | |
| Clause 6, Schedule 3, Clauses 7 and 8, new Clauses relating to Part 3, new Schedules relating to Part 3, remaining proceedings on the Bill | Five hours after the commencement of proceedings on Clause 6. |

Consideration and Third Reading

3. Any proceedings on consideration shall be brought to a conclusion (so far as not previously concluded) one hour before the moment of interruption on the day on which those proceedings are commenced.

4. Proceedings on Third Reading shall be brought to a conclusion (so far as not previously concluded) one hour after the commencement of those proceedings or at the moment of interruption on the day on which they are commenced, whichever is the earlier.

5. Standing Order No. 83B (Programming committees) shall not apply to proceedings on consideration and Third Reading.

Programming of other proceedings

6. Any other proceedings on the Bill (including any proceedings on consideration of Lords Amendments or on any further messages from the Lords) may be programmed.—[Gillian Merron.]

The House divided: Ayes 288, Noes 166.

EUROPEAN UNION BILL [MONEY]

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 52(1)(a) (Money resolutions and ways and means resolutions in connection with bills).

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the European Union Bill, it is expedient to authorise—

(1) the payment out of money provided by Parliament of—

(a) expenditure incurred by a Minister of the Crown or government department by virtue of the Act; and

(b) any increase attributable to the Act in the sums payable out of such money under any other Act;

(2) the payment out of the Consolidated Fund of—

(a) charges paid by the Electoral Commission in respect of services rendered, or expenses incurred, by or on behalf of the Chief Counting Officer or a counting officer in connection with the referendum for which the Act provides;

(b) sums payable in respect of increases of superannuation contributions required to be paid by local authorities in consequence of fees paid as part of those charges;

(c) sums in respect of expenses incurred in accordance with an order relating to the holding or conduct of a referendum in Gibraltar;

(d) any increase attributable to the Act in the sums charged on and falling to be paid out of that Fund under any other Act;

(3) the payment out of the National Loans Fund of any increase attributable to the Act in the sums payable out of that Fund under any other Act.—[Gillian Merron.]

Question agreed to.

EUROPEAN UNION BILL [WAYS AND MEANS]

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 52(1)(a) (Money resolutions and ways and means resolutions in connection with bills).

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the European Union Bill, it is expedient to authorise—

(1) charges to taxation of the European Union that is to be established by the Treaty signed at Rome on 29th October 2004 establishing a Constitution for Europe;

(2) the modification of the power of the Treasury by order under the European Communities Act 1972 to make provision about the imposition of customs duties on goods; and

(3) the payment into the Consolidated Fund or the National Loans Fund of sums received by a Minister of the Crown or government department by virtue of the Act.—[Gillian Merron.]

A14

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Gillian Merron.]

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak about the A14 in Cambridgeshire and I am pleased that my hon. Friends the Members for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) and for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly) are in their place this evening. I hope that they will be able to catch your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker, because the road runs through their constituencies as much—in some cases more—than mine and it affects all three of us.

Before dealing directly with the main issue, I want to express to the Minister in the strongest possible terms my anger at how I have been treated by the Highways Agency over the last few days. On Monday, I requested the latest information on traffic volumes to prepare for this debate. After several prevaricating and clarifying conversations, my office was informed at nearly 5 pm this afternoon that the Minister's office had refused to release the information—[Interruption.] The Minister seems to be suggesting that that is untrue, but if he listens, I will tell him exactly what happened. That fact was confirmed to me by his office as being in accordance with the Freedom of Information Act 2000. Subsequently, his office claimed that he had given permission for the information to be released, for which I am grateful, but I shall show that I have been given only partial answers to some of my questions. I have to question the basis of a freedom of information Act that apparently relies on a Minister to decide whether or not information should be released.

The critical issue to all three of us—it has been for many years—is the A14. Prior to 1997, most of the route from the Suffolk border almost as far as Huntingdon was in my constituency. Now, my patch includes only the section east of the Girton interchange. This debate is primarily about the sector from what is known as the Spittals interchange at Huntingdon to the A10 junction in my constituency.

The road is of local and national significance. It is the main commercial route between the west midlands and our biggest container port in Felixstowe. It is the main north-south route to east London, docklands and the channel crossing. Indeed, it is signposted as such on the A1. Within a few short miles, six lanes become four, then two—yet the traffic does not diminish. The stretch eastward from Girton is also the Cambridge bypass, but it is also a local road, which people have to use to get to and from Cambridge to work or study.

The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has decided that we must have 47,500 new homes in the Cambridge sub-region, including a new town at Northstowe, a few miles east of the A14. That development cannot go ahead without A14 improvements. That is not just my view; it is the considered view of Cambridgeshire Horizons, the organisation representing all the local authorities, businesses, the university and others who are taking the development forward.

On the matter of the road conditions, anyone using it will, anecdotally, testify to the problems, particularly daily traffic jams at peak times, often stretching for several miles. Local and national radio traffic flashes feature the A14 probably more than any other road in the country. One constituent wrote to me over the weekend:

"The journey time to Peterborough can now take anywhere from 1–2 hours. I never know what time I will arrive at the office or what time I will arrive home".

Those anecdotes are supported by the few statistics that I do have. Traffic volumes between the Hinchingbrooke and Girton interchanges—not quite the whole length that we are discussing—have increased from 63,000 in 1997 to almost 72,000 in 2003. It worries me, Madam Deputy Speaker, that the Government and the Highways Agency are so anxious not to publish all the figures, presumably because the picture is so awful.

What I can tell the House, as the county council kindly provided me with the information, is that, sadly, there has been an increase in accidents over the last nine years—not a politically significant period. Particularly on the stretch to which I referred, the number of accidents has risen by almost 40 per cent. I understand that it was particularly bad for two years, in 2000 and 2001, and it improved a little after that. It is now worsening again. Last year, there were 106 accidents in which, sadly, four people lost their lives, 232 were seriously injured and 148 slightly injured. The accident figures show that the accident rate per million vehicle kilometres on this critical stretch of road has increased from 0.13 in 1997, to 0.15 in 2003. That means that the road has become 15 per cent. more dangerous over that period.

Behind those statistics lie some very personal matters. One of them is the huge cost and distress inflicted on people caught up in the aftermath of accidents. It is not unknown for the road to be closed for many hours; it was closed for a whole day on one occasion last year. I received an e-mail from a consultant working in the accident and emergency department at Addenbrooke's hospital. He said:

"As an A and E consultant at Addenbrooke's hospital . . . I sadly see all to frequently the so many badly injured people from the notorious A14 motorway. A large number of us doctors, nurses and other staff spend hours, days, weeks and months putting their shattered bodies back together again and hopefully their lives too. Unfortunately, many succumb, leaving behind their families to pick up the pieces."

The consultant continues:

"I believe that if the A14 is improved, we will see a dramatic reduction in the number of motor vehicle crashes, with an associated reduction in the number of deaths and seriously injured patients. There is robust scientific evidence that such road improvements and other preventative measures make a difference and lead to fewer and less serious injuries."

That consultant sees the real impact of what has not been achieved. However, there is also environmental damage. We all know that slow-moving traffic is a serious cause of pollution. There is also the impact on all villages in the area. The county council is spending thousands of pounds on traffic calming measures to deter the many drivers who use the villages as rat runs to avoid the A14. The county council itself is seriously affected in a direct way because it is prevented from making plans to improve various other roads locally because it does not know what is happening to the intersections on the A14.

A former roads Minister said:

"the No. 1 priority for East Anglia has been the A14. That dual carriageway trunk road all the way from the M1 . . . to Felixstowe is one of the key strategic routes for the region . . . The A14 is . . . one of the 14 Christopherson priority projects for the European Community and it is eligible for some funding from the trans-European networks budget.—[Official Report, 14 February 1996; Vol. 271, c. 1117.]

That was John Watts, in 1996.

The present Government inherited a scheme between junction 14 on the M11 and the A1-M1 link—that is, to Huntingdon—and £122.3 million was allocated to meet the standard cost. By 1998, the scheme had been downgraded from "scheme in preparation" to one that was "subject to further studies and/or consultation by regional planning conferences."

In 1998, my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire held an Adjournment debate on the A14. The then Minister, the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Glenda Jackson), replied by previewing the multi-modal study that was finally completed in 2001. It recommended extra lanes for most of the existing dual carriageway, with a new southern bypass for Huntingdon. It also recommended a public transport system along the lines of the old St. Ives railway, to take some commuter traffic off the A14 and to serve Northstowe. The present Minister is aware that the county council has proposed a controversial guided bus system, and we await the outcome of the public inquiry.

The Secretary of State for Transport announced a project worth £490 million to build a three-lane carriageway and a southern bypass for Huntingdon. That was on April Fool's day, 2003—and perhaps that was no coincidence—but we all cheered, and there is no getting away from that. He said that the improved road was expected to open around 2010, and added that the Highways Agency would develop the scheme to the stage where the public could be consulted.

That was almost two years ago. Just before Christmas 2004, the present Minister said that the public consultation had been put back to allow more time for the Highways Agency to consider an alternative proposal—as if the multi-modal study had not had time and opportunity to consider all options.

Replying to questions from me and my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon, the Minister said that the consultation could start in spring 2005, and that he hoped that slippage would be slight. He told the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) that it was incumbent on the Government to "tackle the worst first", and that the greatest problem had to be dealt with first. But when the Cambridge Evening News, which is rightly campaigning for the improvements, phoned the Highways Agency, it was told that there was no priority list and that the agency could not name another A road in more need of upgrading than the A14. That statement was confirmed to me by the Minister's office today.

It is now February 2005 and, as far as my constituents are concerned, we are getting nowhere. In the view of the Cambridge Evening News, it is "Delay, delay, delay". I look not for pleasantries from the Minister tonight, but for real commitments. He may wish to dismiss my comments as electioneering and seek to reassure us that all is on track. Frankly, nobody will believe him. Every local authority involved in Cambridgeshire Horizons, the chamber of commerce, the local papers and all the businesses in the area are convinced that no progress has been made. As a constituent said to me in an email:

"No-one in the Highways Agency appears to be taking control of this matter. This would not be allowed in a PLC, heads would roll and so they should."

Will the Minister tell us when the public consultation will begin? He should by now be able to be absolutely specific—my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire has some detail of previous promises on that point. Will a public inquiry be necessary or can the Minister assure us that that can be avoided? If we must have one, when will it be and how much delay would it involve? Most importantly, when will we see some action? Can the Minister confirm that the announcement of £490 million in 2003 is still in the programme? When does he expect soil to be shifted and work to begin? When does he expect the new road to be open? Given the delays that have occurred and the increasing problems that I have described, I believe that the people of Cambridgeshire are entitled to the answers.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): I am most grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) for permitting me to make a short contribution. I congratulate him on securing this debate and on presenting it so comprehensively and expertly. I know that my constituents will be grateful to him for the way in which he has presented the issue.

My hon. Friend kindly mentioned that I had also brought up the issue on 16 December 1998. It is now six years later. Since then, my hon. Friend and I have fought for the multimodal study on the Huntingdon to Cambridge corridor to be put into tranche 1, because the Government were going to put it into tranche 2. After it came out of tranche 2, we had to fight for the right route to be selected. Then we had to fight for it to be put into the targeted programme of improvements. As my hon. Friend rightly pointed out, we thought—given the Government's rhetoric—that the targeted programme of improvements equalled a commitment to proceed with a small number of projects on the fastest possible timetable, so that something would actually happen.

My hon. Friend rightly said that some villages are deeply affected by this issue. He knows that because he represented them in the past. I have represented them since 1997, and they include Bar Hill, Lolworth, Conington, Longstanton and Oakington. It is virtually impossible to leave those villages or to travel south or north when the A14 is blocked—and that is often the case. That makes life in those villages intolerable and it is vital that we have a public consultation on the route as quickly as possible, so that the people living in those villages can see an end in sight to the blight on their lives.

My hon. Friend said that I had more detail on the date of the public consultation and indeed I do. I wrote to the Highways Agency in June and it told me in a letter later that month that the public consultation would start in September 2004. It did not. I wrote to the Minister in October and he replied the same month, saying:

"We now expect to start public consultation on proposals for the scheme in December."

I wrote to the Minister in November, but he replied that there was "nothing to be gained by rushing this stage . . . public consultation is now expected to start early in the New Year."

I wrote to him in December, when he replied:

"This will delay the public consultation until the Spring of next year."

Well, if we look outside at the weather, it would appear that spring has arrived. I wrote to the Minister in January and he replied on 1 February. All that he could say was that "You will be advised as soon as a date is fixed for the public consultation."

As my hon. Friend said, it is now approaching two years since the targeted programme of improvements was announced. I said back in 1998 that it would be unacceptable for it to be as long as 10 years before work was undertaken on this road. We are now approaching the point at which it will go beyond 10 years, and it is indeed unacceptable.

Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) on securing this debate and thank him for allowing me a couple of valuable minutes in which to speak.

The people of Huntingdonshire are tired—tired of constantly hearing of the accidents and deaths on the A14, tired of their inability to get around Cambridgeshire, tired of diversions, tired of A14 accident traffic running through their villages, and tired of this Government's consistent shilly-shallying, delaying and false raising of hopes.

I have written more letters to Ministers and asked more written and oral questions on the A14 than on any other issue. Much good it seems to have done anyone. Every few months, there is a new reason for delay and some lame excuse from Ministers. In December, the Minister wrote to me that the consultation was delayed from January to spring 2005. He has not, however, seemed in much of a hurry to set a date.

In demanding action on behalf of my constituents, I make three brief points. First, last Saturday, I talked to a pre-eminent research doctor who lives in my constituency. He works in Cambridge, but is now considering moving because of his inability to commute on the A14. Thus we see the ripple effect out from Cambridge—which is meant to be a regional priority—going into reverse. We all have big plans for the eastern region, but if this road is not sorted out, those plans are next to useless, as will be this Government's plans to build thousands more houses in the region.

Secondly, the Government must start to put the A14 plans in the context of the separate plan for the A1 and the A428. I have been shocked at how disjointed the Government are on what is meant to be multi-modal transport.

Thirdly this is a national problem. If every local car between Huntingdon and Cambridge were taken off the road, traffic would decrease by less than 5 per cent. on the A14. Therefore, while better local public transport is welcome, it will do next to nothing in itself to solve the problem of what is the main road from the docks to the west midlands.

With rail expansion simply not happening, the Government owe it to the people of my constituency, the region and the country to get the new A14 built and to do it now.

7.57 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Jamieson): I congratulate the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) on securing this debate, and on giving the House an opportunity to discuss this section of the A14. Unfortunately, the hon. Gentleman started the debate in rather a churlish manner, and complained about the way in which he said that he was treated by my office. He requested some information in an e-mail—I have it here—that arrived at 6.19 pm on Monday.

Mr. Paice: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Jamieson: No, not for a moment. The hon. Gentleman will listen to what I have to say now.

At 6.19 pm on Monday, the hon. Gentleman requested some information via a complex set of questions, and my officials set about putting the information together for him the next morning. The information arrived in my office at 2 o'clock today, and as soon as possible I made sure that the information was provided to his office in a fax that went out at 5.34 this afternoon. Had the hon. Gentleman put in his request in good time, we might have been able to get him more information, and more complete information. As it was, I had to make sure that the information that had been provided to me was properly and fully checked. We were not sure whether some of the information provided by the county council was entirely accurate, so we wanted to check that, too.

Therefore, the hon. Gentleman was provided with information. As someone who has occupied ministerial office in the past, he should know that it takes more than 24 hours to get a complex set of questions answered. Now I will give way to him, and will perhaps hear his explanation and apology.

Mr. Paice: There are words that one is not allowed to use in this House, but if I were, I would use them. What the Minister is suggesting is totally untrue. On Monday, my office telephoned the Highways Agency in the morning, and subsequently rang and asked for written confirmation, to which he has referred. This afternoon, his office—I could name the individual in his office, but I will not—stated clearly to me that he had personally ruled that the information could not be released to me because of the Freedom of Information Act 2000. That is absolutely clear.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. I remind Members of "Erskine May". The words "good temper and moderation" come to mind, so perhaps they will bear them in mind.

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Madam Deputy Speaker. I have explained to the hon. Gentleman when the information was sent in writing. In fact, what I asked to be conveyed to him was that we could not provide the information until we had checked its accuracy. Fortunately, that was done later in the afternoon and it was then given to him. He was told that under the Freedom of Information Act 2000, there could be a delay of up to 20 days before he received it. I hope that I have clarified what happened, for the benefit of the House.

The A14 was established as a trunk road in 1994 following completion of a new high-standard dual carriageway between the M1 and M6 junction at Catthorpe and Huntingdon. It is a route of strategic national importance, connecting the midlands with the ports of Harwich and Felixstowe. As the House will know, it is a mixture of dual two-lane and dual three-lane carriageway and has a variety of junction types, some with flyovers and some without. Congestion at peak hours at the Milton and Histon junctions caused by traffic queuing into Cambridge affects A14 through-movements. Average daily traffic flows on the A14 in Cambridgeshire range from 40,000 at Ellington to 72,000 between the St. Ives interchange and Bar Hill.

We are concerned about the casualty rate on the A14. Records for the period 2002-04 show an average of 200 personal injury accidents per year. Although the number of accidents is relatively high—any accident is unacceptable—the rate is below the national average for similar dual carriageway. That said, I do recognise that any accident is regrettable and involves human misery.

Following the Government's strategic review of the roads programme in 1998, we announced our intention to carry out a study of the problems on the A14 between Cambridge and Huntingdon. The Cambridge to Huntingdon multi-modal study—known as CHUMMS—reported in August 2001. The East of England local government conference, the predecessor to the East of England regional assembly, concluded that the preferred plan was consistent with the emerging regional transport strategy for the east of England and represented an integrated package that should form the basis for resolution of transportation problems in the corridor. The Government accepted the Conference's view that the package was a sound basis for pursuing integrated transport solutions, and asked the Highways Agency to take forward the recommended A14 improvement scheme.

The multi-million pound A14 Ellington to Fen Ditton improvement was added to the Government's targeted programme of improvements in April 2003. I should remind the hon. Members for South-East Cambridgeshire, for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) and for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly) that this scheme includes the widening of the A14 between the M11 and the A10, and that such a scheme was withdrawn by the previous Conservative Government in 1996. The hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire said with mock indignation that the situation is a disgrace, but if his party were in government, there would be no such scheme at all. The 2004 spending review has confirmed that the scheme is of national importance and will be progressed for future construction.

But there is much that we are doing in the short term, and the Highways Agency is also doing a lot to improve safety. Measures to improve traffic signing and white lining are programmed for completion before the end of this March. Such measures, combined with the installation of closed circuit television cameras and incident detection equipment—the latter has already been installed—are elements of the CHUMMS preferred plan. The agency is also in the early stages of planning other safety improvements for later in the year, including a further extension of the existing CCTV coverage.

The Highways Agency has also undertaken in-depth analysis of the accidents at the Spittals and Brampton Hut junctions, and it is developing short-term and medium-term measures to reduce the number of crashes at these locations. A scheme to provide improved traffic signs and road markings at the Spittals interchange is programmed to commence later this month; it will take about a week to complete. That will be complemented in 2005–06 by the installation of traffic signals, which will bring safety and journey time benefits. Many other improvements are being made to that stretch of road, but I do not have time to expand on them this evening.

Following a tragic accident on the A14 last year, the chief constable of Cambridgeshire asked representatives of the Highways Agency to travel the A14 with him and undertake an audit to address safety issues and driver behaviour. In September 2004, the agency assisted Cambridgeshire police in a multi-agency operation to monitor safe driving practice along that section of the A14. Special patrols spent a week monitoring drivers in a bid to put a stop to tailgating, needless overtaking and other offences involving mobile phones and seat belts. That survey exposed many instances of poor driving behaviour.

Returning to the Ellington to Fen Ditton improvement, I acknowledge the support for the scheme, but whatever the level of support, it is important to ensure that all opinions are properly invited and considered. Hon. Members will be aware that as a result of consultations with local authorities in preparation for the public consultation about the scheme, an alternative proposal, which differs from the strategy proposed by CHUMMS, has been suggested by the residents of Buckden in the constituency of the hon. Member for Huntingdon.

Mr. Djanogly: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Jamieson: No.

One reason why the delay has occurred is that we have listened to local residents and are examining the alternatives. The alternative proposal would retain the existing A14 past Huntingdon operating as a dual carriageway trunk road with a new route from Fenstanton to Ellington as a two-lane dual carriageway. The net effect would be to provide four lanes in total in each direction, instead of the three provided by the CHUMMS option.

An initial examination of the alternative proposal has concluded that it is essential that its merits and impacts are fully and properly assessed. At an early stage, CHUMMS assumed that the existing A14 past Huntingdon would carry local traffic only. I believe that it is important that work at this stage is carried out in sufficient detail to enable the proposals put forward for public consultation to be robust and to minimise the risk of lengthier delays to the scheme later in its programme. Public consultation on proposals for the scheme has therefore been put back a little to allow the Highways Agency time to consider the alternative.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) has also attended this debate and also takes an interest in that stretch of road. Her representations to my Department have been constructive, however, and instead of taking the churlish approach adopted by Conservative Members, she has been helpful.

We expect the consultation to start in spring 2005. There has been a great deal of media coverage about the delay to the scheme. When the scheme was added to the targeted programme of improvements, the Highways Agency aimed to start work in 2008–09. That will be difficult to achieve, but the agency has confirmed that it may still be possible. The scheme has not been delayed by the spending review announcement and was always scheduled for delivery in 2008 onwards.

I am glad that we have had time to expose some of the arguments. Anybody reading the Hansard report of the debate will reflect on the remarks made by Conservative Members—but were they in office, this debate would not need to take place because that road would not be being improved at all, and I am glad to have had an opportunity to put that point on the record.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

The Secretary of State was asked—

Environment Agency

1. Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): What steps she is taking to improve the capacity of the Environment Agency to tackle illegal waste dumping and fly-tipping. [215588]

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): A number of measures have been included in the Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003 and the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill.

Mr. Sheerman: Does my hon. Friend agree that the Environment Agency does a very good job and that it is increasingly being given new roles with European directives, one after the other, on waste electrical and electronic equipment, end-of-life vehicles and hazardous waste? At the same time, the Government are saying, through the Gershon review, that we must make all Departments cut back, and the James report from the Conservative party says that the Environment Agency should lose 1,200 jobs. Is that the way to ensure that the Environment Agency has the capacity to look after our environment?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The James report is not a ministerial responsibility.

Mr. Morley: I welcome that guidance, Mr. Speaker, but I certainly join my hon. Friend in welcoming the work of the Environment Agency. Indeed, its role is absolutely vital in environmental protection, environmental standards and the collection of waste. Any ill-thought-out measure that would seriously weaken its environmental protection department would be bad for the community and bad for the environment.

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend plan to publicise the new regulations on waste tipping, which could be introduced as a result of legislation being passed by the House? Might he consider giving anyone with a farm or premises where fly-tipping is taking place a large notice telling the men in white vans that their vehicles could be confiscated, and the costs of recovering those vehicles would have to be paid by them, if they continue to fly-tip in the future?

Mr. Morley: It is certainly important that we raise awareness about the penalties for fly-tipping in particular. The Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill will strengthen the penalties that can be applied and give local authorities and the Environment Agency more powers, including on the seizure of vehicles, as my hon. Friend rightly suggests. We have been working well to raise awareness with a range of stakeholders, including the Country Land and Business Association, the National Farmers Union and the Local Government Association. I have been pleased to see the targeted action that the Environment Agency has been taking with various campaigns to seek out areas at high risk of fly-tipping and, along with the police, to stop and search vehicles.

My hon. Friend might also be interested to know that under the BREW—business resource efficiency and waste—fund, which comes from landfill tax, we have made available to the Environment Agency £2 million in additional funds, in particular to tighten up the permitting and transfer of waste.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): In Burnley, waste dumping and illegal fly-tipping is a major problem. We get waste dumped in the backyards of empty properties and the council is clearing it up all the time. One of the biggest problems is that small builders who are working on one property dump the waste in the backyard of another property. Should we not impose draconian penalties on those people and, if necessary, put them out of business because that practice is unacceptable?

Mr. Morley: I agree with my hon. Friend. Fly-tipping is antisocial, selfish and, of course, brings with it environmental risks, and we must use all the measures that we can to stop it. Under another measure in the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill, site plans must be produced for large construction works to make it clear where the construction waste will go, so those sites will be clearly identified. Of course there is a threshold for that—it will not apply to small operators—but the Bill also contains measures to ensure that the landowners of empty properties take action either to secure the property or to clear it up when it is used as a tip, and that people who are responsible for fly-tipping take on the costs of the clean-up as well.

Climate Change

2. Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): What assessment she has made of the scientific evidence presented at the avoiding dangerous climate change conference. [215590]

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Margaret Beckett): The conference on avoiding dangerous climate change, which was convened by my Department from 1 to 3 February, concluded that the risks of climate change were even more serious than previously thought. It provided new scientific evidence that underlined the need for urgent work on both climate change mitigation and adaptation.

Tony Lloyd: My right hon. Friend once again deserves the thanks of the whole House for convening that important conference. As she pointed out, its conclusions were consistent with recent reports showing that climate change and the pace of change are worse than we thought. Although I welcome the implementation of Kyoto next week, it was disappointing that the European Commissioners announced that they will not establish targets on climate change under Kyoto beyond 2012. Will my right hon. Friend tell the House whether we can use our EU presidency to ensure that we firmly push forward the agenda, perhaps change the Commissioners' view on the matter, and make sure that Europe takes the lead with the United States, Japan and, importantly, the newly industrialising world so that we get a grip on the problem of greenhouse gases now? Frankly, if we do not do that now, we are betraying future generations.

Margaret Beckett: I take entirely the point that my hon. Friend makes. We will be engaging with some of the newly developing countries, especially those with substantial and growing energy needs, at a further conference that we are convening in the middle of March. I understand his worry about whether further targets will be set. We anticipate that we will discuss that issue during the March Environment Council. Our likely discussions will centre on whether the scientific and economic analysis informs dialogue and debate on whether further targets should be set, when they should be set and what their form might be. It is important for us to have an evidence-based discussion of the kind that we held in this country before we published our energy White Paper.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): Was any evidence presented at the conference on the effect of default demolition, which English Nature estimates costs the equivalent of 3,000 gallons of petrol for every Victorian terraced house? The Daily Telegraph described the demolition of homes as "Prescott's 'first resort'". Has the Secretary of State discussed with the Deputy Prime Minister whether that fits neatly with her green agenda?

Margaret Beckett: I am afraid that the conference did not concentrate on default demolition. It considered what the key impacts of climate change are likely to be for different regions and sectors, as well as for the world as a whole. It also considered what levels of climate change imply about the stabilisation and concentration of greenhouse gases, the emission pathways that would enable different stabilisations and concentrations to be reached, and the technological options. With due respect to The Daily Telegraph, the scope of the discussions was a little different.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend accept that public understanding about the link between burning fossil fuels and climate change is still at a comparatively low level? People now clearly understand the links between tobacco and cancer, and between junk food and heart disease, but we have a long way to go before most of my constituents clearly understand the impact of burning fossil fuels. Is there more that the Government can do to improve public awareness?

Margaret Beckett: Yes, I take my hon. Friend's point entirely. He is right that the links are less well understood in this area, which is at least in part because in the effort to ensure that all points of view are heard, media coverage tends to put a disproportionate emphasis on the views of those who are way outside the scientific consensus on the matter. He is entirely right that we realise that there is more to do to increase communication on the issue. We have given extra resources to both the Carbon Trust and the Energy Saving Trust—he might have seen the new campaign that the Carbon Trust has started to run—and we are getting advice about a further communication programme to be run by the Government, for which we were given money in the spending review.

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk) (Con): I join the hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Tony Lloyd) in congratulating the Government on holding the conference last week. Given the serious conclusions, are the Government worried that carbon dioxide emissions have not fallen since they came to power, that they will miss their own target for cutting carbon dioxide emissions by 2010, that their renewable energy target is no longer credible, and that because of their incompetence, British companies cannot take part in the European Union emissions trading scheme? Is it not all too clear that a far more urgent response to the threat of climate change is now needed and that no amount of fine words from the Prime Minister will cover the gaps in the Government's policy?

Margaret Beckett: Of course we are disappointed that $CO_2$ levels have not fallen, but the hon. Gentleman is stretching things to say that we will miss our target. We are not in 2010 yet—in fact, we are some five years away. It was intended from the beginning, when the climate change programme was established in 2000, that the programme would be reviewed. It was always thought likely that the measures would not be sufficient to get us to our 20 per cent. target by 2010. No such target was missed by the previous Government because they did not have a target for meeting carbon dioxide levels.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): That was before Kyoto.

Margaret Beckett: Yes, but we have moved substantially beyond the levels of greenhouse gas emissions that we inherited from that Government. I am not criticising them because they made progress, but we have made still more and have, indeed, exceeded our Kyoto target.

On the emissions trading scheme, I know that it is too much to expect consistency from the Conservatives, but considering how much they criticised us when we announced our initial proposals for a national allocation plan—

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): And they prayed against the regulations.

Margaret Beckett: Indeed, they also prayed against the regulations. So it is a bit ironic that they criticise us for trying to amend that plan.

Mr. Yeo: However hard the Secretary of State tries to mislead people—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."]—about the Conservative party's attitude to emissions trading, nothing will stop us telling the truth about the Government's failures. [HON. MEMBERS: "Withdraw."] We have always supported the principle of emissions trading—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Hon. Members sometimes tell me how to do my job. The hon. Gentleman is in order, but he is close to the edge.

Mr. Yeo: I am grateful for your guidance, Mr. Speaker.

Is it not disgraceful that at the time when the Prime Minister is putting climate change at the heart of Britain's presidency of the European Union, Britain, along with Greece and the Czech Republic, are not even in the emissions trading scheme? We all support the principle of targets, but it will not add to the Government's credibility if they defy the clear evidence that their targets for renewable energy and cutting carbon dioxide emissions will be missed, despite the fact that, after five years of continuous economic growth under the previous Government, they inherited falling carbon dioxide emissions.

The next Conservative Government will make transport greener, do more to promote energy efficiency for the benefit of households and business, and develop a wider range of renewable energy sources than Labour has done. Does the Minister realise that if we are to achieve our objectives and obligations, those are the very steps that the Government should be taking?

Margaret Beckett: I reject utterly any suggestion that I misled the House. All I did was remind it that the Conservative party—[Interruption.] I am sorry, but the hon. Gentleman said I was misleading people. I was not. I referred merely to the simple fact, which is on the record, that the Conservative party prayed against the emissions trading scheme regulations. I was delighted to be told the other day that, nevertheless, the Conservative party supported the principle of such regulations. I have not since said, and will not say, that the Conservatives oppose the principle, but I am entitled to draw attention to the record. I am certainly entitled to draw attention to the Conservatives' inconsistency in criticising us, as they did, for hitting British industry when we published our original proposals and now criticising us for trying to amend them.

I have made no attempt to deny where we are with the targets. It should concern everyone in the House that we are not finding it as easy to meet those targets as had been thought, and we will have to do more. I trust that we will get support from the Conservatives for the measures proposed in the climate change review programme.

As for the notion that the Conservatives would do more on energy efficiency, the Conservative Government did not recognise the issue of fuel poverty, and certainly no steps were taken on energy efficiency to help the millions of people who have been helped by this Government. The hon. Gentleman says that we need a wider range of renewables. I agree absolutely. What a pity, therefore, that the Conservatives cut the funding to programmes such as marine and coastal renewables when they were in power.

Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): My right hon. Friend will know that nine out of 10 of the most costly insured weather catastrophes since 1970 happened in the past 15 years. Was the insurance industry represented at the conference? What prospect does she see for engaging that industry in urging those who are rather laggard in realising the dangers of climate change to take more urgent action?

Margaret Beckett: My hon. Friend is entirely right. The dangers to which she draws attention are very real. The insurance industry was not represented as such at the conference. It was a conference of scientists that was convened and run by the scientific community. My hon. Friend is right that there is increasing awareness not only in the insurance industry but, as I heard myself during recent conversations that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister had with the World Economic Forum in Davos, in the banks, which are increasingly warning those who use their services that their preparations for and understanding of the risks of climate change will, in the long term, be a factor in the assessment of their financial record and probity.

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): May I welcome the work that the Secretary of State's Department has done in co-ordinating the scientific evidence on climate change? It has taken a lead within the Government in promoting the necessary radical action that we need, although sometimes it has lost out to other less enlightened Departments, which demonstrates the importance of the departmental structure. Have discussions been taking place within the Government on the possible abolition or reconfiguration of DEFRA, to be announced shortly after the election?

Margaret Beckett: I am not aware of any such discussions. I am constantly urged in conversations, particularly, for example, with non-governmental organisations, that my Department should take in all of energy policy, all of planning or all of transport. That is all very interesting, but I am aware of no plans that we should do so. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his remarks.

Alongside the concerns expressed and warnings given about the increased danger and urgency of the problem, the scientific community also judged that many of the technological options for tackling the problem already exist, and that significant moves forward could be made at a lower cost than some had previously believed. That is an important and worthwhile message that I hope will come out of the conference.

Wild Birds

3. Mr. Ben Chapman (Wirral, South) (Lab): If she will make a statement on numbers of wild birds in the UK. [215591]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): Thanks to the policies of this Labour Government, wild bird numbers, after decades of decline, are now recovering. Among threatened species that are increasing are the bittern, the corncrake and the cirl bunting. Others, including some more common species, such as the house sparrow and starling, are still declining. However, I can announce that from 1 March the house sparrow and the starling will enjoy increased legal protection.

Mr. Chapman: Will my hon. Friend join me in congratulating the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds on the 25th anniversary and success of its big garden bird watch, in which nearly half a million people took part and which is important in identifying declining numbers of particular types of bird? Will he join me in congratulating the RSPB also on the stance that it has taken on the potential effects of dredging in the Dee estuary and the damage that that could cause to this important wild bird habitat? Will he urge the authorities concerned in reaching a decision on the dredging of the Dee to take a view that fully balances the important ecological considerations alongside those of commerce?

Mr. Bradshaw: Yes, on my hon. Friend's latter point I can give him the assurance that he seeks. I am happy to join his congratulations to the RSPB on the excellent work that it does, not least through the garden bird watch scheme, in which I would urge right hon. and hon. Members and the public to participate, as I do.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): The wild birds at Highgrove, which is just outside my constituency, will no doubt join me in congratulating my constituent, Mrs. Parker Bowles, on the exciting news of her forthcoming marriage.

We very much welcome the slowing of the decline of wild bird populations that the Minister described in his answer, but we remain concerned about some of the species that are still being heavily predated. Will he explain why it is that under the Hunting Act 2004 dogs may still be used for the protection of pheasants, grouse and partridge, but not for the protection of corn buntings and turtle doves?

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): What about cats?

Mr. Bradshaw: The hon. Member makes a good point from a sedentary position.

The hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) is wrong that those species are still declining. Some are, but most of the species on the list are increasing, thanks to a number of policies that the Government have introduced, not least the agri-environmental schemes that will be built on by common agricultural policy reform.

The situation with raptors is variable. Sparrowhawks and buzzards are doing well, but the kestrel is doing less well. However, there is no evidence to suggest that the decline in some songbird species is the result, even primarily, of the actions of birds of prey. Cats, as the hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) pointed out, are a far bigger danger.

Jeff Ennis (Barnsley, East and Mexborough) (Lab): Will the Minister join me in commending English Nature on transforming 40 derelict pit sites into lowland heath landscapes which, I am sure he will agree, are excellent habitats for many of our wild native birds?

Mr. Bradshaw: Yes, my hon. Friend has highlighted one of a number of projects supported by the Government to restore the habitats that the country has lost over preceding decades. The lowland heath habitat to which he referred is particularly important, partly because it is very rare, but also because it is home to some species that in the past have been most threatened.

Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge) (Con): The Minister claimed that the Labour Government have been good for birds. What are their plans for cormorants?

Mr. Bradshaw: Cormorants are one of the species that have done extremely well in the past 20 years, and their numbers have increased a great deal. The hon. Gentleman is right. Last year, after listening carefully to the views of both the RSPB and the angling community, we decided to change the licensing regime for cormorant culling because of the damage that they were inflicting on some fisheries. However, even if the maximum number of licences were issued, the cormorant population would still be far higher than it was under the Tories.

Recycling

4. Helen Southworth (Warrington, South) (Lab): What initiatives her Department has undertaken to support recycling by local communities. [215592]

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): DEFRA, through its waste implementation programme, is currently delivering a package of targeted support to both local authorities and local community sector organisations across England to help raise recycling, composting and re-use rates.

Helen Southworth: In the UK, we recycled 3 billion aluminium cans in 2003, including 1 million in the Novelis plant in Latchford in my constituency. That is a huge number but, in the same year, 4 billion cans were thrown away. Every single recycled aluminium can saves enough energy to power a television set for three hours, so we saved 600 million kW of energy in 2003. However, we wasted a lot more. Will my hon. Friend commission research to identify voluntary schemes that provide recycling incentives so that more consumers will recognise the value of their empty cans?

Mr. Morley: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the energy saved through recycling, which avoids the need to make new cans from raw materials. As she may know, we have been running a campaign, "Recycle Now". The evaluation is encouraging, as it shows that the message is getting through to people and that they are being encouraged to change. I am pleased that our recycling rate has risen from 6 per cent. in 1997 to 17 per cent. today. There is a great deal more scope for improvement, and I accept the point made by my hon. Friend. I am pleased about the recycling rate for aluminium—the prices are also good—but there is an opportunity to do a great deal more, and the Government are committed to doing so.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) (Con): Given that recycling is such a good thing, would the Minister like to congratulate the Conservatives, as more Conservative councils operate recycling schemes and eight out of 10 of the best council recycling schemes are run by Conservative-controlled councils?

Mr. Morley: Let me be clear: I congratulate any council that has achieved and exceeded its targets. Many of the councils that the hon. Lady mentioned were Labour-controlled in the past, and there was a cross-party commitment to establish such schemes. Rather than being partisan about the records of individual councils, we should ensure that all councils achieve the recycling targets set by the Government. I am glad to say that, under this Government, they are doing so.

Toxic Waste

5. Mr. Colin Pickthall (West Lancashire) (Lab): What discussions she has had with the Environment Agency on the control of emissions from toxic waste tips. [215503]

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): The Department has frequent discussions with the Environment Agency on a wide range of issues arising from management of landfill sites.

Mr. Pickthall: I have here a list of substances classed as permitted waste, which have been dumped into a large toxic waste tip in my constituency. There are 350 of them and most are described as "dangerous". They range through arsenics, asbestos, phosphates, cyanides, mercury, effluent sludges and, ominously, other heavy metals, whatever they include. What work is done to examine how such materials react with one another once they are in such tips, and what monitoring is there of the effect of the emissions on surrounding populations? What work is being done to minimise such materials in production as well as in waste stream processing?

Mr. Morley: I understand that my hon. Friend is referring to the White Moss tip, and I appreciate the point that he makes. The White Moss tip has a licence for hazardous waste. It is monitored by the Environment Agency and I understand that action has recently been taken under the pollution prevention and control permits system in relation to odours from the site. The latest information that I have is that the issue comes from an old cell and not one of the new cells, which are engineered to very high standards and must meet the requirements of the Environment Agency and the relevant legislation. I might add that the tip always took hazardous waste and had a licence for former co-disposal. My understanding is that the owners are currently spending £100,000 to deal with the odour problems relating to one of the cells, and that the agency is supervising that and monitoring what goes into the tip.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): The Minister may be interested to know that the Select Committee on Environment, Food and Rural Affairs has recently received from the organisation Beyond Waste a report using official statistics to calculate that 692,000 tonnes of hazardous waste are still unaccounted for. There is dispute about that number, but would he agree to receive a copy of that report and analyse it? Does he accept from me that correct data are required on the volumes of hazardous and toxic waste that have to be disposed of if industry is to have the confidence to make the necessary investments to provide appropriate facilities in the long term to deal with the problem?

Mr. Morley: I certainly accept the point that the right hon. Gentleman makes. We have recently put a great deal of effort and resources into improving data capture, which is very important not only in monitoring waste flows, but in guiding our policy. I shall be only too pleased to receive the information to which he referred, and I will look at it seriously, as it is important that we are never complacent about hazardous waste management issues.

Both the industry and DEFRA predicted a substantial fall in hazardous waste, mainly because between 60 and 70 per cent. of hazardous waste was contaminated topsoil. We know that there was an acceleration in the amount of topsoil going into sites before the new regulations were introduced. We also know that many sites will be developed at a later date and that many are also being remedied on site, rather than with the use of dig and dump, which is exactly the outcome that we seek. We want to limit the amount of all waste, including hazardous waste, going into landfill, and there are clear signs that the policies that we are putting in place are having that effect. The amounts are within our predictions, but I shall be only too pleased to look at the figures.

Mr. Bill O'Brien (Normanton) (Lab): In addition to the emissions from tips, will my hon. Friend also take into consideration the run-off of surface water into watercourses and rivers, and the experience in my constituency on the Wellbeck site, where a fire broke out and the water that was used to put it out drained into the River Calder? The quality of the water going into watercourses and rivers is an important matter. The Environment Agency addressed that situation, but we must have a great deal of further investigation and research into the toxic water waste from surface water on tips.

Mr. Morley: My hon. Friend is right that leachate from tips must be rigorously controlled, and that is a condition of the pollution, prevention and control permit that landfill sites must obtain. I had the pleasure of opening a reverse osmosis plant—I have opened many projects—to deal with leachate on a landfill site, which is an example of the rigorous standards. When a fire breaks out on a tip, the situation is an emergency and run-off is likely to occur. The Environment Agency which attends such emergencies, has procedures to deal with water run-off and leachate, and it is important that adequate safeguards and regular monitoring are in place.

Farm Incomes

6. Mr. Hugo Swire (East Devon) (Con): If he will make a statement on farm incomes. [215594]

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): Total income from farming in the UK is estimated to have fallen in 2004 by 5.4 per cent. in current prices, or by 8.1 per cent. in real terms, to £3.01 billion. Despite the recent fall, total income from farming in real terms was almost 70 per cent. higher in 2004 than at the low point in 2000.

Mr. Swire: Given that the Prime Minister is in an apologising mood, will the Minister take this opportunity to apologise to the hundreds of dairy farmers, and particularly those in the south-west, whose incomes have fallen year on year since Labour came to power? Given that the Secretary of State has consistently stated that she does not think it right or proper for the Government to get involved in negotiations on milk prices, what practical advice does the Minister have for the sector, which is suffering from a lack of Government understanding and woeful neglect?

Alun Michael: The apology should come from the Conservative party, which neglected agriculture for decades, so I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman had the cheek to ask the question. If one examines the issues, one sees that a wide gap exists between the performance of the most and least efficient dairy farmers—we concentrated on that issue at the last Environment, Food and Rural Affairs questions. We have made a grant of nearly £500,000 to the Food Chain Centre to examine how to improve dairy supply chain efficiency, because we must address the issue of productivity. In the next few weeks, we will receive a report from the Office of Fair Trading on the operation of the supermarket code of practice. The hon. Gentleman should recognise that the Government are contributing to the many things that are going on.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): My right hon. Friend understands that farmers want an early sign that they will receive single farm payments. As we live in the era of the Freedom of Information Act 2000, does he agree that the figures on payments by the state to individual farm holdings should be disaggregated, so we can see that the payments are going where they are most needed and that we are getting the best return?

Alun Michael: I agree with the principle enunciated by my hon. Friend that it should be clear that money from the public purse is achieving the intended outcomes. Because we are discussing farm incomes generally, it is worth pointing out that the upper trend in incomes since the low point in 2000 reflects increased productivity in the farming sector—labour productivity is up 18 per cent. and total productivity is up 5 per cent. The farming industry is tackling its own problems, and the Government are working with it. As my hon. Friend has suggested, examining what is really happening rather than point scoring will help the industry in the long term.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle) (Con): Bearing in mind that many Lincolnshire farmers face an acute financial crisis, will the Minister say when the new single farm payment will be made? Will it be paid at the same time as or earlier than under the old system, and will it be staggered?

Alun Michael: If the hon. Gentleman had followed the exchanges at the last Environment, Food and Rural Affairs questions, he would know that the single farm payment will consist of a single payment, which will be made at the front end of the window. For a variety of technical reasons, we cannot promise to do that this year, when we hope to make the payment as early as possible. We are working with the industry on the best way of making sure that farmers benefit from the move to the single farm payment and on minimising any disadvantages in moving from the old system of partial payment and supplementary payments, which was not best for farmers. The situation is getting better.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): A few days ago, I went to Cattows farm in Heather in my constituency with pupils from the local primary school to plant trees on that land. Those were some of the 6 million trees that have been planted over the past 10 years in the national forest largely located in my constituency. Will the Minister say a word or two about the potential of reafforestation in contributing towards a boost in farming incomes? Across north-west Leicestershire and south Derbyshire, we are seeing the fruits of what is being achieved in national forests.

Alun Michael: My hon. Friend raises a number of interesting points in what seems a simple question. The growth of some 7 per cent. in reafforestation makes a contribution to the income of farmers. Exercises such as that in which my hon. Friend was involved help young people to understand the importance of that, which is crucial. Of course, they also make a contribution to tackling climate change and general environmental improvement.

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): The Minister has already made it clear that he is aware that many thousands of farmers on the very margins of survival are anxious to hear more news and guarantees about the timing of the single farm payment, particularly its impact on tax records and cash flow. Will he therefore give serious consideration, in his discussions with farmers, to the possibility of an up-front payment of the bulk of the estimated payment before the end of this calendar year, with payment of the residue before the end of the payment window?

Alun Michael: If we followed that road, we would increase the bureaucracy involved. As we have said, we want to make the single payment as early as possible, bearing in mind that very complex processes have to be gone through to achieve that. As the hon. Gentleman's question implied, no one has any doubt that in the longer term, once we have bedded in these systems, making the payment up front, at the beginning of the window, will be to the benefit of farmers, and that it is worth going through the change this year. We will consider with farmers' representative organisations what we can do to ease the transition.

The hon. Gentleman rightly says that many people, particularly farmers on the margins, are looking to the future with some trepidation. However, it is worth pointing out that, this year, the latest farm land values show an increase of 25 per cent., with farmers buying most of it for the first time in many years. Confidence in the industry is increasing. Productivity is the big challenge. We are addressing the variations in productivity across the industry through the strategy for sustainable farming and food and the investment that we are putting into helping the industry to be more efficient and effective and to have a successful future.

Paul Flynn (Newport, West) (Lab): Is it fair that farm income should be further boosted by raiding the taxpayers' pocket again for the £600 million by which animals were overvalued during the foot and mouth epidemic? Is it not time to break the link between valuers and farmers whereby farmers can choose their own valuers, who have a perverse incentive to overvalue animals because their commission is paid as a percentage of the animals' total value?

Alun Michael: I understand my hon. Friend's point, but compensation that has been paid has been paid: that is in the past. Furthermore, money has been withheld where there were doubts about whether the money was justified. We are sometimes criticised for not having paid out money quickly enough. We are genuinely considering the public interest and ensuring that it is protected, and there have been changes in the system as a result of the experience gained during the crisis. I understand the points that my hon. Friend makes, which have been very much taken on board in the systems that are now in place.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): I am sure that the Minister agrees that farmers' incomes in future will increasingly depend on whether they can command a premium in the marketplace to exploit the high standards of production, animal welfare and environmental care. Does he therefore understand the utter frustration that the National Farmers Union, the Tenant Farmers Association and the National Beef Association express about their inability properly to exploit those advantages while the Government continue to allow food to be labelled as British when it is not?

Alun Michael: I am not sure whether the labelling of food is the problem. The problems and the fall in income this year are to do with lower market prices for cereals, a rise in input costs—primarily, the higher world oil prices—and movements in the exchange rate. There have also been lower prices for some classes of cattle and sheep. That leads to a fall in income. However, the hon. Gentleman should acknowledge that farm incomes are volatile—they go up and down, year after year and are influenced by many factors. We want to ensure stability and sustainability in farming by increasing productivity. That will enable farmers to compete in the future and to cope with the inevitable volatility in the market.

Flood Risks (Urban Areas)

7. Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): What steps the Government are taking to reduce flood risks in urban areas. [215595]

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): Flood risk from rivers and the sea in both urban and rural areas is managed by the Environment Agency and other operating authorities. The Government set the overall strategic framework and provide the great majority of funding, which was projected to be £570 million per annum throughout the 2004 spending review period.

Hugh Bayley: I congratulate the Government on sharply increasing their contribution to flood protection. Does my hon. Friend share my concern about the Yorkshire regional flood defence committee's decision to halve local authority contributions to flood protection? Does he believe that it should think again? Will he confirm that the Government's funding for flood defences in Yorkshire will not be cut as a consequence of that short-sighted decision by local authorities?

Mr. Morley: I need to talk to my hon. Friend about the details of what is happening in his area. However, I think I may know what has happened. We have moved to a block grant for regional flood defence committees and that means that the levy that local authorities formerly provided will go down. Instead of the money from central Government being paid through local authorities, it is now paid as a block grant to the Environment Agency and the regional flood defence committees. That is a much securer method of funding, which the flood defence committees and the agency have warmly welcomed. I know that approximately £1 million has been spent in my hon. Friend's area since 2000 on upgrading flood defences and, for example, repairing the pumps on the Foss barrier. There is a long-term commitment of £30 million for upgrading the whole catchment area. Part of that money will go to York.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): The best way in which to prevent flooding on flood plains is not simply to make the Environment Agency a statutory consultee, but to make its advice obligatory for local planning authorities. Does the Minister agree that it is unacceptable that, out of almost 3,000 planning applications to which the Environment Agency objected, more than 300 were allowed to proceed in blatant contradiction of agency advice? What is his solution?

Mr. Morley: Well, I do not think that it is banning all forms of building on flood plains, which the hon. Lady advocated when we discussed the matter previously. The number of planning applications that have gone ahead against the Environment Agency's advice has dropped to approximately 12 per cent. That is a dramatic decline from the former position, including that under the previous Administration. Some of the applications that went ahead may have been minor. She should understand that there are sometimes conflicts between planning authorities and the Environment Agency. Lincolnshire county council went to court to complain that the Environment Agency was taking too hard a stance in its planning advice. There must be a proper balance. In some cases, inappropriate development on flood plains must be turned down. In the case of appropriate developments on flood plains, the developers should make a contribution to not only defending those properties but mitigating any effect that they may have on other communities in the area.

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle) (Lab): I thank my hon. Friend for visiting Carlisle and north Cumbria twice since the horrendous floods on 8 January. His words have been welcome, especially his comments on the new flood defences. However, there is an inquiry into the flood's consequences. Will he give me some indication of its time scale and perhaps its terms of reference?

Mr. Morley: Yes, I can. First, I reiterate my sympathy for the owners and occupiers of the 3,000 properties and businesses in Carlisle that were affected, which included the home of my hon. Friend. Having been there, I have seen how he has worked night and day to represent the interests of his constituents during this period. I was pleased, on my second visit, to see the progress that had been made on recovering from the floods. It is important to emphasise that business is getting back to normal in Carlisle; it is open for business and people should support it.

On the inquiry, after every major flood event, we expect the Environment Agency to produce a detailed analysis of its causes, so that we can learn from the event and feed that knowledge into future policy. That work is under way, and I am expecting a report on the Carlisle flood from the Environment Agency in March.

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): I think that we would all accept that the root cause of a lot of the flooding is climate change. Given that the United States undoubtedly puts the most greenhouse gases into the atmosphere, and that we are supposed to have a special relationship with the United States, what efforts are the Government making to—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is moving much too far away from the target.

Greenhouse Gas Emission Targets

8. Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South) (Lab): What plans she has to make greenhouse gas emission targets statutory and binding. [215596]

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Margaret Beckett): Ratification of the Kyoto protocol on 16 February will mean that the UK is legally bound by protocol to reduce greenhouse gas emissions by 12.5 per cent. below 1990 levels in 2008 to 2012. We are well on track to meet this commitment. We currently have no plans to make further specific and quantitative legally binding greenhouse gas emission targets.

Alan Simpson: Members on the Labour Benches will rightly be proud that it was a Labour Government who gave themselves the legally binding duty to abolish fuel poverty in its entirety by 2016, and who set targets for the reduction of domestic greenhouse gas emissions by 20 per cent. by 2010. Before the Secretary of State allows the Conservatives to berate her on this, she should recall that they opposed the introduction of that legally binding framework, warning the House that it would result in a nation—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that that is enough for the Secretary of State to go on.

Margaret Beckett: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He is right to highlight the fact that many on the Conservative Benches denied the existence of fuel poverty. They certainly showed no sign of recognising its tremendous impact on many households in this country. We are very proud that more than a million families have been helped under this Government's programme, and that we are now able to invest extra resources in taking the programme forward to do even more to alleviate the distress caused to vulnerable households.

Recreation (Rural Areas)

9. Andy Burnham (Leigh) (Lab): What initiatives her Department has introduced since 2001 to promote recreation in rural areas. [215597]

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): DEFRA will complete the introduction of the right of access to open country and registered common land for the purposes of open-air recreation by the end of this year. This has been widely welcomed in the north-west, which was one of the first regions to open. We are also working to improve and maintain the existing infrastructure and to increase the range of people who have access to the countryside. We have today published the draft Natural Environment and Rural Communities Bill. As set out in the rural strategy by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State last July, the Bill will establish a new independent non-departmental public body, provisionally called the integrated agency. At the heart of its role will be the encouragement of open-air recreation and the promotion of access to the countryside and open spaces.

Andy Burnham: I thank the Minister for that reply and for the work that his Department is doing to promote the use of the countryside. The enjoyment of fishers and walkers is being seriously spoiled, however, by the growing use of off-road motor bikes in former mining areas such as the one that I represent. The Minister has indicated that he intends to legislate to tackle this problem. When will he do so? Will he also work with local councils to provide more designated areas for off-road motor biking?

Alun Michael: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising those points. According to our research, off-road vehicles cause a nuisance in some, but not all, areas of the country. Part of the solution could involve preventing the use of such vehicles in inappropriate places, but another part will be about the better management of access. Two documents that I have published recently provide real meat for those who want to deal with this issue in a constructive manner, and I hope that local authorities will, as my hon. Friend suggests, engage with us in using best practice as well as looking to legislation.

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): When this Labour Government look back on their stewardship of agriculture, and at the despair and sense of abandonment among the farming community, will they not appreciate that their initiatives to promote recreation in the countryside will have been achieved beyond their wildest dreams?

Alun Michael: That was a rather silly question if I may say so. The hon. Gentleman should be aware that agri-environment schemes pay for some 4,000 km of permissive access—footpaths, bridleways and disabled access. They are listed in DEFRA's conservation, walks and rides register, and can be found on DEFRA's website. That is a success story. This is a Government who believe in access to the countryside for all—everyone should be able to enjoy it—and in supporting farmers so that they have a sustainable future, rather than talking a lot about farming but not doing much to support it, which was the record of his Government.

Andrew Bennett (Denton and Reddish) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that there was an awful lot of doom and gloom, in this House and outside, when the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000 was going through. People were predicting that if ordinary walkers had access to large areas of mountain and moorland, there would be major problems. Given that we are now halfway through the implementation of that, does he agree that there have been none of those problems but a great deal of pleasure has been given to those who have access to areas that they have been kept off for more than 100 years?

Alun Michael: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. That point has dawned on a large number of people. For instance, it was welcome that the Country Land and Business Association and the National Farmers Union were part of the celebration of opening up access in the north-west when that welcome day dawned after many years of campaigning. It is also true that people now understand that open access is important to the whole rural economy. It is important to the future of farmers and everyone who lives in the rural communities. The only people for whom that penny does not seem to have dropped are those such as the hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt), who does not understand how the countryside works.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): May I put it to the Minister that my rural constituents would like less recreational time, because they were promised free extra days at sea by a letter from the Department dated 25 January—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is out of order. That is far too wide.

Supermarket Code of Practice

10. Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): What recent discussions she has had with colleagues in the Department of Trade and Industry regarding the supermarket code of practice. [215598]

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): The supermarket code of practice was one of a number of subjects discussed when my noble Friend Lord Whitty met the Minister with responsibility for competition on 1 February to talk about issues in the supermarket sector.

Mr. Carmichael: May I tell the Minister, however, that there is growing frustration among farming and crofting communities that while supermarkets announce ever-increasing profits, the farmers and crofters who supply them are struggling to survive? Does he agree that the present code, which is voluntary, has been largely ineffective, and that the code now needs to be made enforceable to embrace the whole supply chain? My farming constituents should not be left carrying the cost for special offers in supermarkets without ever having agreed to that.

Alun Michael: The hon. Gentleman rightly reflects the feelings of producers about the supermarket code of practice. That was reflected in the findings of the Office of Fair Trading on the views of producers. It has now commissioned the compliance audit, which is due to be published in the next few weeks. For the first time, that will provide focused information on the operation of the code. We should await that, read it with interest, and Members on both sides of the House will no doubt want to focus on it as soon as it is available.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): It would help farmers and small businesses if the practice of predatory pricing by supermarkets were to be stopped. Other countries have laws preventing retailers from selling goods at lower than cost. Now that the Office of Fair Trading has said, at least in respect of alcohol, that minimum prices are not anti-competitive in some circumstances, will my right hon. Friend try to persuade the DTI to accept that in the case of our food and drink, minimum prices would be acceptable?

Alun Michael: What I am prepared to do is wait for the outcome of the compliance audit. That will provide us with a factual basis in order to discuss these matters further. As my hon. Friend knows, we are working, through the support of English Farming and Food Partnerships and the Food Chain Centre, to enable producers to get a fair return from the end price. I do not think that we should jump ahead of the publication of the compliance audit. We should all focus on that.

European Trade

11. Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): What discussions she has held with European Trade Commissioners about health and sanitary standards as a barrier to trade in agricultural products. [215599]

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Margaret Beckett): I meet the Agriculture Commissioner regularly and the Trade Commissioner on occasion. I have not had occasion recently to discuss health and sanitary standards with them either generally or with regard to specific issues.

Dr. Cable: Will the Secretary of State agree to support Peter Mandelson in his efforts to remove unjustified trade restrictions by publishing her own list of trade-restricting standards that have no scientific basis—for example, aflatoxin content, which is used to exclude African products, despite a risk factor of fewer than one in a billion lives?

Margaret Beckett: We have, as yet, had no formal notification that the European trade department is intending to pursue such a step, but we will certainly consider with very great interest any proposal that comes forward.

Speaker's Statement

12.30 pm

Mr. Speaker: I have a statement to make about the use of electronic devices by Members in the Chamber. I am aware that a new generation of such devices is being used by Members. My predecessor ruled in 1997 that Members carrying such devices should turn off the audio function before coming into the Chamber. She also ruled that it was totally unacceptable for a Member speaking in the Chamber to be prompted by information on the screen of such a device.

I have no objection to instruments that silently prompt the Members carrying them. Clearly, many Members use these devices and they serve a useful purpose, provided that they are unobtrusive. But I am not prepared to accept the use of electronic devices to communicate outside the Chamber nor to act as an aide-memoire by a Member participating in proceedings. This also applies to the wearing of earpieces used to receive messages—[Interruption.] Order.

In future, the Chair will order a Member seen to be using such an electronic device while speaking to resume his or her seat immediately. That ruling will be applied in Westminster Hall and in Standing Committee. Seated Members who disregard my ruling and use devices actively to communicate outside the Chamber will be asked to leave the Chamber forthwith.

Business of the House

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Will the Leader of the House please give us the business for the week after we return?

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Peter Hain): The whole House will wish to send our warm congratulations to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and Mrs. Parker Bowles. As Secretary of State for Wales, I am personally delighted, and the House wishes them every happiness for the future.

The business for our next week is as follows:

MONDAY 21 FEBRUARY—Remaining stages of the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill.

TUESDAY 22 FEBRUARY—Motions relating to the draft Social Security Benefits Uprating Order 2005 and the draft Guaranteed Minimum Pensions Increase Order 2005, followed by remaining stages of the Drugs Bill.

WEDNESDAY 23 FEBRUARY—Opposition Day [5th allotted day]. There will be a debate on an Opposition motion. Subject to be announced.

THURSDAY 24 FEBRUARY—Consideration of an allocation of time motion, followed by all stages of the Electoral Registration (Northern Ireland) Bill [Lords].

FRIDAY 25 FEBRUARY—Private Members' Bills.

The provisional business for the following week will include:

MONDAY 28 FEBRUARY—Conclusion of Committee and remaining stages of the Constitutional Reform Bill [Lords].

I should like to inform the House that business for Westminster Hall for the first two weeks in March will be—

THURSDAY 3 MARCH—A debate on the report from the Committee on the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister on decent homes.

THURSDAY 10 MARCH—A debate on "Working, Caring and Life Balance: Supporting Choice".

Mr. Heald: May I associate myself and other Conservative Members with the congratulations extended to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and his bride to be? My right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition has said today that he is also delighted at the news.

Is the Leader of the House able to give us the date of the Budget? He knows that I have been pressing for a long time for a foreign affairs debate so that we can have a proper discussion of developments in Africa and the middle east. It is a long time since we had such a debate: when can we expect to have another opportunity?

Despite his notorious claim that it is just a tidying-up exercise, the right hon. Gentleman knows that the European Union Bill raises very important issues and involves consideration of the more than 500 pages that the new constitution comprises. One of the constitution's authors, the French statesman Alain Lamassoure has described it as the "coronation of . . . the French vision of Europe, as opposed to the Anglo-Saxon vision."

A French meal always takes a little longer, so can we have at least one more day for debate in Committee? Will the Leader of the House please reconsider the short time that has been allowed so far?

Will the right hon. Gentleman also withdraw the remarks that he made last week criticising the commitment of the Opposition to the Northern Ireland peace process? The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has always thanked my hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) for the co-operation extended by him and by the Opposition as a whole. Surely the national interest requires an all-party approach to such issues.

There is concern in all parts of the House at the tactics being used by the Government to slow down information requests under the Freedom of Information Act 2000. That is in sharp contrast to what is happening with information about previous Governments. Some requests for more recent information are being delayed for further consideration, or refused on the ground of cost. That seems surprising, given the huge volume of documents made available speedily about the previous Government. More surprisingly, in response to two questions—on correspondence with the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority during the 2002 A-level marking crisis, and departmental assessments of grade inflation—the Department for Education and Skills even claims that no papers exist.

Can we have a debate in Government time about the tactics being used by the Government under the FOI, before it becomes known as the freedom of old information Act—or FOOI?

Mr. Hain: First, I cannot give the hon. Gentleman the date of the Budget yet. Secondly, I have already answered his question about a foreign affairs debate. Thirdly, he quoted rather selectively from one French person on the question of the European constitution. The truth is that, at the end of the process, every newspaper in France, Spain and Germany—and right across Europe—considered it to be a victory for my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and for Britain's vision of Europe. That vision is based on a partnership of nation states, not a federal superstate.

The policy advocated by the Conservatives would put Britain in a risky position of isolation. That would not be in our interests. We are a leading European power, and always have been. Under this Government, we intend to be right at the heart of Europe. We shall not be isolated and left to whinge on the fringe.

The hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) asked me to withdraw what I said about Northern Ireland, but I will not. I have attended repeated statements by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, and witnessed many debates, and I have seen the Opposition engage in sniping and petty point scoring. When Labour was in opposition, we gave the previous Conservative Government 100 per cent. support for what they were doing to tackle terrorism and ensure that the peace process was driven forward. I just wish that Tory Front-Bench Members would do exactly the same, in the interests of the nation and of the people of Northern Ireland.

I remind the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire that this Government introduced the Freedom of Information Act. We want it to work well. The information that has come from the Treasury about Black Wednesday has nothing to do with Ministers. However, the previous Conservative Government were responsible for what was an absolute disaster for Britain and the Opposition are embarrassed about that. That is why the hon. Gentleman has raised the issue. I can assure him that requests under freedom of information legislation will be answered in due course and in the proper way. That has started to happen already.

On the question of A-levels, exam marking and so on, the Secretary of State for Education and Skills will note the hon. Gentleman's report.

I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman did not ask me for a debate on housing because the front page of today's edition of the Daily Mirror states:

"I lost my house through negative equity. I blame the last Tory Government for that and will never forget what you did to me."

That is not my statement, nor is it a statement of a Daily Mirror journalist; it is in the Conservative manual and guide to their election candidates, which also states that the Tories are as well as uncaring. That is a fitting prelude to a general election campaign.

"out of touch, anti-women, greedy and divided"

Sir Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough) (Lab): Further to the congratulations and good wishes of the Leader of the House, supported by the shadow Leader of the House, following the announcement this morning that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales will remarry, may I, as Second Church Estates Commissioner, say that the Archbishop of Canterbury has warmly welcomed the statement? The arrangements have his strong support and are consistent with the Church of England guidelines on remarriage, which the Prince of Wales fully accepts as a committed Anglican and as prospective Supreme Governor of the Church of England. As there are no constitutional implications, can I assume that there will be no statement next week?

Mr. Hain: Well, the House is not sitting next week, so there will certainly be no statement.

I am grateful for my hon. Friend's statement and we all echo his sentiments. The Archbishop of Canterbury has made clear his delight, as has the Prime Minister. We all share in that.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): I very much welcome what the Leader of the House and the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Sir Stuart Bell) said. Prince Charles is Duke of Cornwall, which, as the Secretary of State for Wales will know, is his premier title. He has shared in our delights and disasters, most recently the floods in north Cornwall. I am sure that the people of Cornwall will be especially delighted by today's news. On their behalf and on behalf of my hon. Friends, I wish Prince Charles and his future wife every happiness for their marriage. We shall all celebrate with the Duke and Duchess of Cornwall on 8 April.

In his business statement, the Leader of the House did not give any indication of when he expects the Budget statement. Surely he can give some indication of when it will be.

Can the Leader of House say whether a statement will be made on nuclear energy? He has a consistent record of opposition to the expansion and extension of the nuclear option. The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs has previously said:

"We certainly do not need extra nuclear power in anything like a 10 or 15-year cycle".

However, she now seems to have made a U-turn, so can we have an absolute assurance from the Leader of the House that there is no prospect, before or after the general election, of a change of policy on nuclear energy? Will he give us that assurance now?

May we also have an urgent statement about the advice apparently given to the Secretary of State for Transport by the Strategic Rail Authority? This morning, The Guardian quoted the SRA as saying that there may need to be a cut of 25 per cent. in the national rail network if investment levels are not raised. Has that forecast been dealt with, can we be sure that the current overall pattern of the rail network will be maintained, and when can we expect to see a real end to the chaos and terrible consequences of the worst effects of the bungled privatisation of the rail network by his predecessors?

Mr. Hain: On the bungled privatisation by the last Conservative Government, the hon. Gentleman and I are absolutely at one. It was a disaster, and we have been clearing up the mess ever since we came to power. Despite his point, there has been a 25 per cent. increase in passenger journeys on the railways under this Government, 1,500 more trains running and record investment, all of which would be at risk if the Conservatives ever got into power and implemented their planned cuts.

I note the hon. Gentleman's congratulations and I welcome the House's unity in supporting the Prince of Wales and Mrs. Parker Bowles. As Secretary of State for Wales, I must dispute the hon. Gentleman's comment that the Cornish title is the premier title.

Mr. Tyler: It is the older one.

Mr. Hain: Well, "Prince of Wales" is the premier title as far as I am concerned, but I grant that Mrs. Parker Bowles will be known as the Duchess of Cornwall after the marriage.

On the Budget, no, I cannot give the date. On nuclear energy, there is no Government U-turn and no change of policy.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Hull, North) (Lab): May I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to early-day motion 673, signed by myself and many of my hon. Friends, concerning the position of House of Commons cleaners?

[That this House recognises the invaluable contribution made by House of Commons cleaners towards ensuring the smooth running of this House; is dismayed with the poor pay and working conditions of the cleaners who are paid a miserly £4.85 per hour with only 12 days' paid holiday per annum, statutory sick pay only and no company pension; finds these employment terms and conditions shameful and totally unacceptable in 21st century Britain; wholeheartedly supports the claim made by the Transport and General Workers Union, who represent cleaners in the House, for better wages and improved working conditions; believes that the cleaners' claim should not be ignored or their work continue to be taken for granted; and urges the House authorities and the contractors that employ the cleaners to accept their claim for £6.70 per hour, 20 days' paid holiday per annum, company sick pay and a company pension to ensure they receive a fair deal.]

Their employment situation is outrageous; they have low wages, no proper pension scheme and derisory holidays. Does my right hon. Friend, in his role as our representative on the House of Commons Commission, believe that the contracts awarded to third parties should be of concern to the Commission, especially in terms of the wages and conditions of some of the people on whom we depend enormously for the good functioning of the House? They are in many ways invisible, but they are necessary for us to carry out our jobs properly and they should be remunerated accordingly and their firms should not be allowed to pay them such lousy wages.

Mr. Hain: This is of course a matter for the House authorities and ultimately for the House of Commons Commission. However, I understand the points that my hon. Friend is making. The cleaners perform a vital role for all of us, especially at a time when security is of paramount importance in the Palace. It is vital that they are treated properly and that their wages, albeit paid by private contractors contracted by both Houses, should be decent. Cleaners and their representatives from the Transport and General Workers Union came to see me this morning. Frankly, I could not live on their wages, and the whole issue should be looked at again in the negotiations to come.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): The Leader of the House asked why we had not called for a debate on housing and mentioned in his statement a forthcoming debate on decent homes. You, Mr. Speaker, certainly know, as the Leader of the House should, that yesterday at questions to the Deputy Prime Minister I asked for an explanation of why the Government are building only half as many social houses as the last Conservative Government did each year. The answer I received was about as useful and stimulating as a game of Scrabble against the Deputy Prime Minister. So that the forthcoming debate can be better informed, will the Leader of the House make an urgent statement on why the Government are building so few social houses and why they are letting down 100,000 people—a record number—trapped in temporary accommodation? Those people are being cheated by the Government.

Mr. Hain: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's interest in housing; it is an interest that every Member shares

[Mr. Hain]

He pointed to the past record and current performance, so may I remind him of the reality? When we came to power, the reality was that people were living rough in London—all over the streets and under the arches. The reality was massive problems of homelessness. The truth is that we have refurbished 1 million council properties and we are putting huge investment into social housing, every million pounds of which would be cut or at risk under the Conservatives' £35 billion cuts. The hon. Gentleman should sort out his Front-Bench colleagues on this matter. Let us have a common approach to dealing with social housing, providing more opportunities for housing, instead of savage cuts across the board, as the Conservatives promise.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab): In more than 40 years as a Member of the House of Commons, I find it inconceivable that any previous Administration, including Mrs. Thatcher's—because I asked John Wakeham about it—would have denied the House a serious debate on the question of Iraq or any similar situation. Does the Leader of the House understand that it is not good enough simply to say that the House has been kept informed? Especially after the Iraq elections, Members in all parts of the House have views on the very serious situation of what might occur with the Kurds. They have views on relations between Iraq and Iran, which, heaven knows, are delicate enough. Why are we being denied the opportunity to express those views? Bluntly, without raising the anger of MPs from Northern Ireland, to spend a day on the electoral register in Northern Ireland, yet not to discuss Iraq, will be seen as very odd outside the House.

Mr. Hain: I do not agree that the day to be spent on the electoral reform needed in Northern Ireland is unimportant. The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland certainly takes that view, and I think that everybody involved agrees.

Obviously, I defer to my hon. Friend the Father of the House, with his 40 years of experience, but surely he must recognise that we were the first Government to permit a vote on going to war; no previous Government had done that. That is important. It was an important debate. We have always reported to the House and given every opportunity for hon. Members, including my hon. Friend, to express their views. [Interruption.] I respect the disagreement that my hon. Friend has with the Government on the original decision to topple Saddam and invade Iraq, but my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary came at the first opportunity—the first day back after the elections—and made a statement to the House. He has kept the House informed continuously. I simply do not recognise the picture that my hon. Friend has painted.

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann) (UUP): May I say to the Father of the House that we would happily give up the day for the debate if he wished. May I draw the attention of the Leader of the House to the welcome report of the Independent Monitoring Commission, which has made it clear that it would recommend the exclusion of Sinn Fein from office were the Northern Ireland Assembly sitting? May we have a debate on the matter as soon as possible so that we can establish a consensus, call on the Government to recall the Assembly and support the passing of a motion to exclude Sinn Fein, take the necessary action and rectify the anomaly of Sinn Fein's privileged position here at Westminster?

Mr. Hain: The right hon. Gentleman knows that all these matters have been agreed and implemented as part of the peace process and of cementing its detail. Obviously, as we set up the Independent Monitoring Commission we take any report from it or recommendation that it makes seriously, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will take careful note of what it says.

Anne Picking (East Lothian) (Lab): Does the Leader of the House share my regret at the comments made by the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) about the nation of Scotland? Does he agree that the remarks were offensive and insulting and that the people of Scotland share that feeling?

Mr. Hain: Particularly as my grandfather and grandmother were Scottish, I think Scotland is a fantastic place to live and to be proud of, second only to Wales. I agree with my hon. Friend.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): On 23 February there will be a debate in Westminster Hall on House of Lords reform. As this is a subject on which Ministers have a range of conflicting views, can the Leader of the House give me an assurance that the Minister who replies will be a Minister who supports the Government's manifesto commitment to a more democratic and accountable House of Lords?

Mr. Hain: That is a very good question from my right hon. Friend and I will think about it carefully. Any Minister replying for the Government always supports the Government's view.

Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly) (Lab): As the Leader of the House will be aware, Kofi Annan is in London today speaking on his recently published report on the future of the United Nations. Does my right hon. Friend agree that that is a vital document? Will he facilitate a debate on it on the Floor of the House as soon as practicable?

Mr. Hain: It is a vital document. Given the pace of legislation now going through the House, I cannot promise an early debate, but my hon. Friend is free to apply for one. I hope that there will be an opportunity for such a debate because, as my hon. Friend says, it is crucial for international stability and security, and the future of the world, that we have a powerful United Nations and a Security Council reorganised to deliver the UN mission right across the world.

Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden) (Con): May I support the request made by my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) for a debate on the Government's selective and partisan use of the Freedom of Information Act—in particular the refusal by the Deputy Prime Minister to publish under the Act the report that he has already received from the inspector about a planning proposal in my constituency to build up to 10,000 houses on the green belt? It has national significance because it will be the biggest ever encroachment on the green belt. The Deputy Prime Minister has received that report, but apparently wants to put off publication until after the general election. He admits that encouraging public debate is important, but says that publishing the document would not help with public debate. Can we have a debate on this rather contentious matter?

Mr. Hain: I recognise the constituency point that the right hon. Gentleman raises, which my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister will note carefully. I reject the right hon. Gentleman's central charge that there is some kind of selective release of information—officials advise on the release of information. In the instance of Black Wednesday, no Treasury Ministers were involved in the decision on the release of information. Indeed, the former Prime Minister, John Major, acknowledged as much on the "Today" programme this morning. The permanent secretary to the Treasury is in charge of all these matters. I am sure that, as a distinguished Secretary of State himself, the right hon. Gentleman would not want to accuse permanent secretaries of any partisanship, so I am sure that he was not doing so a moment ago.

Mr. Michael Jabez Foster (Hastings and Rye) (Lab): In view of the confusion about the Freedom of Information Act, especially the scurrilous accusations of partisanship by the Opposition, may we have a teach-in for hon. Members so that we can better understand what the Act says and how it operates? Perhaps the FOI commissioner could be asked to organise such an event.

Mr. Hain: As you will know, Mr. Speaker, there is guidance for Members of Parliament on some important issues for us in respect of the Act. The overall point is that we introduced the Act because we believed in greater transparency and accountability of government. That is what we believe in and will stick to. Despite these day-to-day processing stories that are being raised by the Opposition, in time the workings of the Act will settle down. Some complex matters are involved, such as how to protect the principle of ministerial responsibility but at the same time protect the position of officials and civil servants as well as national security and commercial confidentiality. Every request has to be judged carefully, and that we are doing with scrupulous fairness.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): On behalf of the Scottish National party and Plaid Cymru, may I offer our congratulations and best wishes to the happy couple?

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): Tony and Gordon is it?

Mr. Salmond: Might be.

May I ask for an urgent statement from the Fisheries Minister about the official information released to fishermen on 25 January promising them three extra days fishing at sea with the proviso that they fish in an environmentally sensitive way? Now they have been told that it was all a mistake and that the days on offer are being withdrawn. The Leader of the House knows how hard-pressed the fishing industry has been. He also knows that people have made financial commitments based on the official information that they were given. Will he ask his colleague to come to the House to make a statement about what can be done to allow the Government to live up to their word and not further prejudice things against the industry?

Mr. Hain: I realise the importance of fishing to the hon. Gentleman's constituency, to Scotland and to the whole of the United Kingdom. It is a vital industry. My hon. Friend the Minister will note carefully the points that the hon. Gentleman has made and I am sure that he will want to respond to him in writing.

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): Is it possible to have a debate on miscarriages of justice? I am sure that the House was pleased that the Prime Minister was able to apologise with such sincerity to the Conlon and Maguire families yesterday. I am sure that anyone who heard Gerry Conlon's interview could understand the burden that had been taken off him after so many years of injustice.

Is my right hon. Friend aware that there are a number of miscarriages of justice in the south Wales area, in particular the so-called newsagent three, who were wrongly imprisoned for 11 years for the terrible murder of Philip Saunders, who was a constituent of my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Kevin Brennan). Mike O'Brien—one of the Cardiff three, who is now my constituent—has always said how much it would have meant to him if someone had just said they were sorry. How can we take this forward?

Mr. Hain: I agree with the point that my hon. Friend makes about the moving response from the Conlon family to the Prime Minister's forthright apology for what was a grave miscarriage of justice. Any miscarriage of justice is a stain on the legal system, and the House will want to ensure that they are apologised for and that the necessary consequences follow. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will note the points that my hon. Friend has made in respect of the case that she raised.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills) (Con): Has the Leader of the House has seen early-day motion 684, which is supported by a number of colleagues on both sides of the House and from all parties, and which details the consideration in Committee of the Identity Cards Bill, indicating that clauses 8, 9, 10, 11, 23, 24 and 25 were not considered?

[That this House regrets that, because of the guillotine, the Standing Committee on the Identity Cards Bill was prevented from discussing Clauses 8, 9, 10 and 11 relating to issue etc of identity cards, renewal of identity cards for those compulsorily registered, functions of persons issuing designated documents and power to require information for validating register and Clauses 23, 24 and 25 relating to rules for using information without an individual's consent, appointment of National Identity Scheme Commissioner reports by Commissioner and jurisdiction of the Intelligence Services Commissioner and Tribunal;

further regrets that, as a consequence, the total number of groups not reached because of knives was 10 and the number of Clauses and Schedules stand part not reached because of knives was six; and therefore deplores the restricted time allocated to the remaining stages of the Bill on Thursday 10th February.]

The wider point, on which I should be grateful for a discussion as soon as we return after the recess, is how we restore to the House the proper examination and consideration of Bills, especially those that touch on the freedoms and liberties of the citizens of this country and those that raise big issues of the relationship of the citizen to the state.

Mr. Hain: As a Government, we have sought continuously to introduce sensible timetabling. The hon. Gentleman disagrees with me on that matter, and there may be individual cases where issues need to be addressed, but I think that I am right in saying that the Chairmen had repeatedly to pull up Conservative members of the Committee to which he referred for filibustering, and that additional time was offered.

The big picture is that we ought to back the introduction of identity cards, for the reasons that the Government have explained, and I want to know where the Conservative party stands on that. I gather that Conservative Members will abstain on the matter today. Are they for or against identity cards?

Mr. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): May I raise with my right hon. Friend once again the question of rail freight and the channel tunnel? A strategic rail freight network is developing on the continent of Europe, and the channel tunnel is underused and in financial difficulty, while on this side we have an inadequate railway system that does not deliver sufficient freight to the channel tunnel. We could put 30 extra freight trains a day through the tunnel—10,000 trains a year—thus making a tremendous difference to our freight industry. We could link our industrial areas directly to the continent of Europe if we had that freight delivery system. Can we not have a full debate on the need to develop a rail freight route that links Scotland and all Britain's industrial areas to the continent of Europe?

Mr. Hain: The Secretary of State for Transport will agree with my hon. Friend's objectives. We all want more freight to go by rail and less on the roads for environmental and efficiency reasons. It is undoubtedly true that there are opportunities to make greater use of the channel tunnel, which is why the Government seek to maximise those opportunities. My hon. Friend refers to the inadequate railway service, but I am sure that he will also want to welcome the huge investment that the Government are providing to improve our railway network, including for freight, and to compare it with both the dreadful situation that we inherited from the Conservatives and the cuts in rail investment that would follow as part of the £35 billion in cuts that they are promising if they win the next election.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): May I tell the Leader of the House that his responses on the Freedom of Information Act 2000 sound almost as though he is auditioning for the future role of Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster? He certainly gave the sort of answer that we get from the present incumbent of that post.

We need a debate on freedom of information. Of course, the Government introduced the Act, but the question is whether they did so to enable the even-handed disclosure of information or for partisan political advantage. When the right hon. Gentleman says that civil servants decide such things, he should bear in mind the civil service advice that was leaked, which advised that certain aspects of the exchange rate mechanism papers should not be revealed because they might be read across and then used by the Conservatives to insist on answers to some of the questions that we have asked. They are answering the questions that are helpful to the Government. Why are they not answering questions that would be helpful to the Opposition?

Mr. Hain: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on getting in a reference once again to the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster—he is absolutely expert at doing so.

On the substance of the hon. Gentleman's point, no, the Freedom of Information Act is very clear. Ministers are under an obligation to respect its terms and to implement it in full in response to requests, and we are doing so. I realise that the Conservatives have an interest in getting up some kind of process story about it because of their embarrassment at the disaster of Black Wednesday and the negative equity, the bankruptcies and the collapse of the economy that it heralded. That is their history—that is what they must live with—but they would take us back to that kind of situation if they were re-elected. I entirely reject the suggestion that there is one law on the release of information about the past Conservative Government and another law for the Government. We are operating the Freedom of Information Act absolutely even-handedly.

Mr. Heald: Ha ha!

Mr. Hain: The shadow Leader of the House says, "Ha ha!", as he is inclined to do. Is he or the hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis) suggesting that the permanent secretaries in charge of Whitehall Departments, who are ultimately responsible for giving advice on these matters, are operating in anything other than an even-handed way? If so, they should get up and say so.

Ms Meg Munn (Sheffield, Heeley) (Lab/Co-op): May we have a debate on the future of the new deal programme? Many of my constituents have benefited from the new deal, but a number of people are still unemployed, despite a dramatic fall in unemployment in my constituency. Is it not time for us to look at how we can go forward with that programme and deal with the real concerns that people may have that it might be abolished?

Mr. Hain: I fully agree with my hon. Friend. If there is an opportunity to debate the new deal, I will seize it with relish and persuade my colleagues to join me in providing time for it. A very important choice faces the country on the new deal, which has helped about 1 million people to get work, skills and new opportunities and, including in my constituency, has transformed the lives of thousands of individuals. All that would go, all that would be axed if the Conservatives came to power—indeed, the Liberal Democrats have the same policy—so there is a very clear choice between future investment in and the modernisation of work opportunities, including for those who are economically inactive, or cutting off that lifeline and hope for many unemployed people. The country will chose whether it wants to go back to the Conservatives or forward with Labour.

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): Is the Leader of the House absolutely sure that the Freedom of Information Act is working well? Is he aware that I asked for details of the work being undertaken by the ministerial Sub-Committee on Freedom of Information and was told that it was a secret and that I could be told nothing about it? Can he confirm whether any parliamentary question will be treated as though it has the force of a freedom of information request or the force of a request under the environmental regulations that are parallel to the Act?

Mr. Hain: First, the proceedings of Cabinet Committees are obviously confidential—that is the only way that the Government can work—but any request that the hon. Gentleman may make under the Freedom of Information Act will be considered under the terms of the Act. I should have thought that, as a Liberal Democrat, he supported the Government for the fact that we have introduced the Freedom of Information Act. After all, his colleagues said at the time that the Act did not go far enough.

Norman Baker: That is right.

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman is nodding at that. We introduced such an Act for the first time in British history—that is a good thing—and it makes the Government more transparent and accountable. Parliamentary questions are answered in accordance with the rules of parliamentary procedure. The operation of the Freedom of Information Act is a related, though separate, matter.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): I welcome the Government's investment in higher education. The university of Wolverhampton, which is headquartered in my constituency, is the most accessible mainstream university in the United Kingdom. Therefore, it has more students who are poorer. That means it will hand out more £300 minimum-standard bursaries and have higher administration costs for those bursaries, and it has more part-time students. By comparison, Wolverhampton university will hand out five-and-a-half times as much of its additional fee income as Cambridge university. Unless the access regulator steps in to redress that, Wolverhampton university will be penalised for its success on access, and universities such as Cambridge will be rewarded for their poor access. May we have an early debate on the implementation of the Higher Education Act 2004, so that we can discuss what the access regulator is doing to redress the possible imbalances, what is happening with the administration costs for minimum-standard bursaries, and the fact that the Government are still deciding whether to allow deferral of tuition fees for part-time students, which is a particularly important issue, not only for Wolverhampton but for the Open university?

Mr. Hain: Questions to the Secretary of State for Education and Skills will be asked on the Thursday after we return from the recess, so my hon. Friend will have an opportunity to raise that point, if he catches your eye, Mr. Speaker. He raises a lot of important issues, and the Secretary of State will want to take careful note of them. It is certainly no part of the Government's plans to make good universities across Britain feel discriminated against in any way. He makes some important points about the student catchment and intake of the university of Wolverhampton, to which the Secretary of State will want to respond, but he must also bear in mind the fact that we are bringing back grants, which were abolished by the previous Conservative Government, and which will be of enormous assistance to students going to the university of Wolverhampton and welcomed by everyone.

Mr. Adrian Flook (Taunton) (Con): The Westcountry Ambulance Services trust has announced several proposed changes, and the paramedics' union has responded by considering strike action. One change would reduce cover at night, while another proposes replacing paramedics during enforced break periods with a "Dad's Army" of first-aiders, allegedly driving Renault Clios. Will the Leader of the House ask the Secretary of State for Health to come to the House to explain why it is right for Somerset's ambulance service to have Private Godfrey driving Corporal Jones's van?

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman raises an important matter for his constituents. I know that the Secretary of State will pay careful attention to it, and I expect that he will want to make a detailed response in writing.

Mr. Gwyn Prosser (Dover) (Lab): When the Leader of the House finds time for us to discuss the excellent results of Labour's new deal programmes, will he widen the remit so that we can talk about the success of jobcentres in delivering jobs? Is he aware, however, of the decision of local managers in Kent to shut down Deal jobcentre at the very time when my constituency is facing 1,000 or more job losses? Does he agree that that is untimely, to say the least? Surely it flies in the face of Government policy. Is there not a mismatch between the Government's policy intention of removing barriers and hindrances to people getting back into work and the heavy-handed actions of local managers?

Mr. Hain: I understand the point that my hon. Friend makes in representing, as excellently as he does, his constituents' interests. I also understand that Deal jobcentre has a relatively small unemployment register and is unable to deliver the full Jobcentre Plus service. Although such changes are difficult in individual constituencies—I have experienced that in Neath—they are all designed to improve front-line services for the residents of Deal and elsewhere in the country.

Whatever the transitional difficulties in that process of change, it will deliver a much better service on the ground for everyone by making efficiency savings in back-room staff and releasing extra resources to the front line.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): May we please have an oral statement from the Prime Minister or the Foreign Secretary on the continuing crisis in Darfur, western Sudan, given that the United Nations-backed international commission of inquiry found evidence of war crimes by Government forces in Darfur that might be no less serious or heinous than genocide? Several hon. Members heard harrowing personal testimonies to such crimes during a visit to the region last week? Does the Leader of the House agree that the best way in which to demonstrate the international community's revulsion at those crimes, and its determination to bring the perpetrators to justice, would be to put the suspects on trial as soon as possible before the International Criminal Court?

Mr. Hain: The House is grateful to the hon. Gentleman for bringing these matters to our attention and for the eloquent and consistent way in which he raises the plight of people in the Darfur region. The crimes are totally unacceptable, and the Foreign Secretary is monitoring the situation closely with other colleagues throughout the world. They will take note of what the hon. Gentleman said.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): When my right hon. Friend meets the House authorities to discuss our cleaning staff, will he bring to their attention the e-mail that I received this morning from Union Network International, the international trade union operating out of Geneva, which includes messages of support for our cleaners from cleaning workers in countries as far afield as Australia and South Africa? Given the importance of the image that we create, will he try to reach agreement with his opposite number to ensure that the Conservatives, too, support our campaign to get proper wages for the people working around us?

Mr. Hain: I do not want to make this a partisan issue; it is a House issue. I agree with my hon. Friend that we all want our cleaners to be remunerated properly and given good conditions of service that are reflected in their hourly rates, overtime and night-time duties and holidays—all those points were put to me today. I know that the House authorities will have taken note of hon. Members' points. Albeit working through an independent contractor, the House must be a model employer, so in these circumstances we have to ensure that we really act as such.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): In view of the obvious but sadly unfulfilled desire of the Prime Minister to apologise to the House for something for which even the most partisan observer could not possibly hold him responsible, may we have a session every week called Prime Minister's apologies? He would thus have the opportunity to apologise for the dome, weapons of mass destruction, his broken promises on tax, his broken promises on dentistry, misleading "Newsnight" on hunting, his failure to help to promote democracy in Zimbabwe, and so on.

Mr. Hain: That question was straight out of one of this morning's Conservative tabloids. When the Prime Minister appeared before the Liaison Committee for well over two hours, no one said a glove on him. It was a dominating performance and he answered every question directly. Far from apologising, the Prime Minister can take great credit, as now the longest-serving Labour Prime Minister, for record employment, economic stability, continuous growth, low mortgage rates, low inflation and record public investment, all of which would be put at risk if the Conservatives won the election and returned us to public spending cuts and boom and bust.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside) (Lab Co-op): I am very encouraged by moves towards peace in the middle east and especially by the Prime Minister's success in convening the Palestinian conference in London. Will there be a statement to indicate how the important question of Palestinian Authority incitement to violence against Jews and Israelis is being tackled? Does the Leader of the House agree that statements such as those coming from the Palestinian Authority saying that the characteristics of Jews are betrayal and treachery cannot be accepted?

Mr. Hain: Of course those statements cannot be accepted. My hon. Friend will welcome the steadfast determination and leadership on the matter that the Prime Minister has shown, including by persuading the American Administration to make promoting the middle east peace process a priority—it is welcome that that is being done under Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. That should be taken forward with great energy because there is no dispute that it is more important to resolve in the current international situation than the conflict between the Palestinians and the Israelis. A secure Israel must be the outcome, with an independent Palestinian state existing alongside it in friendship, rather than anger. The London meeting on 1 March will play an important part in helping the Palestinian Authority to assume a proper governing role in Palestine, rather than playing that which it has had over the past few years.

Mr. Tony McWalter (Hemel Hempstead) (Lab Co-op): Will my right hon. Friend prevail on his Cabinet colleagues to arrange an early cross-cutting debate on the ramifications, and especially the economic consequences, of having laissez-faire in student choice for universities? For example, the Forensic Science Society recognises that forensic scientists need a degree in chemistry or biology followed by a masters degree in forensics, but we have 57 undergraduate forensic science degrees, none of which are recognised, or will get people jobs. That is an example of the way in which universities provide courses that are pretty near useless and give the wrong impression to people who want to work in such fields.

Mr. Hain: I am sure that the odd useless degree is being offered throughout the country, and it would be surprising if that was not the case, given the thousands of degree courses that are offered. Surely my hon. Friend should welcome record investment in our universities and the fact that we are introducing a fair student financing system by restoring grants and bringing into effect a system through which people will repay fees and loans only if they are in work and earning more than £15,000 a year. He might have noticed a report this morning that graduates are earning more than ever before.

David Cairns (Greenock and Inverclyde) (Lab): May I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to a report out this morning from the Jewish Community Security Trust which records a record increase in violent anti-Semitic assaults in the UK, including 20 incidents against Jewish school children and Jewish schools." [Interruption.] This is a serious issue and Conservative Members demean themselves with that sort of heckling. Will my right hon. Friend find time in the busy schedule after the recess for a debate on the increase in anti-Semitic assaults so that we send both a clear signal from every quarter of the House that anti-Semitism will not be tolerated in this society and a clear message to members of the Jewish community that their protection and safety matters as much as that of any other citizen?"

Mr. Hain: I agree entirely. The rise in— [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) must not behave in that way.

Mr. Hain: The rise in such incidents recorded in the latest report by the Jewish Community Security Trust reveals a totally unacceptable level of attacks and other incidents. That is why there have been regular meetings between the Home Secretary and the president of the Board of Deputies of British Jews, until about collaboration between the police and the Community Security Trust. We have also strengthened the law against racism, including raising the maximum penalty for incitement to racial hatred. We want those laws applied energetically to anyone who practises anti-Semitism or commits such horrific attacks.

Jim Sheridan (West Renfrewshire) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will be aware of the private Member's Bill, promoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Mr. Hepburn), on directors' responsibilities for health and safety. It would be inappropriate to ask for Government support at this stage, but will my right hon. Friend use his good offices to ensure that the Bill gets a fair wind through the House of Commons? If it is successful, it will go a long way to reducing the number of accidents and fatalities at the workplace, which is a vital concern for all our constituents.

Mr. Hain: I think that the Bill gets its Second Reading on 4 March. Health and safety is important and must be paramount, and the Government have given it that position. We will obviously want to consider my hon. Friend's points carefully.

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Itchen) (Lab): My right hon. Friend has greatly enhanced the opportunities for pre-legislative scrutiny and has stated the ambition that it should be a normal occurrence. Does he harbour similar ambitions for post-legislative scrutiny, in particular the scrutiny of Executive agencies charged with implementing legislation once it is passed by the House?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend makes a valuable and [illegible] academic interest in such matters. He has a point. We should find ways to have better post-legislative scrutiny and to monitor the impact of legislation. For example, it was only as a result of Back Benchers' experiences of the disastrous Child Support Agency, as then configured, in their surgeries in the early 1990s that its whole operation was reviewed. It might have been better if the House had had a proper mechanism for monitoring that. We need to consider such scrutiny, perhaps in the new Parliament.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will know that the Government intend to publish their White Paper on reform of the 14 to 19 curriculum in our schools and colleges in the very near future. Given the extremely long time scale that is likely to be needed for implementing the proposals and the absolute necessity to build across-party consensus in support of the Government's proposals, will he find time in the busy schedule over the next weeks for a full debate on the subject—not just a statement from the Secretary of State—as part of the process of building that all-party consensus?

Mr. Hain: I cannot promise a debate. However, the subject is vital and the Secretary of State wants to make a statement at some point, if there is an opportunity for her to do so. Indeed, she gave an interesting presentation in Cabinet this morning about the Government's plans. Raising the skills levels of people in the British economy and focusing on improvement and reform in 14-to-19 education is, she indicated, probably the greatest priority that our educational system faces.

David Taylor (North West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): In terms of topicality for debate after the recess, should not the private finance initiative take priority over Northern Ireland electoral registration? More than 10 per cent. of GDP is tied up in such schemes. Service is teetering on the edge of the financial abyss. Fourteen PFI projects are at a standstill, including London's Whittington hospital acute facilities, with £180 m. refusing to step in. Finally, today saw the publication of Sir John Bourn's National Audit Office report on the Darent Valley hospital in Kent. It shows inflated performance scores, leading to unearned profits, and refinancing, leading to unearned rates of return to The Hospital Company (Dartford) Ltd., the contractor, at 76 per cent., which is 60 per cent. higher than planned. Does not all that show that PFI is prohibitive in cost, flawed in concept and intolerable in consequence to the taxpayers, patients and NHS workers?"

Mr. Hain: No, it does not.

Points of Order

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This is a serious and genuine point of order. You are a stout defender of the rights of Members of this House, and we look to you for that protection and rely on you to discharge that function, which you do. Will you reflect on whether it might help the House to make a Speaker's statement to clarify the relationship between parliamentary questions and the Freedom of Information Act 2000, and in particular to rule whether they should be treated with the same force as a freedom of information request? It would be intolerable if parliamentary questions carried less weight than a request from someone outside the House.

Mr. Speaker: I think it would be best if the hon. Gentleman wrote to me. I can then give the matter reasoned consideration.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday, you rebuked Defence Ministers for failing to provide full and accurate answers to me, my hon. Friend the Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) and the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) about Swan Hunter. I regret to have to seek your guidance today, but a Standing Committee on Delegated Legislation will this afternoon debate the armed forces pensions appeal tribunals. Unfortunately, there is little on the face of the statutory instrument to indicate what it is all about.

The Department has helpfully provided an explanatory memorandum, which better explains the measure. Interestingly, it says:

"Ex-Service organisations . . . are being informed about the proposals in parallel with laying this instrument."

As 93 per cent. of all represented appeals by ex-servicemen are represented by the Royal British Legion, and as it told me this morning that it has not received that information, how can we proceed this afternoon given that the principal organisation—a charitable organisation—charged with undertaking the responsibility of representing ex-servicemen has been unable to study the information and therefore advise Members of Parliament on how we should deal with it?

Mr. Speaker: Every hon. Member of this House has a high regard for our ex-servicemen and the organisations that represent them, including the Royal British Legion. My understanding is that the hon. Gentleman can attend the Standing Committee, and he should raise that matter with the Minister there, which will put the Minister in the position of making a reply that goes on the record. That will be beneficial to the ex-servicemen's organisations.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it possible for a dilatory motion to be made in circumstances in which information provided to a Committee is misleading in such a way? Clearly, the views of the Royal British Legion on pension appeals are crucial. If they are not known, there should be a delay—or at least there is an argument for a delay—in that Committee's sitting. Can you give us guidance on whether that would be in order?

Mr. Speaker: All members of my Chairmen's Panel are experienced. That is why they are Chairmen of Committees. It would be a matter for the Chairman of that Committee as to whether such a motion was acceptable.

Second Chamber of Parliament

Mr. Paul Tyler, supported by Mr. Kenneth Clarke, Mr. Robin Cook, Tony Wright and Sir George Young, presented a Bill to make provision for and in connection with membership of the Second Chamber of Parliament: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 8 April, and to be printed [Bill 60].

Identity Cards Bill (Programme) (No. 2)

1.30 pm

The Minister for Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Desmond Browne): I beg to move,

That the Order of 20th December 2004 (Identity Cards Bill (Programme)) be varied as follows:

For paragraph 4 substitute—'

4. Proceedings on consideration shall be taken in the order shown in the first column of the following Table and shall be brought to a conclusion (so far as not previously concluded) at the times specified in the second column.

TABLE

| Proceedings | Time for conclusion of proceedings |
|---|---|
| New Clauses relating to the purposes and scope of registration and identity cards. | 2.45 p.m. on the day on which proceedings on consideration are commenced. |
| New Clauses relating to the National Identity Scheme Commissioner, Amendments relating to Clauses 24 and 25 | 3.45 p.m. on that day. |
| Remaining new Clauses, Amendments relating to Clauses 1 to 23, Amendments relating to Clause 26, Amendments relating to Clauses 33 to 45, new Schedules, Amendments relating to Schedules 1 and 2 | 4.30 p.m. on that day. |
| Amendments relating to Clauses 27 to 32 and any remaining proceedings on consideration | 5.00 p.m. on that day. |

The motion is intended to assist the House in using the time that we have available—[Interruption.] Perhaps Opposition Members might wait for the punch line before they laugh. It is intended to assist the House in using the time that we have available this afternoon for consideration on Report to the best possible effect.

We have made good progress with the Bill so far. Indeed, it was clear from the pace with which we dealt with many parts of the Bill in Committee that, in huge part, this is not highly contentious legislation. I will put before the House the evidence of that.

The Bill has been given proper scrutiny. Indeed, in preparation for it we had a six-month public consultation exercise, starting in 2002. There was an inquiry by the Home Affairs Select Committee, starting in 2003. There was further consultation on a draft Bill in 2004. The Government responded to all those consultations in the way in which the Bill was presented to the House.

On the last sitting of the Standing Committee, on the afternoon of 27 January, we dealt with amendments and agreed to 20 clauses and one schedule—clauses 26 to 45 and schedule 2. That indicates how quickly progress could have been made in large parts of the Bill.

After the first two sittings of the Committee, the Government proposed a timetable motion for the remaining consideration of the Bill in Committee. That was at the beginning of the fourth day on the morning of 25 January. The motion was agreed to only after we had spent an inordinate time debating a group of two amendments to clause 8—one hour and 10 minutes on the afternoon of 20 January followed by a further one hour and 35 minutes on the morning of 25 January. Two and three quarter hours was spent on the same group of amendments.

A group of amendments could have justified two hours and 45 minutes, but I do not rest my case only on the time. The Chairman of the Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford (Mr. Beard), had to intervene nine times to remind Opposition members of the Committee of the need to keep in order on the morning of the second of those two sittings alone. The debate was brought to a close when, unusually, the Chairman agreed to a motion that the Question be now put. I do not have extensive experience in the House, but I have served on a number of Standing Committees. I have never before known a Chairman of a Standing Committee to accept a motion that the Question be now put. It is clear to me that the Chairman, having intervened of his own volition on nine occasions, had no alternative but to do that.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): The Minister told us that the proceedings had been uncontentious. Clearly they were not.

Mr. Browne: The hon. Gentleman allows me to reinforce a point that I made earlier, which he clearly did not hear. I shall repeat what I said because I wrote it down. I said that the proceedings in Committee proved that, in large part, this was not contentious legislation.

It was clear to me that, had there been a proper use of the time allotted for the Committee, we would have scrutinised every clause. I had already said that I would be happy to sit late and for there to be another Committee sitting.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Browne: I am not a right hon. Member, but I will give way.

Mr. Bercow: I apologise if I prematurely elevated the Minister to the Privy Council. I feel sure that for a demonstration of such loyalty to the Government it is only a matter of time.

Some of us find it peculiarly offensive to be told that such and such an allocation of time was provided in Committee and that members of the Committee had every opportunity to consider the Bill, and so on and so forth. That is because I speak as a humble Back Bencher, or at any rate as a Back Bencher who ought to be humble, who was not fortunate enough to receive the preferment of a celebrated appointment to the Committee. I have not had a chance. I am not very pleased about that and I want the chance today.

Mr. Browne: I am very keen that the hon. Gentleman should be pleased about his contribution to the House. My loyalty to my party in Government is modelled on his own loyalty to his party in Opposition. I look to him as a model of that. I know that he is well qualified to speak on that subject.

I am explaining to the hon. Gentleman and to other Members, who I suspect have not engaged in this level of research into the workings of the Committee, why the Bill comes before the House with certain parts of it unscrutinised by the Committee. The opportunity was there for that to be done and significant progress was made on large parts of the Bill in short measure in Committee. However, a significant part of the Committee's consideration was taken away by filibustering, which was identified by the Chairman and responded to by him. [Interruption.] I say that because I am sure that, in opposing the motion, Opposition Members will make the point that parts of the Bill were not scrutinised by the Committee. It is a legitimate part of my argument and I will continue with the argument.

[Mr. Browne]

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Browne: No, I will continue with the argument at this stage.

To offer the opportunity for the completion of the work in Committee, the Government made the offer of additional time, an additional sitting or a late sitting, but that was not taken up. It is clear to me that, at least in part, some Opposition Members were making use of parliamentary procedures to frustrate the passage of the Bill. As a result, we had to divide the timetable today to ensure that all parts of the Bill are properly scrutinised. That is the purpose of the motion. It is a consequence of what was done in Committee.

On Second Reading, the official Opposition voted in favour of the principle of the Bill. We know that the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) is in favour of ID cards. [Interruption.] I accept that some Opposition Members are against them. When the right hon. and learned Gentleman was Home Secretary in the last Conservative Government, some other right hon. Members who are in the Chamber were also Ministers. They were apparently in favour of them as well. They were part of that Government's programme. The right hon. and learned Gentleman remained in favour of ID cards. In an article in The Daily Telegraph on 20 September, he wrote:

"We must protect our citizens in every way that we can and, in my judgment, that includes ID cards."

He is right. He is no doubt aware that a recent survey found that 88 per cent. of Conservative voters support ID cards.

Sir Robert Smith: What has the fact that the Leader of the Opposition supports the Bill got to do with the timetable, which is about allowing time for Back Benchers to take part in the debate? Surely it is precisely when Back Benchers disagree with their Front Bench that parliamentary time should be generous. Given that the Leader of the House has told the House that the current hours for Thursday make it unsuitable for major legislation, will the Minister tell us why the Bill has been scheduled for a Thursday? Does it mean that the Government do not see the Bill as major legislation?

Mr. Browne: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Bill has been scheduled for a Thursday because the usual channels agreed that the Bill should be presented to the House today, and I am not part of those discussions.

If the Opposition want to allow debate on the Bill, as they suggest that they do, whether from the Back Benches or the Front Bench, they should agree with the motion. Last week, the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell), during a debate on the programme motion on the Serious Organised Crime and Police Bill, said:

"Our debates on programme motions often have the qualities of a choreographed Greek chorus, with outrage expressed by the Opposition about the nature of the motion".—[Official Report, 3 February 2005; Vol. 430, Col. 1024.]

I am offering an opportunity to the House not to do that in these circumstances and to avoid the temptation of the "choreographed Greek chorus". I am offering the opportunity not to fall into that trap and instead to agree that it would be better for us to spend time debating the Bill rather than taking time, at length, to debate the timetable motion. The motion will help order our debate in a sensible way.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab): I thought it apposite to remind my hon. Friend of the wise words of my first Prime Minister, Harold Macmillan, who said that when Front Benches were united they were almost always united in error.

Mr. Browne: I always listen to the wisdom of the Father of the House and have enormous respect for his views. Part of my argument, if only by implication, is that I am not that certain that there is unity between the Front-Bench teams on the Bill. The motion will help to order our debate in a sensible way and I commend it to the House.

Mr. Humfrey Malins (Woking) (Con): I urge my right hon. and hon. Friends to vote against the programme motion, for the simple reason that it is the latest in a long line of insults to the House of Commons. We face a Government who are determined to ride roughshod over elected Members of Parliament and to get their own way at any cost. They have consistently ignored the principle of proper parliamentary scrutiny. I shall take a look at what happened in Committee in a moment but, make no mistake Mr. Deputy Speaker, this is a major Bill with major implications for the lives of all of us. As my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) said in a question a little while ago, it touches on the sensitive relationship between the individual and the state, so it has enormous implications for civil liberties, and it is not just about identity cards.

The Bill's principal purpose—not understood widely outside the House—is the creation of a national register or database under which people will be obliged to provide dozens of pieces of personal information to the Government register, to which many others will have access. If one does not supply that information there is a penalty—some say a fine—of £2,500. The Bill is clearly important and has huge constitutional and civil liberties implications.

David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): As someone who has made it clear that I am not in favour of the Government's proposals, having written a minority report for the Home Affairs Committee and voted against the Bill on Second Reading, may I put it to the hon. Gentleman that, whatever the Government's failure to provide time, we are where we are? If the purpose of the main Opposition party is to utilise all the time allowed to debate the programme motion, that would effectively result in less time to debate the matters of substance before us. It would be most unfortunate if that were its tactic, because it would aggravate a situation in which the Government have not provided the time that we would like.

Mr. Malins: I have enormous respect for the hon. Gentleman who, throughout proceedings on the Bill, has opposed the Government. If the debate on the programme motion takes time away from the debate on new clauses, it is the Government's fault, not ours.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): I hope that my hon. Friend will not be seduced by the argument of the hon. Member for Walsall, North (David Winnick). We must assert the right to scrutinise legislation. The only way in which we can do so is to speak in these debates and vote on these timetable motions. If we do not do so, we are not performing our duty.

Mr. Malins: My right hon. and learned Friend is right, as always. What power do we have? All that we can do in practice is speak in these debates, make our protest known and vote when the time comes. That is what we are going to do.

If ever a Bill needed detailed and thorough scrutiny in Committee, this is the Bill. It did not receive it, and that was the Government's fault. I shall tell the House what the Government did. At a stage in Committee when he did not have any justification whatever for his charge, a Government Back Bencher falsely accused the Opposition of over-long speeches and filibustering. It was an absurd allegation that was utterly rejected by the Committee Chairman. Throughout our proceedings, we had kept to the point. Yes, there were long speeches, but the Minister made a speech in excess of one hour. I do not criticise him for doing so—he was giving a lengthy, if unsatisfactory, response to points that we were making.

Following that absurd intervention by a Government Back Bencher, the Government introduced knives or what people outside the House would call a viciously short timetable for the rest of the Bill. As a result, whole clauses were not debated or scrutinised. Part of clause 8 was not debated; clause 9 was not debated at all; clauses 10 and 11 were not debated at all; clauses 23, 24 and 25 were not debated at all. Those important clauses deal with the commissioner and his or her powers, as well as the provision of information about an individual without their consent. None of those clauses was debated, so they were not subject to any scrutiny. By any standards, that is a disgrace.

After the Committee's proceedings had finished, the Joint Committee on Human Rights reported. It said that the Government's identity card and register proposals raised "serious question" about possible breaches of human rights and it regarded Ministers' failure to explain why they believed their Bill was compatible with the Human Rights Act 1998 as "deeply unsatisfactory". I warned the Government on day one of the Committee that the Joint Committee would shortly report, and I suggested gently because that is my style, that they wait for that report so that we could consider it during our deliberations on the Bill. The Government did not take any notice of my suggestion whatsoever. It is ludicrous that we had to go through the entire Committee stage without the benefit of that important report.

One might ask whether there was a good reason for that unseemly hurry and ridiculous rush. I believe that the main motive of this utterly discredited Home Office is to secure some last-minute headlines before the general election. It wants to give the appearance of being tough, but it has completely ignored the need for proper parliamentary scrutiny of a vital Bill. Today, Members on both sides of the House wish to speak to amendments and new clauses that they have tabled, including the hon. Member for Walsall, North (David Winnick) and his hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara). The hon. Member for Walsall, North is wholly against his Government and has as much right as any hon. Member to speak to his amendments. The hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) and his colleagues have tabled a number of amendments and they have the right to speak to them.

Mr. Hogg: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the perverse effects of this truncated procedure is that it dissuades hon. Members from becoming interested in a Bill, as they know that they do not have an opportunity to discuss it on the Floor of the House or, indeed, in Committee?

Mr. Malins: My right hon. and learned Friend makes a good point. Increasingly in recent years, right hon. and hon. Members have wondered what is the point of tabling an amendment or coming to the Chamber to try to debate something, as there will be a guillotine and their contribution will be cut out. That has a serious impact on parliamentary democracy.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): I very much agree with my hon. Friend, but I hope that he accepts that because many Conservative Members take such comments seriously, we need a constant reminder that when we are returned to Government automatic guillotining will stop. That has not been stated with sufficient strength, and until my hon. Friend does so his comments lack moral authority.

Mr. Malins: My right hon. Friend makes an interesting point. I can only speak personally and I choose my words with care: I hope that when we are returned to Government, considerably more time will be made available for vital Bills of this sort.

Mr. Cash: On the point that my hon. Friend so ably made about the impact on the House of Commons, does he agree that the extent to which people are concerned that they are being effectively cut out also contributes to the lack of turnout in general elections? People who witness what is happening and see that it is such an invasion of constitutional rights and civil liberties say to themselves in a state of fury, "The House of Commons is impotent and decisions are taken without regard to the people we have elected." They then do not bother to turn out, so it is the destruction of democracy as well.

Mr. Malins: My hon. Friend is right. The situation contributes to lack of turnout not just in elections, but,

[Mr. Malins]

I venture gently to suggest, among colleagues throughout the House of Commons who feel that it is not worth turning up.

Mr. John Taylor (Solihull) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree, perhaps along with my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), that one of the best ways of ensuring that all this guillotining is not necessary is to introduce fewer Bills so that they can all be considered properly?

Mr. Malins: My hon. Friend is right—there is far too much legislation and far too little scrutiny. Today we have Report and Third Reading, and we have less time than my hon. Friend the Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer) had for his private Member's Bill last Friday. I refer also to the report quoted earlier from the Select Committee on Modernisation, which mentioned restoring longer hours on Thursday to take substantial business. If this is not substantial business, I do not know what is.

Today should be the chance for all Members of the House to express their views on the detail as well as the principle of the Bill. The Government have taken that chance away from all of us by giving us a matter of a few hours—not even one full day—to debate the vital issues. When times for votes are taken out, the position is even bleaker and even more unfair.

Today, we cannot stop the Government driving a steamroller over Members of the House. Today, we cannot stop the Government showing their contempt for Parliament. But we can still—thank God—protest, and I hope that our protest is heard by the millions of people outside this building who care deeply about parliamentary scrutiny and parliamentary democracy.

1.52 pm

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): I do not wish to speak for long on the motion, but I want at least to place on record the disgust felt in my party at the Executive's lack of regard for Parliament.

The Minister said that a Greek chorus was the appropriate metaphor for the current circumstances. I am quite a fan of Greek tragedy. If I remember correctly, the role of the chorus is to explain to the audience the narrative of the protagonist rushing headlong to their doom. In the context of the Bill, being in a Greek chorus is quite an apt metaphor for what we are doing.

The Bill is complex and has significant technical, financial and privacy implications that cannot be covered under the programme motion before us today. Its complexity has grown during the passage of the Bill thus far, so there are many areas that need further clarification that we will not have time to deal with.

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): My hon. Friend is quite right: there is simply not enough time to discuss all the important amendments that have been tabled. For example, between 3.45 and 4.30, there are three sets to consider, but a vote on the clauses that finish at 3.45 would take out a quarter of an hour, and a vote on the use of information from the register would take another quarter of an hour. Even if the debate on the use of information from the register takes only a quarter of an hour, we will have no time to discuss all the later amendments that affect Scotland and remote rural areas.

Mr. Allan: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention; the amendments are important, as I have said. The Scottish National party did not have anyone on the Standing Committee, so this is its only opportunity to raise issues—my hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) also raised them, and there was an interesting debate about them—about people who live in remote Scottish areas.

Mr. Hogg: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that he made a serious point about the disabling of minority parties? If minority parties are not represented— [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. We must have no more interventions from a sedentary position. If hon. Members want to intervene, they must stand up and do so in the proper way.

Mr. Hogg: If minority parties are not represented in the Standing Committee, as was apparently the case in this instance, Report is the only opportunity that they have to speak on the detail of the Bill.

Mr. Allan: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is entirely correct and I have a lot of sympathy with his point. I come from one of the more compact parliamentary parties in this Parliament and for us to cover all legislation is a challenge. Report is an important opportunity for smaller parties to intervene—and if that is curtailed there is nowhere else for them to be heard.

Mr. Browne rose—

Mr. Allan: I know the point that the Minister is going to make, but I shall let him make it anyway.

Mr. Browne: I will not disappoint the hon. Gentleman and I am grateful to him for giving way. He made an enormous contribution to the debate in Committee, but he must tell the House that his party had two people on the Committee, only one of whom was ever present at any time.

Mr. Allan: That is known as teamwork: we were running a relay operation. The serious point is that it is difficult for smaller parties—they will speak for themselves – to cover all the Committees that take place in the House, and Report remains an important part of the structure of legislation for precisely such purposes. I do not think that it has ever been the tradition that smaller parties cover every single Standing Committee.

Mr. Gummer: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the other problem is that there are disagreements within parties about such Bills? I happen to be very much in favour of the principle of the Bill, while others in my party take a different view. This is the only opportunity that we all have to show what parts we agree with and where we might want alteration, so that there can be greater consensus. With a Bill of this sort and of this importance, that consensus becomes very important.

Mr. Allan: That intervention was entirely helpful. People often say that the debates in the House are meaningless because all parties come in with a single party Whip and troop through the Lobby, not having listened to the debate or changed their minds. This afternoon, we are dealing with precisely the sort of issue on which people will engage in debate and on which they may change their minds, as has been shown by the course of our proceedings so far. It is on precisely this sort of issue that we need additional time on Report.

Mr. Bercow: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. Given that most members of the public have not seen the selection of amendments for consideration today, would the hon. Gentleman agree that it is important, in order to underline the gravity of the situation and our complaint, that people should be aware that there are 150 minutes in which to debate no fewer than 77 new clauses and amendments? In other words, even if there were no votes, which is not realistic or desirable, there would be fewer than two minutes for the consideration of each. That is an outrage and an insult.

Mr. Allan: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for those mathematical calculations. Even at the speed at which I customarily speak, it would be difficult to get through those amendments in that time.

Briefly, I shall tell the Minister off, if I may, in my own gentle style for one point that he made in his introduction. He said that there were certain points on which we made progress in Committee. I will be completely honest: there were times when we had too little time in Committee and on other occasions people spent too long debating matters that did not need so much time. I am not going to pretend that everything in Committee worked smoothly, but the reality was that the Committee did not have sufficient time overall. There were occasions on which hon. Members such as I felt that we ought to assist in making some progress in order to get on to other things, so we did not spend as much time debating clauses as we wanted. Having tried to be co-operative and helpful, we find it a little difficult to have that thrown back at us afterwards, as if to say, "You went through these clauses quickly, so everything was fine and they were non-contentious." I want to put that on the record because it is not an entirely fair comment.

If we stick to the timetable that we have before us, hon. Members will be asked to vote—I must be careful with my imagery—for a pig in a poke. That is the correct metaphor to describe what we are being asked to buy, something about which we do not have sufficient detail. In my party, we do not want to buy this pig at all. We have made our position clear on the Bill. The Conservatives have explained that they do not yet know enough about the pig, and that what they have seen they do not like. I understand that they are officially planning not to vote at all. However, we will be united in voting against the programme motion, which is essential if we are to have the detail that we need to make a proper informed decision. That is, after all, what we should be here to do.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills) (Con): The programme motion is nearly as bad as it gets. It is not quite as bad as the instrument that the Government use to deem that a Bill has been considered, but it is close. Most Government Members would accept that to deem without consideration is an outrage. The programme motion does not even pretend that we will consider the Bill.

As the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) has pointed out, the Bill is essentially an enabling Bill. It gives huge powers to the Secretary of State, but what do those powers enable him to do? The point about a pig in a poke is correct. The House has a right to examine the Bill.

The Minister takes a lofty view of Committees, which are for the convenience of the House. In years gone by, Bills were traditionally taken on the Floor of the House in order to meet the reasoned observations of hon. Members. We have all been elected and all represent a point of view. We should all have the opportunity to express how the Bill may bear on our constituents and to form a judgment whether the legislation merits passing.

Mr. Hogg: Does my hon. Friend agree with this proposition: by curtailing debate, the Government are showing contempt for the views of hon. Members and, more importantly, for the views of the public, who might seek to use their representative to express their views?

Mr. Shepherd: I have spoken so often in debates on guillotine motions that I sometimes think that my remarks are explicit, when they are merely implicit. I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend for yet again underlining one of the crucial reasons why we have parliamentary debate.

An early-day motion has been tabled to point out to hon. Members and Members of the other place how lamentable the process has been. As my hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Malins) has pointed out, the EDM lists the clauses that were not debated—clauses 8 to 11 and 23 to 25. Is that a mere technical matter in an enabling Bill that should not fuss us? Clause 8 sets out the procedure for issuing identity cards. Is that a small matter and should we have the right properly to consider it? Clause 8 concerns matters such as issuing identity cards and designating documents.

Clause 11 contains the power to require information for validating the register. It is enormously important because it is crucial to the operation of the scheme, but it has not been debated. Clause 11(1) places a duty on a person to provide information to the Secretary of State for the purposes of verifying an individual's entry on the register. Not unreasonably, we would like to discuss that duty.

Clause 23 has also not been discussed. It concerns

"Rules for using information without individual's consent".

If the world at large knew what this Government are about in their construction of a security and police state, it would be truly alarmed by databases that can be accessed by other people and information that must be given under the threat of law. We want to know to whom the information must be given and for what purpose.

Clause 23(1) states that information—photographs, signature, fingerprints or other biometric information—provided under clauses 19 to 22 may be authorised only when the Secretary of State, an omnipresent individual who wants to know everything about us,

"is satisfied that it would not have been reasonably practicable for the person . . . to have obtained the information by other means."

For example, if fingerprint information were recorded on the register, the police would first have to search their own register of fingerprint records before requesting information from the register. That is an illustrative example, but it touches on how the Bill will encroach on the very privacy of our lives.

My hon. Friend the Member for Woking has mentioned the work of the Joint Committee on Human Rights. The Bill has been galloped through with less than 28 hours of consideration in Committee, and we are discussing the heart of the Bill—issuing ID cards, the commissioner and databases. The strongest civil liberties argument is that we have seen no detail because we are examining an enabling Bill. The Bill's vagueness, which is inappropriate, was a principal concern of the Joint Committee on Human Rights. How will the Bill affect an individual's privacy?

I do not accept that we should reduce ourselves to nothing, which is the presumption of all those Labour Members who say, "Let's get on with it. Let's consider the Bill and do what we can." The matter concerns one of Parliament's primary functions, which is to look at that to which we give the power of law—if only the Leader of the House could remember his own dual duty. We must solemnly ask ourselves whether the procedure is right.

This is not a party matter. When we vote on the programme motion, which concerns the suppression of the freedom of expression of elected Members of Parliament, we should make a personal judgment. Some might say that that contradicts the purpose of the modern Parliament, because we are merely party men who must do as we are bid. We are, however, individuals who represent human beings—our constituents. Should we agree to a meaningless and monstrous consideration that defeats the very purpose for which we are sent here?

2.7 pm

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): The Minister has confirmed my determination never to hire him as an advocate if I am on trial for anything at all serious. He has said that the Bill is non-contentious. The title might be non-contentious, but much of the rest is highly contentious.

The Minister has said that the timetable motion will allow debate. That would be true if it had enough time in it, which it clearly does not. As has already been pointed out, my hon. Friends and I have tabled no fewer than nine amendments to a key passage of the Bill, but that passage has been allocated 45 minutes of consideration, almost certainly half an hour of which will be taken up by voting. Those nine amendments affect Scotland, a country which the Minister might remember from time to time, but not one of them is likely to be reached under this disgraceful timetable motion.

Mr. Gummer: Will the hon. Gentleman not be taken in by the Government's use of the word "timetable"? "Timetable" suggests that time is available; this is a guillotine motion that is designed to cut off debate. It is a foreign motion and a foreign word and we should pronounce it in a foreign way. We should vote against the guillotine motion.

Mr. Salmond: The Conservative party is embracing all things French—I knew that it was only a matter of time before that happened.

Mr. Cash rose—

Mr. Salmond: I give way to the Francophile.

Mr. Cash: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that in the light of the disgraceful way in which the Government continuously introduce programme motions, the more that personal liberty is put at risk, the more certain one can be that one will get less time? We should call the motion a garrotte.

Mr. Salmond: I always agree with the hon. Gentleman, except when I disagree with him. Nevertheless, his point is substantial. The timetable motion makes it impossible to reach any of the nine amendments.

The Minister said that we should examine the splendid example of the Serious Organised Crime and Police Bill. Some of us tried to debate that Bill on Monday, when two extraordinary things happened. First, a whole series of amendments was no longer applicable because at the last minute the Government removed the bit of the Bill to which the amendments referred; such was the spatchcock nature of the legislation. Secondly—this is almost unprecedented in the history of this place—the Home Secretary had to adopt other parties' amendments, including one from the Scottish National party. The Government, in headlong retreat from aggravated trespass in Scotland, found themselves having to assimilate the amendments of other parties and then found that, under the timetable, they did not even have time to explain why. I know that the Minister has been preoccupied with this Bill, but he should look at what his colleagues are doing before he cites another Bill as a splendid example of examination and parliamentary democracy.

Finally, let me say this to the Minister—

Mrs. Claire CurtisThomas (Crosby) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Salmond: No, I will not take further interventions because I am anxious to complete this point.

I smell a debacle. We are informed under the freedom of information legislation that the retreat from the exchange rate mechanism cost £4 billion. I suspect that this debacle will cost double that. In days to come, when the Minister looks back at the wreckage of a once promising parliamentary career, and as this hangs around his neck like an albatross, he will say, "I wish I'd listened to Alex Salmond on 10 February 2005. I wish I'd allowed those amendments on Scotland and on the rights of the Scottish Parliament and of people in far-flung areas of Scotland to be debated, because if I had, perhaps I and the Government would not be in the ridiculous position of spending £8 billion on a pile of nonsense."

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central) (Lab): This is a major Bill because it takes us into wholly uncharted waters in terms of the relationship between the individual and the state, yet we are trying to discuss it in one afternoon—the shortest of the week. It may not be a constitutional Bill, but it is semi-constitutional, in that it distinguishes a new era for the relationship between the individual and the state. A sane Parliament would give it at least two full days of debate.

Like other hon. Members, I supported the Bill on Second Reading, but with considerable reservations. I did not object to the card itself, but had many reservations about the details, such as the role of the commissioner, what will be on the register and our ability to access and change erroneous material on it. I was hoping, and thought that I had assurances from the Government, that many of those things would be addressed and changed in Committee, but I cannot see that they have been. This is the first opportunity for Back Benchers such as me, who have serious and growing reservations, to hear the debate and participate in it—yet, as hon. Members on both sides of the House have said, we simply will not have enough time.

This is a hugely important Bill and once we pass it, the relationship between individuals and the state will never be the same again. I regret bitterly that this afternoon we will be so constrained in our consideration. The Government are making a huge error.

2.13 pm

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher), with whom I agree so often on such matters.

The detail of the Bill has been examined fully by my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) and I will not repeat what he said, but I would like to summarise my objections.

We are perpetrating a fraud on the electorate because we tell them that Bills are discussed, but this Bill has not been discussed. It is also a fraud on the judiciary, who often say when interpreting legislation that Parliament decided on it after consideration. We are not considering and we have not decided. We are dissuading hon. Members from becoming involved in legislation, because they know that they will not have a chance to speak to the detail.

Mr. John Taylor rose—

Mr. Hogg: If I may just finish this point, of course I shall give way.

We are disqualifying the minority parties from playing a proper role in the discussion—

It being forty-five minutes after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair, pursuant to Standing Order No. 83A(8).

Question put:—

Mr. Peter Atkinson and
Mr. Mark Prisk

Question accordingly agreed to.

Mr. Malins: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We now have no more than 18 or 19 minutes to discuss no fewer than 24 amendments and three new clauses. That is a disgrace. It gives us no chance to make meaningful contributions. Is there any way that the Government could be persuaded through you to take the proceedings out of today and return on another day when we can have a proper debate? Otherwise, the proceedings are a farce.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member will appreciate that the Chair is not responsible for the result of the Division. The programme motion is now in place and we must proceed with the debate.

Mr. Hogg: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have dealt with the matter sufficiently for the time being. I do not want to prolong debate on it. We should move on.

Identity Cards Bill

As amended in the Standing Committee, considered.

[Relevant document: The Fifth Report from the Joint Committee on Human Rights, Session 2004–05, on the Identity Cards Bill (House of Commons Paper No. 283).]

New Clause 1

NATIONAL IDENTIFICATION SCHEME

'(1) The Secretary of State shall establish a National Identification Scheme ("the Scheme") consisting of—

(a) a register of individuals ("the Register"), and

(b) the provision of Identity Cards to individuals.

(2) The purposes of the Scheme are confined to—

(a) enabling individuals to establish their identity to others by providing registrable facts about themselves, and

(b) enabling others to be able to establish the identity of individuals whenever that is necessary in the public interest.

(3) Something is necessary in the public interest if and only if it is—

(a) of assistance to the Secretary of State in the preventing or detecting terrorist acts in the United Kingdom or elsewhere or otherwise in the interests of national security,

(b) for the purposes of controlling illegal immigration and enforcing immigration controls,

(c) of assistance to the Secretary of State in preventing or detecting crime save crime which gives rise to offences triable only summarily, or

(d) for the purposes of securing proper provision of public services.

(4) In this Act "registrable fact", in relation to an individual, means and is limited to it—

(a) his full name,

(b) his date and place of birth,

(c) his address, and

(d) his current residential status (which shall mean his nationality and his entitlement to remain in the United Kingdom).'—[Mr. Malins.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

2.30 pm

Mr. Humfrey Malins (Woking) (Con): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: New clause 5—Commencement and continuation in force of certain provisions of this act—

'(1) This section applies to the following provisions of this Act—

(a) section 5(2) to (6),

(b) sections 6 and 7,

(c) section 9,

(d) sections 15 to 17, and

(e) sections 19 to 22.

(2) The provisions of this Act to which this section applies may only—

(a) be brought into force, and

(b) continue in force,

in accordance with the provisions of an order under this section.

(3) The Secretary of State may not make an order under this section unless he is satisfied that either the conditions in subsection (4) or the conditions in subsection (5) are met.

(4) The conditions in this subsection are that—

(a) an emergency within the meaning of Part 2 of the Civil Contingencies Act 2004 (c. 36) has occurred, is occurring or is about to occur, and

(b) it is necessary to make arrangements under the provisions of this Act to which this section applies for the purpose of preventing, controlling or mitigating an aspect or effect of the emergency.

(5) The conditions in this subsection are that—

(a) a public emergency within the meaning of Article 15(1) of the European Convention on Human Rights exists in the United Kingdom, and

(b) it is necessary to make arrangements under the provisions of this Act to which this section applies for the purpose of preventing, controlling or mitigating an aspect or effect of the public emergency.

(6) The Secretary of State may not make an order under this section unless a draft of the order has been laid before Parliament and approved by a resolution of each House.

(7) No order under this section may provide for the continuation in force of a provision of this Act to which this section applies for more than a period of twelve months.'.

'and the number of any ID card issued to him, which numbers shall be the same'.

Amendment No. 14, in schedule 1, page 40, line 33, leave out paragraph (b).

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Given the position that we now face, would it be convenient for the Chair not to use the expression, "With this it will be convenient"? It is not convenient for the House; we are proceeding in the current manner because we have to. That is altogether different.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The right hon. Gentleman is an experienced Member of the House. I simply refer to the way in which the amendments are grouped, not the time allowed for them.

Mr. Mullin: I repeat that our problem is that we now have 17 minutes in which to get through a great deal of business and it simply cannot be done properly. I had intended to outline new clause 1 at some length. In fairness, I cannot do that because other hon. Members want to make some contribution to the debate, and I shall ensure for my part that they have an opportunity to do that.

My hon. Friends and I would very much like to divide the House on new clause 1. We have already discussed the fact that the purpose of the Bill is principally to set up the national identity register. New clause 1 would change the existing clause 1 in a number of respects. Under the existing clause, I shall be obliged to provide "registrable facts" about myself to others, so that they may check on me. I have already remarked on the vast number of registrable facts that an individual will have to provide. New clause 1 seeks to limit that number. After all, if I am seeking to establish my identity, why on earth should I provide more than my full name, my date and place of birth, my address and my residential status?

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): It would be helpful to the Liberal Democrats if the hon. Gentleman could confirm that his new clause seeks dramatically to restrict the functions of the scheme. He will be aware that we are opposed to the scheme as a whole. If he is seeking our support, we might find something that seeks to restrict it preferable to the Government's option, although that would be no indication of our support for the scheme as a whole.

Mr. Mullin: The hon. Gentleman contributed significantly in Committee and I respect his views on this matter. He is right: we are seeking to place restrictions on these measures, in this brief debate.

The purpose of clause 1 ought to be to establish the real purpose of the scheme. The Information Commissioner himself has said:

"The lack of a clearly defined purpose for ID cards, including the continuing change in focus causes concern".

Having heard different arguments over the past two or three years about what the Bill is for, I believe that it is time to establish in the Bill what the card and the register are going to do, and what the purpose of the scheme is. Surely the Government should insert in the Bill the statement that its principal purpose is to assist the Secretary of State

"in the preventing or detecting terrorist acts in the United Kingdom or elsewhere or otherwise in the interests of national security", as new clause 1 would do. I believe that it is essential that that vital purpose should be specifically set out, although the Government appear to disagree.

We have not yet been persuaded that the register and the cards will significantly contribute to reducing acts of terrorism. We also need to be persuaded that the costs involved will be worth while. Could the money be better spent elsewhere? The Information Commissioner, Mr. Thomas, also told the Home Affairs Committee:

"I want to see on the face of the statute right at the outset a very clear indication of the stated purposes for this card."

Dr. Nick Palmer (Broxtowe) (Lab): The list in new clause 1(3) differs significantly from the provisions in clause 1 only in that it omits any mention of illegal employment. Do the Opposition not care about illegal employment?

Mr. Malins: I have made it quite clear that the significant difference is that we want to insert in the Bill a reference to terrorism, which we believe is very important.

I want to illustrate the uncertainty that exists among Ministers by quoting some exchanges between them and others in the past. In 2002, in answer to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir Teddy Taylor), the then Home Secretary said that he would not rule out the possibility of the cards making a "substantial contribution to countering terrorism"

He said on a later occasion that they could make a contribution towards countering terrorism, but that it would not be their primary purpose. The hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) was taking a break from ministerial office at the time—otherwise he would not have asked these questions of the then Home Secretary:

"May I ask my right hon. Friend, first, whether he accepts that it is for those who are in favour of the card to make a case for it, not the other way round? Secondly, will he confirm that the card will be little or no use in combating terrorism? Thirdly, given the unhappy history ... of Government information technology projects, are we not entitled to be sceptical about some of the claims made for the card?"

The Home Secretary replied:

"I can say yes to all three."—[Official Report, 1 July 2002; Vol. 388, c. 231-236.]

So there are serious doubts on this matter.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that the Government might be resistant to his new clause because they themselves do not believe that an identity card can significantly reduce the risk of terrorism?

Mr. Malins: The hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point. That could well be the case. In Committee, the Government certainly did not persuade us on that point.

On illegal immigration, a MORI poll found that a third of the people surveyed tended to support a card because they believed that it would prevent illegal immigration. Are they right? In the few moments remaining to me, I should like to point out that all new asylum seekers—the poll showed that most people were referring to asylum seekers—are already issued with a biometric card, so they are already covered. What about the 250,000 failed asylum seekers who are already in the country? How will the card help in that regard?

Mr. Allen: Does the hon. Gentleman have any sympathy with our amendment Nos. 68 to this group? We may not get to it, but we would like to divorce the Home Office from ID cards from passports. British passport holders are the last people we need to issue with an ID card, as they already have a secure document.

Mr. Malins: The hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point.

What will the card do to prevent illegal immigration? What effect will it have on the millions of people who come to this country on short-term visits of up to three months? They would not need to register or have a card. Have the Government persuaded us that the card or the register will have an effect on illegal immigration? No, they have not. Have they persuaded us that the card will have a sensible effect on identity theft or benefit fraud? No, they have not.

Our other amendments are restrictive. I am concerned that the registrable facts that we shall have to supply include information about addresses at which we have previously resided in the United Kingdom and elsewhere. I have tabled amendment No. 11 to restrict that to the previous five years. We also seek to limit the nature of information about the addresses where we have lived. We are trying to limit the Government.

If the principal purpose of clause 1 is to help us to prevent terrorism—or if it is not—the Government should say so. Our debate is uninformed unless we know that. Furthermore, we need convincing that it will do that. I am also reluctant for the state to have quite so much information from me as an individual, and the new clause seeks to restrict the information to an amount that we regard as reasonable in the circumstances.

David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): I should like to speak to new clause 5. In the limited time available, I want to explain that it aims to limit the use of identity cards to dealing with terrorism or an emergency and that it would introduce the necessity for the Government to seek parliamentary approval every year. As I have explained elsewhere, including on Second Reading, I do not accept that identity cards would help in the fight against terrorism. They would certainly have been of no assistance during the 30 years of IRA violence and murder.

Nevertheless, the Government put great emphasis—more than on anything else—on the view that identity cards would help in the fight against terrorism. Therefore, I believe that, if we are to have such cards, their use should be confined to terrorist outbreaks or the kind emergency that I describe in the new clause. It would then be necessary for the Government to come to the House of Commons to defend and justify their view that such an emergency was about to occur, and to seek the approval of Parliament for the use of identity cards—incidentally, we have not had such cards for more than half a century—and then, if Parliament gives its approval, it would do so on the basis of 12 months. Obviously, the Government would then come back if they require a renewal of powers given by Parliament for that purpose.

For all those reasons, we should confine identity cards along the lines that I have suggested. I hope that the Government will consider the matter more carefully than they have done.

Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak) (Lab): As my hon. Friend concerned that the Government have made no response available to hon. Members to the concerns raised by the Joint Committee on Human Rights about the human rights aspects of the Bill?

David Winnick: That was mentioned in the debate on the programme motion. That is unfortunate and perhaps the Minister will refer to it on Third Reading. The criticism that has been made by the Joint Committee on Human Rights is very important. I do not want to appear in any way immodest, but in some respects, it draws on some of the matters raised in the minority report of the Home Affairs Committee, which I recommend, with due modesty, that some Members read, even if the footnotes were not included as they should have been.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Read out the report.

David Winnick: I will resist that temptation.

My other amendment relates to public services. In effect, my argument is that it should not be necessary for those seeking hospital treatment or access to other public services to produce an ID card. At Prime Minister's Question Time yesterday, my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dudley, North (Ross Cranston), who is a supporter of identity cards, said nevertheless that people do not want a society in which the response is, "Where's your papers?" Neither do I, although it would be, "Where's your identity card?" There are already enough checks on people coming along for registration or treatment at a GP surgery or hospital. It would be an undesirable state of affairs in which the first inevitable question asked of a new patient at a GP's premises or hospital is, "Can you show me your identity card?" That is what will occur if the measure is passed without amendment.

Mr. John Taylor (Solihull) (Con): The hon. Gentleman is addressing the question of producing an identity card in anticipation of public services. Would he take note of my recent experience buying a new motor car last autumn when the dealer required me to produce my passport? I suggest that the application of identity cards would not be confined to public services but might also become widespread in private sector transactions.

David Winnick: I note that point, but the hon. Gentleman satisfied the motor car dealer by producing his passport. If he did not have a passport, he would no doubt produce other evidence. There is all the difference between that sort of evidence, which we all carry on us, and an identity card. That relates to the debate on Second Reading.

The Minister for Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Desmond Browne): Is my hon. Friend aware that the Government's reply to the report of the Joint Committee on Human Rights is available in the Vote Office?

David Winnick: That is useful.

Lynne Jones: I went to the Vote Office just before the debate began and it was not available.

David Winnick: Perhaps it is corrected, but it will not be after the Minister's intervention. If the Government have responded in a positive way—I have not read it—that would be very encouraging.

Mr. Allen: I want to speak briefly to amendments Nos. 42 to 45, which address issues raised in the Joint Committee on Human Rights report.

Amendments Nos. 42 and 43 would restrict the amount of historic address information. That came up in Committee and we did not receive a satisfactory answer. We want to ensure that any address information is necessary and proportionate to that which is sought to be achieved, and we are not yet clear what the bounds of that are.

Amendments Nos. 44 and 45 are important, particularly amendment No. 44, which has cross-party support and on which we would seek to divide the House, as it is intended to break the link between applications for passports and ID cards. The Committee pointed out that assigning ID cards to those who apply for passports is a fairly arbitrary method. Those who have passports are the very category who do not need ID cards. Therefore, we would seek to make the scheme genuinely voluntary by breaking that link. I hope that hon. Members will support the amendment on that basis. If the Government want compulsion later, they can use clause 6 powers to introduce compulsion in a much more open and transparent way, rather than using the passport system.

Mr. Cameron: Does not the House see that the Minister has not had a chance to answer any of these points, which shows that we are once again held in contempt? The Minister must remember that even small cogs in wheels are in the end guilty of destroying great institutions. He ought to remember that he will be held responsible for allowing this scandalous situation, when we can neither debate properly nor can he answer properly.

It being Eleven minutes to Three o'clock, Mr. Deputy Speaker put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair, pursuant to Order [this day].

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time.

The House divided: Ayes 128, Noes 229.

APPLICATION OF FREEDOM OF INFORMATION ACT

'(1) The following provisions shall have effect in relation to reports and information which have been prepared in relation to this Act.

(2) The Commissioner is a public authority under the Freedom of Information Act 2000 (c. 36).

(3) In relation to requests for information to the Commissioner under the Freedom of Information Act 2000, the exemptions in sections 35 (formulation of Government policy) and 36 (prejudice to effective conduct by public affairs) of that Act cannot be applied.

(4) In relation to requests for information to the Commissioner under the Freedom of Information Act 2000, any exemption which was considered subject to the provisions in section 23 (information relating to bodies dealing with security matters) shall instead be treated as if the exemption were subject to section 24 (national security) of that Act.'.—[Mr. Malins.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Malins: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: Amendment No. 20, in clause 24, page 21, line 15, leave out third 'and'.

Amendment No. 21, in clause 24, page 21, line 16, at end insert

(e) the workings of the Identity Card Scheme and the Register including complaints made to him in relation thereto.'.

Amendment No. 15, in page 21, line 17, leave out from 'Commissioner' to end of line 33 and insert

'include general policy matters, but do not include—

(a) the exercise of powers which under this Act are exercisable by statutory instrument or by statutory rule for the purposes of the Statutory Rules (Northern Ireland) Order 1979 (S.I.1979/1573 (N.I.12)) unless any particular case affected by these powers or rules raises a concern of substantial public interest;

(b) the imposition of civil penalties, objections to such penalties or appeals against them, unless a particular penalty, objection or appeal raises a concern of substantial public interest;

(c) the operation of so much of this Act or of any subordinate legislation as imposes or relates to criminal offences in any particular case, unless a particular case raises a concern of substantial public interest;

(d) the provision of information to the Director-General of the Security Service, the Chief of the Secret Intelligence Service or the Director of the Government Communications Headquarters in any particular case, unless the provision of information in any particular case raises a concern of substantial public interest; or

(e) the provision to another member of the intelligence services, in accordance with regulations under section 23(5), of information that may be provided to that Director-General, Chief or Director in any particular case, unless the provision of information in any particular case raises a concern of substantial public interest.'.

Amendment No. 23, in clause 24, page 21, line 18, leave out paragraphs (a) to (c).

Amendment No. 16, in page 21, line 33, at end insert—

'(3A) The Commissioner may, where appropriate—

(a) before undertaking a review which includes the policy towards the provision of information to the Director-General of the Security Service, the Chief of the Secret Intelligence Service or the Director of the Government Communications Headquarters, liaise with the Intelligence Services Commissioner with a view to referring responsibility for that review to that Commissioner, or

(b) liaise with the Information Commissioner in relation to any processing of personal data.'.

'would cause substantial harm to the public interest'.

Amendment No. 37, in clause 25, page 22, line 12, leave out from 'security' to end of line 15.

Amendment No. 39, in clause 25, page 22, line 12, at end insert 'serious'.

Amendment No. 25, in clause 25, page 22, line 14, leave out from 'authority' to end of line 15.

Lynne Jones: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I want to make it clear that the letter in response to questions from the Joint Committee on Human Rights was available in the Vote Office, but that the staff there did not seem to understand that that was what was being requested. However, the Committee asked for a reply by 7 February and said that it would consider the response and report back. There has been no opportunity for the Committee to report back on the Government's response.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not really a matter for the Chair, but the point made by the hon. Lady is now on the record.

Mr. Malins: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I ask you to indicate—or the Minister, through you—what opportunity it is felt that hon. Members have to consider their response to the Joint Committee report before we continue our debate?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order for the Chair at this stage. All the official documents necessary for dealing with the debate should, of course, be available to the House. That matter has been raised before, and I trust that the documents have been made available.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I seek your guidance. Is it not important for us to know exactly when the Government's response to the Joint Committee's report was deposited in the Vote Office? If information is supposed to be available before the debate, surely considerations of reasonableness must apply. Did the Government intend to put the response in the Vote Office only today? Was that an insult, incompetence, or a combination of the two? I think that we ought to be told.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a matter with which I can deal precisely at this time. I repeat what I said earlier—that all Government documents necessary for the debate ought to be available to all hon. Members before the debate starts. I think that we should now proceed, as time is limited today.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP) rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: No, we have dealt sufficiently with that matter for the time being. If the Government have not done something that they should have done, that will obviously be looked at later.

Mr. Malins: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I should be extremely grateful if, at the end of this debate, we can have Divisions on new clause 4 and amendment No. 26. I shall speak to the latter in a moment.

The debate has been under way for a little while, and it is time for me to pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow). On Second Reading, he had something to say about the commissioner. I pause only to remind the House that clause 24 was not debated at all in Standing Committee, even though it is the vital clause that deals with the appointment of the national identity scheme commissioner. Neither was clause 25 debated in Committee, but on Second Reading my hon. Friend very properly expressed his disappointment that the Bill made it clear that the commissioner's report "can, and probably will, be doctored by the Secretary of State before being presented to Parliament".

He went on to say:

"Does that not underline our anxiety that the commissioner will prove to be but a craven lickspittle of the Government?"

He was right to draw our attention to that issue. My right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) said that he had

"a prejudice in favour of the commissioner reporting to the House rather than to the Government".—[Official Report, 24 December 2004, Vol.428, c. 1958.]

What is the effect of my new clause and the associated amendments? Clause 25 provides that the commissioner must make a report to the Secretary of State about the carrying out of his functions. Clause 25(3) states:

"The Secretary of State must lay before Parliament a copy of every annual report made to him under subsection (1)."

So far, so good. However, the tricky bit comes next. Clause 25(4) states:

"If it appears to the Secretary of State, after consultation with the Commissioner, that the publication of a particular matter contained in an annual report ... would be prejudicial to national security,"—

so far, I think, so good—

"the prevention or detection of crime or"— and the House should mark the next words—

"the continued discharge of the functions of any public authority, or ... would be otherwise contrary to the public interest" it could be excluded.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree that the phrase

"would otherwise be contrary to the public interest" is couched in such wide language as to have no meaning other than that the Secretary of State may do as he pleases?

Mr. Malins: My right hon. and learned Friend is right. I hope that the Minister will correct me if I am wrong, but the clause seems to give the Secretary of State the power to say, "I don't want Parliament to know about this bit of the report. I don't have to justify it on grounds of national security. I can catch this point under any of these little subsections." Frankly, I am not happy about that.

New clause 4 offers a different way to proceed that would avoid the House getting a watered-down report. As a general proposition, it is impossible to review the Secretary of State's actions independently and properly if the commissioner's reports to Parliament are filtered by him. For that reason, the new clause would establish an alternative scrutiny mechanism under the Freedom of Information Act 2000. New clause 4(2) identifies the commissioner as a public authority under that legislation, and there is no obvious dispute about that. Proposed new subsection (3) would disapply the exemption in the 2000 Act relating to the formulation of Government policy, as well as the prejudice to effective conduct by public affairs. It means that legal advice in relation to human rights and the ID card could be accessible to people who request it. The reason for that is that the Government, as the Joint Committee has shown, cannot be trusted on human rights issues.

New clause 4(4) would remove the absolute national security exemption, mainly because the service has, for example, secret access to details on the register under paragraph 9 of schedule 1. I commend the House to examine that paragraph.

My proposed change would not jeopardise national security, as the 2000 Act contains an additional, non-absolute national security exemption that can be used case by case. In short, new clause 4 would set up a new mechanism that would allow the House of Commons to have access to some information to which it would not have access otherwise but which may be very important. There is no intention to jeopardise national security, to which the new clause poses no threat. All we seek is a method whereby more information can be made available to parliamentarians.

Mr. Bercow: Clause 25 is a recipe for the exercise of ministerial fiat. The new clause that my hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Malins) has commended to the House is absolutely indispensable to provide a brake on the use and abuse of Government power, and I warmly welcome it.

My hon. Friend's words about my little intervention on Second Reading were generous. I am thoroughly depressed about this obnoxious and distasteful Bill, but as a result of his characteristic generosity, I shall go about my business for the rest of the day with a glint in my eye and a spring in my step that would otherwise have been lacking.

Mr. Malins: If I have brought a glint to my hon. Friend's eye and a spring to his step, I—

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills) (Con): Apologise!'

Mr. Malins: Well, if my comments have caused those reactions in my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham, I am delighted. It is probably my most useful act of the day.

Mr. Hogg: Should the Minister decline to accept the new clause, would my hon. Friend consider advising colleagues in the other place to delete the phrase and paragraph (b)? Does he agree that if those amendments were made, subsection (4) would be less offensive?

"the continued discharge of the functions of any public authority"

Mr. Malins: My right hon. and learned Friend is right. The other place will certainly consider that message. He has made an extremely valid point.

I am conscious of the time and want to make two further points. First—my right hon. and learned Friend touched on this—it would be better if those offensive parts of clause 25(4) relating to the "discharge of the functions of any public authority, or ... otherwise contrary to the public interest" were removed from the Bill, because we do not want to give the Home Secretary carte blanche to do what he likes without the House of Commons knowing about it.

My second point relates to amendment No. 26, which is simple and essential. It would change the clause so that instead of stating that "the Commissioner must make a report to the Secretary of State", it would require the commissioner to

"lay before each House of Parliament a general report".

That is essential, which is why I hope that all hon. Members will support my amendment.

There is a further minor amendment. In Committee we debated the cost of the scheme as much as we could—we were heavily curtailed—but never received a satisfactory answer. One of my amendments in Committee, which is now amendment No. 24, relates to the appointment of the national identity scheme commissioner. Clause 24(6) requires the Secretary of State to "provide the Commissioner with such staff as the Secretary of State considers necessary for the carrying out of the Commissioner's functions."

I pause only to say that at no stage have we been reassured about how many members of staff would be employed by the commissioner. My probing amendment suggests that it should be limited to 10, but it is only a probing amendment. Why would I probe? The answer is simple—it would be helpful when looking at the cost of the whole scheme to know what the cost of the commissioner and his staff will be. At the end of the day, someone must pay. There was an exchange in Committee when the Minister said that the issue had very little to do with taxpayers' money because the burden would be on the individual to pay for the service—[Interruption.] Well, if I have misquoted him, he will put me right, because he will have a chance today to speak to the House. He has not had that chance yet, but I hope that he will.

The national identity scheme commissioner should have broad and strong powers, and they should be wide-ranging and not limited. The commissioner should have greater powers to take any steps that he or she wants to take in relation to the scheme, even to the extent of receiving complaints from individuals about the way in which it is running. I do not want his powers to be limited. That is the genus of our amendments.

I am certain that any decent Government—I hope that this Government are decent—would accept the proposition that the commissioner should report direct to the House of Commons and would also accept that while matters concerning national security should perhaps be kept from the House, that is the limit of what should be kept back. Matters should not be excluded just because it suits the Secretary of State for us not to hear about them, otherwise there would be yet a further diminution in our influence and power. I hope that the debate on my new clause and amendments will produce some interesting arguments during the amazingly short time left to us.

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central) (Lab): When my hon. Friend the Minister replies to this group of amendments, will he explain how and in what way the commissioner will have the power to protect the rights of the individual? The hon. Member for Woking (Mr. Malins) touched on that. If information on the register is inaccurate and wrong, or if the register is in some way abused, how will our constituents seek redress? I cannot see in these clauses that the commissioner has specific powers to act as a tribunal and guardian of individuals' rights. Should our constituents appeal to the commissioner, either through us or in their own right, and what could the commissioner do to put the matter right?

I suspect that every hon. Member has had constituents who have found that their credit rating is incorrect. A couple of years ago, one of my constituents had that problem and although the credit card company recognised and eventually admitted that its information was wrong and my constituent should not have been denied a credit rating, it took me nine months and unending correspondence to get it corrected. If that happens with a relatively small commercial data bank, how will constituents obtain redress and correct information? Surely, we must have a fast-track method of appeal to the commissioner, or to someone else, to have such information corrected. Otherwise, there will be absolutely no confidence in the scheme.

Mr. Hogg: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the commissioner might wish to use his annual report to identify such errors and to bring them to the attention of the House, so is it not undesirable to give the Secretary of State the power to amend the commissioner's report in the wide terms set out in clause 25?

Mr. Fisher: I agree with the right hon. and learned Gentleman. He is addressing—correctly—the strategic macro point, but I do not want to lose my micro point about individuals. Whatever the virtues of the scheme, it will be completely discredited if it is seen to abuse the rights of individuals and people will not have confidence in it. In a scheme of this scale, which requires individuals to submit 56 pieces of information, things are bound to go wrong and there must be a fast-track procedure to put them right.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's concern from past experience of things going wrong. When the previous Government introduced the poll tax, one of its flaws, in addition to its unfairness, was that it attempted to keep a register of where everyone lived and, in the process, managed to introduce many mistakes. That register involved just names, addresses and locations of people, not the wealth of information that the national identity scheme will require.

Mr. Fisher: It is inevitable that there will be mistakes, so it is essential that our constituents have an easy, comprehensible and swift way of putting them right, otherwise their career and many other aspects of their life could be put at prejudice. I hope that the Minister will be able to respond to that point before we vote on the new clause.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): I am pleased that this group of amendments has been tabled, as it is an opportunity to explore at more leisure than we had on the previous group whether the commissioner will be any more than a fig leaf to cover the Government's embarrassment or genuinely an organisation or individual who will be a fearless champion for the citizen. That is what we are interested in.

When discussing these issues we must remember why an individual might want to go to the commissioner. What might have happened to them? They may be seeking redress for a range of serious circumstances. We know that the cards will be used for public services. A person may have had all kinds of hassle accessing a public service; they may have found it difficult to obtain health care or education. Those are serious matters for an individual. The person may have been falsely arrested and have had problems with the criminal justice system. We have seen how errors in the Criminal Records Bureau system have led to individual cases of hardship, where a person has been denied a job because a record is fake or has been falsely matched. We must be aware that people could be seeking redress for serious circumstances.

A person could have had travel difficulties. They might have failed to buy a car that they were after.

Mr. John Taylor: On cue! The hon. Gentleman knows my theme—about needing a passport to acquire a new car. He was talking about accessing public services with the aid of an identity card. Would he care, just for a moment, to speculate on how widely the use of an identity card might be made necessary in private sector transactions?

Mr. Allan: The hon. Gentleman is correct. A typical circumstance that someone may take to the commissioner is that in a financial transaction a bank has denied them access to financial services or they have been hauled up on suspicion of doing something they had not done, because the identity card checking process has gone wrong somehow, as it will do in some cases.

In Committee, we discussed the fact that there will be a trickle-down effect. Banks will be offered a voluntary service for checking people against the identity register and will be charged for that service. That is in the Bill. But then the Government could come along with money laundering regulations that will make the process mandatory if the banks want to be in the clear under those regulations. There will be a trickle-down effect: the ID card could come into play for a huge range of everyday transactions, for all of which people might want to go to the identity commissioner.

We must take the amendments seriously. They try to remove some of the restrictions that the Government have placed on the ability of the commissioner to carry out his or her work. Governments increasingly like commissioners for all sorts of things. We have seen how some of them—for example, the Information Commissioner, Richard Thomas, and the data protection commissioner, Elizabeth France before him—can build their roles and perform a good function. The Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards performs an effective function. The measure of that is the extent to which commissioners can criticise Ministers and the Government, on a serious and well-founded basis, and have that criticism accepted.

Well-functioning commissioners have an important role in making criticisms of particular instances and in drawing lessons from them to show why the system is flawed. That is what we want the identity scheme commissioner to be able to do. If, as we fear, the identity card system contains serious flaws, we want the commissioner genuinely to be able to highlight them and bring them to Parliament so that we can hold an informed debate and either scrap the scheme or change it, depending on the depth of concern. Our fear is that unless we accept some of the amendments or the Government make their own proposals to strengthen the commissioner's hand, the commissioner will be too weak.

The Government, like previous Governments, have been desperately keen to avoid judicial review of anything that they do. It now seems to be built into legislation—Ministers do not like being hauled up before the courts and told that their legislation is poor. I suspect that the commissioner process is part of that. The Government hope that the commissioner will deflect some of the criticisms that might otherwise come through the courts and be directed at a Minister.

I fear that the proposed commissioner system will still leave citizens having to take the judicial review route, which is much less satisfactory than being able to put the case to the commissioner, particularly in respect of the exclusion applied to the commissioner looking at the way that fines are levied. As we understand it, the Secretary of State, almost personally, will be taking people to court. The Secretary of State will take people to the county court saying, "You owe me £1,000 because you didn't register. You didn't notify your change of details or do x, y or z." The county court could send the bailiffs round if a person did not pay up. The Government are trying to avoid poll tax martyrs, so they have set up a complicated civil recovery scheme, yet the commissioner, unless the clause is amended, will have no power to look into that system.

Mr. Bercow: Have the Government offered any explanation at all of subsection (4)(b) of clause 25, the circumstances in which uncensored publication of the commissioner's report would be "otherwise contrary to the public interest"?

If such an explanation has been offered, I have not yet heard it and it is palpable that, particularly in the early stages when all sorts of mistakes are made, the Government will have a huge vested political interest in suppressing publication on the ground that otherwise confidence in the whole scheme might—perish the thought—be damaged.

Mr. Allan: The hon. Gentleman is right to draw attention to that point. We received no explanation whatever in Committee because the clause was not debated; it just passed through. We had no opportunity to go into the detail of how the process would work. There is a clear statement in the clause that the Secretary of State can suppress matter if it would be contrary to the "continued discharge of the functions of any public authority".

I think that plays to the hon. Gentleman's point. If the functioning of the identity card scheme would be damaged by publishing criticism of the scheme, we shall not criticise it. The law as currently drafted would seem to permit the Secretary of State to do that. If the Government have something to be embarrassed about, if they have dirty washing, let us have it out in public. What is the point of having a commissioner if they are not able to do that?

Unless the clause is amended, sadly, we shall have a fig leaf commissioner rather than, as I want to see, a fearless champion of the citizen. There will be a spill-over. If people cannot obtain satisfaction from the commissioner, there will be judicial review. The case will go to the parliamentary commissioner, the ombudsman, instead of to the identity commissioner. People will bypass the process. For example, if the problem was with the health service, they would go to the health service commissioner. We run the risk of creating a real mess and that is not satisfactory from the citizen's point of view.

Mr. Hogg: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the great advantage of new clause 4 is that it makes information available to the citizen, on the back of which the citizen can go to the court for judicial review if he feels that the Secretary of State has acted unreasonably?

Mr. Allan: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is entirely correct about the citizen having access to information. There are other examples of the kind of harm we are talking about. Something may have happened to the system that meant that a citizen was denied entry to another country. They may have spent several thousand pounds to somewhere, but then have immediately been flown home again. That would be a serious incident in anyone's life. If that occurs, they must be able to obtain information about what went wrong. If there is any suggestion of blanket coverage, if the individual was told for example, that it was an agreement between the UK and the United States authorities covered by terribly secret terrorism provisions, when they were merely going on holiday to Disneyworld, that would not be satisfactory in terms of the citizen's ability to obtain redress. I question the point of having a commissioner if they were unable to expose that type of information. I hope that the citizen could go to the commissioner and say, "I turned up at Orlando airport and they sent me back. They said it was something that came out of the identity system that we are all part of now." I hope that the commissioner could say, "Right, I'm going to get on with that. We will take the case through whatever process we need to get the redress that you are after."

My fear is that the citizen will meet a blank wall and the commissioner will not offer such satisfaction. I hope that the Minister, in the time available to him, will be able to offer some more assurances. I suspect that this is one of the issues that will have to be picked up at greater length in the Committee proceedings down the corridor in the Lords, where they often do have sufficient time to consider such things. I certainly feel that to establish the commissioner without testing his real powers and accepting some of the amendments will not offer citizens the safeguards that they need for a scheme of this significance.

3.30 pm

Mr. Hogg: I shall be brief because this is a time-limited debate. I shall confine myself to three points. First, the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) made an important point. It is certain that errors will be made with regard to individuals. One of the problems about the Bill is that the individual will not be well placed, perhaps not placed at all, to identify the fact of an error or to challenge it. The advantage of the proposal made by my hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Malins) is that it will make it possible for a citizen, using the procedure set out in new clause 4, to identify errors of fact made in relation to them. Once an error of fact has been identified, corrective action is possible. I say to the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central that new clause 4 goes directly to the anxiety that he has properly expressed.

Secondly, looking at the wide powers set out in clause 25(4), one has to accept that, in reality, they give the Secretary of State of the day the power to amend at will the report of the commissioner. Phrases such as "would be otherwise contrary to the public interest,"

are so wide that there are few Secretaries of State who could not bring their own prejudices within the parameters of those phrases. And of course the discharge of that amending function is not reviewable, which takes one back to new clause 4. If new clause 4 is accepted, individuals—whether they be Members of this House or someone else—will be able to say, having obtained that information, that the exclusion of material from the commissioner's report is unreasonable and does not fall within the language of this Bill and either raise it as a parliamentary matter or seek judicial review of it. That is particularly important when one reflects that the commissioner might well wish to use his annual report as a vehicle for criticising the Government's use of the scheme. It would be intolerable if the Secretary of State was able, by using the language of clause 25(4), to delete that criticism.

My final point is that my own preference, and one that I commend to the House, and through this House to the other place, is the approach recommended by my hon. Friend the Member for Woking, namely, to approve new clause 4 or something like it and to amend the language of clause 25(4) broadly in terms of amendment No. 38, which is in this group, so as to remove the offensively wide language on which I have addressed the House.

As time is pressing, that is all that I wish to say, although were time not so limited, I would wish to say a lot more.

Mr. Browne: I rise to oppose the new clause and amendments and to speak to amendment No. 56, which I think, when I explain it, will give some significant comfort to hon. Members, especially those who espouse the provisions of new clause 4. Amendment No. 56 in substantial measure covers exactly the same ground as new clause 4, although there are qualifications, which I shall come to in a moment.

Before I deal with the new clause and amendments and the questions that I have been asked—to the extent that I am able to answer them—it is important that I put on record the position in relation to the Government's response to the Joint Committee on Human Rights report. I am disappointed at the way in which hon. Members have implied in the House that the Government were dilatory or that there was some attempt not to make the information available to Members of the House at the earliest possible opportunity. I might say that those observations were made to some degree in bad faith because no one asked me about the matter at any point or made any inquiries about the true circumstances.

The fact of the matter is that my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) is correct. The Chairman of the Joint Committee on Human Rights requested that the Home Secretary respond to the Committee's report within seven days and named the date of 7 February. The letter that was sent from my right hon. Friend the Chairman of the Joint Committee on Human Rights was dated 26 January, and it arrived at the Home Office and was received by the Home Secretary on 28 January. He responded by 8 February, which was one day out. Bearing in mind the fact that the report was received two days after the date of the letter that accompanied it, I do not think that that is a matter of serious criticism.

I think that all hon. Members have now had access to the letter, and they will see that its final paragraph contains an appropriate request to the Chair of the Joint Committee that with her permission, which was sought by implication in the request,

"it would be helpful . . . to make this reply available to the House for the remaining stages of the Bill on 10th February."

That permission was given yesterday, and the letter was deposited in the Vote Office before 10 o'clock this morning. Nothing could have been done in any sense any quicker, and I do not think that there can be any criticism of the way in which the Government and my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary have acted in relation to this issue.

Lynne Jones: The Committee set the date of 7 February, but it would not have been aware that we would debate the Bill on Report so soon. Obviously, the Committee has not been given sufficient time to report to the House about whether it considers the Home Secretary's response satisfactory.

Mr. Browne: I thank my hon. Friend for that contribution. All those observations are truisms, but the workings of the Joint Committee on Human Rights are matters entirely for the members of the Joint Committee, and the timetable for their work and the priority that they give to their work are matters entirely for them. The Bill has been published in draft form—substantially the same form as at present—for some months now. I make no criticism of the members of that Committee. Indeed, I was a member of it at one stage and served with some members of the current Committee for whom I have the greatest regard. However, it cannot be a criticism of the Government that a Committee of the House adopted a certain timetable—that is the only point that I make.

Mr. Bercow rose—

Mr. Shepherd rose—

Mr. Browne I will give way to the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd), as I understand that he is a member of the Joint Committee.

Mr. Shepherd: I am a member of the Joint Committee. Of course, the drumbeat of Home Office legislation that touches on human rights matters is so great that we are running behind the Government. That is the difficulty that this huge volume of legislation places on us, as well the constraints that lie within it. It is in the Government's gift to make reasonable the passage of Bills and the deliberation of Select Committees. That is what all this is about.

Mr. Browne: I hear what the hon. Gentleman has to say, but I remind the House that, before the Government's incorporation of the European convention on human rights into the law of this land, there was probably no need in the House for the Joint Committee on Humans Rights.

Mr. Bercow: I am afraid that that simply will not do. I have the very highest regard for the Minister's ability, as he knows. Moreover, I do not on a daily basis make partisan points for the sake of it—when the Government are right, I am quite happy to say so—but what we have just heard in relation to this matter from the Minister is a very shabby piece of buck-passing. No hon. Member on the Floor of the House is suggesting for one moment that the timetable for the activities of the Joint Committee, or those of any other Committee, should properly be a matter for the Minister. Does the Minister accept that one is entitled to say that the Government should operate on a joined-up basis? If the Minister did not know what the Whips Office had in mind when scheduling the Bill's consideration on Report and Third Reading, he certainly should have done. It should have been his priority to do everything that he could to ensure that the Joint Committee's report was available for consideration by Members well before today's debate.

Mr. Browne: I do not want this to turn into a mutual admiration society, but I have great regard for the hon. Gentleman, too, although he is perhaps inflating the debate on this issue slightly. The report of the Joint Committee on Human Rights has been available to hon. Members for some time. Nothing that the Government have done has interfered in any way with hon. Members' ability to access the report. I thought that I would be able to cover this matter in a few minutes, but it has turned into a mini-debate of its own. However, hon. Members will agree that some comments that were made strongly implied that the Government delayed their response to the report and produced it at the last minute. I was merely pointing out that the Government responded within the Joint Committee's requested timetable—albeit one day out—and that a further day's delay was required before the Joint Committee gave permission for the letter to be placed in the Vote Office.

Mr. Malins: I never attribute bad faith to the Minister—quite the reverse—but now is the time for frankness. Does he think that it would have been helpful to the Standing Committee if it had had the benefit of the report during its deliberations? Does he also think that all hon. Members would have benefited if the Government had produced their report a little earlier? I am sure that he will be frank and say yes.

Mr. Browne: I will be frank and say yes. It would be nonsensical to say anything but that that would have been helpful. I am merely explaining to the House how events arose because although there was a clear implication that timings were manipulated, they were not.

In the few minutes that remain, may I try to reassure hon. Members who want to be satisfied that the Government intend the commissioner to work with teeth and be a formidable person? The Government's response to the report of the Home Affairs Committee made it clear that we accepted the recommendation that the national identity scheme commissioner should have a broader oversight of the whole scheme, which is provided for by clauses 24 and 25. The commissioner's remit will thus include examining the uses to which ID cards are put, the dealings of all recipients of information held on the register and the administration of the issuing of cards.

Mr. Salmond: Will the Minister specify the relationship of the commissioner with the Scottish Parliament and its Committees?

Mr. Browne: The commissioner will have no relationship with the Scottish Parliament and its Committees under the Bill's structure because we are not considering a devolved matter. There would be no reason for the commissioner to have a direct relationship with the Scottish Parliament.

Mr. Salmond: The Minister said that one aspect of the commissioner's remit will be examining the uses to which identity cards are put. Many of the uses to which they will be put in England will not be those to which they will be put in Scotland. How can the Minister maintain that that is of no relevance to the Scottish Parliament and its Committees?

Mr. Browne: I am not suggesting that the commissioner's actions will be of no relevance to the Scottish Parliament and its Committees. The hon. Gentleman asked me a specific question to which I gave a specific answer.

Hon. Members posed questions about the commissioner's ability to listen to specific complaints. The commissioner will of course be able to listen to specific complaints and will have a strong advisory role to the Secretary of State. I understand that there is a clear and established process if there are errors in the issuing of driving licences, which eventually ends with the possibility of judicial review, as the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) pointed out. The commissioner will be able to take individual complaints from people who are affected by the process and from people whose attempts to correct information on the register were not successful.

New clause 4 relates to the status of reports and information from the national identity scheme commissioner in respect of the Freedom of Information Act 2000. The most important aspect of the new clause is that subsection (2) would make the commissioner a public authority under that Act. Schedule 1 of the Freedom of Information Act lists all public authorities for the purpose of the Act.

I am grateful to Opposition Members for raising that. They are no doubt aware that it is not strictly necessary for the Bill to be amended because it is possible to add to the list of public authorities by order. The Government could do that later, which was our intention. However, as dealing with that important issue in the Bill has merit, I accordingly tabled Government amendment No. 56 to do just that. I must, however, reject subsections (3) and (4) of the new clause which relate to Freedom of Information Act exemptions for the formulation of Government policy.

It being fifteen minutes to Four o'clock, MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair, pursuant to Order [this day].

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

The House divided: Ayes 126, Noes 233.

New Clause 3

Disclosure from the Register: Unlawful Activities

'(1) This section shall have effect in relation to any disclosure from the Register which is authorised by provisions in sections 19 to 23.

(2) It shall be unlawful for any person who obtains information about an individual from the Register to retain copies of that information for the purpose of duplicating the Register or part of the Register.

(3) It shall be unlawful for any person who obtains information about a particular individual from the Register to disclose that information about that individual to another public authority unless an entry relating to that disclosure is recorded in the Register for that individual.

(4) It shall be unlawful for any person who obtains information about a particular individual from the Register to disclose that information about that individual to another person for his (the second person's) purpose where the other person is not authorised to obtain that information directly from the Register.

(5) The term "connected with" shall not be construed as meaning that the connection with a particular event is remote or unlikely, but to the contrary, that the connection with an event is significant or that failure to obtain the information from the Register could prejudice an investigation into that event.

(6) The phrase "in the interests of national security" shall be construed as meaning that failure to obtain the information from the Register would cause prejudice to the objective of safeguarding national security.

(7) Any person who obtains information from the Register shall take all reasonable steps to ensure that any obtaining, use or disclosure of the information is consistent with the requirements of the Human Rights Act 1998 (c. 42).'.—[Patrick Mercer.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: New clause 6—The Register and CCTV Systems—

'Use of the National Identity Register in conjunction with CCTV systems shall be considered to be directed surveillance for the purposes of Part 2 of the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 (c. 23).'.

Government amendment No. 53.

Amendment No. 46, in clause 22, page 19, line 43, after 'information', insert

'not falling within paragraph 9 of Schedule 1'.

Government amendments Nos. 54 and 55.

Amendment No. 47, in clause 22, page 20, line 1, after 'person', insert 'in the United Kingdom'.

Amendment No. 30, in clause 23, page 20, line 13, leave out 'reasonably practicable' and insert 'possible'.

Amendment No. 32, in clause 23, page 20, line 26, leave out from 'person' to end of line 28.

'(6) The Secretary of State must not make any regulations under this section unless a draft of such regulations has been laid before Parliament and approved by a resolution of each House.'.

Patrick Mercer: I am conscious that we have a lot to get through in a very short space of time. Certainly, Conservative Members feel that we did not have enough time to cover as many clauses as we would have liked in Committee, where we constantly ran out of time, although I hope that I spoke with great brevity. I will try to do so again today, so that Members who are interested in speaking to their amendments in the available 15 minutes or so will have the opportunity to take part in the debate.

I will speak briefly to new clause 3, as well as amendments Nos. 30 to 32. It is designed to address the issue of disclosure from the register in terms of unlawful activities. First and foremost, I am extremely concerned about the wide powers in clause 19(1), which, to remind the House, says:

"The Secretary of State may, without the individual's consent, provide a person with information recorded in an individual's entry in the Register if . . . the provision of the information is authorised by this section; and . . . there is compliance with any requirements imposed by or under section 23 in relation to the provision of the information."

I am concerned about such wide powers to disclose information held on the register without the consent of registered individuals. The range of eligible authorities under clause 19(2)—the director general of the Security Service, the chief of the Secret Intelligence Service, the director of the Government Communications Headquarters and the director general of the Serious Organised Crime Agency—means that far too wide a register of individuals can be concerned with this. Moreover, the test on what information can be disclosed to such bodies—in other words, "for purposes connected with"—is insufficient. That is why new clause 3 would provide that the "term 'connected with' shall not be construed as meaning that the connection with a particular event is remote or unlikely, but to the contrary, that the connection with an event is significant or that failure to obtain the information from the Register could prejudice an investigation into that event."

4.15 pm

Similarly, the authorisation to disclose information that does not fall within paragraph 9 of schedule 1 to a chief officer of police for the prevention and detection of crime under clause 19(4) is far too wide. I shall not bore hon. Members by talking about that in great detail except to underline that subsection (4) specifies

"in the interests of national security".

New clause 3 tries to redefine that by stating:

"The phrase 'in the interests of national security' shall be construed as meaning that failure to obtain the information from the Register would cause prejudice to the objective of safeguarding national security."

I am concerned that the police could conceivably have information routinely disclosed through the powers of the clause. I also view the disclosure of information that does not fall within paragraph 9 of schedule 1 to a prescribed Department

"for purposes connected with the carrying out of any prescribed functions of that department or of a Minister in charge of it" in clause 19(5) as not tight enough. The provisions need to be much more clearly focused and new clause 3 achieves that.

I am worried about the powers of disclosure in clause 21(2), which would allow disclosure to a person who provides "inaccurate or incomplete information" of the discrepancies between it and the information recorded on the register. Regardless of whether the person who provides the information is an individual who represents himself or herself to an organisation for entitlement or an organisation that requests information to check against what an individual provides, disclosing the discrepancies would be most unwise.

The seventh data protection principle requires data controllers to take appropriate technical and organisational measures against unauthorised or unlawful processing of personal data and against accidental loss, destruction or damage to personal data. Given the importance of the national register and its security and the number of linking organisations, that will be tremendously difficult and technical. Above all, the managerial task, which includes staff vetting, and dealing with the rules and different cultures across the many organisations, will be difficult. To ensure that the principle is met, there should be clear information for users about how their data will be used, processed and transferred. We need unambiguous consent—that is essential—and I believe that new clause 3 would cover that.

I am concerned about the extended powers of disclosure without consent in clause 22. Previous clauses provide an extensive list of personnel, some of whom we have covered, who may get access to an individual's information. However, clause 22 provides the Home Secretary with an opportunity to add people and purposes by order. Again, it is far too slackly defined and bestows far too much power.

Mr. Bercow: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is important in highlighting to the public the scope and dangers of the Bill that we should underline what secondary legislation means? As my hon. Friend well knows, it means that, subsequently, the Government will set up delegated legislation Committees to sit upstairs and consider proposed extensions of power for an hour and a half at most. The Government are contemplating that, and they hope that the public will either not notice or understand and cannot therefore complain.

Patrick Mercer: As usual, my hon. Friend makes a clear and unambiguous point, which we are trying to achieve in new clause 3. We made that point consistently in Committee. I hope that the Government have listened, but I take my hon. Friend's point. If we try to tighten the clause and explain it in unambiguous language, we will get some way towards tackling my hon. Friend's point.

I shall speak briefly to amendments Nos. 30, 31 and 32, which deal with the rules for using information without an individual's consent. Amendment No. 30 would substitute the word "possible" for "reasonably practicable" in clause 23(1). Amendment No. 32 would delete clause 23(3)(c), and amendment No. 31 would add to the clause the sentence:

"The Secretary of State must not make any regulations under this section unless a draft of such regulations has been laid before Parliament and approved by a resolution of each House."

That addresses the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) has just made.

New clause 3 and our other amendments in this group would considerably clarify what is going on, and considerably narrow the scope of the provisions, making them much less likely to be abused.

Mr. Allan: I rise to speak to new clause 6 and amendments Nos. 46 and 47. I shall deal with the amendments briefly, because Government amendments Nos. 54 and 55 seem to deal with the issues involved, which came out of our considerations in Committee. Amendment No. 46 identifies a particular kind of data that Committee veterans will know as "schedule 1, paragraph 9 data". These are the audit data, the trial of information on every time the national identity database has been checked. Significant invasions of privacy could occur as a result of its use, because it could be shown that someone had accessed a public service in a particular place, or been abroad at a certain time, for example. The gathering of this kind of data is most intrusive, and I am pleased that amendment No. 54 seems to accept that it should not be available to be given out under the powers in clause 22.

Amendment No. 47 was important. I asked the Minister in Committee whether he could introduce an order under clause 22 to allow the FBI, Europol or any other external, foreign agency access to the entirety of our national identity database without our consent. He replied in his usual forthright manner that, yes, the existing wording would allow that. I hope that he will now confirm that amendment No. 55—which changes the word "person" to "public authority"—will achieve what we were trying to achieve, namely, that the authority in question would have to be a UK public authority. People are interested to know who will be using the national identity register database, and their legitimate concerns are motivated not by xenophobia but by an interest in whether the bodies that will have access to the data will be accountable under the British constitution and jurisdiction, or whether the provision will extend to external bodies. I hope that the Minister will be able to clarify what is meant by "public authority".

Mr. Browne: I can give the hon. Gentleman the reassurance that he seeks. If I have a chance later, I will expand on that, but I can give him that reassurance now.

Mr. Allan: I am grateful to the Minister.

New clause 6 merits a much longer debate, but I shall spend just a few minutes on it now. It springs from a question that arose in my mind as I was reading Jane's Police Review—my normal bedtime reading—which is a police product review that describes the products that are available to the police. It talks about the use of biometric technology in combination with technology such as closed-circuit TV cameras. This country has more CCTV cameras per head of population than anywhere else. There are 4 million of them out there, and they have their uses. However, one use to which they had not been able to be put, because the technology was not there, was the real-time monitoring of people as they go round the streets. They are used for evidence gathering and deterrence, but if we were to move to such monitoring, it would be a significant change.

Tim Lott writes in the Evening Standard tonight:

"For most of us, liberty is a feeling rather than the difference between jail and freedom—but it is a feeling I value tremendously. The idea of being able to go about my private business without being stopped by a policeman, or observed by a secret camera, strikes me as something many of us so take for granted that we can't imagine what it would be like to lose it."

That is at the heart of this issue: the idea that we could be monitored everywhere we went changes the feeling that we have as we go about our business. We are trying to test that in our proposals, and to understand whether the protections that Parliament has rightly put in place—including the legal safeguards under the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000, which establish who authorises any surveillance, what suspicion has to be shown and what thresholds apply—will apply under the new regime if the Government have their way. Questioning that is justified. Jane's Police Review provides some lovely quotes—for example:

"The co-ordinated national use of intelligent tracking systems . . . which can piggyback onto the CCTV network is viewed within the service as something of a holy grail."

I accept that it may be a holy grail for law enforcement purposes, but it is not necessarily a holy grail for privacy. Throughout this debate, we have tried to argue that law enforcement measures are necessary, but they must always be necessary and proportionate in respect of the invasion of privacy that takes place. It is a delicate balance to strike, and we are trying to establish whether it has gone too far.

Mr. Bill Tynan (Hamilton, South) (Lab): If one of the hon. Gentleman's or my constituents were attacked by a group of youths, and were they to find themselves recorded on CCTV cameras, is he saying that we should not use that for identification, along with national identity cards?

Mr. Allan: The hon. Gentleman has described the kind of circumstances in which, under normal policing procedures, it would be acceptable. I am not seeking to rule out the use of the technology where appropriate; I am trying to establish the bounds of that technology. What would be inappropriate, for example, would be people outside the police service who monitor CCTV cameras having access to the database to monitor everybody going past. There would be temptations for people to seek to abuse that. What I am trying to do, and what the amendment specifically tries to do, is to ask: will the strict legal safeguards that would be in place were the police doing it be applied universally? If the hon. Gentleman is in favour of the cards, as I believe that he is, he needs to assure his constituents that they will be used for the purposes that he intends, and not abused.

Mr. Frank Roy (Motherwell and Wishaw) (Lab): O the question of priority, would the hon. Gentleman priority be the privacy of someone walking the streets the fact that CCTV cameras would enable them to wal the streets safely?

Mr. Allan: The hon. Gentleman has highlighted th balance that we must always strike. We want both, and th two are not necessarily mutually exclusive. A clea principle is established in the Human Rights Act 199 which he and his Government support, whereby breache of privacy can take place if they are necessary an proportionate to that which we are seeking achiev Throughout discussion of the Bill, we have tried t establish where that boundary is. It is possible to have complete surveillance state. It is possible for CCT cameras to scan everybody, with a record of wher everybody in the country is at any particular moment. Th technology will enable that. The decision for us is whethe the benefit of being able to catch additional crimina outweighs the potential loss of privacy and freedom. W are approaching that debate with an open mind, and w are seeking to establish those boundaries in the new claus

Mr. Browne: With an eye to the clock, I want to assur the hon. Gentleman that my view is that the prope interpretation of the Bill, should it become an Act, i relation to its specific purposes and the issue proportionality, would rule out the very use of CCT cameras and such images that he fears. They could no be used under the Act in the way that he fears, wherea they could be used in the way that my hon. Friend th Member for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan) suggests, a he agrees that they should be.

Mr. Allan: If nothing else, the debate has been helpfu for producing that intervention from the Minister.

Mr. Gummer: Does the hon. Gentleman agree tha that is precisely the kind of issue that we should hav discussed in full, so that we would understand th answers? Those of us who are in favour of identity card now find ourselves progressively wanting to vote agains the Bill, simply because we have not had the time t discuss these issues, and our constituents deserve a answer to those questions.

Mr. Allan: I encourage the right hon. Gentleman t continue progressing towards wanting to vote agains this Bill. He is right in saying that, as that is precisel what we have found. As we have explored these issue we have found more and more implications that hav not necessarily been considered. We are asking people t buy into this scheme with their own money—for family to take part in the scheme, they will have to pu their hands in their pockets and pay several hundre pounds. With all the promises made, we do not reall understand the full implications. That is what we hav been trying to tease out, and we still do not have all th answers. The Minister has given some kind of assurance

Mr. Fisher: I suspect that the hon. Gentleman wi agree that we welcome what the Minister has said, but i this a Pepper v. Hart situation? The Minister, wh commands considerable respect in all parts of th House, has said something helpful, but I am not sur that what he has said is in the Bill.

Mr. Allan: It would be useful to have a further 20 minutes to discuss this issue of fundamental importance, about which a number of us feel strongly. Instead, we have 20 seconds, which I will give to the Minister to allow him to do his best or worst.

Mr. Browne: I feel that I must speak to the Government amendments, which are responsive to issues raised in Committee. When clause 22 was debated, I undertook further to consider some of the issues and I have proposed three Government amendments, two of which would make amendment No. 47, tabled by the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan), redundant. Government amendments Nos. 53 and 55 restrict the bodies to whom information can be provided without consent to public authorities, as defined in section 6 of the Human Rights Act—

It being half-past Four o'clock MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair, pursuant to Order [this day].

New clause 3 disagreed to.

It being after half-past Four o'clock, MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER put the remaining Questions required to be put at that hour.

APPLICATIONS RELATING TO ENTRIES IN REGISTER

Amendment proposed: No. 44, in page 4, line 43, at end insert

'(d) state that the individual does not consent to be included in the Register on the basis of the application.'.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The House proceeded to a Division.

Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden) (Con): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether his point of order relates to the Division?

Mr. Lilley: I would be grateful, Madam Deputy Speaker, if you could tell us what we are voting on. Amendment No. 44 does not appear on the list of amendments to be considered.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The sequence of voting is correct. The amendment was under discussion in a previous debate.

The House having divided: Ayes 54, Noes 227.

4.45 pm

Mr. Salmond: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. As you know, no Member is allowed to criticise the Chairman's choice of speaker or amendment, but is that not, in effect, what has just happened in terms of the Government's restriction of time motion? Nine amendments, duly selected by Mr. Speaker or the Chairman of Ways and Means, were down for debate, in order, yet as a result of the timetable motion we have not even been allowed to start that debate. The timetable motion is so restrictive that the Minister did not even have time to introduce them—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I cannot hear. The hon. Member will continue with his point of order.

Mr. Salmond: Those key amendments affect Scotland and Wales. The Minister, who represents Kilmarnock and Loudoun, has arranged for them not to be discussed. Is not that an abuse not just of the House and its procedures but of the Chair? Given that no hon. Member would be allowed to do that, why should the Government be allowed to do it?

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Chair is in no way responsible for the timetable and the programme motion. I am afraid, therefore, that we must follow the programme agreed by the House.

Clause 28

IDENTITY DOCUMENTS FOR THE PURPOSES OF S. 27

Mr. Browne: I beg to move amendment No. 57, in page 25, line 11, at end insert 'or'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 58 to 60 and 75 to 78.

Mr. Browne: During debate in Committee, I undertook to look again at the legal status of the counterpart driving licence, which forms part of the definition of a UK driving licence in clause 28. The clause lists the identity documents to which the clause 27 offences of possessing false identity documents apply. Doubts were raised at the time about whether the counterpart—that is, the paper part of a photographic card driving licence—should be considered an identity document.

On 3 February, I wrote to the Chair of the Committee with the results of my consideration, which I will briefly summarise. Both the photocard licence and the counterpart have to be produced to the police and courts in certain circumstances relating to road traffic offences. Many people of course still hold valid paper driving licences that incorporate the counterpart. However, the Road Safety Bill, currently before Parliament, will enable the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency to create an electronic driving record that will be available to the police. The legislation includes a provision to remove references to the counterpart in existing legislation. It is anticipated that the Bill, if enacted, would not come into force until about 2007 or 2008.

In view of the intention to abolish the counterpart licence, I have decided that we should simplify the definition of a UK driving licence by removing it from clause 28(3)(c) in respect of that offence. I therefore invite the House to agree to the amendment.

Government amendments Nos. 59 and 60 bring the commissioner and his staff within the remit of the clause 29 offence of unauthorised disclosure of information. Disclosures made as part of the commissioner's functions will not be caught by the offence, but clearly it would be unacceptable for the commissioner's staff to make unauthorised disclosures of information to which they had access as a result of their employment. I see no reason why such behaviour should not be criminalised. It is therefore right that the clause 29 offence should be extended in the way proposed in Government amendments Nos. 59 and 60, and I invite the House to accept them.

Government amendments Nos. 75, 76 and 78 restructure the offence in clause 31 of tampering with the register and Government amendment No. 77 is a technical amendment which replaces "is" with "may be". It is not intended to be a substantial change. The effect of amendments Nos. 75, 76 and 78 is to make it clearer that it is a defence to a charge under this clause to have an honest and reasonable, albeit mistaken, belief that the modification made to the register was authorised. The way in which a prosecution under clause 31 would work is as follows. The prosecution would have to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the defendant caused a modification of the register and that the modification was unauthorised. "Unauthorised" is a term defined in subsection (5); it is an objective concept.

It would be a defence for a defendant to show on the balance of probabilities that, notwithstanding the lack of objective authority, he held a reasonable subjective belief that the modification was authorised. I consider that the amendments structure the offence in a clearer way, and I urge hon. Members to support them.

I have nothing further to add on this group of amendments and I commend them to the House.

Patrick Mercer: I am grateful to the Minister. There were times in Committee when it seemed that we were making no progress and that nothing at all was being given by the Minister. Therefore, much of what he has just said meets with our approval, especially about amendment No. 57, which relates to clause 28 and the driving licence. It strikes me as a helpful and sensible way forward. I suggest that our amendment No. 41 would have been clearer, simpler and probably easier than Government amendments Nos. 59 and 60, which achieve the same end.

Everything that the Minister says about so-called whistleblowers and public interest disclosures makes a great deal of sense. We dwelt on that quite long enough in Committee to show how important it was. I broadly welcome what he has said.

Mr. Allan: I echo the hon. Gentleman's comments. This is an example of constructive Committee work. We had to go through the clauses to which these amendments relate fairly quickly. It would have been good to spend a little more time on them in Committee. The issues that we picked up are ones that the Government have accepted.

I raised the issue of the counterpart driving licence as much as anything so that I could highlight the ridiculous system for getting a replacement driving licence. If one loses the whole licence, it is considerably easier to get a replacement than if one loses one part of it. The Minister has told us today that there is a broader solution to that, which will filter its way through to the provisions in the Bill, and has tabled amendments for that purpose. That is entirely welcome.

The hon. Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer) raised the point about whistleblowing or public interest disclosure. We feel that it is an important one. People should be able to report abuses of the system. We felt we had good reason for that because there have been abuses of other systems such as the police national computer, and they have resulted in prosecutions. Fortunately, they are few and far between, but when they occur it is important that no one feels legally constrained in making allegations if they are justified.

Both sets of amendments are thoroughly welcome and non-contentious. I hazard to suggest that if we had longer in Committee we could have made even more helpful suggestions to improve a Bill that the Liberal Democrats do not want to see go through, but wish to do what they can to make it less bad.

Mr. Browne: I wish to take a few more minutes of the House's time to put on record how grateful I am to the hon. Members for Newark (Patrick Mercer) and for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) for their constructive response. As this may be the last opportunity that I have to speak to the Bill in the House—it may not; we do not know—I wish to say that I appreciate the constructive way in which the Committee conducted most of its work. I greatly appreciated the atmosphere in which its work was done, even when I did not think that significant progress was being made—and that was a comparatively short period.

[Mr. Browne]

The Government amendments contain examples of the Government listening to constructive criticism and responding, and I hope that that response has improved the Bill. I am particularly proud of the Bill for the paucity of Government amendments that had to be introduced unprompted by the Committee. That is a credit to the officials and the draftsmanship of the Bill, as well as the pre-legislative scrutiny that it received.

Mr. Malins: I am grateful to the Minister for the way that he is speaking. He may remember that he offered a bet to each of us who served on the Committee that the Government would introduce fewer amendments than could be counted on the fingers of one hand. We thought that each of us would win a bottle of champagne if the number exceeded three or four. I wonder whether he can help us.

Mr. Browne: The hon. Gentleman has a selective memory. Part of what he remembers is correct, but we will need to check the Official Report to find out whether his memory is comprehensive. I think that I made a rash prediction that a smaller number than this very small number of Government amendments would be introduced. I should not have underestimated the persuasive powers of the hon. Gentleman and other members of the Committee.

Mr. Bercow: I hope that the Minister will accept in a positive spirit that the scale of what is required from his pocket should be roughly in proportion to the scale by which the Government have exceeded the number of amendments that he originally envisaged introducing. On my mathematics, the Government have introduced no fewer than 12 amendments. In other words, they have introduced four times as many as he had in mind. That seems to suggest that, ethically, he should buy at least four bottles of champagne for the members of the Opposition Front-Bench team.

Mr. Browne: Given the history of Government amendments under Governments of all colours and the fact that there are only 12 Government amendments to a Bill with 45 clauses and two schedules, perhaps I should suggest to the hon. Gentleman that the drinks should be on him.

Order for Third Reading read.—[Queen's Consent, on behalf of the Crown, signified.]

4.58 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Charles Clarke): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

I begin, on behalf of the Government, by thanking all those who have worked hard to bring the Bill to this stage. I associate myself entirely with the comments made by my hon. Friend the Minister for Citizenship and Immigration in commending the work of the Joint Committee and hon. Members from all parties who contributed to that. I thank officials in the Home Office for the consistent and coherent work that they have done over a long time. I also thank the staff of the House for their work to bring the Bill to this stage.

The time has now come for the House to agree that we need the benefits and safeguards that an identity card system will provide both to individuals, who will be able to prove their identities securely and reliably, and in the wider public interest. Rather than seeing identity cards as a threat to civil liberties, most people now regard them as essential to safeguard our civil liberties.

Lynne Jones: My right hon. Friend says that an advantage of the scheme is that it will allow people to secure their identity. However, we do not know about the form or accuracy of the biometrics that the Government will demand, or how secure the database will be, so how can he have such confidence before the assessment work has been done?

Mr. Clarke: An assessment is under way on the different forms of biometrics that could be used, such as fingerprints, iris examinations and photographs. I am confident that, as in many countries throughout the world, the biometric regime that we establish will provide the security that people rightly look for.

The Bill has been given proper scrutiny. Indeed, in preparation for the legislation, we started a six-month public consultation exercise in 2002.

Mr. Hogg: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Clarke: I will not give way at the moment.

The Home Affairs Committee started an inquiry in 2003, and there was further consultation on a draft Bill in 2004. Changes have been made to the Bill, and I assure the House that I shall continue to listen to, and act on, constructive comments on plans for delivering the identity card scheme after this enabling Bill has completed its passage through Parliament. It is our intention that the first ID cards will be issued in 2008, and there will be further opportunities between now and then for the House to examine the detailed provisions to be set out in secondary legislation.

Mr. Salmond: How can the Home Secretary claim that the Bill has been given proper scrutiny when seven amendments, including all those specifically relating to Scotland and Wales, were not debated in Committee or on Report as a result of the Government's programme motion?

Mr. Clarke: I can claim that the Bill has been given proper scrutiny for exactly the reasons that I set out a moment ago. There has been a long-standing debate about the issues, and a range of discussions on the specific matters that have been taken forward has been held in the Chamber and in Committee.

The simple fact is that the possession of a clear, unequivocal and unique form of identity in the shape of a card that is linked to a database holding biometrics will offer clear benefits to us all. Such benefits include the prevention of terrorist activity, the proper control of immigration and illegal working, help for the more efficient and effective provision of public services, and specific measures to deal with crime. That is why recent surveys show that 80 per cent. of the public support the introduction of identity cards.

Biometrics are being developed around the world to improve the security and reliability of identity documents, including fingerprint biometrics on visas and our own biometric passports with a facial image biometric that will be introduced in about a year's time. The scheme will not create threats to privacy or change the way in which we live our lives. We have never proposed a scheme under which it would be compulsory to carry a card.

Lembit Öpik: I want to pin down the Secretary of State on the question of terrorism. Will he explain exactly how a voluntary identity card will protect us against terrorism? If identity cards are to become compulsory in 10 years, does he think that the war on terror will still be being fought in 2015?

Mr. Clarke: We dealt with that on Second Reading, but let me go back to the core points. There is no guarantee that any scheme—identity cards or anything else—will be able to deal with and eliminate the terrorist threat. There is no silver bullet to solve the problem. However, identity theft and fraud represent a significant modus operandi for those involved in terrorism, serious and organised crime, people trafficking and drug dealing. The fact that we will have an identity card scheme will give us the capacity to attack the problem that would not otherwise exist. It is true that a compulsory card would give us more power to attack the problem than a voluntary card, but it is also true that a voluntary card gives us more capacity to attack the problem than we have at present. I think most people acknowledge that that is true.

It is, moreover, the case that ID cards will help in tackling fraud and will save tens of millions of pounds of taxpayers' money. The Government have proceeded in a measured way by consulting on the principles and, most recently, on the draft legislation. The Bill sets out a clear legal framework for the scheme. It provides a means for everyone legally resident in the country to assert their right to be here and to help them gain access to the services to which they are entitled. It will help preserve national security and assist the work of law enforcement. It will enable the public to have the ID card system that they say they want.

Those are the reasons why people in all parties have supported the legislation. In an article in The Daily Telegraph on 20 December 2004, the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), the Leader of the Opposition, said:

"I have listened to the police and security service chiefs. They have told me that ID cards can and will help their efforts to protect the lives of British citizens against terrorist acts. How can I disregard that? We must protect our citizen in every way, and in my judgment that includes ID cards."

In that same article of a couple of months ago or less, he went on to write:

"In my first speech as Leader of the Opposition, I would not oppose Government policy just for the sake of opposition. It is wrong to sacrifice the national interest for political expediency."

I applauded those remarks at the time and wish that they had been carried through. They reflected previous remarks also by the right hon. and learned Gentleman. On 23 September 2001, he wrote in the News of the World:

"Britain is the easiest country in western Europe in which criminals and terrorists can lose themselves. If we are serious about tackling this problem, there is one obvious remedy: identity cards."

Even earlier, in 1994, at the Conservative party conference, he said:

"In time, carrying your ID card would seem as natural as carrying a credit card is at the moment."

Perhaps that is why the 1997 Conservative party manifesto had a commitment to introduce ID cards.

I find it utterly extraordinary that the Opposition have decided to abstain on this vital issue, affecting the future of the nation.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): I can assure the Home Secretary that a number of Conservative Members have no intention of abstaining. We voted against the Bill on Second Reading and have every intention of doing so this evening, because his proposal is a serious invasion of the civil liberties of the people of this country.

Mr. Clarke: To be candid, the hon. Gentleman has more to say for his position than his Front-Bench colleagues. The fact is that some people—he is one of them, and some of my Labour colleagues agree with him—have issues of principle with ID cards and find it difficult to support them for the reason that he identified.

David Winnick: Will my right hon. Friend distinguish between the opportunist position of the Conservative party and those of us who oppose ID cards in principle but would change our minds—certainly I would, without the slightest hesitation—if we thought that they would help in the fight against international terrorism? I hope he recognises that although my opposition is based on principle, it would change were I so persuaded.

Mr. Clarke: I accept that distinction, which I have sought to make, including in evidence to the Home Affairs Committee earlier this week. Some people, for reasons that I respect but with which I do not agree, think that ID cards pose such a threat to our civil liberties that it is necessary to oppose them. Those people exist on both sides of the House. They are entitled to take that position to a vote and to carry it through.

My point is different, however. The Government and, in my opinion, the Opposition have to assess, when considering national security, precisely the balance of issues, as described by my hon. Friend, that arise from ID cards. The Government have made that assessment and believe that the ID card is in the interest of the country. The Leader of the Opposition made that same assessment and came to the conclusions that I quoted, but he has now decided to abstain—not to vote against, not to vote in favour—on this key national issue, and abstention is not an honourable position. I believe there is a reason—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. The right hon. Gentleman must be very careful about impugning the honour of any other right hon. or hon. Member.

Mr. Clarke: I beg your pardon, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and that of the House. I was not intending to impugn the honour, in the parliamentary sense, of the Opposition or of anyone else. I withdraw that word at your request.

It is not defensible, however, for an Opposition party or a Government party to abstain on an issue of this sort. There is a clear reason for the abstention. It is that the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis), who I am delighted to see in his place—he has forgone his chance to be at the shadow Cabinet meeting in Manchester with the Leader of the Opposition, perhaps to undermine the right hon. and learned Gentleman's position even further—has been clear about his scepticism of ID cards in a variety of different ways. The truth is that he has rolled over his leader and reached an abstention position. That is the reality. I say that that is not defensible.

Dr. Palmer: I may be able to help my right hon. Friend. My Conservative opponent in my constituency was until recently the press spokesperson for the Leader of the Opposition. He says that his position is that he is opposed to ID cards in principle but that if they are required for international travel he might be persuaded otherwise. Does my right hon. Friend hope that we can yet persuade the Opposition to do a second U-turn?

Mr. Clarke: I shall be even more candid than I was earlier. I have that hope. I ask the Opposition to reconsider their position. The position of abstention is not defensible, in my view, for a serious political party. It has an implication that is of meaning. When the other place considers the proposed legislation, if there is not agreement from the official Opposition there are real issues about whether the Bill can be brought into effect in this Session, were a dissolution to be sought. The normal wash-up issues would arise, but a decision of the Conservative party to oppose the Bill in the other place would lead to a delay in carrying forward this important measure for the security of the country.

Mr. Gummer: Does the right hon. Gentleman remember that I voted for and spoke in favour of the Bill on Second Reading? I attended all the debates on the Bill to seek to continue that support. I have to tell him that the way in which he treated the House—the failure to enable me to ask a number of questions on key issues and the time given, which did not allow his junior Minister to respond to many of the debates—has led me to believe that indeed we should act differently, and I shall vote against the Bill.

Mr. Clarke: Those right hon. and hon. Members who come to the view that they must cast their vote against, either for the reasons just given by the right hon. Gentleman or by others, are taking a position that I can understand, although I do not agree with it. I cannot understand those who say, "We shall abstain on this key issue that is facing the country." I believe that it is a matter of internal politics within the main Opposition party and a betrayal of the interests of the country. If, in the final event, we are not able to carry through the proposed legislation in this Session, we will know clearly that that is because of the decision taken by the Opposition—their decision to put peace within their party ahead of the national interest.

I commend the Bill to the House.

5.13 pm

David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden) (Con): So much for the constructive and open debate on liberty and freedom and on security of the state that the Home Secretary was so keen to tell us we would have when we talked about identity cards and house arrest, an issue on which he is in even more trouble.I join him, at least in one respect, in thanking those right hon. and hon. Members who have taken part in consideration of the Bill in Committee and on Report. At the same time, I sympathise with them in what must have been the most frustrating process of their political lives.

The Bill attempts to strike a balance involving a number of extremely serious issues: individual privacy, the relationship of the citizen and the state versus security, prevention of fraud, control of immigration and a number of other serious issues. That is why I set some tests for the Bill on Second Reading. I did not just want to test individual practicalities but to establish the balance between those principles and the Bill's competence to achieve some of the things that the Home Secretary talked about. A competent Bill would do what he said and that would, as the hon. Member for Walsall, North (David Winnick) said, have a significant effect in improving security. It would make a minimum intrusion into the liberty and privacy of the individual, and there would be strong safeguards where such intrusions proved necessary. An incompetent Bill would have a weak or non-existent impact on security, the prevention of fraud and the control of immigration. It would prove highly expensive and too intrusive into liberties, and would provide few effective safeguards for those liberties.

The point of those five tests is to establish, as I said, the balance or imbalance between those serious principles which matter, as the Home Secretary rightly said, and the competence or incompetence of the proposal. Having read all the Hansard reports of the Committee and listened to today's debate, which I attended when I could, I do not think that we have had a real or persuasive answer to any of the tests. It is not only our questions that remain unanswered. The Joint Committee on Human Rights said on page five of its report on the Bill:

"Explanatory notes to the Bill have been published. They do not, however, contain any explanation of the Government's reasons for believing the Bill to be compatible with the Convention rights."

The next part is important:

"We consider the absence of such an explanation to be deeply unsatisfactory in a Bill which is concerned throughout with issues of personal privacy, and with the delicate balances to be struck between individual rights to private life and the protection of the community."

That is not the stated view of the Conservative party but of the important and distinguished all-party Joint Committee on Human Rights. We are not the only ones to have reached the conclusion that we have had a dreadfully inadequate set of answers to an important set of questions as well as dreadfully inadequate time in which to debate those questions.

Mr. Chris Mole (Ipswich) (Lab): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

David Davis: The hon. Gentleman has not been here all day, so he is not qualified to comment on the Bill, as he lacks the information or attendance record to do so.

The first test in that important series of tests deals with clarity of purpose. That matters, because it has implications for every other aspect of the Bill. As I said at the outset I, like the hon. Member for Walsall, would be persuaded as a sceptic to support the measure if it had the aim of dealing with terrorism. We tried to include that aim in the Bill, but we failed because the Government refused to do so. We tried to make the priorities explicit, but Ministers refused. Foreign travellers, particularly from the European Union, can come here under EU rules without identification for three months, which means that the Bill is quite inadequate for use as an anti-terrorism measure, unless we have a way of dealing with that problem. The common travel area is another problem, as is the issue of Ireland, which I shall address in a moment. Those issues may be soluble, but there has not been a single attempt to answer our questions. If identity cards are an anti-terrorism measure, it should be made compulsory to carry them, otherwise they will not work. I do not want to have such a compulsory card in this country. As has been said, we do not want to hear our policemen saying, "Papers please, citizen". However, there has been not been any attempt to answer the problem.

The Bill could have been used to tackle illegal working but before we introduce a draconian measure we should try everything else first. For several years under this Government, under legislation that the Conservatives passed to make the employment of illegal immigrant workers a crime, there was one successful conviction a year. Only after the tragedy at Morecambe bay and the brave campaign of the hon. Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale (Geraldine Smith)—she is a Labour Member, but I am happy to give her credit—and, I am afraid, a campaign by my party on the failure of Government policy that led to the departure of a Minister, have we gone from one conviction a year to well over 600 operations a year against employers of illegal immigrant workers. That is what must be done first: instead of throwing away liberties, the Government should do their job.

On benefit fraud, we have again not been told all. The Home Secretary told us that the provisions will save us tens of millions of pounds; the cost of the scheme may be tens of billions of pounds. I hope that he is never Chancellor, because with that sort of return on capital, the Government will go bankrupt very quickly.

Mr. Charles Clarke: Black Wednesday.

David Davis: Those claims have been discounted recently, I notice, but I am happy to recognise the single success of the Government's freedom of information programme so far.

The primary problem is not concealment of identity, but concealment of circumstance, of which my right hon. Friend the Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley), the former Secretary of State for Social Security, was only too well aware during his review of the issue during the 1990s.

We have had no answers. On illegal immigration, which was raised on Report today, my hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Malins) made the very good point that nine tenths of the issue is dealt with by the asylum identity card—a registered card. So we have 90 per cent. of the solution for 1 per cent. of the grief.

My point to the Government is that those questions could have been answered in Committee, but no attempt was made to give an answer. Why? It is hard to understand why, unless the Government do not believe their own case or their supposed reasons for the ID card. That is very worrying, and it is more worrying in many ways than other points that I shall raise in a moment.

Dr. Palmer: The right hon. Gentleman says that his position is consistent: the Conservative party supports ID cards, but on condition that these questions are answered. He says that it would be possible to answer them, but he feels that the Government have not done so. Does that mean that a Conservative Government would answer their own questions and introduce ID cards?

David Davis: The hon. Gentleman should not put words in my mouth. If I wanted someone to rearticulate my views, I would not pick him.

What have we heard today? We have heard from the Home Secretary—I think that I am quoting him correctly—that this issue shows that the Tory party is "soft on crime, soft on immigration, soft on terror." We will let the public decide the plausibility of that proposal. In many ways, I would worry more about being called stupid on crime, stupid on immigration and stupid on terror, which is the risk if we do not get the matter right. That is the point: we must get it right. It is a question not of being pro or anti a particular matter, but of getting the issue right.

I have to say that this is a very poor start to the Home Secretary's serious debate on liberty and security, because this issue is one of the key components of that debate; indeed, perhaps it is the most important one. Let us go on to the second test, which concerns technology.

Mr. Bercow: Is there any chance of anyone else speaking in this debate?

David Davis: I beg my hon. Friend's pardon; I shall be as quick as I can.

The second test is important, and I shall quote the Home Affairs Committee, which said that it is "essential that, before the system is given final approval, there should be exhaustive testing of the reliability and security of the biometrics chosen, and that the results of those tests should be made available to expert independent scrutiny, perhaps led by the Government's Chief Scientific Adviser."

Again, we put that point into an amendment, which the Government turned down. Not only the Home Affairs Committee, but Privacy International and the Association for Payment Clearing Services have raised concerns.

David Davis: No, I will not give way because I am pressed for time.

The next issue is the high value of the database, which will be an extremely large target that will attract attack. Putting aside the weaknesses on biometrics, the Government have not even tried to answer how they will prevent those attacks, which will destroy the system.

Test three concerns cost, which has gone from £1.2 billion to £3.5 billion to £5.5 billion. Conventional wisdom puts the overall cost somewhere between £10 billion and £20 billion. Bart Vansevenant, the director of the organisation that runs Belgium's ID card system, has said that

"the amount of people you catch will not be worth the price of the infrastructure . . . If you look at this from a distance and look at the goal, I'm afraid a lot of money will be wasted and the real cost will be much higher than any of the figures currently suggested."

How will the Government control the cost? They do not have a good track record. Would that money be better spent on trying to stop illegal immigration, terrorism and benefit fraud?

The final issue concerns civil liberties and privacy. In the words of the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher), this is the "largest change in relationship between the individual and the state". Richard Thomas, the Information Commissioner, has said:

"There are huge questions about access to the national identity register: who has access to it, for what sorts of purposes, and how is that information to be used".

As the debate has progressed, it has become increasingly apparent that many organisations—more than we thought—will have access to the database, which means that the scope for unauthorised access will be unmanageable. There is even the possibility that the data must be shared with other countries such as Ireland, because of the common travel area.

Mr. Shepherd: The Home Secretary introduced a new concept in his winding-up speech, during which he would not take an intervention. He said that his card will enable us to "assert the right to be here". I do not know what that means. Is he telling my constituents and the people of Britain that they have no right to be here unless they assert it through his means of an ID card?

David Davis: My hon. Friend makes the same point as the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central. ID cards involve a completely new view of citizenship. Being a subject of the Crown is a right, which it is not for the Government to give or take away.

The Bill deals with massively important issues, and we have adopted a constructive approach. The Government have denied us time for debate and answers to proper questions, and they have even delayed the response to the Joint Committee on Human Rights. This House has had no chance to consider the Bill, but the Home Secretary promised a serious and constructive debate on security and human rights.

David Davis: I will not give way because I am about to finish. I heard what the Minister had to say earlier, and I thought it a weak response to the issue.

The Government have denied debate and treated this House with contempt. I will recommend that my hon. Friends in the other place commend the Bill to a Joint Committee to answer the unanswered questions. Until that point, I cannot recommend that my hon. Friends should vote for the Bill.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): It is a pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis), who just made the speech that he wanted to make on Second Reading, but was not allowed to—his speech was better late than never and it was a pleasure to hear it tonight. He was Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee in the previous Parliament and he knows a lot about systems and what can go wrong with them, so the warning that he has issued again tonight is appropriate.

The Liberal Democrat position is based on both principle and practice. At various points, it has been put to us that those two ideas are contradictory and that one must oppose the Bill on the grounds of either principle or practice. However, some policies are so flawed and so offensive that one can oppose them on the grounds of both principle and practice, and tonight's debate is such an occasion.

The Minister has challenged us a number of times to discuss the issues of principle, and I thank him for those challenges, which were appropriate. I boil the matter down to the extent to which one values privacy. Article 8 of the European convention on human rights concerns privacy. It states that states have the right to breach the right to privacy, where such a breach is necessary and proportional to the end that they are trying to achieve. That clearly shows that there is no absolute right to privacy and that it can be breached under certain circumstances. Nevertheless, a threshold needs to be set. The Liberal Democrat view is that the Minister's ID card proposals do not meet that threshold, and that the benefits he suggests—if they can be realised—are not sufficient to outweigh the disbenefits, in terms of the cost to the privacy of citizens of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Browne: Before the hon. Gentleman moves off this subject, can he tell the House which of the 21 out of 25 members of the European Union that are social democracies are also breaching that article of the European convention on human rights—some of them with compulsory ID card schemes that require people to carry them?

Mr. Allan: The Minister certificated the Bill as being compatible with the European convention on human rights. There are elements that may be compatible, but there is a variation in the threshold that one may apply. There is a political difference here between Liberal Democrat and Labour Members and, indeed, between Conservative Front Benchers, because we set the threshold at a different level. That is a political judgment; both a legal and a political judgment needs to be made in this respect.

Lynne Jones: The point made by my hon. Friend the Minister was covered by the report of the Joint Committee on Human Rights, which states that "an identity card containing only a person's name, sex, date and place of birth, current address, and the name of their spouse, does not in itself raise issues of the right to private life under Article 8 . . . Neither does the obligation to hold or carry such a card engage Article 8."

Nevertheless, the Committee went on to make serious criticisms of the Government's proposals.

Mr. Allan: The hon. Lady is right to remind us that the scheme being put forward is not necessarily comparable to ID card systems in other countries and goes a lot further. The hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) referred to the Home Secretary's unfortunate turn of phrase when he said that the cards will allow people to assert their right to be in the United Kingdom.

The Government are essentially proposing to put us all on a criminal intelligence database and to treat us all as potential suspects. That creates a fundamental change in the relationship between state and citizen. The scope of the database that the Government propose is far more comprehensive than any that has been suggested elsewhere. Indeed, the Minister has said at various points that the scheme that he is putting forward is bigger and more complex than anyone else's. He said that with a certain note of pride, and then with a slightly hysterical look of fear as we came to consider the implications of doing something more comprehensive than is to be found anywhere else.

Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey) (LD): Another paradox, and therefore a failure to justify the scheme, is that whereas British citizens—people who have never had to prove to the state their right to be here—will have to have the cards, people who come here with no right to be here will not. That seems to be one of those ridiculous examples that identifies the fundamental flaws.

Mr. Allan: My hon. Friend's intervention is helpful.

I should like to nail a red herring, if one can nail a herring, in relation to whether one has to carry the cards compulsorily. We debated that in Committee. Most of us carry our irises and fingers wherever we go. The point about being on the database is that people can be checked against it wherever they go—whether they have their ID card with them is immaterial. The fundamental question is the extent to which the benefits derived in terms of catching people involved with terrorism and crime—something with which we agree—are so great as to justify holding all that data, and presumably using it and checking it regularly. Are those benefits worth the disbenefits of a citizen having to pay, having to go through the inconvenience, and having the potential loss of privacy? We come to a different judgment from the Government, and have consistently done so throughout proceedings on the Bill.

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): My hon. Friend makes a powerful case against the Bill. He mentioned inconvenience. My constituents, many of whom live on islands, will be faced with great inconvenience if they are forced to go to Glasgow to get biometrics taken for their ID cards. The Secretary of State for Scotland has said that the Home Office is considering a mobile facility, but that will take ages and it will cost a huge amount to go round the highlands and islands. The Government have not answered those questions at all.

Mr. Allan: My hon. Friend helpfully moves me on to the significant practical considerations. The Government have tried to write off or trivialise the matter. They have talked down the costs and suggested that they will be less than they are, but whatever happens, they will be several billion pounds more than zero. They have talked down the costs and the inconvenience. It could cost several hundred pounds for a family of four adults in a remote area of Scotland who simply want to renew their passports to go on holiday by the time they have travelled to a centre, had the biometrics taken and paid for the documents. That is a significant change from the current position, and the Government have not made enough of it.

Mr. Browne: The hon. Gentleman's party now supports the policy of biometrics in passports.

Mr. Allan: The Minister knows that only facial biometrics, which can be taken from a photograph, are required for a passport. That is different from the proposals for irises and fingerprints.

I know that some hon. Members support identity cards but I urge all hon. Members, whatever their views on the cards, to vote against the Bill. The scheme that the Bill presents is simply not ready. If we proceeded with an identity card scheme, we should start by going ahead with some sort of passport biometric—we are told that we must do that for international reasons—but at a much lower level than the Government suggest. We should test the technology for several years to ascertain how it works.

We should move on to getting our NHS medical records database right because that gives immediate benefits to the citizen and would allow us to establish whether we could securely give access to systems at multiple points of contact with our public services. We should then get our national insurance records system right and ensure that there is one number per person in the country so that we can establish whether we are genuinely competent to run such identification regimes. We need to take those steps first and demonstrate that we can fulfil all those tasks before we consider an identity card scheme.

If the Government approached us in four or five years, we could have a reasoned debate about the matter. Even the Government say that the card will be pointless. In a couple of years, they will tell people to pay money and go through all the hassle to get their passports for something that is functionally pointless because a passport is good enough; an identity card as well would be unnecessary. The system and the scheme may change in the intervening period. We are being asked to buy a pig in a poke.

Even if hon. Members support identity cards, they should seriously consider whether they want to support the Bill. It is clearly being introduced for political reasons. It is outrageous of the Home Secretary to say that, if the Conservatives vote against something that will not be effected for several years, it makes them the friends of the terrorists. That accusation is normally made against us. It is an absurd assertion.

Simon Hughes: Will my hon. Friend give way one more time?

Mr. Allan: No. If hon. Members believe that the Bill does not pass the tests of proportionality and necessity and that too much uncertainty remains about exactly what we are being asked to buy and how much it will cost; and if hon. Members believe that any additional money for which Parliament asks from citizens could be better spent on other measures to achieve the same objectives, I urge them to vote against the Bill.

Dr. Palmer: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Earlier, the Opposition spokesman criticised the Government.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I can already sense that it is not a point of order but a point of debate.

Dr. Palmer rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I shall let the hon. Member try again, but I hope that he will not take up too much time.

Dr. Palmer: Will you confirm, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that new clause 2 was not selected by the Speaker and that that is the reason why it was not debated?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The record will show that. This particular occupant of the Chair does not have such recall, but I am sure that the record will show whether that is correct.

5.38 pm

Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow) (Lab): I shall be brief because I know that other hon. Members want to speak. My position has always been clear. I voted against the Bill on Second Reading and the more I hear about it, the less I like it. I shall vote against it again this evening.

I agree with one point that the Home Secretary made. I do not agree with much that he said about the measure but he was right about the Tory Front-Bench position. It is pathetic not to be able to reach a decision about whether to vote for or against such an important measure on Third Reading. We have had a limited time for debate this afternoon, but what are the reasons for that? The usual Front-Bench channels made agreements to discuss the measure on a Thursday, when there is one less hour for debate, so those on the Tory Front Bench are shedding crocodile tears.

Listening to the debates on some of the amendments this afternoon, I felt as though I was listening to discussions about angels on pinheads, because, however we amend the Bill, we cannot make it acceptable. What it sets out to do is fundamentally objectionable. The Joint Committee on Human Rights raised a host of objections to it, and I have just had a brief chance to read through the Government's response to them. It does not really answer them.

On Second Reading, we debated issues such as whether the cards would become compulsory. I am absolutely sure that it will become compulsory to have this card, because the Home Secretary said on Second Reading that this was the first step towards compulsion. We also discussed disclosure to service providers, the police and people in the private sector, and the audit trail that will exist. The real problem with this measure will be the register, rather than having to carry a card.

The public's view on this will change. At the moment, we might find 80 per cent. of people saying that they support the measure, but once they realise that they are going to have to have these things, their view will change. Once the next, short step is taken, as I believe it undoubtedly will be, and carrying the card becomes compulsory, public opinion will certainly shift. We are going down a very dangerous road.

Everyone here knows which people will be the most likely to be asked to produce their card when it becomes compulsory to carry one. All the evidence from every European country that has cards—including those where they are voluntary—shows that the people who are most often asked to produce their card are from minority ethnic communities. To pretend, as the Government did in their race relations assessment, that this measure will actually improve race relations, strikes me as absurd.

I do not like enabling legislation of this kind. A mass of detail remains to be introduced in secondary legislation, which means that it will never be properly debated in this place. Of course, we cannot amend secondary legislation, so whatever form it takes, we shall just have to take it or leave it. I am also unconvinced that the Home Office can produce information technology infrastructure that will work, which could perhaps be the saving grace in all this. This concept is fundamentally flawed in principle, and we should not be going down this road.

5.42 pm

Mr. Hogg: I entirely agree with the speech that we have just heard from the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard). Indeed, he made his points with a great clarity that I could not surpass. I shall confine myself to speaking for just a few minutes.

It is not right to say that the Bill has been properly debated. The Home Secretary is wrong about that. Had he been present during the Report stage, he would have appreciated that fact. He has only to look at early-day motion 684, which has been signed by many of his hon. Friends, to see what was omitted in Committee.

I am perfectly willing to accept that there are some benefits to be gained from identification cards. The question is: how do they weigh in the balance with the disadvantages? I agree entirely that the money involved in this provision could be spent very much better in dealing with its stated objectives differently. I am extremely sceptical about the ability of the technology to deliver, and, if it fails, very serious injustice could result. I question whether the measures will address the questions of terrorism or serious fraud, because a high proportion of such cases rest on questions not of concealed identity but of concealed circumstances or concealed intentions.

On matters of principle, I shall confine myself to two points. First, I believe that this represents a huge extension of statism. We are changing the relationship between the individual and the state, and we should not do that without a really compelling reason.

Secondly, I entirely agree with the point made by the hon. Member for Walthamstow. Inevitably, what will happen down the track if this policy is to be made effective is that the citizen will have to carry and produce an identity card on demand. He is entirely right that that will bear down most oppressively on the ethnic minority communities.

I have been in the House long enough to remember the old sus laws and what rows they caused. I do not wish to create a situation in which the ordinary citizen can be arrested for not carrying a card. That is the inevitable consequence of that which we do today. It is wrong in principle. I hope that my party will change its mind and vote against this Bill.

5.45 pm

Mr. Liam Byrne (Birmingham, Hodge Hill) (Lab): I want to speak in favour of the Bill. It is supported overwhelmingly by more than 90 per cent. of my constituents in Hodge Hill. They will be surprised and disappointed to hear about the Liberal Democrat and Conservative position tonight. Not too long ago, Liberal Democrat Front-Bench Members voted in favour of a ten-minute Bill supporting the principle of ID cards. They will also remember that more than a decade ago, the Leader of the Opposition, as he is now, said to his party conference:

"In time, carrying an ID card would seem as natural as carrying a credit card."

My constituents will be particularly perplexed to hear the Liberal Democrat position that this money would be best spent on police, because this is not public money. This is money raised from individual contributions. No one in the House would seriously propose that one should finance the police by passing a hat around in the community and hiring as many police officers as one could afford from what is left in the pot. That is the implication, however, of the Liberal Democrat policy in this area.

Mr. Allan: Will the hon. Gentleman remind us what the Prime Minister said about ID cards at the same time?

Mr. Byrne: Can I remind the hon. Gentleman what his colleague the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) said in the police revenue debate last week? He said that his answer was "to relate the policing of an area directly to the amount that people pay to support that policing." [Official Report, 2 February 2005, Vol. 430, c. 885.]

He was unable to refute the charge that that would end up with rich communities hiring more police while the rest of us were left in the lurch.

People in Hodge Hill see three clear reasons why this Bill deserves their support: it is a fast track to a fairer deal in public services; it is the best means that we have for tackling illegal immigration; and it is another spoke in the wheel for tackling global terrorism.

Many Members will have read the report of the 9/11 commission and will have seen, like me, the conclusion:

"For terrorists, travel documents are as important as weapons. Terrorists must travel clandestinely to meet, train, plan, case targets, and gain access to attack."

The report continued:

"We found that as many as 15 of the 19 hijackers were potentially vulnerable to interception by ... authorities."

That is exactly the kind of development that ID cards will allow, and that is why the proposal deserves commendation from both sides of the House.

5.48 pm

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (Con): I shall vote in principle against the Bill tonight. I shall do so because it fails to meet the four tests enunciated excellently by my right hon. Friend the shadow Home Secretary. It will not protect civil liberties, it will not work to curb terrorism, it will not be cost-effective and I have serious doubts as to whether the Home Office is in any event capable of implementing it within any kind of meaningful time frame.

I am proud that my predecessor as Member of Parliament for Gainsborough, Harry Crookshank, when Postmaster General, four months after the Conservatives won the 1951 election, abolished ID cards. He came to the House and said that the Conservative Government believe that "it is no longer necessary to require the public to possess and produce an identity card, or to notify change of address for National Registration purposes." [Official Report, 21 February 1952, Vol. 496, c. 415.]

That was a popular policy. Our policy of getting a grip and asking questions about the identity card is also right.

[Mr. Edward Leigh]

That abolition of ID cards in 1951 came on the back of the case of Clarence Willcock [Interruption.] He was a Liberal; quite right. He was stopped in the street, his card was demanded by the police and he refused to produce it. Lord Chief Justice Goddard said that ID cards were an "annoyance" and

"tended to turn law-abiding subjects into law breakers"

We believed then, and I believe now, that ID cards are appropriate only in wartime.

I do not want to live in a "Your papers, please" society. One reason why ID cards were abolished in 1951 was that people remembered the cry in wartime Europe, "Ihre Papieren, bitte!" We do not want that sort of society here, and that is what will happen. As night follows day, the police will start to demand that people produce their ID cards. That is why I shall vote, in principle, against the Bill.

Mention has been made of my role as Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee. If this Bill becomes an Act and it actually happens—we know that the chance of ID cards actually happening is very remote—there will be numerous PAC reports, showing that it is way out of budget. The initial estimate was £1.3 billion, then £3.1 billion and now £5 billion. When is it going to stop? The card will not curb terrorism or stop illegal immigrants. What it will do is cost us a lot of money and fundamentally attack our civil liberties. I urge the House to reject it.

5.50 pm

David Winnick: It is normal practice for the Opposition to complain about the lack of parliamentary time. We did so when we were in opposition, but on this occasion, I agree that inadequate time has been allotted for such an important measure. It should not have been crowded in on a Thursday and there should have been far greater examination of the detail. If I may say so, I know that the Home Secretary is not responsible for the allocation of time, but we should have had at least two days. I genuinely regret that, irrespective of one's views, inadequate time has been allotted to examine the measure on Report.

I remain unpersuaded that ID cards are needed. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary—if he is listening—referred to a number of countries, including fellow members of the European Union, that have identity cards, but those countries have exactly the same the problems that we have. They face the same problems of terrorism, as we have seen in Madrid, corruption, illegal working and so forth. No argument has yet been put forward to explain how identity cards, biometric or otherwise, will resolve the problems that we, in common with other European countries that have such cards, face.

Yes, identity cards may be popular at the moment, as has been said. For all I know, it may be that 80 per cent. of the population are in favour, but high expectation is the reason for that. People believe at this stage that the cards will help to resolve the problems of illegal working, illegal immigration and all the rest of it. I believe that when people realise, as they are bound to do, that the cards offer no panacea, their expectations will drop a great deal. Undoubtedly, one question that some people will ask is, as with child support legislation, "What examination was given to the Identity Cards Bill as it went through Parliament?" They will ask how much time was allotted to examine it in full detail.

David Winnick: I shall continue, if my hon. Friend will forgive me.

As to costs, I agree—it has to be said, it is usually on very rare occasions—with the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh). Whatever the estimated cost now, it will prove to be much more at the end of it all.

I know that other Members want to speak, so I shall finish by saying that I am going to vote against the Bill on Third Reading. I remain uneasy. I believe that the Bill will lead to an infringement of civil liberties. As I said in an intervention earlier, if I believed that it could be an effective tool against international terrorism—I am the last person to underestimate the terrorist threat—I would simply enter the Aye Lobby and vote accordingly. I am not so persuaded. I am uneasy because I feel that we are going down a wrong path. I may be proved wrong and the Government may be proved right, but at present, I remain uneasy about the unnecessary infringement of civil liberties. I believe that we can live without identity cards as we have done for more than half a century. For all those reasons, I simply cannot support the measure. The only option is to vote against it.

Mr. Bercow: The Government say that identity cards are necessary. William Pitt, as long ago as 1783, said:

"Necessity is the plea for every infringement of human freedom. it is the argument of tyrants, it is the creed of slaves."

Moreover, the Labour party has not always enunciated this position:

"Instead of wasting hundreds of millions of pounds on compulsory identity cards, as the Tory right demands, let that money provide thousands more police officers on the beat in our local communities."

So said the current Prime Minister, when he was Leader of the Opposition, at the 1995 Labour party conference. If the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Byrne) seriously thinks that he advances the calibre of the argument by quoting what was said by other people in the past, he will learn in this place that two can play at that game.

I am interested in a more serious debate. The Home Secretary and the Minister for Citizenship and Immigration know that I am very ready to pay tribute to the Government when I think that they are right. However, we should be unremitting in our criticism of them when they are wrong. Today, hon. Members from all the different political traditions have explained eloquently that the Government are wrong.

The Government's arguments have shown no sureness of touch. They have shifted their position constantly—one minute, it is a question of reducing the threat from terrorists, the next it is about reducing illegal immigration, and the next it is about reducing benefit fraud. The former Home Secretary, the right hon.

Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett), took the biscuit when he asserted 18 months ago that the merit of the introduction of identity cards—eventually to become compulsory—was that they would enable us to assert our "sense of belonging".

Many people in this country feel a sense of alienation, from the Government or their local community, or both. I have yet to meet a single constituent in Buckingham who has said to me, "John, I feel a terrible inability to assert my sense of belonging because I do not possess an identity card."

Mr. Gummer: Does my hon. Friend agree that even those of us who believe in identity cards and who have argued for them for years cannot support this Bill, as the Government have not even allowed Ministers enough time to explain their case and respond to any of our debates? That is why I feel that I must vote against the Bill. It has nothing to do with identity cards, but with the abuse of this House on an important constitutional matter.

Mr. Bercow: My right hon. Friend is right. In politics, as in life as a whole, self-knowledge is a valuable thing. The Home Secretary has gravely embarrassed himself by his behaviour. If he is not aware of that simple fact, he needs to go away for a bit of therapeutic reconditioning.

The arguments against the Bill are powerful. First, it involves a fundamental change in the relationship between the citizen and the state, to the disadvantage of the citizen. Secondly, as many hon. Members have explained, it is virtually certain that there will be a growth in function creep. If that were not the case, why do no fewer than 25 out of the Bill's 45 clauses provide for order-making powers? The Bill is littered with phrases such as "the Secretary of State may at any time decide", "the Secretary of State may by order", "the Secretary of State may as he thinks fit", or "regulations made by the Secretary of State may provide." That is not acceptable.

There is a real problem to do with discrimination, as the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) powerfully explained. After the recent improvement in race relations, we risk taking a retrograde step. The House should take care to resist any idea of putting a match to gunpowder.

The argument to do with cost has been made, but I shall conclude with the argument about public opinion. The Government have propagated a very downmarket line of argument. We all quote polls when it suits us, but I remind the House that we are elected representatives. I am not a robot, a sheep or a button to be pressed. I have a responsibility to look at the issues, study the legislation, identify the arguments and make a judgment. It is risible to contend that we need simply say, "Oh, the opinion polls show 80 per cent. in favour." Everyone knows that there was mass support in Australia for the introduction of identity cards, but people there recognised the drawbacks when they saw the real implications. They knew the impracticalities, they appreciated the threats to their liberty and they turned against the proposal.

People in this country will turn against the proposal too, and against the Home Secretary and he will richly deserve the hostility of the public when that happens. He will not be laughing—he will need to take cover. I shall vote against Third Reading.

5.59 pm

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central) (Lab): I was one of those who voted for the Bill with considerable reservations on Second Reading in the hope that the Committee stage and today's Third Reading would resolve them. However, the more I have heard today and the more I study the Bill, the more my reservations, far from being resolved, have been aggravated. I was looking for a tightly drawn Bill with plenty of checks and balances, the right for individuals to access information, the right to prompt redress from the commissioner, and a good, strong commissioner.

The Minister for Citizenship and Immigration attempted, nobly, to try to address some of those problems—

It being Six o'clock, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair, pursuant to Order [this day].

Question put, That the Bill be now read the Third time:—

The House divided: Ayes 224, Noes 64.

European Defence Market Equipment

That this House takes note of European Union Document No. 13177/04, on the European Commission Green Paper on Defence Procurement; endorses the Government's support for the Green Paper's aim to open up a debate on the competitiveness of the European defence industry; and supports the Government's wider objective to create an effective and competitive European defence equipment market.—[Mr. McAvoy.]

Question agreed to.

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Tuesday 22nd February, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order No. 16 (Proceedings under an Act or on European Union documents), the Speaker shall put the Questions necessary to dispose of proceedings on the Motions in the name of Mr Secretary Johnson relating to Social Security and Pensions not later than three hours after the commencement of proceedings on the first Motion; proceedings may continue after the moment of interruption; and Standing Order No. 41A (Deferred divisions) shall not apply.—[Mr. McAvoy.]

ELECTORAL REGISTRATION (NORTHERN IRELAND) BILL [LORDS]

Ordered,

That, in respect of the Electoral Registration (Northern Ireland) Bill [Lords], notices of Amendments, new Clauses and new Schedules to be moved in Committee may be accepted by the Clerks at the Table before the Bill has been read a Second time.—[Mr. McAvoy.]

Hospital Services (Paddington)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Mc.Avoy.]

6.13 pm

Ms Karen Buck (Regent's Park and Kensington, North) (Lab): I apologise to my hon. Friend the Minister for his drawing the short straw of replying to the Thursday Adjournment debate.

Before I begin, I want to declare the ultimate non-pecuniary interest. My feelings about St. Mary's hospital are motivated in no small part by the fact that over the past 25 years it has seen me through serious illness, major surgery, a cancer scare and the birth of my child. I am committed totally to the hospital and its place in what, if we get it right, will be one of the most exciting hospital developments that has ever been attempted in this country.

The time is drawing near for a decision on the future of St. Mary's hospital in the context of the Paddington health campus. The fact that this has been a difficult decision to take—it has been seven years in planning and development—is not surprising, given the fast-changing backdrop of the development of health policy and the complexity of the specific scheme in the very heart of London. It is understandable—indeed, it is right and proper—that such a project should be rigorously scrutinised and meet the demands of the future, as defined in 2005, as much as it would have done when it was first conceived not far off a decade ago.

I have no argument about the fact that the scheme has been subject to rigorous scrutiny in the Department of Health and elsewhere, but my worry and the reason why I requested this debate is that some of the negative publicity that has accrued to the scheme over the years, and even the old ennui factor that is inevitably attendant on a scheme that has been so long in gestation, may have obscured some very important central facts and prevented us from the viewing the scheme and the new offers that are being made to facilitate it at this late stage clearly on their merits.

I do not intend to dwell on some of that negative publicity, although it is important that its existence is not denied because it provides a proper context for the debate. I merely wish to point out that the whole concept of the Paddington campus has had its opponents from the beginning, and they have been largely motivated by opposition to the closure of Harefield hospital. That is in many ways understandable from their perspective, but I very much regret that the local concern that has been expressed has muddied the waters a great deal around the campus itself.

The key fact is that the Paddington health campus continues to offer us an extraordinary, once-in-a-generation opportunity to renew and improve health care in north-west London. The most recent business case presented to the Department just before Christmas has the backing of all three local primary care trusts, the strategic health authority, clinicians from all three of the participant hospitals and the medical school, patients and the patients organisations, Conservative-controlled Westminster city council, the Mayor of London and the Commission for Architecture and the Built Environment. Indeed, in response to a question that I asked a few weeks ago, the Prime Minister described it as "extraordinary", "imaginative" and "state of the art". I could describe a political—with a small "p"—coalition of that kind as implausible. In fact, I have never known that breadth and depth of support across agencies in 25 years in public life.

It is worth recapping for a moment the importance of the scheme and what it has to offer. Combining heart and lung services with acute general specialist services will dramatically improve patient care for the seriously ill, children and those with complex health problems. All the renowned expertise of the Royal Brompton and Harefield hospitals, Imperial college postgraduate research and teaching centres and St. Mary's hospital will be available to patients on a single site. The two hospital trusts and Imperial college have a tradition of research into improving health care, linking science to medicine. Harefield has the largest European heart and lung transplantation programme. The national heart and lung institute at the Brompton hospital is an internationally recognised five-star research centre, and St. Mary's is a leading research centre into infection in its own right. Bringing together all that research with Imperial college's world-renowned expertise will enable a major centre for research to be created, which will strengthen London's standing internationally, as well as directly benefiting patient care. However, a few myths need to be demolished for the record.

Myth No. 1 is that this is some kind of bloated super-hospital, a dinosaur from a bygone age and a over-ambitious amalgamation that is in danger of looking old-fashioned before it has even started. In fact, it is two hospitals on one site, with parallel academic development. It is not a single hospital, but a way to reduce costs by relocating three existing hospitals on to one site that is strategically located, with superb communications available to it that are not available anywhere else in north-west London. It is adjacent to Paddington station and, I hope, to a new Crossrail site, with easy access to Heathrow—a location advantage that cannot be replicated on any other site in inner, north or west London.

Myth No. 2 is that the campus will lock London into a surplus capacity of NHS beds. In fact, the Paddington health campus assumes that the requirement for 15 per cent. of routine surgery will be supplied by the private sector, and most routine elective surgery will be carried out in other hospitals in north-west London in any event. The campus has been designed to deal with complex tertiary work at St. Mary's and the new Brompton and Harefield, with St. Mary's also providing emergency services with appropriate backup for the local population, as at present.

Myth No. 3 is perhaps the most important of the myths doing the rounds: there is a quicker, cheaper and easier alternative. Relocating the Brompton and Harefield and rebuilding St. Mary's on this inner London site is complex and challenging, but the value-for-money case is strong. The other options—there must be other options because doing nothing is neither clinically nor financially viable—remain tentative in financial and planning terms. Significant cost benefits could be enjoyed by pooling central services, such as administration, payroll, catering and a range of others. It is estimated that revenue savings of £20 million a year could be made, but they would not materialise under other options that involved upgrading the hospitals separately or using any other configuration.

If we did not proceed with the campus, it would not reduce the need to move specialist heart and lung services away from Harefield hospital, or modernise the Brompton and St. Mary's facilities. If detailed capital and revenue cost plans for alternative options exist to demonstrate that they would represent better value for money, and all their details on the cost of such things as land assembly and planning permission have been scrutinised to the extent of those for the Paddington health campus, I am not aware of it.

All the arguments in favour of the Paddington health campus have been strengthened even more in recent days by the latest offer from Westminster city council to reduce the cost to the NHS of the land deal required for the campus. The council has offered to broker land deals in a manner that would cut both the cost and complexity of the scheme. That would represent better value than all previous options and would save the NHS in excess of £60 million more than the existing scheme. The capital surplus would be increased, the steady state operating position would be substantially improved and contingent liabilities would be greatly reduced.

Westminster city council can explain its own motives for the latest offer. However, it would be true to say not only that it is committed to maintaining a local hospital with international teaching excellence, but that it sees the scheme as a further step in the wider regeneration of the Paddington area. The retention and improvement of hospital facilities is thought of as not only being of direct benefit to people, but allowing further redevelopment throughout the Paddington basin. The campus is one piece of a jigsaw that has already included the introduction of the Heathrow Express, the refurbishment of Paddington station, the £62 million Paddington bridge project, the establishment of 97,000 sq ft of office space and 922 residential units, and substantial changes to education provision. There is more to come, including Crossrail—the hybrid Bill will hopefully be introduced in the near future—a potential business improvement district, the re-provisioning of the City of Westminster college, and a major new affordable housing development.

Additional benefits have already included 7,000 permanent jobs, thousands of construction jobs and huge investment in the local economy. That was much needed when we remember that despite the mythology of Westminster's uniform prosperity and the fact that it includes some of the most prosperous parts of the country, the four wards immediately surrounding Paddington are among the 10 per cent. most deprived wards in the country. Other wards in the surrounding district are among the 30 per cent. most deprived in the country.

When critics say, as they sometimes do, that the campus development has been seven years in the making and has yet to reach fruition, it would be true to say, "So has Paddington." The Paddington that we knew seven years ago when the health campus began to evolve is not the Paddington that we see now, because at that stage there were no academy schools or plans for the redevelopment of the secondary sector, no business improvement districts, and no immediate prospect of the blight on the Crossrail development being lifted. The project has been fluid and constantly changing, so inevitably land assembly deals have had to be done. Additionally, the hospital has been subject to constant re-evaluation because as health needs change, capacity needs change. It would be unfair to make harsh judgments about the Paddington campus without appreciating the momentum of the whole regeneration scheme.

If the final decision is taken to rebuild St. Mary's hospital alone, I am confident that a fine teaching hospital will continue to be available for my constituents. St. Mary's is not a hospital that is any longer fit for purpose because many of its buildings are inappropriate for a 21st century hospital. It is absolutely essential to redevelop the hospital, ideally within the campus site. If it is not situated on the campus site, however, it will continue to provide first-class services. The quality of services within St. Mary's was recognised when it won the Dr. Foster's hospital of the year award three years ago, when it received its star ratings and when, only a few weeks ago, it was included in the latest wave of possible foundation status hospitals.

I am more worried about the long-term viability of institutions that will not benefit from the scale and concentration of resources. Without the campus, health facilities in north-west London will continue to suffer from fragmentation and dispersal, with services for children in particular increasingly at risk. The failure to consolidate heart, lung and paediatric specialties would deny patients the opportunity to improve the quality of care for complex medical conditions in particular.

The case for the campus clinically, in terms of overall value of money and regeneration, is compelling. The chance, once lost, will not come again. Given the new financial impetus that has been afforded by Westminster city council's latest offer on land assembly, I urge the Minister to take back the message that the scheme must proceed. I look forward to hearing his comments and hope that we get the clearest possible indication that, after all these years, those who looked forward to having the most prestigious hospital teaching and research developments in Europe will, at last, be satisfied.

Mr. Mark Field (Cities of London and Westminster) (Con): I am grateful for this brief opportunity to add my comments in support of the remarks made by my constituency neighbour, the hon. Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North (Ms Buck).

As has been said, the Paddington health campus is a large undertaking, but it is also a project whose time has come. It will offer all the people of London and, indeed, the country more generally, world-class facilities across a range of medical disciplines. It is an essential component of Westminster's regeneration plans for a highly visible part of our capital, the significance of which goes way beyond the local level. I endorse the hon. Lady's comments. She rightly said that Paddington is a much changed area, and that change continues. It is a little unfair to compare the plans with those of even six or seven years ago.

The Minister is aware that a vast amount of preparatory work and expenditure have been invested to get to where we are today, and I urge him to recognise how much has been achieved. That there have been difficulties and disagreements along the way is not surprising. The crucial point to note is that there is now a strong, influential and robust coalition of support for the scheme, both medically and politically. Any project that unites the Conservative leader of Westminster city council and the Mayor of London—never mind hon. Members from opposing parties who have a direct constituency interest—is surely also worthy of the Government's support.

This has been described as a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity, and few would demur from that description. Indeed, only occasionally can we say that all the planets are aligned in favour of such an important project being given the go-ahead, but that is now the case. There is nothing to be gained from delaying a decision until after the election. Political uncertainty is perhaps the project's greatest threat.

I understand that the rector of Imperial college, Sir Richard Sykes, has only this afternoon been in touch with No. 10 Downing street to express that wonderful global institution's support for the scheme and, I have no doubt, to muse on the significant boost it would give to Britain's ability to continue playing a leading role in international medical and scientific research.

Westminster city council is, as we speak, engaged in discussions to reduce still further the public sector's exposure and to strike a more beneficial accommodation for the taxpayer with the private sector partners, whose positive contribution and needs in unlocking the project must also be recognised.

I do not wish to rehearse the formidable points that the hon. Lady made, but here today and, I suspect, on many other occasions, the will for the project to succeed and bring its undoubted benefits to London and the country is very much apparent among the trusts and politicians involved locally. I urge the Minister and his Government to demonstrate their political will and support the Paddington health campus.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North (Ms Buck) on securing the debate. I also congratulate the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field) on his interest in the matter. I know that the subject is of real concern to my hon. Friend and other hon. Members. She has raised it before with Ministers and, as she said, with the Prime Minister. I have no doubt that the matter is also of great concern to her constituents and to many national health service patients in west London and throughout the United Kingdom. It will have significance to them.

In October 2001, the Department of Health announced that it intended to develop a new health campus at Paddington. I emphasise at the outset, as did my hon. Friend, that this is not a proposal to build a single super-hospital but a development that would bring together three major hospitals and a medical faculty on a single new campus.

The proposed Paddington health campus scheme embodies a bold and exciting vision for the wholesale redevelopment and renewal of services and facilities that are currently dispersed across north-west London and exist, in many instances, in outmoded and unsuitable accommodation. It plans to combine this on the new site, bringing together the renowned expertise of the Royal Brompton hospital and Harefield hospital, along with St. Mary's hospital, a busy secondary and tertiary centre with a strong focus on serving the needs of Paddington. Imperial College postgraduate research and teaching centres will share the campus, which will embrace the use of technology to improve levels of patient care. The environment for patients and staff will include state-of-the-art facilities and diagnostics in both new and fully refurbished buildings, replacing run-down, old and unsuitable accommodation.

This is a vision that the Government fully support. We see it as an excellent proposal not only for local health services but for the specialist services that will be provided to the wider NHS on the site. There is substantial support within the local NHS for the Paddington health campus, as the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster said. I understand and appreciate this. We are working with the local NHS to find a sensible way forward for the campus.

Any new proposal—my hon. Friend alluded to this—must offer the very best value for money and be affordable by the health economy. Before the Government can finally turn their support for the vision into a final commitment to proceed, we need to work through the business proposals to ascertain whether the numbers add up. Until now, the key challenge facing the campus project team has been to demonstrate value for money with acquisition of the land needed. That is not to criticise it—any project board would have the same challenge. A scheme of this size or complexity has never been undertaken by the NHS, and transparently demonstrating its viability takes time, hence the apparent delays.

In 2001, the original outline business case estimated the cost of this redevelopment at £325 million. However, in 2003 it was recognised that the price of the project had escalated way beyond its original OBC approval figure to £800 million. Given this rise in the cost, a review of the OBC and the management of the project was necessary, and this was undertaken in late 2003.

The review team was led by officials from the Department of Health and included officials from the Treasury and the National Audit Office. I believe that it was right to conduct the review. In October 2004 the review concluded that a revised OBC should be submitted by the project team to the Department. It was agreed that, when approved by Department officials, the OBC would be submitted to the Chief Secretary to the Treasury for consideration and approval.

The revised OBC was approved by North West London strategic health authority and submitted by the project team to the Department in December 2004, and it is currently being reviewed by Department officials. One key issue from the revised OBC is that the NHS needed to acquire land from Westminster city council and Paddington Development Corporation Ltd., a privately owned consortium. It is this complex land transaction, linked to a large PFI hospital contract, that has until now made this such a difficult project to progress.

However, the campus project team is right now considering an exciting new proposal whereby Westminster city council would enable the land deal for significantly better value for money than the proposal described in the current OBC. For Westminster city council, the campus project would be the final piece in the regeneration of Paddington. It would provide key benefits to the local economy, including 7,000 permanent jobs, thousands of construction jobs, millions of pounds of investment in the local economy and significant amounts of key worker housing in an area adjacent to some of the most deprived wards in London. The four wards surrounding the site are among the 10 per cent. most deprived neighbourhoods in the UK.

Full details of the proposal and its possible impact on the project should shortly be with the Department. They will be worked through as quickly as possible, and I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North and the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster will accept that we cannot progress the work in detail until we have the final proposal in our hands. Work will, however, take place as quickly as possible, and I assure my hon. Friend that the Department and Ministers will do everything that we can, working with the local NHS, to expedite progress, to evaluate the proposal and develop it into an addendum to the original business case. Like her, I await those details with great interest.

Of course, not everyone shares my hon. Friend's enthusiasm for the project, as she openly admitted. The Paddington health campus plans have generated considerable controversy, not only in constituencies in the area but in others. However, the quality of building stock at Paddington, Chelsea and Harefield needs to be improved. Two thirds of the Royal Brompton and the vast majority of both Harefield and St. Mary's are long overdue for replacement. Those issues cannot be ducked and must be dealt with in the very near future, health campus or not.

In addition, Harefield hospital will, in the not-too-distant future, become unsustainable as a viable specialist heart hospital. It is crucial for the success of single-speciality hospitals that they have access to a wide range of related sub-specialities. Harefield, which is several miles from local general hospitals, is not in a position to draw on the support of the wider range of specialties that are found at such hospitals. The high-quality work and legacy of Harefield hospital will be sustained at Paddington health campus through proximity with St. Mary's. Even if that were not the case, Harefield is on a greenbelt site, and therefore constrained by planning regulations. It is difficult for people who do not live in the local area to access it by public transport, and a major redevelopment at Harefield would have a knock-on effect on the surrounding hospitals.

It must be remembered that a large proportion of Harefield's patients will receive routine care and treatment at their local hospitals. Only patients requiring specialist care would go to Paddington health campus. I am sure that the House will agree that that we should all be prepared to accept that hospital and community services must, from time to time, change if we are to continue to fulfil patients' needs and improve services. Services should not remain static for ever, but must reflect advances in technology and clinical practice. Of course, all the planning and analysis is bound to create uncertainty. Throughout the transitional phase, staff involved in the scheme and those who have continued to provide health care to Paddington patients have worked tirelessly, despite their concerns. I pay tribute to all the staff who contribute to the excellent work of those hospitals.

I can assure my hon. Friend—and I hope that this is the promise that she was seeking from tonight's debate—that Department officials are working closely with North West London strategic health authority, commissioners and providers of health care in Paddington and west London to arrive at the best solution quickly and expeditiously for the local health economy. Like her, I remain excited by the project and its potential. The Government and I want decisions to be made as quickly as is safe.

Alcohol Abuse and Public Order

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Jim Murphy.]

9.30 am

David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): I am pleased to have been given the opportunity to initiate this debate, which is not likely to last the full time. I originally put in for a debate on the implementation of the Licensing Act 2003. That would, by and large, have been appropriate, except that the main Opposition party decided to choose it as the subject of its first debate of the afternoon, as it had every right to. Whether my debate on alcohol abuse and public order is something of an anti-climax because of the debate in the Chamber later I do not know. However, there are genuine and deep-seated problems concerning alcohol abuse and I welcome the opportunity to say a few words about it.

The controversy about extending drinking hours has helped to focus attention on alcohol abuse—the cost to the national health service, the disorderly and sometimes criminal behaviour that takes place on a regular basis and, we should not forget, the harm done to the individual by excessive drinking. There is, however, a difference, which most of us would accept, between warnings about drug taking and smoking and warnings about alcohol. The first two activities should not be taken up at all. Every effort should be made to encourage people not to take up smoking and drugs. That is not true of alcohol. I would be the last person to suggest that one should not drink. Drinking is part of the pleasure of life and long may it be so. Perhaps, Mr. Deputy Speaker, we could have a drink to that sentiment, but, of course, in moderation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. John McWilliam): Order. I would be happy to oblige the hon. Gentleman, but not until the sitting is over.

David Winnick: Point taken. It is chronic or binge drinking that is a danger to health and public order. It is not by any means a minor problem, as the Government recognise. The change to what could be 24-hour licensing, or, more likely, 16 to 18-hour opening times for pubs, which is longer than at present, will increase the problems. It is difficult to imagine that there will be less excessive drinking if opening hours increase. To their credit, in March 2004, the Government brought out a paper called "Alcohol Harm Reduction Strategy for England". I welcome the fact that the Government recognised the problems so well that, before the present controversy, they brought out that paper.

The paper gives some alarming facts and figures. Those figures include the fact that £95 million is spent on specialist alcohol treatment every year. There are more than 30,000 hospital admissions annually for alcohol dependence syndrome. There are up to 22,000 premature deaths as a result of excessive drinking per annum. At weekends, particularly on Friday and Saturday nights, up to 70 per cent. of admissions to hospital accident and emergency departments arise from alcohol-related incidents.

The Royal College of Physicians of London and the chief medical officer report a rising trend in deaths from liver disease caused by alcohol. The incidence of alcohol-related liver disease has increased tenfold since the 1970s. The figure that the Government give as the cost to the national health service caused by alcohol misuse is £1.7 billion. That is apart from domestic violence, a third of which is estimated to be due to alcohol. These are very serious issues and very serious figures. It is understandable that, against that background, there is controversy about whether it would be right and appropriate for pubs and clubs to be open later than they are now. However, the same Government document gives a figure of up to £7.3 billion as the annual cost of alcohol-related crime. Therefore, alcohol abuse is a major contributor to ill health, premature deaths, serious accidents, road crashes, disorder, antisocial behaviour and crime itself.

We know, not just from our television screens, the difficulties that the police regularly face. They have to deal with ugly scenes in town centres and spend a great deal of time trying to deal with the disorder caused by people drinking excessively. Fortunately, at many pubs with regulars there is little disorder; people know one another and know how much they should drink and when to stop. However, at other, anonymous places in town and city centres, a significant minority of people gather and drink without any concern for their situation afterwards or the likely effect on others and on neighbourhoods.

The drink industry seems to be rather complacent. I know that it set up the Portman Group, which might almost be said to be a public relations exercise to demonstrate that the drink industry is really worried about the problems, but I do not believe that it is concerned, as it should be, about excessive drinking. As long as the profits roll in, responsibility for what occurs should be left to others: that seems to be the alcohol industry's message. If the Government are to get tougher with the polluter, that is a welcome step, and one that should perhaps have been taken some time ago.

The chief constable of Nottinghamshire is one of the many senior police officers who have made the point that the industry has maximised its profits with a disregard for the outcome. That sums up to a large extent the feelings not only of his fellow senior police officers but of politicians, many in the religious community and those who are deeply concerned about alcohol abuse. Representatives of the drink industry recently gave evidence to the Home Affairs Committee, which is holding an inquiry into antisocial behaviour. When confronted with the question whether it should pay along the lines suggested, the representative said, "We already pay. We pay in taxes, we pay in rates." However, I do not believe, and I hope that this is the Government's view, that that is sufficient. The industry must recognise that some of its schemes, such as happy hours and half-price drinks to start with—although not for long—to encourage people to start drinking as much as possible, are irresponsible.

[David Winnick]

As I began by saying, I am not one of those who considers drink to be a curse. I drink, the majority drink, but we drink in moderation. The problem is not drinking itself but excessive binge drinking and the irresponsibility of those who indulge in it and those who seem to encourage it through various schemes. The problems that I mentioned are clearly recognised by the Government, so I find it very surprising that they feel it appropriate to extend drinking hours.

Let me be clear: I welcome the fact that local councils will be the licensing authority. I understand—no doubt the Minister will refer to this—that local authorities will have a number of criteria on which to base decisions about applications, but to what extent they will act tough in view of representations made by local residents and the police remains to be seen. Local authorities may have the power, which is fine, but will not large-scale owners of pubs and clubs use all forms of legal machinery to lodge appeals in the courts and so on, thus warning other local authorities not to be too tough? I do not believe that it is simply a question of local authorities acting in a responsible manner, which I hope they will.

If we are faced with the problem that I described, which is recognised, with all the resulting costs, what sense is there in making it easier to drink? I know the argument that spreading the opening hours will mean that there will not be such disorderly conduct—that people will be able to drink at leisure and will not have to drink up to ensure that they have what they want by closing time. Surely there is another argument: that those who drink excessively will go on to another pub that is open once the first is closed. Why not? If we are dealing with the sort of people about whom I am concerned, that would be a logical outcome. Instead of going home once the pub is closed, they will find one that is open—if, indeed, the 2003 Act is implemented.

I hope that the Minister, my good and honourable Friend, will deal with another issue. If a number of pubs in a given area decide to stay open and others do not, will the latter not come to the conclusion that they are losing business? As a result of the competition, they will decide, as business people, that it is wise to open their pubs for longer so that they will not be undermined by the competition from those who have already done so. Those issues need to be taken on board.

There is some controversy about Scotland, but let us leave that to one side at the moment and deal with Ireland. Ireland decided four years ago to extend opening hours, not to 24 hours, but from 11.30 pm to 2 am. The result was what some of us predict will happen here: there was much more drinking and disorderly and criminal behaviour. What was the result? The Irish Government decided that the decision taken in the year 2000 was wrong, and last year they wisely decided to revert to earlier closing times. Why should we have to go through that experience of extending hours to find, as the Irish have done, that it is a mistake? Now is surely the time to consider what happened in that country and other places, and reconsider the issue.

On Third Reading of the Gambling Bill, the Tory spokesperson criticised the Government for conceding this and that. I intervened and asked what was wrong. The Government listened to people like me, who were concerned about super-casinos. They responded to that. I am glad that they did and I was able to support the measure last night on Third Reading, when previously I had abstained. I ask the Government to listen carefully now.

I have not been particularly party political, but I think that this afternoon the Conservative party will be climbing, not for the first time, on the bandwagon—if that is the right expression. The Conservatives have a perfect, legitimate right as the Opposition to take up issues that are in the public mind. I spent 18 years in opposition. I understand all that. I am not going to criticise the Conservative party because it feels that it has found a popular issue and wants to exploit it—that is the role of the Opposition. However, I say to the Government that we would be acting wisely if we understood that the concerns that have been expressed go far beyond the Conservative party, which, after all, supported—except on Third Reading—the Licensing Act. Very late in the day, the Conservatives have decided that there are votes, or potential votes, in doing what they are doing today.

I say to the Minister, just as we listened—rightly—over the Gambling Bill, let us listen now. Do not let us be dogmatic. I know that she is not in a position to decide whether the implementation of the 2003 Act should be postponed. She will not mind if I say that the decision goes a little higher than that and will be made at a more senior level. I hope that the senior members of the Cabinet will consider the position as quickly as possible. If the Government are determined to go ahead with the measure, why not at least set up a pilot scheme in one or two places to see what the position is? I have explained my concerns and reservations and I hope that it will be possible for the Government to reconsider the position, postpone the implementation of the 2003 Act and then see over a period of time whether it would be wise to extend opening hours along the lines that they have in mind.

Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey) (LD): I am glad of the opportunity to take part in this debate, although as the hon. Member for Walsall, North (David Winnick) rightly said, we have been slightly overtaken by the fact that there is a show on the main stage later. Happily, that is on the same day, so we can all contribute.

I had better declare an interest. My dad and my granddad were brewers and my mother's pension is dependent on Whitbread continuing to make a profit. As children and youngsters, we were brought up to understand that alcohol in moderation was good for people—and indeed good for our family's financial survival. Happily, none of the family has ever suffered as a result or become addicted. That has not been a problem.

Like every colleague in the Chamber this morning and like everybody else, I have parts of my community where there is a concentration of heavier drinking or more frequent drinking establishments. I was told when I was elected that my constituency had the largest number of pubs of any in London. I never counted them, but there was certainly a huge number. There are fewer now.

Many pubs have closed, although in recent years, many banks and offices have been turned into bars, as is the case all over the country. Very unlikely buildings that one would never have imagined would be turned into licensed premises have become licensed premises.

There are two bits of my patch where there is now significant late-night drinking. One is the Old Kent road, the only bit of the Monopoly board south of the river, and the other is Borough high street, going down from London Bridge station. I have to say that there is not a phenomenal problem. There is late-night drinking. At the moment, the pubs and bars generally have extensions to 1 or 2 o'clock. That is generally the throw-out time on Thursday, Friday and Saturday nights, rather than 11 o'clock. However, they have not become no-go areas. They are not normally places where people cannot go.

We must be careful not to exaggerate, to take those pictures that we sometimes see of the centre of Newcastle or the centre of other places and to presume that every urban centre—every place where there are lots of pubs and bars—becomes a no-go area from 10 pm until 2 am or 3 am. That is not to say that there are not areas where problems blow up—we all know that, if people drink heavily, problems are much more likely to arise.

I remember being in Hull late on a weekend night, watching the increasingly aggressive behaviour at the minicab office where people were waiting for taxis to take them home. If people are gathering around kebab shops, takeaways and minicab offices, with more people pouring out and none leaving the area, a cross word becomes a row, a row becomes a fight and sooner or later someone has attacked somebody else. Then the ambulance and the police are called and the whole situation can get out of control. We understand the position. The issue has clearly become, rightly, a major concern of our colleagues in local government, who will see responsibilities coming down to them later this year. It has also clearly become an increasing concern for the police.

Let me declare that my starting position as a Liberal is that licensed premises should be able to stay open, if they want to be, 24 hours a day. I think that a modern society should be able to have licensed premises that can stay open 24 hours. In cities such as London, the current regime is extremely frustrating and inconvenient. Some people work late, some work a 2 to 10 pm shift. Some work—as we do on a Monday evening for example—until 11 pm. Some people arrive in the city in the evening to meet friends. It is quite a bizarre society where it is not possible to go out after a meal for a quiet drink, or where there is only 10 minutes or half an hour in which to enjoy the drink. All logic suggests that we ought to have the more continental timetable. That is the correct starting point and it is the reason that we support a move in that direction. It ought to be the choice of adults as to when they drink and how much. We all have to take responsibility for that.

However, we have clearly run into a difficulty in moving in that direction, which is that the enforcement agencies—the police and the local authorities that are going to pick up the responsibility—are saying, "Hang on, we are not ready." We have a clearer message now than we did two to four years ago from people such as the outgoing Metropolitan Police Commissioner, Sir John Stevens, and others. We have to pay heed to that. As the Minister will know, that is why I, my hon. Friends the Members for Winchester (Mr. Oaten) and for Bath (Mr. Foster), who take responsibility for home affairs and culture matters, and other colleagues have decided that we, too, now believe that the evidence is there for slowing down the transition to 24-hour opening. When we have the debate in the main Chamber later on, we will be saying that, as will the Conservative Party, because we believe that the case has been made.

We, like the Conservatives, voted against Third Reading of the Licensing Bill when it was going through Parliament because we had reservations, so we are not making a complete U-turn. We still want to move to a 24-hour position but we think that there is now a strong case for saying, "Hang on, let us wait and get it right." There are two other logical reasons as to why we should do that. The first is that, unless we are living in cloud cuckoo land, we look as if we are about to have a general election in May. The Minister feigns ignorance of that fact but there is not a single sign that suggests otherwise.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Caroline Flint): I am just lowly.

Simon Hughes: She has booked her holiday—I do not believe her.

That is one argument for saying, "Let us just wait until the other side of the election and see what the composition of Parliament is. Let us see who the Government are, who has responsibility for the Departments of State with responsibilities for these issues." Secondly, we really cannot rush into another set of legislative changes such as that which the Government announced the other day. This is legislation on the hoof.

The Government came to power in 1997 wanting, rightly, to reform licensing legislation, as it had been on the statute book pretty well unchanged for nearly 100 years. We then had long deliberations on the issue, including the famous commitment at the last election via text messages to young voters that licensing hours would be changed. It took all of six years from the Government coming to office to see an alcohol strategy, which, of course, as the hon. Member for Walsall, North rightly states, is a linked issue.

There have been changes to the legislation on how we deal with pubs and bars that break the law. There are powers on the statute book to close places for 24 hours and longer. Last week, as a sticking-plaster job, the Government announced a raft of further ideas, including alcohol control zones. They may be reasonable ideas, but it seems that the Government are running to catch up. Everybody would benefit from a pause to look at three related areas: the way in which the industry will be able to regulate the new regime; the evidence of where the health and medical problems are; and the evidence for what may work from the point of view of the police when managing problems.

I will make some brief points about each of those areas. But first, with regard to what is on offer, we must all be careful to correct the misunderstanding about what the new law proposes. There is an uninformed presumption that the change in the law will mean that all places currently open until 10.30 pm or 11 pm will open all night. It is an option; it is not compulsory. My information from the British Beer and Pub Association is that not a single licensee expects to do that. Over the new year, when there could have been 36-hour opening, no one opened for 36 hours. There will be no great and sudden move.

Secondly, there will be no free-for-all, because decisions will be made by elected local councils. Like the hon. Gentleman, I support that; it is the right move. People who are elected by and accountable to their communities will make the decision about what opens and where. Some of my colleagues rightly say that we are circumscribing the power of local authorities, that they ought to have more powers and that the guidelines prevent them from having a common policy for a whole area. That is wrong. If a local authority thinks that a particular area has a problem, it ought to be able declare that there will be no late licensing in that area.

Thirdly, most pubs and licensed premises are not on the high street, causing grief. They are in small towns and villages where people get on perfectly reasonably and no one complains about them.

Fourthly, and again this is why we should not rush into this process, the Government announcement suggests, if I understand the new proposals correctly, that suddenly, having consulted for months and months over what the licence fee should be, there will be a much higher fee. It is a bit unfair on the industry to consult on one set of charges and suddenly consult over another. The licensed trade pays £22 billion a year to the Government in taxes, which is more than twice the entire police budget for England and Wales. On the other hand, the relative cost of drink is much cheaper than it was 20 or 30 years ago, so there is an issue over how we collect the revenue, how much we collect, how much people in the licensed industry have to pay for the privilege of having those premises and how much we need.

I have a suggestion. It is not party policy but, because drinking is a problem for a minority, which creates huge costs for the NHS, it might be helpful if there were some link between that part of the revenue and the money that goes to the NHS, which has to pick up the tab. That would be quite popular and appealing.

Lastly, the reality is that most people do not binge drink. We are briefed on what binge drinking is; there is a communal definition. Given that everybody uses the phrase, and so that people do not think that we are picking up the cliché and running with it, I ought to put on record that I am told that the accepted definition is "eight or more units for men and six or more units for women on at least one day in the week."

I will not challenge colleagues over whether they fall into that category, but well under one in 10 members of the public do. Again, we are talking not about most of the public, but about a small minority who drink to excess.

I want to flag up the fact that we have a right to be concerned and to express that concern. I have been given different estimates of the number of alcohol-related deaths in this country. Some of those that I have seen suggest that there are between 22,000 and 40,000 alcohol-related deaths every year, I am told, although I have a much clearer figure in my head, that about 120,000 people every year die from tobacco-related diseases. We do not spend nearly as much on preventing people from becoming alcohol dependent or on treating those who are alcohol dependent as we do on picking up the tab when they end up in the A and E department on a Saturday night, having been involved in a fight, a car smash or a domestic incident.

If we are to get to grips with the fundamental problem, we need to deal with the growing problem of young people who start drinking early. The other day, I saw a horrific press cutting from the Aberdeen Press and Journal, which discussed the number of young people who are brought into hospitals in Aberdeen, suffering from alcoholism. The article said:

"At least two children under the age of 15 get emergency treatment for acute alcohol poisoning in Grampian hospitals every week."

Grampian's director of public health said:

"It is amazing the number of young people who are being carried in unconscious to our hospitals . . . It is obviously a great source of concern that two-thirds of these are children under 13."

It is true that half of all alcohol is bought from places such as supermarkets, takeaways and carry-outs, so the problem is not the responsibility only of those who run licensed bars and other premises. It is clearly a wider issue, with many more people drinking at home. In fact, the proportion of alcohol bought outside pubs and bars has gone up, while the proportion bought in them has gone down.

The Government have clearly decided that they are going to introduce a new policy, under which those who run these premises will have to pay more towards policing costs. There is a real debate about that approach and a real policy issue behind it, and it may be the appropriate answer. In recent years, football clubs have been asked to contribute more. My local football club does so. That has become common practice. However, there needs to be a proper debate, and the local authorities need to be involved. If we are going to accede, as I think that we shall, to the hon. Member for Walsall, North's suggestion, which some of his hon. Friends have been making for a while, that we pause, put back implementation of the 2003 Act and take stock, we also need to have a rational debate across the parties about how to obtain the funding to pay for policing, so that local authorities are properly funded.

I make one last suggestion, which, again, shows that there may be a growing consensus. We may have occasion to pause, not only in the light of the relatively recent Scottish experience and of the Irish experience to which the hon. Gentleman referred, but to see whether we could pilot a scheme for 24-hour opening in certain areas. In London, for example, there would be no reason why a local authority could not say that it wanted to pilot a scheme for a year. I have no idea whether my colleagues who run Southwark, Lambeth and Islington councils would want to do that, or whether Labour-controlled councils such as Lewisham or Brent and Tory-controlled councils such as Wandsworth or Westminster would want to do so, but let us give them the choice.

I end with a request. This is one of those issues where it would be frustrating if the public debate became over-partisan. To be honest, when people are standing on the Old Kent road on a Friday and somebody is injured, those people will not be bothered about the party politics; they will be bothered about getting the policy right.

We shall never have a perfect society. People will always get drunk or addicted to alcohol. That is inevitable in a free society and it is the case the world over. We should not become too reactive about that, but Liberal Democrat Members believe that there is sufficient evidence to say, "Let's wait. Let's postpone implementation of the Act." I hope that the Government will heed that and understand that it would be better to proceed by consensus, rather than implement something that gave great concern to the police and increasing concern to local authorities and our health services. I hope that there is ground for an agreed approach before the general election.

10.5 am

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Walsall, North (David Winnick)—who is moving closer to me, because we probably agree on many things—on obtaining the debate. He has made much of the fact that it is on the same subject as one of the Opposition day debates called by the Conservative party this afternoon. That goes to show that there is universal concern about this matter in all parts of the House. I hope that he will take part in the debate this afternoon, and make a similar contribution to the one that he has so valuably made in this Chamber.

I also welcome the contribution of the hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes). He is moving closer and closer to Conservative policy on many fronts, and this is just another one. We can look forward to the day when he can cross over to our party, because he agrees so entirely with our policy. In many ways the hon. Gentleman is right. It would be nice to think that there would be some consensus across the House on such a major problem, but I am sorry to say that I expect the Minister will not respond positively to his suggestions or those of my party.

Sadly, over the past few years, this country has developed a disgraceful reputation at home and abroad for drinking to excess to such an extent that life and limb are threatened. The costs to the country have escalated to such a degree that some commentators estimate that alcohol-related crime and disorder alone cost us some £7.3 billion a year in policing and processing offenders through the criminal justice system. We have seen this evidenced in so many television programmes and reports; in the horrendous holiday destinations where we see youngsters literally out of their minds, clubbing in places like Spain; and in the all-too-familiar sight on Friday and Saturday nights in some of our inner cities, and even some of our towns, of young people who drink themselves almost senseless, and all the consequential problems in our town centres and communities up and down the country, referred to by both previous speakers.

A third of people are drunk when they are arrested. A recent study revealed that 63 per cent. of men and 39 per cent. of women serving prison sentences had been hazardous or harmful drinkers in the year prior to their incarceration. A report by the Revolving Doors Agency that I think the Minister is familiar with showed that people dependent on alcohol are more likely to be homeless on release from prison than those who are not. Therefore, they are likely to be among those most likely to reoffend.

Our increasing alcohol consumption in hazardous quantities does not just cost our criminal justice system dear. About 17 million working days are lost each year because of alcohol abuse. It costs our business and industry in excess of £6.4 billion. Alcohol-related diseases, as the hon. Member for Walsall, North said, cost the health service some £1.7 billion and rising.

If those telephone numbers do not alarm people, perhaps some of the underlying facts will dispel the romantic notion that we can turn the UK into a café society overnight, which is the vision of continental-style drinking on pavement cafés that has been laid out. The British Medical Journal—this is a statistic to add to that repeated by the hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey about the children in Scotland—estimates that more than 2,000 drunk children are admitted to hospital annually, and a third of all teenagers aged 15 say that they have been drunk at least once, compared with a tenth in Italy and France—the so-called café societies.

Despite the rising levels of alcohol-related crime, police powers to tackle binge drinking and alcohol-related crime are not being used fully. In 1996, some 40 per cent. of violent crimes were linked to alcohol and last year around 1.2 million violent crimes—about half the total—were linked to alcohol. However, 90 per cent. fewer people under 18 are dealt with by the police for buying alcohol. Those figures are down from 276 in 1997 to just 33 in 2002. Some 50 per cent. fewer people are dealt with by the police for selling alcohol to those under 18. Those figures have declined from 296 in 1997 to just 162 in 2002. If we are looking for further evidence, we can find it in the fact that even the number of people cautioned for or found guilty of drunkenness has fallen by 20 per cent. since the Government came to power. Under-age drinking has been virtually decriminalised. The laws that exist to reduce the problem are not being used to any great effect under the Government.

In addition, 360,000 incidents of domestic violence, which is about a third of the total—the Minister is familiar with the statistics—were linked to alcohol misuse. The fear in the general population has also increased. Some 61 per cent. of the population perceive that alcohol-related violence is worsening.

Against that background, the Government chose to send a text message to young people asking whether they gave a XXXX for last orders and saying that for extra time they should vote Labour. Was the Minister proud of that? Does she think that it was the action of a responsible party?

There is no doubt that the Government have made some attempts to tackle the problem. On 15 March 2004 they published the "Alcohol Harm Reduction Strategy for England" and set out a strategy for tackling the harms and costs of alcohol misuse. I understand that the aim of the strategy was to prevent any further increase in alcohol-related harm in England. Unfortunately, however, the whole truth did not come out at the time. Papers uncovered by the BBC's "Panorama" programme showed that a draft version of the Government's strategy included evidence from other countries of the damaging effects of longer opening hours. However, those concerns were removed from the final report in March 2004. Why was that decision taken?

The Downing street strategy unit consulted 17 experts when drawing up the interim report that was the basis for the strategy. That report concluded that extending licensing hours would have a severe negative impact and stated:

"Restriction on availability reduces consumption and general levels of harm. Relaxing availability increases general harm whether through more outlets (Finland), denser outlets (California) or longer hours (Western Australia)."

In the final version of the strategy, there was no reference to opening hours. A source cited by The Times as being close to the strategy stated that civil servants

"drafted what they thought was a pretty decent strategy only to see it get decimated as it got passed around government departments."

Could the Minister confirm that report by The Times? It would be interesting to see whether Ministers went against the advice that was put forward by the very civil servants who were expert on the subject.

The previous two speakers acknowledged that we voted against the legislation at Third Reading because we had concerns. However, since that debate on the Licensing Bill—now Act—it has emerged that the police have considerable concerns about the likelihood of 24-hour drinking and the increases in hours. That is reflected in today's debate. Chris Allison of the Association of Chief Police Officers has said:

"While ACPO acknowledges the positive elements of the new Licensing Act . . . it does have . . . concerns about . . . the move towards 24 hour opening."

John Stevens, the Metropolitan Police Commissioner, who has been quoted in this debate, said:

"The move towards 24-hour drinking needs to be slowed down. The fact that large groups of people will be coming out at 3 am or 4 am will mean we have to man the streets to ensure they behave."

More recent police comment has shown a consensus among many police chiefs that the burden on the police from alcohol-related crime is already too much to bear. Andrew Trotter, deputy chief constable of the British Transport police, says that rather than dissipate the apparent problem of unified closing times, 24-hour drinking will simply mean that police resources will be diverted to alcohol-related incidents more of the time. He went on:

"I think that all staggered opening hours does is spread the troubles right through the night."

Mike Fuller, the chief constable in Kent, fears that noise and other disturbance will result from 24-hour licensing. He says:

"A lot of the disorder, noise and rowdiness caused by people drinking finishes in the early hours. If this were to continue throughout the night there will be more disruption. This will significantly impact on people and likewise stretch police resources."

The assistant chief constable in Dorset, Adrian Whiting, is also concerned about police resources. He says:

"There are no further resources being provided to the police, nor indeed the health services and other agencies who will inevitably become involved in the potential outcomes."

I could go on: there are many other quotes from many other organisations and agencies that deal with law and order and health in our communities and have expressed concern. We have a problem in this country, which at a conservative estimate costs around £20 billion a year. That is more than £450 for every adult in the country. However, we do not spend a great deal on preventing the harms that come from excessive alcohol ingestion.

According to Alcohol Concern, the Government spend about £1.5 billion a year on drug-related activity but only £95 million on alcohol. That is disproportionate, because there are about 1,500 deaths a year from drugs and 30,000 a year from alcohol. That means that we spend £1 million on every drug-related death, and only £3,166 on each alcohol-related death; we spend more than 300 times as much on a drug-related death. Does the Minister think that the response from Government is proportionate, particularly in the light of the fact that she is the Minister responsible for our policy on drugs?

Now we have a Licensing Act that will liberalise the hours for drinking and a hastily cobbled together package of measures to try to minimise the harm that that may do to our communities. Even the local autonomy claimed in the package of measures put forward by the Government at the eleventh hour, which it is claimed will hand powers to our local communities, is not as accurate as one would at first believe. Even parish councils will not be able to object to licences in their own backyard.

I want to leave the Minister full time to respond. We do not agree with the Government—we believe that the proposals will cause increased drinking, damage, street violence and physical harm to even younger people. More important, there are not enough police to deal with that. The hon. Member for Walsall, North asked the Government to listen. We are certainly asking them to listen, because we think that there is a problem that is reflected in all the commentary about the Government's proposals.

We ask the Government to delay the provisions. If they do not, there will be a clear choice at the next election. It will be a choice between a Labour Government who are encouraging 24-hour drinking and a Conservative party who would delay the provisions until more work on the problem had been carried out, recruit 40,000 extra police officers to enforce the existing laws, and ensure that there were sufficient resources for them to do so. We would cut away the paperwork and political correctness that stop the police fighting crime and disorder today.

The Minister has an easy task: she just has to say yes. However, although she means well, I suspect that, as the hon. Member for Walsall, North said, she is not in a position to give us what we want. I hope that she has the ear of the Home Secretary, and that the Government will admit this afternoon that we are right and back down from their proposals, which would cause great damage throughout society.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Caroline Flint): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (David Winnick) on securing this debate. One of the problems with discussions regarding licensees—each speaker has contributed to that problem again today—is the impression being given that there will be a free-for-all, with people applying willy-nilly for 24-hour licences. In fact, Government research shows that 1 to 2 per cent. might be interested in having such a licence, compared with around 65 per cent. who merely want to vary their hours. Twenty-four-hour opening will not be the norm; there will simply be flexibility within the system.

The measures brought in under the Licensing Act 2003 will, for the first time, give greater local democratic accountability to local authorities, not only to oversee the applications for licences, but to review them. For the first time local authorities will hold both carrot and stick when trying to contain the excesses we have all read about in our newspapers, and may have seen in our constituencies as well.

My hon. Friend said that he was concerned about whether local authorities would be robust enough to deal with containment. That is an issue for those authorities, but one of the big differences under the new arrangements is that, unlike at present, there is local accountability. No offence to magistrates, but they are not elected, while local councillors are. If councils' decisions have an undesirable impact, such as more disorder and problems in our communities and hospitals as a result of their not being robust in the handling of licences and their review of those licences, they will get a strong message from the electorate.

I draw my hon. Friend's attention to the partnership arrangements in the part of the country around the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South (Ms Taylor). Cleveland police and the licensees of pubs, clubs and takeaways have created a positive relationship whereby, for a small fee, the licensees receive an extra service—telephone contact with specific police who respond instantly. The partnership has been up and running for two months and, with those four additional police, crimes of violence associated with alcohol have been reduced by some 21 per cent. That is a good example—not the only one in the country—of partnership between all the local agencies involved in tackling abuse of those licences or disorder as a result of people drinking to excess. The issue is not just about licences, but about how people are held to account.

Mrs. Gillan: A local authority can refuse a licence only if a responsible authority, such as the police or environmental health officers, objects; the police already have enough to do. However, Westminster council says that it will not be able to reduce problems in its stress area, because the Government have put a "must grant" provision into the Licensing Act. Lastly, local councillors will now be unable to give evidence to hearings despite their local knowledge. Currently—prior to the legislation—councillors could object to applications in their own ward; under the legislation, they cannot.

Caroline Flint: I cannot speak specifically about the problems of Westminster council, but I know that a number of local authorities across the country have they give welcomed these changes. They feel they give them a greater say over both the issuing and reviewing of licenses. One reason why there is a greater say in terms of reviewing licences is that we have brought in powers to close down premises; also, if people are not abiding by their licence, we can take quick and effective action. It is a step change from what we had before; the new culture in which local authorities can have more influence than in the past is one area that I am afraid is not being talked about.

David Winnick: But what about the appeal machinery? As I mentioned in my speech, in a number of cases, very large organisations that are not satisfied with the local authority are challenging any of its decisions not to give an application the all-clear. Clearly one should take into account that the courts may well be involved, and local authorities may be somewhat reluctant to say no.

Caroline Flint: As I have said, I cannot necessarily predict what every local authority will do, but they will be held to account for their actions. The other issue to remember is that we have had a huge amount of publicity about the problems associated with excessive alcohol consumption. If someone wanted to appeal—of course people have the right to appeal; that is a just and fair process—they must justify the grounds on which they are appealing. In the same way, the local authority would have to put its case as well. But I hope we are all agreed that the change from what we have had to a system of local authority involvement is to be welcomed. Overall, individual local authorities and bodies that represent them, such as the Local Government Association, welcome that change. They have probably also welcomed the clarity as a result of Friday's announcement on issues relating to fee structures.

Simon Hughes: The Minister knows that I said in my speech that we welcome the move to local authority decisions. There was some nervousness among councillors, but that must be the right move. But I put it to her that there is widespread concern in local government. Its three concerns are that, first, local authorities cannot adequately take cumulative impact into account; secondly, they cannot apparently decide whether there will be a specific end point for licensing opening hours; and thirdly, they will be under-resourced for dealing with applications, appeals and the like. I hope that the Minister will, with her colleagues, talk again to the LGA and to the party groups, where I am sure that she will hear those concerns.

Caroline Flint: As I said, the announcement of the fee structures has given greater clarity as to what local authorities might expect. Councillor Dame Sally Powell, giving her views on behalf of the LGA, certainly welcomed that greater sense of certainty. As with anything, these issues of course can and will be looked at, but we do have a raft of measures giving greater powers in relation to refusal. Under the new Licensing Act, objections can be made at any time by any of the police, environmental health—from within the local authority, on health and safety grounds—residents or local businesses. Of course there are intermediate actions that can be taken, such as the closing down of premises for 24 hours. Let us not forget also the issue of fixed penalty notices, for example on bar staff serving to people who are drunk or under age. The raft of measures actually complements a better licensing system than we have had before.

[Caroline Flint]

Regarding other countries' extension of licensing hours, we are talking about flexible licensing hours, rather than the perception that everyone will have premises open 24 hours a day. I understand from some of the evidence that an acknowledged problem in Ireland was that licensing hours were extended without some of the wrap-around arrangements for tackling disorder that we have made part of the package of the change to flexibility. That was one of the primary reasons for their pulling back.

The picture presented by the extension of licensing hours is a mixed one. In some instances it has not led to greater consumption. In 1988, when opening hours were extended in the United Kingdom, consumption did not increase per head of population. When Scottish licensing hours were reviewed in the 1970s, men's consumption went down and women's went up. That is not necessarily to do with the hours; it may be more to do with cultural changes, and changes in women's attitude to themselves and to drinking.

Complex issues need to be tackled with regard to consumption. I do not put the responsibility at the Conservative Government's door, but since the time of the Conservative Government, there has been a huge increase in the number of outlets selling alcohol. Today it is commonplace to be able to buy drink in different outlets, whereas the traditional pub with an off-licence at the side has practically disappeared, because alcohol is available in so many other places. I should have declared an interest: I am the granddaughter of publicans and have served in a few bars.

The issue to be considered is not 24-hour drinking, but the way in which people drink and their understanding of the dangers, and not just the immediate health dangers. I met a group of 16 to 25-year-olds last week and we talked about, among other things, personal safety. We need to educate young people not just about the physical or medical effect of too much alcohol, but about the fact that a person who is out of control because of alcohol is vulnerable and susceptible to attack or other dangers. That is true for women and men. Things can get out of control when they get into a fight or a stand-off in the street.

Our messages must deal with health and personal safety. My brief encompasses the national drug strategy and we increasingly encourage our drug action teams to be drug and alcohol action teams. We have a long-term Blueprint project dealing with drug education in schools. The project is running in 23 schools where research is being done on the impact. It focuses on years 7 and 8, at the beginning of secondary school.

The project deals not just with illegal drugs, but with cigarettes, alcohol and, for that matter, prescription drugs—paracetamol and the rest—to which many young people have access in the home. The point of the programme is to make young people aware of different types of drugs and their possible effect and to enable them to make informed decisions. We do not treat alcohol as separate from our other work on drug education.

Simon Hughes: I support that, and we must go further down that route. Although it is not for the Minister's Department to take the lead on this, I want to point out that all the cafeterias in the House are this week providing booklets about the five portions of fruit and vegetables a day for healthy eating. People need the same visible and regular information, from a young age, about acceptable levels of drinking. Bottles of drink should bear a statement of the exact unit level and the associated risk. Good advertising and good labelling would mean that the education battle was half won.

Caroline Flint: As the hon. Gentleman probably knows, the Department of Health is examining the issue of what people understand by the alcoholic content of a drink, alcohol units and people's perceptions. A glass of wine has gone from a standard measure of 125 ml to something like 175 ml. Alcohol volume can vary from one beer to another. Some of the messages have become outdated over time, and the Department of Health is actively considering the issue.

Mrs. Gillan: Then why do the Minister and her colleague Ministers not consider delaying the implementation of the 2003 Act until 2006, when the impact of some of the excellent programmes that she is outlining will have begun to come into the Department? After all, some provisions in the Drugs Bill, which is before the House, have been delayed to April 2006. What is the problem about revisiting the 2003 Act and delaying implementation? If the Minister has such faith in the Act and in these programmes, she should be willing to wait for the results before further liberalising the licensing laws.

Caroline Flint: I believe that it would do the public a huge disservice to delay the licensing arrangements that we are introducing, which will move licensing from magistrates to local authorities. As I have tried to explain, we sometimes lose sight of the much firmer ground on which local authorities will be able not only to refuse licences, but to review and contain them.

Let us not forget the other measures that we have introduced, such as a new range of fixed penalty notices, which can be issued against individual bar staff who sell to under-18s. We have also increased the level of certain fixed penalty notices from £40 to £80 and we will be raising the others to that level. Fixed penalty notices are part of a package and do not stand on their own, but they have two important benefits. First, they reduce the time that the police spend on bureaucracy, which gives the police an incentive to use them. That may partly answer the hon. Lady's question about arrest. Secondly, they have an instant impact by containing individuals who, in different ways, create an unhelpful environment in which people end up fearing drink, instead of enjoying it.

In addition, we intend to introduce fixed penalty notices for under-18s who attempt to buy alcohol and for the sale of alcohol to someone who is already drunk. Those offences can already be prosecuted through the courts, but the FPNs would provide an immediate sanction and a wake-up call to some organisations and groups. I shall keep the list under review and add others as appropriate.

The police and other enforcement agencies need to use the full range of existing powers to clamp down on irresponsible behaviour by the industry and individuals.

Among some retailers and licensees and in some parts of industry the practice has been less good than we want; in others it has been better. There is a good example in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South, and another in Manchester, where people are saying, "There are some problems here. How do we collectively deal with them? What do we need the Government to give us, what do we need the local authority to do and how do we work together better? What do we expect from the industry and licensees?"

The alcohol disorder zones, one of the proposals in last Friday's announcement, are not a knee-jerk reaction. Since the launch of the "Alcohol Harm Reduction Strategy for England" my hon. Friend the Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety has made it clear that we were continuing to discuss compulsory payments where disorder got out of hand. We must talk to the industry about those issues. On the one hand, the hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) seemed to want a delay, but on the other hand he seemed to be making a strong case for being tough on the industry, so I was a little confused.

We have discussed this issue with the industry. We have seen some individual elements in the industry decide to take corporate decisions of their own, and move forward; I think Yates's Wine Lodge is one example, and there are others. Only yesterday, I saw that another group had decided that they were going to introduce a smoking ban in their outlets, so there have been voluntary improvements along the way. However, we always said that we would come back to this issue of whether we needed to have a pricing scheme linked to persistent disorder. That is exactly what the consultation paper is consulting on. It is not an alternative to some of the good practice that is currently taking place, whereby licensees and others are working with the local authority on a voluntary basis to get the sort of services that they want from police and others. That is taking place in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South.

David Winnick: My hon. Friend has been very generous in giving way, and I understand her responsibility as the appropriate Minister. We know that majorities are not always right. Does my hon. Friend agree, however, that all the indications—opinion polling and the rest—demonstrate that the large majority in this country at this moment in time do not want drinking hours to be extended? Perhaps that should be taken into account by the Government at the most senior levels.

Caroline Flint: Probably some polls say that, and others suggest that people are in favour of flexible licensing hours. Some of the arguments for that are as appropriate today as they were when this issue was first discussed. One of the issues in Ireland is, I understand, that while it extended its hours, it was a fixed point extension, which meant that it did not solve the problem of everybody turning out at the same time. I think I am correct about that; if I am not, I am sure that somebody will tell me later.

I return to my point: is the issue one of flexible hours, or of how they are organised? Obviously, if we say that everybody will be open until 3 am, we will not solve the current problem, which occurs when most outlets empty at 11 pm or midnight. It does not solve the problem that the police were talking about. Yes, there are police officers who have voiced different views on this. However, Chris Fox, the president of the Association of Chief Police Officers, made it very clear on Friday that he welcomed the new information that the Government were providing on how the flexible licensing would be wrapped around with these other protective measures. These are valid issues.

My hon. Friend made a point in his speech about people moving from one establishment to another. Well, that already happens in the sense that it is possible to go to a pub in Doncaster until 11 pm and then go to a nightclub until 2 am. That situation exists, so the response to blaming the entire concept of 24-hour opening—as I have said, the indications are that very few outlets will want to open 24 hours a day—must be to say that we already must deal with some of these issues.

Why is it a problem? It is a problem because of lack of responsibility, sometimes by the licensees and by those who work in establishments who continue to serve individuals who should not be served. There is also a lack of co-operation between the police and the local authority on the ability to tackle these issues. Of course, underlying all this is the fact that drinking in the United Kingdom—the amount we drink, the way in which we drink—is not something new and has existed for a very long time. We have to tackle the underlying culture of drink. That, in itself, is not threatened by the new licensing arrangements. It is a bigger issue, which the Government must attend to on a number of different fronts.

Mrs. Gillan: I would like to know where the idea came from for this flexible, 24-hour licensing. The Minister has mentioned, although not by name, J.D. Wetherspoon, which has bravely made its decision to go for smoke-free zones. The chairman of Wetherspoon, however, said—I will not read the first part of the quote because it is not very complimentary to the Home Office—that certain people "in the Home Office thought it would be sexy to go for 24-hour licensing. It was never an idea that emerged from pubs. To me, this all seems like last-minute chaos."

If there was no demand from the industry, from where did the demand come that has resulted in this legislation, which even a leading member of the alcohol industry describes as "last-minute chaos"?

Caroline Flint: I have not read that quote. He is entitled to his opinion. The measures that we are taking are part of an ongoing discussion about how to tackle the excessive use of alcohol. We see that as an ongoing responsibility.

When we launched the "Alcohol Harm Reduction Strategy for England" we said that we would come back on a number of points, particularly on what should be paid by those who contribute to disorder as a result of alcohol. Those issues were part of a review of licensing arrangements—in exactly the same way, I presume, as when a previous Government reviewed the opening hours in 1988—to examine how our communities are affected and how licensing is arranged.

[Caroline Flint]

Fundamentally, the issue is not about a carte blanche for 24-hour opening, but about variable licensing hours. What suits one community may not suit another. Alongside that will be more rigour, so that local authorities can have more of a say, and, importantly, powers for the police to deal effectively and quickly with the excessive use of alcohol.

My hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North also mentioned promotions. That is another aspect on which we have said that we will continue to consult. It is clear that some promotions in certain quarters are irresponsible. I met a group of young people the other week and we talked about promotions such as the one that allows a woman to drink for free if a man brings her, and speed drinking, where people drink as much as they can in an hour or two for half the price.

We feel that such promotions are irresponsible and must be dealt with. That is not to say that we are trying to limit price—there is an issue of price competition—but there is a world of difference between that and some of the irresponsible promotions of recent years. Such promotions—where people drink as quickly as they can in a short space, often very alcoholic drinks indeed—add to the problem. We support the British Beer and Pub Association and others in the development of guidance to owners and operators that we hope will do away with such irresponsible drinks promotions.

Let us not forget that our measures are not confined to the pubs, clubs and restaurants that sell drink. We are also talking about tougher measures for other outlets that sell drink, whether they be supermarkets or corner shops. They, too, should have responsibilities in relation to under-age drinking and selling drink to people who have had too much. We must consider the wider community and how drink impacts on different areas.

Simon Hughes: The Minister knows—I have said it more than once—that it would be right for us to move as a country, as Scotland has done, to more flexible licensing hours, which is the phrase that people need to understand. However, because the Government have taken from 1997 to this year to honour the commitment to do that, there is every merit in considering the whole debate in the round. Rather than—as was done last week—announcing measures to deal with abuses that cannot possibly be law and implemented before November, let alone February, when licensing authorities will start the process, we should put everything on hold. That way we can bring together the payment regime, further proposals for controlling people who abuse the system—both after consultation—and then the implementation. That must now be the logic of the Government's position.

Caroline Flint: I have to differ with the hon. Gentleman. It is vital that we get under way the measures that will come into force on local authorities and on licensing . Local authorities throughout the country have been gearing up for the changes. It would be a retrograde step to say, "Well, sorry, but we're going to put that on ice, pending other issues." Of course those other issues are important, but they should not necessarily prohibit us from moving forward on the licensing arrangements, bearing in mind that, aside from what was announced on Friday, we have tougher licensing arrangements—

Simon Hughes: But they will not be in force.

Caroline Flint: Hang on a second. Tougher licensing arrangements will come into force in the near future and there will be fixed penalty notices; they already exist for a number of offences. We have the support of the police forces throughout the country to work in partnership with local authorities and others to tackle the problem, and finally, we have good examples from the industry of what it is prepared to do to put its house in order.

We are looking at further measures, and by announcing those, we are warning the industry and others about the changes. There is an opportunity for them to see the writing on the wall and to do more than they are doing to tackle the problems that exist in communities. There are some positive examples of that, but some are not so positive and need to be addressed.

With regard to the balance sheet, there are a range of policies and areas in which we can tackle the problem. At the heart of that are the new licensing arrangements, which create democratic accountability for the first time in the issuing of those licences, giving the community a say that it clearly did not have before. We must continue to build up the resources available for treatment for those who have binge-drinking problems—there is a difference between that and chronic alcoholism—and we are doing that as well.

Mrs. Gillan: The Minister is giving way generously. Did I hear her correctly? Is she saying that this is not the end of the story and that the Home Office, or the Department for Culture, Media and Sport, have further proposals on their desk, which they are about to spring on the unsuspecting public, local councils or industry? If so, when can we expect to see them? Or is she threatening the industry by saying, "There is definitely going to be a levy, but we are acting step by step and quietly because we are moving towards an election"?

Caroline Flint: No, the hon. Lady is twisting my words. It is quite clear that the existing powers are there to be used, and can be used in a better way throughout the country. The new licensing arrangements are coming in and the consultation document on Friday made the Government's policy clear.

I said that it is not the end of the story because Members have raised several issues about how we tackle the culture of drinking in this country. Consideration must be given to projects such as Blueprint, which I mentioned earlier, and to looking at the information we give to young people, whether that is clinical information relating to ill health or information about personal safety. We are having ongoing discussions on those matters with regard to public health and people's responsibility for their actions.

On the question of domestic violence, I would say that alcohol is often a factor, but I strongly believe that one of the reasons why more cases of domestic violence have been brought to the courts is that the Government have, for the first time, tried to remove the obstacles preventing those cases from coming to court. A rise in the number of arrests for domestic violence in itself is not a bad thing.

Simon Hughes: Why?

Caroline Flint: Because we are finding ways in which those matters can be brought to court.

As in all areas of public policy, we are mindful of what is happening. We have to deal with an underlying cultural issue, but the issue of flexible hours will not necessarily make that situation worse.

David Winnick: It will not make it better.

Caroline Flint: I think it will make it better in a number of cases, but it has to be supported by good local working partnerships. At the end of the day, we can pass laws here, but they are implemented on the ground. That is why we see very good practice in some parts of the country, and we should expect all parts of the country to aspire to that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not wish to enter into the debate, but it being the anniversary of Robert Burns' birth, I have to observe that he wrote a prayer to the Scotch Members of this House, objecting to the proposal to increase duty on whisky.

Robert Burns Heritage Projects

10.57 am

Sandra Osborne (Ayr) (Lab): I very much welcome the opportunity to raise the vital issues of the legacy of Scotland's national bard, Robert Burns, and the urgent need for funding from the Heritage Lottery Fund. I know that they are also close to your heart, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I look forward to hearing your "Immortal Memory" later in the week. I am sure that you will be very interested in my reply to the "Toast to the Lassies", and I had to be careful not to bring one of those speeches with me this morning. It might have been a wee bit more amusing than what I am about to say, but it would not have addressed the serious issues that, unfortunately, I have to raise.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. John McWilliam): Order. If the hon. Lady had done that, I might have been responding to the debate, rather than the Minister.

Sandra Osborne: Thank you.

Today, as I speak, Burns clubs all over the world are celebrating the birth of this great poet and song collector. No doubt all kinds of over-the-top sentimentality will be on display, but kailyard parochialism has little or nothing to do with the real Burns, who is a far more substantial figure than that. His place in the Scottish consciousness is unique; he has been described as Caledonia's bard, natural man, a many-sided genius, the heaven-taught ploughman, the noble savage, a man of the resistance, a national hero and even a national myth. His name has become synonymous with Scotland.

Life levels all men, but death reveals the eminent. Burns captured the soul of Scotland, and his name is entitled to the respect of posterity. He may have died a poor man, but he has immeasurably enriched the world. On this day, we do not remember a departed memory, but honour a living, life-enhancing presence. When Scotland forgets Burns, history will forget Scotland. It would be to our eternal shame if we ever allowed that to happen.

Among his faults and virtues, Burns had a common touch, warm humour, vigour, humanity, a universal message and profound common sense. I want to quote some famous words by him, although I hesitate to do so, because when the Deputy Prime Minister visited Burns cottage—we were very pleased to see him—and he was asked to read a poem by Robert Burns, he refrained from doing so because he said that it takes him all his time to master the English language, let alone lowland Scots. I do not know whether the Minister will treat us to a Burns poem later, but in the meantime, as I said, Burns's profound common sense is encapsulated in these famous words:

"O wad some Pow'r the giftie gie us
To see oursels as others see us!
It wad frae mony a blunder free us,
And foolish notion",

and in these:

"The best laid schemes o' mice an' men
Gang aft a-gley."

[Sandra Osborne]

Mr. Deputy Speaker, I am sure that you will agree that those words are of great benefit to every Member of this House, both individually and collectively.

There could not have been a better time to secure this important debate because, as we meet in our convivial gatherings at this time of year to celebrate Burns's life and works and to toast his immortal memory, there are pressing matters that we should consider if we are properly to secure his physical legacy in the west of Scotland, specifically in the place of his birth—Alloway, just outside Ayr. Alloway is in the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes), who is disappointed that he is unable to attend today's debate. Hon. Members may be aware that his wife is ill. My right hon. Friend is a member of the Burns Trust. In my role as Member of Parliament for Ayr, I also declare an interest in the trust as a trustee.

The debate is timely, not only because it is taking place on Burns day but because his legacy has recently seemed to be under threat. I want to provide the House with some background to the issue before seeking some reassurances from the Minister on lottery funding. The problem is a long-term one that should have been sorted out decades ago, not just in the last couple of months, as some who have spied an opportunity to jump on a political bandwagon are making out. Some of those people have not taken one iota of interest in Burns, apart from attending the occasional supper. The local councillor for Alloway, Robin Reid, who has suddenly become vocal in complaining, is, like me, a trustee. However, to my recollection he has not attended any of the regular trustees' meetings since I joined in 1997. Burns would, I am sure, have looked with irony at much of the present hypocritical posturing. No doubt he would have written a poem about it.

I note that my predecessor, Phil Gallie, has acknowledged that efforts have been made during the years to preserve and develop the Burns national heritage park as a tourist attraction. I join him in paying tribute to people such as Douglas Hemming and our lord lieutenant, Major Richard Henderson, as well as to the local councils in Ayrshire. All have strived to preserve and develop the park but they have done so against the odds.

My opinion is that, instead of building the Tam O'Shanter experience, which is really just a café and gift shop, the money should have been invested directly in the historic buildings and artefacts and in preserving the physical heritage of Burns. Only a small proportion of the people who go to the café and visitor centre visit Burns cottage, so although it gains some income it is not succeeding in attracting tourists to Burns, nor is the income anything like enough to meet the needs of such an important national treasure.

However, hindsight is a wonderful thing. My point is that we should have had a properly funded and supported national strategy to preserve the legacy of one of our most important historical figures many years ago.

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): I agree entirely with the hon. Lady and with her sentiments about the importance of the legacy of Burns, not just to Scotland but around the world. She is right to talk about a national strategy, but why, with a Labour-run council, Labour-run Scottish Executive and Labour-run UK Government, do we not have one?

Sandra Osborne: As I shall explain later, successive councils, both Tory and Labour, have tried hard with limited resources to support the legacy of Robert Burns. Also, the Scottish Executive have supported the funding for the last three years. I do not accept that they have not been proactive in the situation, and they are about to be much more proactive. Where I do agree with the hon. Gentleman is that Westminster has failed the legacy of Burns for many decades. As I suggested, it is a long-term problem. It did not just spring up last week. It should not fall to individual local authorities, trusts or Burns organisations to work in isolation to preserve the heritage, but that is the somewhat casual approach that has characterised the situation for far too long.

I am no nationalist, as the House will be aware, but without, I hope, sounding too paranoid, I do not think that anyone in the House could foresee a situation in which Shakespeare's birthplace and places associated with his legacy would be neglected or would fail to be recognised as of national importance. To be even more parochial, if I am honest I think that if Burns had been born in Edinburgh instead of Ayrshire, it would also have been a totally different story.

In many ways, it gives me great pleasure to say that it is with the Scottish Executive that we are seeing not only a quick response to the current problems, but a long-term commitment to evolving a coherent strategy for the future, which has been sorely needed for so long. My task today is to ensure that the Heritage Lottery Fund is recognised as a potential source of funding and that it operates in a way that can proactively protect our heritage, along with Historic Scotland and other Government bodies.

The Burns national heritage park is made up of the cottage where he was born, the museum, the monument and gardens, the manuscripts and memorabilia, the Tam O'Shanter experience, which once exhibited a recreation of that famous poem, Alloway kirkyard and the Brig O'Doon. It is all contained in a beautiful setting in the village of Alloway. It is vital that that setting is preserved.

The heritage park is managed by a joint board on which three partners—South Ayrshire council, the Burns monument trustees, of whom I am one, and Scottish Enterprise Ayrshire—are represented. Based on previous consultancy reports, the original commercial aim was that the heritage park would be financially self-sufficient after its first few years of operation. That never happened.

I think that it would be of benefit if I outlined briefly where we are at the moment and how our problems came about. The Tam O'Shanter experience is owned by the council and for some time it has been its intention to lease it to a commercial operator. In so doing, it was responding to a request from the joint board. It was thought that that could provide an opportunity for capital investment and for an ongoing revenue stream. The council planned to reinvest the income from the lease in the upkeep of the park as part of a service-level agreement. That is not new and has been in the public domain for at least the past couple of years, if not longer.

In so doing, the council was treating the trust in the same manner as it does every other voluntary organisation. The purpose of such agreements, as hon. Members will know, is to determine the level of service delivered in return for financial support from the taxpayer, and to ensure that outcomes can be measured and acceptable standards maintained. That will be familiar to hon. Members as part of the best value regime and is all within the thrust of Government policy to follow the public pound. Councils are measured in terms of how they spend public money and the quality of services that they deliver. Service-level agreements are an extension of that, in that councils are charged with the responsibility of following the public pound to ensure that external organisations give value for public money and are measured as stringently as councils themselves. That is as important for preserving our heritage as it is for providing services to people.

However, that is a tall order for many organisations and the problem is that the trust is a very different entity from most other voluntary organisations. Its constitution is a complicated and aged document, drawn up at a time when it was seen as appropriate to set up bodies that were basically made up of the local gentry—the great and the good, such as the lord lieutenant, the sheriff principal and elected representatives—whether or not they had the time, expertise or interest required. In recent years the trust managed to recruit some more appropriate volunteers, but the constitution meant that the trustees would be held jointly and severally liable for financial problems. That became a major problem when a multi-million pound project was involved, so advice was sought about dissolving the trust and setting up a new management structure.

It is my understanding that at that time the National Trust for Scotland was not interested in taking over, although it was clear that a national body was required. At the same time, there was an increasing problem with preserving precious artefacts. A report produced last April by the national Burns collections project showed that 35 per cent. of the existing Burns collection is stored in the Burns cottage museum in an uncontrolled environment. I am sorry to inform the Chamber that the original manuscript of "Auld Lang Syne" is currently held in Edinburgh for that reason. I am sure that the Chamber will realise not only the financial importance of the document, but its importance as Burns's legacy.

Artefacts have been held in an uncontrolled environment for many years. That cannot be allowed to continue. Little or no support was provided over the years by any national body until the Executive stepped in three years ago with short-term funding. That cannot be allowed to continue either.

I am going into some detail about how we got to where we are now partly because there have been deliberate misrepresentations, particularly about South Ayrshire council, but also because I believe that there are important lessons to be learned. Local bodies cannot in isolation take responsibility for sites and collections of such national significance as the heritage of Robert Burns. I might add that his birthplace is by no means the only important Burns legacy in south-west Scotland. A proper strategy is required for them all.

As I have said, work has already been done to establish a new Burns museum at Alloway that would preserve the Burns collection to modern standards and greatly enhance tourist potential. One application has been made for lottery funding, which was rejected, and a second was withdrawn with a view to resubmission when a new management structure was established.

Given the scenario, I would contend that it was perfectly clear to all that that structure was needed if the project was to succeed. It could not possibly have escaped the notice of our national heritage bodies, but they did not see it as their role at either a civil service or quango level to intervene in a proactive manner that could address the problem. I do not suggest that anything other than good professional advice was given about the merits of the designs or the business plans, but only latterly were there discussions about the structure of the management, which appeared to be caused by the council not being prepared to underwrite the costs. That was never a feasible proposition. Councils today are simply not in a position to take on multi-million pound projects in such a way. In any case, as I have tried to make clear, there should be a national input.

The Minister may be about to tell me that it is not the role of the lottery heritage board to intervene and suggest that the project is of national significance and should be run on a national basis. The Heritage Lottery Fund, not local councils, largely funds our national historic assets today and, along with bodies such as Historic Scotland, is charged with the responsibility of preserving our heritage. I suggest that a more proactive approach, with powers if necessary, is required at some level. I should be grateful if the Minister would comment on that.

I pay tribute to the Scottish Minister for Tourism, Culture and Sport, Patricia Ferguson, not only because she was instrumental in organising the campaign that got me elected in 1997, but because she has provided the political will—lacking for so long at a national level—to give Robert Burns the recognition that he deserves. She has backed that up by speedy action. When I met her before Christmas, along with my colleague Cathy Jamieson, the MSP who represents Alloway, Patricia Ferguson immediately informed us of her determination that the homecoming of the Scottish diaspora, planned for the 250th anniversary of Burns's birth in 2009, will centre around the Burns national heritage park in Ayrshire. That has not always been the case; in the past, it would have been far more likely to be centred in Edinburgh. I was delighted to hear it, and I hope that hon. Members who are Scottish but represent seats elsewhere—such as yourself, Mr. Deputy Speaker—will join us in the celebrations.

Plans are already under way and have pointed up the need for a national strategy. The Executive will fund the work needed, but it is clear that a firm central direction is needed. Patricia Ferguson has made £50,000 available in the short term; yesterday I met her, South Ayrshire council and Scottish Enterprise to begin planning the future, which includes the possibility that the whole park will be taken over by the National Trust for Scotland. It is a solution favoured by most, and South Ayrshire council yesterday indicated its willingness to go along with that solution. It is likely to include a submission to the lottery fund for a museum to be ready in plenty of time for 2009.

[Sandra Osborne]

At last we are moving in the right direction to secure the Burns legacy, which is so richly deserved. On Burns day, in celebration of his immortal memory, I ask that we all—not just in Scotland, but in the UK and throughout the world—pay tribute to Scotland's national bard, not just with words but with action.

The Minister for the Arts (Estelle Morris): May I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Sandra Osborne) more than usual on securing the debate on the most appropriate day for it? As one of the few non-Scots in the Chamber, I also wish everyone a happy Burns day and pay tribute to Robert Burns. My hon. Friend naturally talked about his Scottish heritage and contribution to Scottish culture and history. I want to recognise that his work went way beyond the country boundaries. Although the Scots own him in the best sense of the word, his contribution has been felt throughout all continents. As we approach the celebration of 250 years of his birth in 2009, I think that above all things he has certainly stood the test of time.

Indeed Burns's words of wisdom, particularly about poverty and disadvantage—and the emotions which he had the ability to portray in anger at those things—have not lost their relevance, although I suppose the geography of where those feelings are more apt changes with time. So, although we talk of celebrating his history, of a memorial and of paying tribute to the past, one main reason for needing to do all that is the wisdom of his words in the present—wisdom which I am sure will continue into the future.

This is a difficult debate for me in some ways. There are areas over which I have responsibility, and areas over which I do not. Of course I want to acknowledge that the Heritage Lottery Fund has a role to play. That will be the main comment I want to make. Before that, however, I welcome the contribution that the Scottish Executive have now made; only last week, they announced a grant of £50,000, which my hon. Friend rightly said was short-term funding. From what I have read, it will not survive in that form; it will be covering the ongoing year-on-year costs. It is not a real investment to keep the park steady and there must, I suspect, be a joining together of financial forces to bring into reality the dream to which she referred.

I shall therefore talk briefly about the Heritage Lottery Fund, because hon. Members will know that it is a national UK body. Although our Department has no responsibility for culture in Scotland—nor should it—we do have an overseeing purpose regarding the HLF. To make matters even more complicated, the HLF is itself independent of Government—so in some ways I feel twice removed from the issue about which we are talking. None the less, I accept a responsibility to keep a careful eye on what is going on.

The HLF has had a relationship with the Burns national heritage park over the years. I reviewed it for the debate and it was clear that it had been an up-and-down relationship. There have been seven applications for HLF funding since February 1997, and the pattern is that small ones were granted and large ones were turned down. It is good news that in 1996 just over £65,000 was granted for repairs; in 2000 just over £98,000 was granted for a curator to help with preparation of a bid; and in 2003 just over £49,000 was granted for project planning for the redevelopment of the cottage museum.

However, the applications that were turned down were of far greater monetary value. There were applications for £1 million in June 1998, for £1.25 million in December 2002, and for more than £5 million in December 2004, although that was withdrawn. Those big bids tended to be withdrawn rather than turned down. That told me, as I looked through the HLF applications, that the HLF was not unwilling to engage with the Scottish authorities and the trustees. It looked to me as if when the big bids came in, something was not right with the applications. I suspect—although I can only guess at this—that they have fallen on advice from the HLF about the likelihood of securing approval and a suggestion that the applicant should get its house in order before proceeding further.

Sandra Osborne: The Minister makes a very good point. I believe that we are pushing at an open door with the Heritage Lottery Fund. There have been several applications, and there has been no mechanism to enable anyone to ask, "What is the problem? We cannot allow the drift to continue." Do the relevant agencies have a role to play in being a bit more proactive?

Estelle Morris: My hon. Friend makes the point exactly about the way forward. An organisation is needed to do as she describes. It cannot be the HLF; it cannot say, "Let's get our act in order. We will take on leadership, co-ordinate the funders and the trustees and see whether we can arrange things." However, the HLF will equally not conduct the equivalent of an Ofsted inspection, sitting quiet until the bid is made and then passing it or failing it. It does not have that sort of relationship with an applicant, but something in between.

A bid as large as the one that we are discussing should never get to the point of being submitted without a fair understanding on the part of the applicants of the likelihood of success. To proceed otherwise is a waste of time and resources. I see it as the duty of the HLF—it is an obligation that it accepts and fulfils for many major projects—to work with the applicant, advise on where there are shortfalls and help with putting the bid in good order.

All that that will mean is that when the bid is made, it will be in good order and eligible, and can compete with others for what are inevitably limited funds. The relationship with the HLF cannot guarantee the funding, because one cannot know how many bids, or of what value, will be made. However, the Burns heritage park needs someone other than the HLF to play the leadership role, and be the point of contact.

The light on the horizon, which my hon. Friend mentioned, is that the National Trust for Scotland has expressed an interest in that role. I do not suggest that it should put in more money than anyone else; that is not for me to do, but the equivalent of a lead body is needed. My hon. Friend alluded to the history, and we all know about such things from our constituency experiences—I can almost imagine what has gone on, without needing to be a Scottish Member. There have been many interested parties and people willing to help, but no one with an agreed lead role.

As an outsider, my reading of the situation is that we could be most optimistic if the trustees and other parties would unite around a lead partner. Choosing the National Trust for Scotland for that role would give the HLF a better chance of doing the negotiation before the bid was put in. The reasons given for the project being turned down in the past were things like value for money, long-term sustainability and management—we are talking about a multi-million pound project. The HLF will advise on each of those things, but cannot do them for the bidder and cannot take an ongoing lead role. Perhaps there is a time for all of these things.

For Scottish Members of Parliament, and for Scottish Members representing English seats as well—certainly with the pressure of 2009 upon us all—I agree with my hon. Friend that nobody would want the Scots from throughout the world returning to see that the memory of Robert Burns, the greatest of all the national poets, has not been honoured in a way in which they would expect. If 2009 gives us incentive to ensure that that has happened by then, that is good. If the National Trust for Scotland can provide that lead role, all the better. All I can do today is to say to my hon. Friend that the HLF is a source of income to which an application would be in order, but no promises can be given, as it will need to be considered alongside other applications. The HLF is willing to talk and make sure that as the bid is being developed it stands the best possible chance of being ruled in order and being competitive. Maybe those issues are beginning to come together—perhaps for the first time in a while.

I know that with the leadership that my hon. Friend has shown in her constituency all those concerned will not let this opportunity slip away. I congratulate her on having a most historic constituency and on having the foresight to allow us all at Westminster to celebrate Burns day today. Celebrating it in Westminster is apt—although I suspect that they are having greater celebrations north of the border—and I wish her every success in the project that she has taken on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. Member for Ayr (Sandra Osborne) for her kind invitation in 2009. Since I shall not be a Member of this House, I will be able to accept it.

Obesity (Young People)

2 pm

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): I am delighted to have the opportunity to raise a subject that is of interest to people inside and outside the House.

The problem of obesity is spiralling out of control in the United Kingdom, although it is not unique to this country and affects others too, notably the United States of America. Already, 8.5 per cent. of six-year-olds and 15 per cent. of 15-year-olds are classed as obese. It is estimated that the cost to the economy of obesity is around £7.5 billion and that obesity reduces life expectancy by nine years. The BBC has reported that more than 30,000 deaths a year in England alone are caused by obesity. We know too that obesity leads to other health-related problems, including arthritis, heart disease and diabetes. In addition, there is the risk that certain cancers, such as prostate cancer, are more difficult to diagnose in those with obesity.

It is in young people, however, that the problems have increased at an alarming rate. Since 1982, the number of obese children has doubled. If present trends continue, half of all children in the United Kingdom could be termed obese by 2020. We need to take action now, before it is too late for our children. There is an acknowledged problem, so action is needed now. When I talk about obesity, I am not referring to a genetic condition termed Prader-Willi syndrome, which I believe was the subject of a BBC 2 documentary last night.

What is being done to help young people not to become obese? The "Choosing Health" White Paper is a welcome step in the right direction. The Prime Minister notes in the foreword:

> "Government cannot—and should not—pretend it can 'make' the population healthy. But it can—and should—support people in making better choices for their health and the health of their families. It is for people to make the healthy choice if they wish to."

That is okay as far as it goes, but the Government should ensure that young people receive the information that they need to make the correct choices. If people are not doing enough exercise and are not maintaining their health with the information that the Government provide—the figures that I have quoted prove that people are not—much more must be done to give information to young people. I mentioned the cost of £7.5 billion, which is a huge drain on the economy, never mind the fact that the quality of life for young people with obesity will be dramatically altered.

Obesity is on everyone's radar screen. I welcome the Health Committee's report on obesity from last year and I am delighted that hon. Members who serve on that Committee are here this afternoon. On 9 February, between 8.15 am and 10 o'clock, the hon. Member for Dartford (Dr. Stoate), who is also here, will hold a mini conference to discuss the White Paper.

I read with interest the Hansard report on the hon. Gentleman's debate on the same subject in January 2003, which I am sure he remembers well. The then Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Tottenham (Mr. Lammy), said:

> "Much more needs to be done to ensure that both children and adults have all the information that they need to choose a healthy lifestyle."

"A low level of physical activity among children also contributes to a rising level of obesity."—[Official Report, 22 January 2003; Vol. 398, cc. 132–33WH.]

Two years on from that debate, why has so little been done on obesity? Talk is clearly cheap, but we now need action to ensure that the problem is properly tackled.

Physically active people have a 20 to 30 per cent. reduced risk of premature death and a reduced risk of contracting major chronic diseases such as coronary heart disease, stroke, diabetes and cancer of up to 50 per cent. It is estimated that more than one in 200 people in the UK are diabetic and that the figure is dramatically increasing. It is clear how important it is not to be obese or overweight and to take physical exercise.

Some 30 per cent. of boys and 40 per cent. of girls are not meeting the recommended one hour a day of physical activity for children. It is in school that that should become second nature, as part of their way of life. The number of obese children has tripled in the past 20 years. Physical education is a compulsory part of the national curriculum up to key stage 4—or 16 to the rest of us. In 2001, the Labour party manifesto stated:

"We pledge a sports entitlement for all children, giving them access to at least two hours a week of sport in or after school."

We now know that that target has been missed. According to the Department for Culture, Media and Sport, sport and physical activity among five to 16-year-olds has actually declined since 1999. According to teachers, children are lucky to get two 45-minute sessions a week. Given the time that it takes to get to the gym, change and have a shower afterwards, we are talking about nothing like 45 minutes, and children would be lucky to get two sessions of half an hour, which adds up to one hour a week.

Recently, I spoke to Heinrich Ungerer, a PE instructor from County Hall gym. He said that young people should exercise at least three times a week, spacing their exercise sessions out within the week so that their bodies had time to repair. He believes that many young people rely on their metabolic rate to hide the fact that they simply do not do enough exercise. It is my view, therefore, that physical activity provision in schools should be increased so that youngsters get exercise at least three times a week—Monday, Wednesday and Friday—and for at least an hour each time, not including the time that it takes for them to change and shower.

I am of the considered belief that, in the past, physical activity, or PE, was always seen as an add-on—it was something that we had to do, but if we could not do it, we would not be too bothered. Furthermore, some of the equipment in schools, certainly in my day, was not up to the job. Physical education in schools should, however, be as important as maths, reading and writing, and I hope that the Minister will confirm that she, too, believes that it is as important as some of the other subjects in the curriculum.

We also need to make it exciting for young people to go to the gym. I referred to the facilities in schools in my day, but we know that state-of-the-art equipment is now available in the best gyms in the country. I do not see why our youngsters should suffer, and I hope that the Minister can give us some good news about ensuring that all schools can now start to re-equip their gyms with state-of-the-art equipment so that youngsters will be encouraged to use them.

Clearly, a one-hour session will not be enough for students to stay fit, and there are initiatives to help children who are being failed by the education system. I can point to things that are being done in my constituency, and I suspect that all hon. Members could do the same in theirs. For instance, I am president of the Clitheroe Wolves football club, which is led by George Hibbert, and I pay great tribute to him. Every Saturday, he has up to 400 boys and girls of all ages out training in Clitheroe. They play football regularly, and they play in teams too. That is superb. Clearly, with 400 youngsters, he does not do that all on his own; he has a number of other dedicated volunteers to help him, and I pay tribute to them. I saw them working last summer in Clitheroe, and it was fantastic to see so many youngsters out enjoying themselves. Clearly, the scheme is outside the education system.

I have also been in touch with Farouk Hussain; he, too, is a volunteer, and he works with other volunteers to run the Clitheroe cricket club for youngsters. He says that, on Thursdays, well over 100 youngsters regularly take part in exercising through cricket. He also has 35 youngsters who coach themselves and other youngsters; that is not only helping them to keep fit, but teaching them leadership. I congratulate him and his volunteers.

In Wales, people over 60 are entitled to free swimming, and some youngsters are also eligible. A constituent asked why that provision could not be extended throughout the country, and the Minister responded that it was not possible for the Government to provide such schemes. However, swimming is one of the healthiest forms of exercise that we can do, and I hope that the Government will look again at the issue. I hope that they will look at what is happening in Wales and at why we cannot extend that throughout the country.

I also congratulate those involved in sporting events such as the London mini marathon, which has been going on since 1986. Teams can enter from all the London boroughs, and there are also 10 county teams and home county teams from Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. Many of us will be familiar with other mini marathons that take place throughout the country, encouraging youngsters to get fit, undergo training and participate in and enjoy running in the marathon.

Professional football clubs must also be congratulated on the work that they do with youngsters. Blackburn Rovers is just outside my constituency. The club runs a number of programmes designed to tackle obesity and promote healthy eating. The students study what a player eats in a day, comparing a player's diet with what they eat, and consider questions such as, "why should you eat healthily?" The club also gets the children to monitor their physical fitness by running up to 100 m and then monitoring their heartbeat. Programmes are designed specifically to meet the different needs, ages and academic abilities of the pupils. They also consider other important health issues such as the dangers of alcohol. A number of other professional football clubs participate in such schemes, and we should encourage the spread of such schemes throughout the country to all football clubs.

It is also important that there is provision for physical activity in the workplace. I asked BAE Systems, which is based in Samlesbury in my constituency, what sort of facilities were provided and found that there was a sports and social association—a gym at the factory with up to 500 members, about 20 per cent of the work force. But the company also encourages youngsters into its grounds to participate in sport in the summer. More such initiatives should be encouraged.

In the workplace, there is a tax of 20 per cent on "free" memberships of gyms at work as a benefit in kind. I know that the Prime Minister is looking at taxation as a way of incentivising people to take out gym membership. Indeed, we should be looking at ways of ensuring that we at least do not penalise companies when they offer free gym membership to their workers. So I hope that when the Chancellor of the Exchequer speaks in just over a couple of months' time he will be able to give some good news in this regard.

I have discussed physical activity. Now I shall speak about food education. Education in what we eat could go some way to stem the problems of obesity. Food education is loosely mentioned in some of the subjects covered at school, such as science subjects. When young children are taught about keeping their teeth clean, they are told which foods can be harmful to their teeth. I have learned of schools that have personal, social and health education that includes some teaching on healthy eating, but there is little direction and there are few examples of firm education on how to lead a healthy lifestyle. Including that in the national curriculum would benefit youngsters and the whole country. Most adults and children do not meet the dietary recommendations of five pieces of fruit and vegetables a day.

I welcome an initiative mentioned in one of today's newspapers, led by the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Geraint Davies), who is campaigning and trying to enforce nutritional standards for school meals. Under his private Member's Bill, nutritional information would be displayed on school menus and vending machines on school premises would be regulated. Any increase in the amount of information that we can give to young people about what they eat must be welcomed.

I have been contacted several times about the food that is provided in vending machines in schools. I welcome initiatives by the Dairy Council and the Food Standards Agency, such as the healthy drinks vending study in 12 secondary schools across England and Wales. The pilot, managed by the Health Education Trust, examined the likely demand for healthy alternatives to carbonated drinks. For 24 weeks vending machines containing healthy drinks such as milk, water and fruit juice operated alongside more traditional machines. I read that the scheme was a great success. It gave youngsters choice and around 70,000 drinks were purchased from the machines, the most popular being semi-skimmed milk, milkshakes, mineral water and pure juices. With schemes like this, we can make a direct impact on young people's lives. Although this was a pilot and a leaflet was produced and distributed to 9,000 schools, it is no promise that things will change in schools without direction. We need clear commitments from the Government to ensure that drinks like these get into school vending machines.

Fast food is always the butt of everyone's criticisms when it comes to talking about obesity. The Health Committee had meetings with McDonald's, among others, concerning obesity. A recent article in the Financial Times highlights these anti-fast food sentiments and I believe that Brussels has given the food industry a year to stop advertising its fast food in the way that it does and to improve product labelling or face legislation from a European level.

I went to McDonald's when it had one of its open days at the top of Victoria street. I was pleased to see that it is beginning to recognise that there is a problem, and that it wants to give its customers a varied choice. It has introduced items like fruit segments, which it never had before. Super-size meals have been junked out of the window, and salads have now started to feature on the menu. It also makes skimmed milk available to customers. I welcome its initiatives, such as partnerships with the four home-nation football governing bodies, which will create 10,000 community coaches across the United Kingdom between 2002 and 2006. McDonald's calculates that those partnerships have led to children aged seven to 16 across the country receiving an extra 800,000 hours of coaching. McDonald's seems to recognise its social responsibility: it provides food, giving more choice to youngsters, but it is also doing something about exercise, which is absolutely right.

There has been a similar movement to promote a healthier lifestyle by Coca-Cola, another company berated from time to time for its products. The company has a four-point strategy for supporting healthier diets and active lifestyles, including initiatives such as offering greater product choice, more low-sugar and diet drinks, greater promotion of Diet Coke, the expansion of responsible sales and marketing practices, such as commercial-free zones in schools, and the encouragement of communities to take part in a range of grass-roots sports, including the schools football cup, which a number of youngsters participate in. As hon. Members will know, I have my own retail convenience store, and what I hear about the sale of Diet Coke now being greater than the sale of ordinary Coca-Cola is certainly reflected in my business. I welcome the company's decision not to brand its vending machines, which will offer a full choice, especially of the lower-sugar and diet products. I understand that it has just introduced a smaller size of Diet Coke can as well.

I hope that the Minister can give us some good news following today's debate—one of many that we have held in the House on this subject. Will she look carefully at ensuring that the level of activity for children in schools will be increased, that activity will be treated as seriously as other subjects on the school curriculum, and that sports facilities generally will be improved and made more available to children, particularly in summer? I cannot stand the fact that when the schools close in summer, the sports facilities alongside them close as well. We have mentioned that time and again in the House over the past few years. The excuse, or maybe a legitimate reason, is that they are afraid to open up, let us say, the soccer fields or the tennis courts because they cannot get insurance. The facilities would have to be insured, and people would have to be paid to monitor the youngsters. I hope that the Minister will look at making facilities within schools available during school holidays, and in the evenings. I know that a lot is done with community school sports facilities—we have one in Longbridge, in my constituency—and we must ensure that they are also fully supported.

On the nutritional side, more information must be given to youngsters, both in the classroom and in the dining room, regarding the nutritional value of what they are eating and the long-term effects if they do not correct their diet and balance their lifestyle with healthy exercise. That is vital. Fruit, for instance, is a cheap and economical food these days, and in many supermarkets is cheaper than some of the other foods that youngsters buy. Fruit is filling and hugely good for them. We need to give that information to youngsters so that they can make intelligent choices. Unless we do so, we are storing up much greater problems for ourselves in the future.

Dr. Howard Stoate (Dartford) (Lab): I am pleased to be called in a debate of enormous importance not just to the House but to everyone in the country. I am pleased, too, that the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) has secured an opportunity for the House to look in hard detail at an extremely worrying and important issue.

I am particularly pleased to take part as I understand I am the only practising GP left in the House. I chair a number of Back-Bench all-party groups—the all-party group on obesity, the all-party group on primary care and public health, the all-party group on pharmacy and the all-party group on men's health—all of which have taken an active interest in the problem of obesity. I co-authored, with my research assistant Bryan Jones, a report published just over a year ago by the Fabian Society called "All's Well That Starts Well". That came up with some controversial views that were well received and debated by people outside—in the media and across the country—and again contributed to the debate.

I am pleased to be president of Team Darenth, a cycling club in my constituency. The club is one of the largest and most successful in south-east England. It teaches young people how to ride their bikes safely and how to use cycling as a sport and hobby—indeed, as a learning experience for life. Many young people are benefiting from that club and the person running it, Michael Humphries, has put great efforts into making it a success.

Along with other hon. Members, I have on many occasions referred to a time bomb of obesity. I must be slightly out of date as my friend and colleague Dr. David Haslam, chair of the National Obesity Forum, says that the time bomb of obesity has already gone off and what we are now waiting for is the time bomb of diabetes and heart disease that will follow it. That is what we are facing. The hon. Member for Ribble Valley has already alluded to obesity leading to significant increases in diabetes and heart disease. What he did not mention is that someone with a body mass index of 30 and above faces anything up to 30 times the risk of getting diabetes at some time during their life.

When I was a medical student, type 2 diabetes was considered to be a disease of middle and old age—indeed, it was called maturity onset diabetes. It is now called type 2 diabetes partly because we are seeing it happening in much younger people. It is wrong to call it a disease of maturity and middle age, as it can now happen in the teenage years, or even before.

It should be a worrying pointer for us all to be seeing significant numbers of children coming through diabetic and endocrine clinics in our hospitals, suffering from diabetes. Those children face a hugely increased risk of heart disease, early death, blindness, loss or amputation of limbs. The complications of diabetes are pretty unpleasant and the longer one has it, the more complications arise. Therefore, a person who gets diabetes in their teens has an extremely high chance of complications as they get older. That wrecks not only their own lives, but the lives of their families. As the hon. Gentleman has mentioned, it causes a huge drain on resources for the entire health service and the wider community.

I do not need to rehearse the statistics that the hon. Gentleman mentioned, but he is right that the number of obese children has trebled in the past 20 years. That should give us all pause for thought. Another worrying statistic is that, in a typical week, one in five children eat no fruit at all, according to the national diet and nutrition survey in 2000. Nine out of 10 children taking packed lunches to school have lunches that contain far too much fat, salt and sugar. Therefore, we face a massive problem.

It is not right to say that the Government have not taken the matter seriously. As the hon. Gentleman said, I secured a debate about this important issue a couple of years ago. I am extremely gratified by the huge amount of work that the Government have done, particularly the Minister who is on the Front Bench today. In publishing the recent White Paper on public health, she has made an enormous contribution to this topic. It would be wrong to score party political points by saying the Government have not taken it seriously, when clearly they have.

I know that the Minister will go through the arrangements the Government have put in place in more detail, but I want to recap a few of them to give hon. Members an idea of the range of topics that the Government are addressing. For example, we are trying to ensure that children have equal access to healthy living, a main area of action outlined in the White Paper. Meanwhile, the Sure Start programme, which is already helping children with healthy living, will develop new child development projects, including volunteers visiting families who are under stress and who need extra support.

That is very helpful, as is some of the action that is targeted at schools such as the national healthy schools programme, which is encouraging schools to foster better health. The provision of free fruit and vegetables to all children aged four to six has been enormously popular in my constituency. When I visit schools in my area, particularly primary schools, many children are extremely pleased to get their free fruit every morning in school. I find that extremely helpful. They are teaching their own parents to buy and eat fruit. That has also been important.

The Government are working hard on revising school meals to improve their nutritional content. There is more support for cycling to school and for promoting sport in schools. At least 400 sports specialist schools are to be established over the next few years and the food in schools programme, a joint venture between the Department of Health and the Department for Education and Skills, will help to ensure that children have access to healthy choices of food in schools. The programme will develop a range of nutrition-related activities and projects in schools to add value to some of the other things that they are doing.

Another cornerstone of the White Paper is the promotion of joint action by local authorities and business voluntary groups to tackle local health inequalities and other issues. People are to be encouraged to become more active through cycling and walking initiatives and will have easier access to sports facilities. By 2006, local authorities are forecast to have built more than 7,000 miles of new cycle tracks and cycle lanes.

Consumers are to be helped to choose healthier meals by a colour-coded system of food labelling and will have more guidance on portion sizes, while the Government, working with the food industry, aim to reduce levels of salt, added sugars and fat.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford) (Con): In what is known as the traffic light system of labelling—the hon. Gentleman has a medical background, which may help—what colour would the label be for an avocado pear? On the one hand it is a fruit that we are encouraged to eat; on the other hand, if eaten regularly, it could cause one to become quite fat.

Dr. Stoate: There are several responses to that question, but most of the deprived children in my community are not worrying too much about avocado pears. We need to concentrate more on the staple foods and diets that they will be eating.

Mr. Burns: Answer the question.

Dr. Stoate: The answer is that there will always be difficult areas at the margins, and we must make a sensible and grown-up decision about certain foodstuffs that do not easily fall into a category. The hon. Gentleman is right. There will be some foods at the margins that will be difficult to classify, but that does not undermine the point of the scheme, which is to give people simpler, more straightforward and more helpful advice, particularly those who have to feed large families on relatively fixed incomes.

Mr. Burns: May I try again? If the aim is to have better, simpler, comprehensive labelling, so that consumers know what they are buying, is not it unhelpful that three different supermarket chains are working on their own labelling systems, which are all at variance with one another and will simply cause more confusion?

Dr. Stoate: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman. It is nonsense for different companies to work on completely contradictory schemes. I hope that the Minister will be able to explain how the Government will work with the different food retailers to make sure that they produce a harmonised scheme that is simple and easy to understand. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that it is easy to pick holes in such initiatives, but their point is to make life much simpler and more straightforward for those who are struggling.

Seventy per cent. of young families admit that they do not have enough information to ensure that their children are fed healthily. That is a worrying statistic, and I am pleased that the Government are looking at it and are trying to improve it. Although there will be difficulties and problems in achieving that improvement, we must help the 70 per cent. of families who are struggling to feed their children because of a lack of appropriate knowledge.

Mr. Evans: The hon. Gentleman is a doctor, and it is good to have a doctor in the House on these occasions, but surely the whole point of giving youngsters and parents information is so that, when they are deciding what to eat, they can choose a balanced diet. Eating the same foods is not a balanced diet. Sometimes they can have chocolate or chips, but not at every meal, not three times a day.

Dr. Stoate: That is entirely the point; it is exactly what we must concentrate on. No one is saying, "Chocolate is always bad. Coca-Cola is always bad". Of course they are not. What is bad is the proportion of the diet that those foods make up. People should be free to eat what they want, but if they have the information to make choices that balance their diet and can choose from a wide range of available foods, which I am pleased to say most shops now stock, that will improve nutrition. Therefore, it is a question not of banning foods or making them difficult to get, but of making sure that people have the right information to make balanced choices for themselves.

I want to scotch the idea that we are producing a nanny state—that is precisely what we are not doing. The Government are ensuring that people are properly educated in order to make choices for themselves. At the moment, when anyone raises the issue of obesity in the House, the newspapers jump on it and make it look as though the Government are telling people how to live their lives, which is exactly what we are not doing. I am pleased to be able to make that point.

As I have said, there is an awful lot going on. In 2007, the Government will launch a new health initiative, health direct, which will be an online service and phone helpline that will allow people access to all sorts of information to improve their health. The Government have done a lot, but I am not complacent and we are not yet reversing the trend. Although they are on the right track, it is not working yet because we are still seeing an increase in obesity in children. The problem is getting worse, not better, so much more must be done.

The extraordinary thing about nutrition is that children are not born with a particular taste in food. They are not born wanting burgers, chips and cola; that is learned behaviour. We must tackle the problem at the point where children learn that behaviour. The situation is a bit like that of smoking. Once someone has become a smoker, they are a smoker. If we can prevent them from taking up smoking, it will have a great effect on their health chances.

The same thing applies to young children. Something happens at a very young age to many children that turns them on to a diet that is far too high in saturated fat, sugar and salt. If we can get a handle on that early formation of their dietary preferences, we can make an effective difference. Hopefully, they will then grow up with a taste for less unhealthy foods, healthier options, more fruit and vegetables and less saturated fat.

We need to concentrate far more on food education, which has become increasingly marginalised in schools during the past 20 years. I understand that there is increasing pressure on the curriculum for all sorts of core subjects, which must be tackled. Often, however, schools lack specialist equipment, kitchen space and appropriately trained teachers, which is one of the biggest problems. That has led to the statistic I cited earlier: 70 per cent. of parents do not know how to feed their children effectively. They did not learn how to do that at school, so it is hardly surprising that they are unable to pass the relevant information on to their children.

We should make food education a compulsory part of primary and secondary education. Unless children are brought up with a good understanding of what constitutes a healthy diet and how to make such choices, there is little chance of them getting it right. As we know, there is a statutory obligation for primary schools to offer food technology lessons, but that does not apply to secondary schools. The Government recommend that schools offer students the opportunity to study food technology. However, 10 per cent. of schools offer nothing at all and many give students only a limited introduction to the subject.

At the moment, the food technology syllabus comes under the heading of design and technology, which means that students are far more likely to spend time designing the biscuit packaging than understanding what the biscuit contains and whether it is good for them. Obviously, altering the curriculum will have significant cost implications. For a start, schools will need extra grants to invest in kitchens and equipment. Teachers will need help to get the necessary training. There would be a cost implication, but we have a duty to consider that to see where Government, local authorities and local education authorities can help to put things right.

Mr. Evans: One of the statistics that I used showed that obesity costs the NHS about £7.5 billion. We are talking about shifting the money from when the problem exists to before it exists. I suspect that a percentage of the money used to tackle the problems of obesity after it has happened could be used to prevent it, which would mean that we saved more money than we spent.

Dr. Stoate: I happen to agree with that constructive comment. We could do that if we recognised the opportunity cost of transferring some resources into prevention. The hon. Gentleman is right. Such initiatives can be brought to bear to improve the position.

There is an initiative in my constituency called "Don't Sit, Get Fit", which is an excellent example of what can be achieved in schools and the community. It has given scores of children in Dartford and Gravesham the opportunity for the first time to take part in regular out-of-school exercise and to learn about healthy eating. Its latest initiative, a healthy living calendar, involved 12 primary schools in Dartford and Gravesham each contributing a healthy recipe. That is a valuable resource. Last week, I met children who were involved. They were extremely energised and enthused by it and were learning a lot from it.

The other area of the school curriculum that is vital is physical education. The Government's White Paper, "Schools—achieving success", gave a commitment that all children will be entitled to two hours of physical education a week. I accept the point that the hon. Gentleman made. Two hours does not always necessarily translate into two hours of actual activity, as there are issues at each end of the lesson. However, at least it goes a long way towards putting that right.

To back up that commitment, the Government have already spent more than £1 billion on the development of school sport. It is hoped that, by 2006, 75 per cent. of all pupils will be participating in physical activity and sport each week. That is encouraging.

The Government are also encouraging schools to develop stronger links with the community and sports clubs to encourage kids to continue their interests outside school. One in five year 2 to 11 students in sports partnership schools now participate in clubs with links to their schools. Again, that is spreading out into the wider community, which is the sort of thing that we need to do.

If we focus on schools as the main driver, the benefits can spill out into the wider community. The cycle club that I mentioned is based in school premises, which the school has made available to the club to use at weekends. To answer the point that the hon. Gentleman made about school facilities not being open outside school hours, they often are. Team Darenth is able to use the school at weekends and has free access to the school grounds, the playing fields and all the things that are needed to ensure that the kids have access to off-road safe cycling and facilities. It can be done. It is just a question of the initiative needed to get it going and the will to drive it along.

I would like trained specialist coaches, particularly from some of our prestigious sports clubs, to go into schools. I know that some already do that, and I think that that could be widened. I would like school sports facilities to be made more accessible to other members of the community, so that the benefits from the school spill out into the community and the community comes into the school to use its sports facilities and other equipment. That can foster closer links and hopefully forge greater partnerships.

Another area that we need to consider is transport to school. Currently, only one in 11 primary school children travel to school unaccompanied, compared with one in five a decade ago. The number of children being driven to school has increased enormously over the past 20 years. We need to do something to reduce the dependence on car transport and to encourage more kids to walk and cycle to school regularly. That is essential to get them into the habit of taking daily exercise. It is not only exercise at school that is important, but the exercise that they get while going to school and the other things that that will achieve. The Government have made £50 million available to help schools and local authorities to draw up measures to reduce car dependency. Again, that is a successful start. It obviously needs to go further, but it is an important beginning.

Another problem is access to fresh food. In the UK today, we buy 80 per cent. of our food in the main national supermarket chains. Those supermarkets are designed and located to cater for the affluent car-owning majority. If one does not have a car—one in five of us does not—access to supermarkets, which are often in edge-of-town locations, is severely reduced. The Government are now revising planning guidance to prevent any edge-of-town spread. However, in my constituency, many of the supermarkets are based on the edge of communities and are quite difficult to get to if one does not have access to private transport.

A young mother with two children in a pushchair, trying to carry home the weekly shop on a bus, would know what I mean. It is extremely difficult. Many of them have to resort to taxis, which they can ill afford, or else they have to shop in more expensive shops that offer a narrower range of foodstuffs. That issue needs to be tackled if we are to reverse the trend.

Mr. Burns: How?

Dr. Stoate: Quite often, the shops in the middle of towns not only offer a more restricted range of food but are more expensive. They do not offer the choice that supermarkets do.

I will give the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) an example. A basket of healthier food is significantly more expensive than a basket of unhealthy food. A survey was carried out a while ago in a London suburb that showed that a basket of healthy food is 41 per cent. more expensive than the equivalent basket of less healthy food. That obviously puts a huge strain on the budget of families with limited incomes. It means that they are much more likely to choose foods that are less healthy for their children purely on the ground of economics. We need to look hard at that to ensure that healthy, fresh produce is priced in a way that makes it accessible to members of society with less disposable income.

Quite a lot of work has been done on street markets. Many street markets, which often offer a wide range of affordable food, are being squeezed by some of the large out-of-town developments that tend to have a negative impact on many market towns. The number of market stalls reduces as supermarkets gain a greater market share. That puts more pressure on costs and can drive them up beyond what many people can afford.

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam) (LD): I take the hon. Gentleman's point about the changes in Government planning guidance that will move supermarkets increasingly from the edges to the centres of towns. How, precisely, will that change help those markets?

Dr. Stoate: One of points that I wanted to make was that we need incentive schemes. There are still many difficult estates that are, effectively, food deserts. Often, there are no shops in those inner-city areas, or the shops that are available offer narrow choice and foodstuffs that are not necessarily appealing to people, or do not have a sufficient range.

I should like the Government to look hard at the idea of a fresh food audit for some of our difficult towns and cities, which would discover what fresh foods were available there. If areas fell below a Government standard for the fresh food that should be available, serious consideration should be given to tax breaks or subsidies to ensure that those foodstuffs were available to people who could not get access to out of town shopping centres.

I know that my suggestion is a bit controversial and I do not expect the Government to promise such a bold step at once. However, I want them to take a hard look at ways of improving the availability of foods in areas where people have low incomes and poor access to transport, and find it extremely difficult to get healthy food for their families. If we could get that right, it would make a huge difference to nutrition and to the massive burden of obesity that we all face. It will affect the whole country sooner or later. If we do not tackle the problem now, we shall all face the consequences in years to come.

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) on securing the debate. Seldom have I heard him speak with such passion and enthusiasm. He was entirely right to choose the subject of obesity in young people. I was initially concerned when he seemed to concentrate most of his remarks on physical activity, but he more than redressed the balance in the latter part of his speech. I think that the emphasis, in dealing with this problem, should come from the fact that we would not die if we did not engage in physical activity but would die if we did not eat and drink.

Four hon. Members are present for the debate, and all are or have been members of the Health Committee. I consider our report on obesity to be the most profound of any that we have produced since I became a member of the Committee. I do not want to pre-empt remarks that I hope to make on 10 February when the Minister will respond to our report. I simply want to say that the Health Committee report has led the way on the subject of tackling obesity.

After the Obesity Awareness and Solutions Trust came to see me at my surgery and shared with me a significant number of problems that rather large ladies face, I attended a meeting of the Committee in which we considered our future programme. In complete naivety I suggested the subject of obesity and all members of the Committee agreed. Now our report is of national and international importance.

When I asked the producer of the BBC's "Fat Nation" programme, "You do know, don't you, all about the Health Committee report and the fact that we started this?", I was reassured when she said that she will run the programme for two years and that she is not into gesture politics. I am sure that all hon. Members have been sent videos in connection with ITV's Britain on the move campaign. I am told that those running it are not into gesture politics either. They will continue with the campaign for a considerable time.

[Mr. David Amess]

No politician or Government should be engaging in gesture politics on this subject. It cannot be cured by photo opportunities of politicians on bikes, or taking part in marathons, or with young people. If the country is serious about dealing with obesity—and it is not yet—doing so will take at least two decades. That is why it is so important that the Government listen to the Obesity Awareness and Solutions Trust strategy for dealing with obesity. I am sure that the House of Commons is sick to death of listening to all the statistics about how many people are obese and how many ailments one can contract as a result of obesity. The House does not need any more proof that obesity is a serious subject. We need some action and leadership; we do not need gesture politics. That is why I look forward to the Government's response on 10 February to our Select Committee report.

Southend does not intend to wait for the Government to act; we intend to lead the way with initiatives. The Minister of State has been in correspondence with me about a frontier-leading production by Sally Lawrence. I can sense that a general election is on the way, as everybody is mentioning local initiatives so I am not going to step away from that. My constituent Sally Lawrence, from Outloud Productions recently came to see me at a surgery with a great idea to promote healthy eating among young people. Her production, "An Unhealthy Invasion", is an innovative approach to promoting healthy eating. The Minister's letter arrived today with her views on the initiative. In the production, the characters, Healthy Kid, Vitamin Girl, High Energy and Protein Dog join forces to rid the world of Gargoyle the Greedy and end his oppressive reign of obesity. The production's use of comic book-style characters is an excellent way to tap into the mindset of young children and teach them about the problems of obesity.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley has concentrated on young people. Those of us who have children observe daily how young people live their lives. I have five young children. We have a black labrador dog, which requires a great deal of exercise. If I were to ask my children, "Would one of you kindly take the dog for a walk?", one or two expletives would be let out, and eventually one of them would go to the front door, open it and let the dog out of the house. The idea that young people are overwhelmingly and regularly into physical exercise in the sense that my hon. Friend has mentioned, is absolutely ridiculous. I can say that with all the experience of my children, who are attending school.

Young people live in a completely different style to that of hon. Members present. I walk a lot; young people do not. Those of us with children often run a taxi service. If they want to be dropped off at a party or see their friends, they do not walk half a mile, they say to mum and dad, "Can you give me a lift?" Mobile phones, the internet: all that technology has meant that young people, as they go about their daily lives, do not participate in as much physical activity as they used to.

I hope that in 2012 we will have the Olympic games in London. I totally support that. If we are successful, it will provide a big boost for physical activity among young people. However, we cannot wait until 2012; we cannot wait until the announcement this year; we have to do something now. My hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) referred to the traffic light system. During the Health Committee's inquiry into obesity, we visited America and had talks with McDonald's and Coca-Cola. We were all appalled at what we witnessed. We found those companies in a state of denial. They did not want to talk about the amount of sugar, salt and fat in their products. They were much keener to talk about the emphasis that they wanted to place on physical exercise. I feel strongly that our battle is with the food manufacturers.

In the last parliamentary Session, I raised with the then Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Twigg), the issue of healthy eating in schools. In America, we saw healthy schools and unhealthy schools. We saw some schools where one could get snacks at any time. At other schools, there was a ban on access to those snacks. The Government cannot step away from the issue. If schools in the United Kingdom say, "We cannot do away with vending machines because it would adversely affect our income", the Government must address the matter.

Mr. Burns: Am I right in thinking that my hon. Friend was a strong supporter of Baroness Thatcher when she introduced the local management of schools, which gave to governing bodies and head teachers the powers to run our schools? As my hon. Friend is nodding, I assume that he did support it. Surely it is up to governors and head teachers to take decisions on vending machines and not for the Government to interfere and lay down the law.

Mr. Amess: My hon. Friend has guessed the next point that I was going to make. It is entirely a matter for the governing bodies of those schools to determine priorities and to ensure that healthy eating and tackling obesity are at the top of the agenda. As far as the Government are concerned, guidance is advisable. I cannot see any reason why the Government should not let it be known that they hope that the governing bodies of our schools take the initiative on the issue. I am delighted to say that some schools in my constituency, for example St. Christopher's school, have taken the initiative on vending machines. At Belfairs high school, which I visited last Friday, healthy eating options are available immediately for young people.

Recommendation 19 of paragraph 222 of the Government's response to the Health Committee's report says:

> "We recommend that, rather than targeting sugar and fat separately, Government should focus on reducing overall energy density of food, and should work with the Food Standards Agency to develop stringent targets for reformulation of foods to reduce energy density within a short time frame."

I could not care less what the recommendation is. I want something to happen. I hate the expression "a traffic light system", but I hope that, in the next two decades, the food manufacturers will let it be easily recognisable where the healthy foods are in a supermarket. It is not the case that those of us who do supermarket shopping get hold of each product, look at its contents and say, "Well, this has got so much salt and so much fat." If we did that, we would never get our shopping done. However, it is possible to have a range of products in a supermarket that are either healthy or not so healthy, whether we call them red, green or tangerine. A number of famous supermarkets are bringing out healthy lines of products, but I think that a colour system is desirable.

Mr. Burns: Can my hon. Friend tell me how he would categorise an avocado pear?

Mr. Amess: My hon. Friend already gave notice of that question. I will write to him on the issue after I have discussed it with the people who supply avocados.

I am delighted to say that Southend-on-Sea borough council has a successful walking buses initiative. I hope that other local authorities will copy that. In Southend, in March, there will be a launch—I hope that it will attract some national interest—involving opinion formers and celebrities addressing the issue of obesity. It will not just be a photo opportunity for the great and the good to turn up, mouth a few words and then forget about it because they have done their bit. We need to be obsessive about this issue. Giving people the information—that is Government-speak: this is not the nanny state—will not be easy. If the Health Committee report, which I know all members of the Committee are proud of, is to deliver what we want eventually to see, we must create a climate in which it becomes second nature to eat and drink healthy products—with just as nice a taste as non-diet products—and in which people undertake as much physical activity as possible. This is the most serious and the biggest of all challenges that our health service faces today. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley on giving us the opportunity to debate it.

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) on securing the debate. It is a useful opportunity to review progress and to pose some questions to the Government. The hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) talked about the need to be obsessive. I concur that he is obsessive about this issue—and rightly so. A litany of statistics has been set out during the debate. Like him, I do not propose to trot out many more, but they are compelling evidence of the need to take the issue seriously and for this to be a matter of consistent and clear focus for public policy. They also make a compelling case for us as individuals to take stock of our own lives and the lives of those for whom we have caring responsibilities.

I take the point that was made by the hon. Member for Dartford (Dr. Stoate) that perhaps the obesity time bomb went off and we almost did not notice it. We are now feeling the aftershock and that in turn will lead to some huge health consequences. The Health Committee paid a visit to the United States as part of its inquiry into obesity. One of the points that was made when we visited the parks department in New York—the point was made time and again and it has been echoed in today's debate—was that children as young as four or five were now being diagnosed with type 2 diabetes. Cases among children of that age have been diagnosed in this country. The consequences for those young people's lives—lives that will be brought to an end far sooner than they should be, and that will be blighted by disability, blindness and many other things—mean that it behoves us all to make this an issue that involves not just debate, but action.

I was particularly struck by research that my hon. Friend the Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) undertook. He considered the views of heads of PE departments. Activity is undoubtedly part of the equation. The issue is about how we readjust the energy-in, energy-out equation so that we get ourselves into a virtuous circle rather the vicious weight-gain spiral that we are in now. In the survey, he considered what was going on in schools and found that just one in 10 heads of PE believe the average pupil in secondary school to be in good health and to have good fitness levels. Some 65 per cent. of those same heads of PE said that they felt that the health of those in their charge, in their schools, had deteriorated during the past five years.

That statistic bears out many of the findings of Sport England and other organisations, and of the chief medical officer, who found that levels of activity had gone down over the past decade or so. It is therefore not surprising that when the National Audit Office considered obesity, it came up with the shocking cost figures that the Health Committee has, in turn, looked at and updated. In 1998, the Committee found that the direct costs to the national health service would be £480 million and the indirect costs £2.1 billion—a combined cost of £2.58 billion to the economy. It estimated that the cost would rise to £3.6 billion by 2010. The Committee recalculated those costings and found that the cost of obesity alone was £3.7 billion—and that is the cost now, not by 2010. So the very conservative figures that the NAO came up with are already found to be wanting. The challenge is found to be greater. When "overweight" is added to the equation, the total cost rises to £7.4 billion a year, as we have heard. We need to be doing more to promote physical activity as part of the equation to reduce those risk factors.

I was struck by the contribution of the hon. Member for Southend, West regarding the parental angst of taxiing one's children from one place to another. The evidence from the University College London study into physical activity is very persuasive. It is not just the physical activity within the curriculum that matters. More calories were burned by walking to and from school than during the two hours of weekly PE lessons. It is not surprising, if most of that time is taken up with getting to the gym and getting changed, then having the exercise before getting changed and going away from the gym, that that two hours does not have the impact that is needed. Clearly, there is a lot that has to be done across government outside the Department of Health, in planning and highways policies, to make our environment beyond the school safer, so that people feel more willing to walk to school with their children, and more content for children to walk to school. That has to be a focus.

The Olympics in 2012 are all about excellence in sport. The key to cracking this problem is about encouraging everyone to participate in physical activity. We must not lose sight of that when we make decisions about the way in which the curriculum is structured and funding for sport is orientated, so that we do not underfund everyone taking part at the expense of ensuring that we have the excellence as well.

Nutrition has been mentioned. I feel very strongly that we need to see every school developing a nutrition policy in consultation with parents and children. That would be a powerful tool for change within schools. It would make possible critical discussion of the merits and demerits of, for example, tuck shops and vending machines, and what should be in those vending machines. That could be a useful way of moving things forward at a local level without undermining the autonomy of school governing bodies.

There is an area, however, where the Government have the right to step in: nutrition standards for school meals. One of the areas that I was particularly disappointed with in the public health White Paper, "Choosing Health: making health choices easier", was the Government's approach to nutrition standards. The Health Committee recommended that the English standards should be abandoned and we should adopt the Scottish standards. The Government are committed to a leisurely three-year review of this. They are only committed to considering it. They are not minded, at this point, to make such an important change, which could have a real impact on the quality of the food served in our schools.

It is worth picking up on what we have done to under-educate people about food. The hon. Member for Dartford mentioned that there is less education now, and there are no requirements in secondary schools. It is not surprising, therefore, that in 1983 the average time spent preparing a meal was about an hour. Today, that has gone down to 13 minutes. It is amazing that it takes that long to unwrap the packaging of a fast food meal and shove it in the microwave, but clearly it does. My belief is that we need to have a curriculum that equips everyone with the basics to shop for, and prepare, a meal—not a curriculum that turns out the food technologists of the future.

Mr. Evans: The hon. Gentleman has reached a very important point. Does he not also believe that newspapers have a role to play in giving this information to parents and youngsters? Indeed, in today's Metro, in Metro Health, it talks about breakfast being the most important meal of the day. It goes through about 10 options, saying that having nothing is the worst thing you can do, and porridge is the best. Would the hon. Gentleman recommend that newspapers play a more active role in disseminating information for parents and youngsters?

Mr. Burstow: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right that newspapers can play a powerful part in educating and informing parents, not least because it was found in a survey that one in four children regularly eat sweets and crisps for breakfast, not porridge, which is the more desirable foodstuff.

The other point that I should like to pick up briefly is reformulation. It is important not only that we focus on salt, but that sugar and fat are rapidly addressed. Food labelling has a part to play in driving the reformulation agenda. We need to move beyond a voluntary approach to labelling towards something mandatory, not least because of the confusion that could arise if a multiplicity of labelling schemes emerged throughout the country. Surely the Government should give a clear lead and a framework within which labelling schemes can be operated.

Hon. Members have rightly highlighted the challenges that obesity poses to the country and the costs, human, personal and to the economy as a whole, that it imposes. I hope that the Minister will say—or at least indicate when she will be able to say—at what point she believes the sum total of Government policies that bear down on the problem will reach a tipping point and the obesity trends will begin to reverse. If the Government are willing to set targets for others, we need to be clear what their own targets are, so that we can see whether Government policy really is making a difference and, ultimately, saving lives.

3.6 pm

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford) (Con): I warmly congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) on securing this important debate. We have heard in the speeches so far, from my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess), the hon. Member for Dartford (Dr. Stoate) and the Opposition Liberal Democrat spokesman, the importance that is attached to the problem of obesity.

In many walks of life, we are thought to be about five to 10 years behind the United States and constantly playing catch-up. However, obesity is not something on which we want to catch up with the US, where the problem is far more significant than it is here. Sadly, however, that is not to minimise the extent of the problem in this country.

In the past decade or so we have, regrettably, been playing catch-up. The statistics, as hon. Members have mentioned, are daunting. About one in 20 boys and one in 15 girls—or 5.5 per cent. and 7.2 per cent. respectively—aged between two and 15 were obese in 2002, according to the international classification. Overall, more than one in five boys and more than one in four girls were either overweight or obese. Projecting those figures forward 15 years and assuming steady growth suggests that around one third of adults will be obese by 2020. However, if the rapid acceleration in childhood obesity in the past decade is taken into account, the predicted prevalence of obesity among children in 2020 will be in excess of 50 per cent., which is a staggering and extremely worrying statistic.

In the majority of European countries, the prevalence of obesity has increased by between 10 and 40 per cent. in the past 10 years, but in England the rate has more than doubled. Levels of walking and cycling have fallen drastically in recent decades, while the number of cars has doubled. That shows the extent of the decrease in the amount of exercise taken.

Added to those statistics is the equally worrying research carried out by London Metropolitan university, which shows that between 1989 and 1998 the average waistband of a two-year-old girl increased by 5 per cent. and that that of a two-year-old boy increased by 4 per cent. An increase in waist size is the most serious problem for health, because it increases vulnerability to heart disease and type 2 diabetes. The waistline of a two-year-old girl increased during that decade by 2.5 cm, or 5.2 per cent., and her body mass index increased by 1.7 per cent. The waistline of a two-year-old boy increased by 2 cm, or 4.1 per cent., and his body mass index increased by 1.8 per cent. If one takes the average waistline figures alone, there was an increase of 2.9 per cent. over the decade, which is staggeringly and deeply disturbing.

The question that we must ask ourselves is where we go from here to ameliorate the problem. As many hon. Members have said, the answer is a combination of two things: a healthy, balanced diet and proper exercise. At this time of the year, one often sees people making new year's resolutions to join a gym and start losing weight, but by the end of January, all their good intentions have gone by the wayside. That is not the way to solve the problem; it is a short-term gimmick, which will not succeed.

Instead, we must ensure that there is better education, not only for children in the school system, although that is important, but for parents. There is a lost generation in this country—a generation of couch potatoes who have been all too quick to jump in their cars and to choose a sedentary lifestyle. They are now superimposing that lifestyle on their children, and we are reaping the harvest of that failure. Therefore, we must use the education system to teach young people about the differences between quality food and poor food, between fresh food and processed food. We must also educate them about cooking and about the need to eat fruit and vegetables, of which, to be fair to the Minister, the Government have made great play. Their work in that respect is to be commended, and it is part of an educational programme that we should all welcome. We must educate children about the importance of such issues, in the hope that they will then be able to educate their parents, who are, in many ways, members of a lost generation. In that way, they, too, will be able to pick up on the benefits of a healthy, balanced diet.

We must also ensure that people do not eat a disproportionate amount of certain foodstuffs. To my mind, there is nothing wrong with a Big Mac or a KFC once in a while, but when everything is with chips—three times a day, seven days a week—and everything is fast food, rather than part of a balanced diet that includes fresh fruit and vegetables, one has problems.

Similarly, we must ensure that there is provision for proper exercise in our schools. We must ensure that there is more school sport, by which I mean not only sports lessons, but physical exercise during playtime in the playgrounds. We must ensure that children understand that it is important to walk up or down escalators, rather than just standing there letting the machinery do the work for them.

It is also important for children to be able to walk to school, although I accept that there is a serious problem as regards their cycling there, and I suspect that the Minister will agree with me. There has been a dramatic decrease in recent years in the number of school children who cycle or walk to school, and for the first time in our history, fewer than 50 per cent. of children cycle to school. That is because the competing traffic makes many roads too dangerous for them to do so, and parents are unwilling to let them. In certain areas, particularly in the winter, many parents are not happy to let their young children walk to school unescorted in what could be the hours of darkness. All of that has increased the numbers of parents getting into their cars and taking their children to and from school. I am not sure what the answer to that problem is, because it is a difficult issue. However, that does not excuse us from examining it. There are many other aspects to the matter. Before the Government proceed, I urge them to consider that although they may perceive some advertising of certain foodstuffs as poor and unhelpful, advertising can also be used positively, to get positive messages across.

It will seem odd if the Government decide to ban television advertising of foodstuffs for part of the day or before a certain watershed, but not to pursue a ban in other areas of advertising, where there are so many food advertisements. I think that the proposal is unworkable per se, but I urge the Government against a knee-jerk reaction of rushing ahead without considering the whole issue and its implications.

The key message is a balanced, healthy diet and more exercise, but it is necessary to educate young people, children and parents, so that we can begin to make an impact and try to reverse a deeply worrying trend that is already having a significant and adverse impact on the health of the nation and individuals.

3.16 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Miss Melanie Johnson): I respond with pleasure to this important debate, and join other hon. Members in congratulating the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) on raising the issue of obesity in young people. Much public attention has been devoted to the matter in the past few years by influential bodies and the press. That concern is not misplaced, as we all agree.

There is emerging evidence of the effect of obesity on children's long-term health, including UK researchers' frightening prediction that the increase in obesity threatens to reverse the gains in longevity made in the past 100 years and in some cases could result in parents outliving their children; that is a terrifying thought.

It is well recognised that overweight and obesity increase the risk of coronary heart disease and some cancers, as hon. Members have said. They can also increase the risk of diabetes and hypertension, as my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Dr. Stoate) said, and conditions such as osteoarthritis. All those factors led the National Audit Office to highlight the fact that obesity is responsible for more than 9,000 premature deaths each year in England. That is not many compared with the number of deaths from smoking, but it is still a large number of deaths and a major problem.

I agree that the problem being stored up for young people is of particular concern to us, as it presents an opportunity to get things right, and those people have the longest lifespan ahead of them. As hon. Members have pointed out, obesity results in significant costs to the NHS and the wider economy where it can result in lost days at work and other costs.

I am grateful to hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber for their support and enthusiasm in this matter—particularly my hon. Friend's remarks about the White Paper and the action proposed in it. I think every hon. Member knows that the Government recognise the impact of obesity, and that tackling it is at the heart of many of our priorities. There is considerable cross-government action to deal with the prevention, management and treatment of obesity, as we have set out in what I am grateful to see is a much-quoted White Paper.

Increased consumption of food and drinks that are high in fat, sugar and salt may contribute to increasing rates of obesity and other health problems. Few children eat the recommended five portions a day of fruit and vegetables, and four in 10 boys and six in 10 girls do not take the recommended hour a day of physical activity.

In response to the remarks of the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns), England is not the only country to have experienced a rapid increase in the prevalence of obesity, although rates differ between countries and I entirely accept that we do not want to catch up with the US in this regard. Virtually all population surveys have shown an increase in the past two decades. Several countries, including the US and Denmark, are taking steps to deal with the issue.

Hon. Members asked how we judge ourselves and how we know whether we have made progress. They are legitimate questions. We believe that we will have delivered if we move the balance of the national diet in England towards that recommended by experts and by 2010 halt the year-on-year rise in obesity among children under 11 within our broader strategy to tackle obesity in the population as a whole. That is part of our 2004 target. It is the way in which we measure our success, although there are many other indicators too.

I am grateful for hon. Members' examples and points. I shall not be able to respond to all of them in detail. There was a veritable forest of good questions and positive points.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Ribble Valley for agreeing that we cannot make people healthy. That is our starting point which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford said, is far from the nanny state. There is a role for a nanny, as it were, in a child's life. Parents mostly fulfil that role, but the state also has responsibilities, as do schools and other organisations, for the well-being of young children. Again, that is uncontroversial.

Our principles are informed choice—much has been said about the importance of giving people more information; personalisation—allowing people to make choices that are tailored to the reality of their lives; and working together. The Government must not only work with individuals; key partnerships are needed to help to deliver these principles. A number of hon. Members have mentioned the important role played by schools and sports clubs. There is huge scope for partnerships to work here in the right way.

As a Department we cannot tackle things on our own. We are working with a range of partners—national, regional and local. Action on nutrition includes investment in the five-a-day programme mentioned by some hon. Members, an excellent programme that is leading to changes in eating behaviour at home as well as at school.

As hon. Members have cited their own constituencies, I may as well revert to form and do so too. I visited the Green Lanes primary school in my own patch a little while ago and saw children taking part in the school fruit and veg scheme. I was amazed to see even raw mangetouts being consumed with enthusiasm. I am sure that many parents would have been surprised by that. We must also challenge parental assumptions about what children will and will not eat. The children were gobbling the mangetouts down as if there were no tomorrow; most parents would not have put money on that.

Mr. Burns: The Minister is talking about children gobbling down food. Does she remember the Minister for Sport and Tourism endorsing the Cadbury's wrapper campaign, in which children had to buy X thousand bars of Cadbury's chocolate to get a piece of sporting equipment for their schools? If a subsequent campaign were proposed, would the Minister be happy with the Department for Culture, Media and Sport endorsing it, as it did the last campaign?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I call the Minister, perhaps I should get in on the act and declare that I am a life member of Blaydon rugby football club.

Miss Johnson: We are following your lead on these matters now, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Clearly anything like that will be tackled by the Government, as a cross-government issue, and will be in line with our suggestions in the White Paper.

Mr. Burns: That was not my question.

Miss Johnson: I was amazed that the hon. Gentleman did not ask about avocados and DCMS policy on avocados.

Mr. Burns: Will the Minister give way again?

Miss Johnson: No; I would like to make a little progress.

Mr. Burns: The Minister has not answered my intervention.

Miss Johnson: I will give way one more time.

Mr. Burns: I should be grateful if the Minister would answer the question: would she expect the Government to endorse another wrapper campaign in the way that the Minister for Sport and Tourism endorsed the last one?

Miss Johnson: It is clear that the White Paper policy would not necessarily advocate such support in future. I am sure that we would not expect to see such developments in future. As hon. Members have outlined, we want the Office of Communications to take action about advertising food to children. I myself was commenting on the EU proposals for action last week. We are clear that some food promotions aimed at children, such as toy offers, are extremely unhelpful, as they put pressure on parents and encourage children to try certain foodstuffs or demand more of them.

It is for all those reasons that we are investing in schemes such as the school fruit and vegetable programme, and working with the food industry to reduce fat, sugar and salt. I agree with the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) that we should be tackling all three substances. The progress that we are starting to make on salt will be replicated, as will the methods of working, when dealing with fat and sugar.

We are determined that unhealthy foodstuffs should not be promoted to children by adverts that are clearly aimed at them, during children's programmes or otherwise.

I have already mentioned that we have a public service agreement target. We want to see more action at a local level, and a number of Members have talked about the importance of that. I am delighted by the admission by the hon. Member for Ribble Valley that he is a member of the Clitheroe Wolves. We will not comment about wolves here, but it is clear that a lot of clubs, such as Blackburn Rovers football club, have good programmes for helping young people to think through diet and exercise issues, often building self-esteem as well. Such work is enormously valuable and provides leadership in the community. It is difficult to find the kind of leadership that has quite that standing with young people.

Mr. Evans: I am grateful for the Minister's comments, and pay tribute to everybody who volunteers in the wider community to give our youngsters opportunities to participate in sport outside school. Will she now give a commitment to increase the number of hours for which youngsters can participate in sport in school?

Miss Johnson: We have made it plain that we expect to see a large investment in school sport. One billion pounds is going into facilities and improvements. Many programmes are designed to increase the number of hours in which children get physical activity each day. There will be a supportive environment through the healthy schools programme, and people have talked about active travel programmes. We are also considering some of what the chief medical officer has set out, including ensuring that children get the recommended amount of physical activity a day. It is also important to look beyond sport. Sport is important and I entirely endorse its important role, but we must build physical activity into everyday life for children and parents. We should push for people to walk or cycle to school regularly, as they are the kinds of activity that help keep weight down and lead to more cardiovascular activity.

We are committed to nutritional standards, and to a nutrition-based approach to school meals. Because schools have a lot of freedom, governors can now take action themselves. The school fruit and vegetable scheme has taught us that schools often wait for some other incentive to come along, and introducing that programme then means that they can decide to take action on other issues, such as the food that children bring to school, the wider availability of fruit and vegetables, the availability of water and what the vending machines contain. All those questions are already for the schools to decide, and although they can do a great deal, we will support them and give them more direction, looking at the way that school meals can be used in the school environment and ensuring that healthy schools are developed across the board. It is important to recognise that walking and cycling to school are ways that that can happen.

On the question of the fresh food audits raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford, the local authorities and primary care trusts have been working together in Barnsley, Knowsley and other places. They have identified some of the "food desert" issues, and addressed them through food co-ops.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am afraid time is up. We have to get on with the other debate, as there is likely to be a Division in the House later.

Rail Services (Worcestershire)

3.30 pm

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): I am extremely grateful for this opportunity to raise an important subject. Worcestershire is overlooked in so many ways and its two principal rail routes to England's first and second cities are no exception. They are the London line—the Cotswold line, in my case, via Pershore, Evesham and Honeybourne to Oxford—and the Birmingham line, or rather lines, via Droitwich and Bromsgrove, or via Hartlebury and Kidderminster.

This debate is timely for three separate reasons. The first is that the Government are on the verge of assuming responsibility for the Strategic Rail Authority, which is currently taking all the decisions on these lines. The second is that the route utilisation strategies have either just been published or are about to be published for both those routes. The third and most urgent reason is that the franchises are both being redrawn. The Central Trains franchise to Birmingham has been broken up into its component parts and on the Cotswold line a new, Greater Western franchise is being created.

I intend to concentrate on the Birmingham services as that is where I have had the greatest volume of complaints about the quality of service. However, I also attach great importance to the strategic potential of the Cotswold line. Complaints about the Birmingham services soared in late 2003, leading to a local meeting organised in Droitwich with commuters and attended, rather bravely I thought, by Mike Haigh and his colleagues from Central Trains. I pay tribute to him for coming into the lion's den and braving the wrath of the commuters.

For a period after that, things appeared to get better, but the volume of complaints has been rising again. I have heard from the prospective Conservative parliamentary candidate in Worcester, Margaret Harper, how many people there have raised the issue with her, and I know from my own postbag just how bad things are for my Droitwich commuters.

Let us turn first to the Birmingham services. I received an e-mail a couple of days ago from Jeremy Batt of Ombersley, who said:

"I am extremely disappointed with the very poor rail service we get between Droitwich and Birmingham. Last year was pretty awful, with many trains late or overcrowded. Since the changes in timetables in September last year they have got progressively worse. Trains are routinely late, and we receive little or no information about what is happening."

That sums up the situation.

I am grateful to Mike Haigh who has provided me with Central Trains' punctuality and reliability information for two key services in each direction, between Worcestershire and Birmingham. The 06.49 from Great Malvern achieves only 63.6 per cent punctuality within 10 minutes. The 07.09 does a bit better at 83.3 per cent but that still means that nearly 17 per cent of trains are arriving late, beyond 10 minutes. Coming back, for the 17.50 from New Street to Worcestershire, only 66.7 per cent of trains make it within 10 minutes and, for the 17.59, the figure is 79.1 per cent. Central Trains' own figures show that there is a real problem with punctuality on services in my constituency.

I am particularly grateful to two of my constituents, Haydn Lloyd and Michael Norris, for the way they have kept me up-to-date with their experiences. Mr. Lloyd has sent me detailed logs of his commuting experiences between Droitwich and Birmingham, and I quote from his most recent letter, dated 19 December:

"Unfortunately the introduction of both the autumn and winter timetables from 26 September and 12 December 2004 has not brought in any improvements in punctuality and reliability. This is illustrated in my logs of the periods for October and November 2004."

He summarises his position by saying:

"Total time lost outward and return journey over 11 week period = 12 hours 54 minutes; this includes over a week when I was on leave. Therefore it could have been worse if I had been at work all the time! Regular delays both on the outward and return journeys. Week commencing 13 December 2004 alone I lost 1 hour and 18 minutes on the outward journeys."

Michael Norris, who is a particularly diligent correspondent, told Mr. Haigh in an e-mail of 5 January:

"At 17.30, the 17.45 arrival for Stansted was shown to be due at 17.55".

This gets a little complicated but it is important to concentrate as it shows how difficult these things are. He continues:

"but the 17.50 to Droitwich Spa was 'on time' which is impossible if the same unit is to be used. It was later announced as being 14 minutes late. At 17.50, the 17.50 was announced as arriving at Platform 12b. Instead the 17.59 (two car unit) arrived and everyone overcrowded on to it (at least we had seats on this occasion). With having to wait for the Conductor, we finally departed at 18.15.

What happened to the 17.50? There was no audible announcement of its arrival but observing passenger movements it could have arrived on 12a and possibly left via the Bordesley loop to Kings Norton. If this was the case, why were we not given the option of transferring to this train particularly if it was to depart before the delayed 17.59?"

That may sound rather complicated, but it shows how frustrating it is for passengers at Birmingham stations trying to catch trains to Worcestershire. I am grateful to the Minister of State, Department for Transport for the serious interest he has taken in overcrowding on trains when answering my parliamentary questions and correspondence. Overcrowding is a serious issue on trains to Birmingham.

In an e-mail on 17 October, Martin Whitehouse of Evesham said:

"On Saturday 16th October I had the misfortune to travel on your 1649 hrs service to Great Malvern from Birmingham Moor Street. When the train arrived (15 minutes late!!), it was already quite full. Approximately 100 people were waiting to get on.

Imagine my dismay when we were all crammed in with nowhere to move. I did a quick count and in our carriage, there were as many people standing as were sitting, (approximately 80 people!). This ridiculous state of affairs lasted for about 1½ hours, until the train was terminated at Worcester Shrub Hill. The situation was so bad, that 2 passengers had panic attacks, one of them had to leave the train soon after getting on.

At subsequent stops more people tried to get on than were getting off. Tempers were so frayed by the time we got to Stourbridge Junction that when one of your staff members tried to get us to squash up even closer to allow more passengers on, (a similar number to those at Moor Street), they were prevented from doing so by passengers already on board. I myself had to lean on my wife and daughter for most of the journey, which made it very uncomfortable for them."

The situation is very bad. That is just some anecdotal information portraying just how bad the services are in our county. At present, services are worse because of the overtime ban caused by the dispute over rest day working. We will not get into that, because it is an industrial relations dispute for Central Trains to sort out with its drivers.

Central Trains has made mistakes. Its timetabling has not always been up to the mark. It has allowed inadequate turnaround time for its trains. I am particularly critical of its failure to stop enough trains at Hartlebury, which would provide a valuable service to my constituents in what is an area of population growth.

On the subject of population growth, one fundamental problem is that passenger volumes are increasing sharply. There is natural population growth, a sharp increase in housing and the success of the Bull Ring development in Birmingham. All are driving more and more people on to the trains, but there has been no planning for increased capacity to cope with increased volumes on those services. The route utilisation strategy is imminent, and I hope that it will have some important and useful things to say about capacity on those services.

I am dismayed by the recently published west midlands regional spatial strategy, which shows no provision for increased investment in transport infrastructure to support the increase in housing in Worcester and Droitwich. We cannot keep cramming into those areas more people who want to commute to Birmingham, unless the transport infrastructure to take them there is provided. There are too many two-car units running, and as four-car units cannot even stop at Bromsgrove station, they are not used on the line. My hon. Friend the Member for Bromsgrove (Miss Kirkbride) supports my view, but she cannot be present today. The Health and Safety Executive must be much more pragmatic about allowing four-car trains to stop at Bromsgrove. Selective door opening is not beyond comprehension; it could and should be achieved. The only long-term solution at Bromsgrove is an extension to enable it to take four-car trains with all doors opening. I hope that my party will include Bromsgrove in a list of priority schemes for improvements, but more must be done now.

Safety is not optional—overcrowded trains are not safe. We have seen some unpleasant accidents at level crossings recently. I was involved in one just over a year ago. People on a seriously overcrowded train could have a much worse experience than those on a train that is acceptably loaded.

Signalling, reliability and adequacy are not good enough. Major improvements are due in the Worcester area, I am told, by 2012, with some hinted at this year. However, we urgently need a new signalling section between Worcester and Droitwich to improve capacity on the line. It has been talked about for years, but when will it happen? In Worcester, improved track layout between Shrub Hill and Foregate Street stations would improve train service flexibility, but there is no sign of that happening. It is talked about, but there is a shift right in time terms all the time. It would be a tremendous improvement, offering flexibility to the operators of trains not only on the Birmingham but on the London services.

There are too many speed restrictions on the line. It is a little known fact that 65 per cent. of all delays on the Birmingham services are still down to Network Rail and not Central Trains. I remain concerned about the primacy of Centro, the passenger transport executive for the west midlands, which seems to be able to call all the shots on the use of rolling stock and services in the wider west midlands. That means that my constituents are left with a worse service than those who have the good fortune to live in the conurbation.

The Government plan to make that problem worse by giving more powers to the passenger transport executives. The Secretary of State for Transport was helpful on that point in the House recently, so I hope that he will reconsider his proposals.

The size of the franchise area has been too big, which is a problem, although the size is being reduced, which I welcome in principle. However, concerns have been expressed about the continuation of through services in Worcestershire, between Malvern and Droitwich, for example. There are hints that Chiltern Railways, which is the favourite to take on the franchise, does not have the resources to do so. Concerns have also been expressed in the railways press about the thought that has been given to the proposal by the SRA and the Government and about whether they are making things up as they go along—I refer the Minister to the latest edition of Rail magazine.

Finally, information on the Birmingham services is a scandal, on trains and at stations, especially at New Street station, but also at University station, Droitwich station, Worcester Shrub Hill station and Foregate Street station. It is confusing for those who are not experts on how the services run to work out exactly what is happening.

That is a brief and rather rapid synopsis of the Birmingham services, but what of the London services? I am talking about a major inter-city route that has for decades been treated as a sideshow by successive nationalised and privatised operators of the railway. The line was downgraded by the old nationalised British Rail and it is now difficult to achieve the vital improvements that are needed. The line still suffers from a dreadful poverty of aspiration, particularly on the part of the SRA. Passenger volumes are high and growing, but could grow much more if the service were not so irregular and if the service in the middle of the day were better.

Two to three-hour gaps are a regular feature of the timetable. For example, the service from Evesham to London is okay in both directions at peak times and is serviced by the better Adelante trains. However, after 09.02 the next through train to London leaves at 12.37. There is a train at 13.37, an hour later, and then another three-hour gap, until 16.33. That is not the way to build passenger volume on a potentially lucrative route.

The remedies are more straightforward than on the Birmingham services, although I fully acknowledge that they have a price. For example, there could be minor signalling improvements to address the so-called Evesham double stop—the fact that an inter-city 125 pulls in at Evesham station, stops 100 yd later to exchange tokens at the Evesham signal box and then proceeds to Worcester on a single line section. That is ridiculous. Even the Severn Valley railway has more modern signalling arrangements than the public railway at that point in my constituency.

We should consider limited re-dualling of the long single track sections. I came here by train this morning and my train was 20 minutes late, largely because we had to wait for a unit coming on to the single line section approaching Moreton-in-Marsh. If there were some passing loops on those single sections, how much better things would be. Full re-dualling of the line should remain on the agenda. I recognise that that is an expensive item and would be some years away, but re-dualling must remain our aspiration for the line.

We could look to the Strategic Rail Authority, and subsequently the Government, to give a higher priority to service levels on the existing infrastructure. I know that First Great Western was anxious to do more on service levels, but that the SRA was not prepared to back it. One major weakness is parking. Parking at Worcester Shrub Hill station is a real problem and I still think that Worcester Parkway station would be one way of encouraging people to drive to the railway and then take a train to their destinations.

Worcester Parkway station is discussed in the route utilisation strategy a little dismissively. The strategy seems to suggest that the station is relevant only for Worcester to London services, but it would also be important for Birmingham to Worcester services. The strategy does not refer to the north-south aspect of that station, so I hope that the Strategic Rail Authority, and subsequently the Government, will consider the proposal afresh.

The route utilisation strategy is in some ways helpful, but overall a disappointment. It acknowledges the impact of single track sections, which is good, although it is a little optimistic about the impact of Adelante trains on the route. it does not acknowledge the infrequency of service outside peak hours and does not acknowledge any possibility of infrastructure improvements to improve service levels on the line. Page 33 of the strategy says that the stakeholder aspiration is to have a full hourly service on the line, but that that is not recommended. The strategy says that potential demand is "insufficient to justify additional resources and risk to performance", and recommends:

"Progress development and appraisal of more limited options in view of potential significant wider economic benefits."

In other words, the strategy recommends tinkering at the margins. That is not good enough on a line that could deliver so much more for the county.

On page 39, we read about the possibility of reducing first-class accommodation on the inter-city 125s that serve the line to increase the standard-class accommodation. I came down this morning. I admit I travelled first class, and it was full. The prospect of reducing first-class accommodation seems to be ludicrous. We should be looking at increasing overall capacity of the line, and not fiddling with the construction and configuration of inter-city 125s.

Finally, in the route utilisation strategy, we read with some hope that the aspiration for a so-called "clockface" timetable—an hourly service, in other words—between Oxford and Worcester is not entirely dismissed. It is:

"Recommended for further development and appraisal to improve affordability by focusing on more marginal peak timetable enhancement."

That is the extent of the SRA's aspiration for these crucial services.

I have rattled through a list of things, and I gave the Minister some guidance in advance of the kind of things I would be saying, which I hope was helpful. A range of things should and could be done to improve the Droitwich service to Birmingham, involving both Government and regional operators and organisations. It is complex, but it can be done. On the London services, it is fundamentally about improving the infrastructure of the line, but no one is talking about that.

I use the train as much as I can, not as much as I would like, because of the timings of some of the services. This morning, as I said, I was 20 minutes late. Last week, and I see the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) here, we were both 35 or 40 minutes late. The service is not good enough and needs to be improved. I hope the Minister will have some words of encouragement for our hard-pressed commuters.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Charlotte Atkins): I congratulate the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) on securing this debate and on providing an opportunity for us to discuss rail services in Worcestershire. He has raised a number of concerns, which I will try to address.

The White Paper, "The Future of Rail", published in July 2004, envisaged that the Strategic Rail Authority would be wound up and its responsibilities transferred to various bodies, including the Department for Transport. I assure the hon. Gentleman that those changes will not be detrimental to the efficient re-letting of franchises during the transitional period. The White Paper also announced our intention to consider how rail passenger franchises could be best aligned with Network Rail's regional and route structure.

Mr. Michael Foster (Worcester) (Lab): I emphasise the fact that the Department will have a stronger role to play in terms of the organisation of rail services in Worcestershire. Sub-regional capitals such as Worcester need to have a top-class rail service to the regional capital—Birmingham—if my constituents and those of colleagues in Worcestershire are to gain the economic, social and wider environmental benefits that rail services and good public transport links can have. I urge my hon. Friend to use the Department's newfound influence to put right the historic wrong of the way rail services in Worcestershire have been built up over time.

Charlotte Atkins: My hon. Friend makes a valuable point. It is important that we are now taking control of the railway industry by bringing it back in-house to ensure that the issues that arose from privatisation, where we had a disjointed railway service, can be addressed and that areas such as Worcestershire, and Worcester in particular, can benefit from much more joined-up thinking.

Mr. Luff: I do not wish to introduce a partisan note, but with, for example, the London service, the major damage to the railway was done well before privatisation. It is not a function of privatisation that we have a problem in the county. It is much more deep-rooted than that.

Charlotte Atkins: The hon. Gentleman has almost implied that privatisation did cause damage. I accept the point that he makes.

The changing of the franchise map is part of the commitment to improve the efficiency of our railways. Those changes will help to encourage joint working between track and train in order to deliver an improved service to customers and help to ensure that efficiency savings through economies of scale are maximised.

On 19 October 2004, the Secretary of State made a statement on the number of franchises, which included the announcement that, following the expiry of the current Central Trains franchise in 2006, its routes will be distributed into the Silverlink, Chiltern, Virgin Cross Country, Midland Mainline and Northern franchises. Work on remapping the routes currently in the Central Trains franchise is at an early stage and no decisions have yet been made on any potential changes to service levels and patterns.

Among the changes to the franchise map announced by the Secretary of State in his statement was the formation of a new Greater Western franchise from existing First Great Western, First Great Western Link, formerly Thames Trains, and Wessex Trains services, following the expiry of current arrangements. The invitation to tender for those services will be issued in the summer and the new franchise is due to run from April 2006. The decision to form the new franchise followed extensive consultation with passenger groups, local and regional stakeholders and the rail industry on the SRA's policy for single franchise operations at major London stations.

The specification for and procurement of the new franchise will be informed by the Greater Western main line route utilisation strategy, which the SRA published for consultation in January. The deadline for responses is 8 April. The RUS aims to make the most efficient use of the existing network, balancing service provision, maintenance access and performance levels, while taking into account anticipated changes in demand. The RUS has come about primarily because of the congestion of train services into Birmingham and rising passenger demand, which we accept. It looks specifically at current crowding and future demand, and will devise a strategy to meet that.

In the consultation document, the SRA acknowledges the aspirations of stakeholders for additional capacity to Worcester and the north Cotswolds. That has been considered as one of a number of options. The RUS notes:

"The London-Oxford-Worcester route has a service with certain two-hour intervals and a number of trains operate only between Oxford and Worcester. This option would seek to provide an hourly service with all trains running to and from London."

The SRA's current view is that:

"Initial appraisal indicates that the financial benefits from this option would be outweighed by the cost of additional rolling stock resources leading to an unaffordable increase in subsidy. In addition, performance risk would be high given the intensification of use of a route with several single track constraints."

I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's concern about the issues at Evesham. We know that that arises from a rather strange situation where drivers need to stop alongside the signal box to obtain a token from the signalman, giving them permission to pass safely through the single track stretch. Clearly, that should be resolved. Network Rail is examining the possibility of altering the token system, so that the exchange could take place using equipment on the station platform instead of outside the signal box, with the double stopping that exists at present. That would avoid the need to stop twice. The work could be undertaken by the end of 2006, but precise details are not available yet.

The hon. Gentleman raised the issue of Worcester Parkway. Worcester Shrub Hill is not well placed for current passenger demand and if a new parkway station were to replace Shrub Hill it is thought that it would have a strong business case. That would be further strengthened if a new parkway station were linked to and part funded by new development. The SRA is prepared to consider the replacement of Shrub Hill in these circumstances. The local authority has been invited to consider ways of improving the business case for Worcester Parkway.

The SRA says:

"Significant potential wider economic benefits are forecast . . . and it is therefore proposed to undertake further option development and appraisal in order to seek to identify more affordable options" possibly providing

"a service which is less frequent in the contrapeak than the peak direction."

The new December 2004 timetable, which the hon. Gentleman mentioned, introduced 125 mph class 180 Adelante trains, offering greater capacity and improved on-board facilities to First Great Western Link direct services from Great Malvern to London. For passengers wishing to travel during the day, there are direct trains at 12.21 and 13.21 from Worcester Shrub Hill to London Paddington, each scheduled to take two hours four minutes.

I accept that the hon. Gentleman will set those improvements against the reduction in the number of direct services. However, although the December timetable slightly altered the departure times of daytime services, involving a change at Oxford, the journey time remains the same. Furthermore, many journey opportunities are still offered by connections at Oxford on the Great Western line and from Birmingham on Chiltern and Virgin West Coast services.

Chiltern Railways currently operates as far as Kidderminster on a limited basis, with five trains to London in the morning and five back in the evening, as an extension of its Birmingham Snow Hill to London Marylebone services. Chiltern Railways also offers the hon. Gentleman's constituents regular access to stations to London Marylebone through connections provided by Central Trains at Snow Hill. If Chiltern Railways were to operate services beyond Kidderminster, additional rolling stock would need to be secured for the mileage.

Services from Birmingham to Worcestershire will be considered in the forthcoming west midlands route utilisation strategy, which is due for publication in February. There will be a 12-week consultation on that. I am aware that the hon. Gentleman has raised his concerns about overcrowding, particularly on the Central Trains route, on many occasions. The RUS will look specifically at that issue.

The hon. Gentleman raised the health and safety issue of train doors opening at the platform at Bromsgrove. Selective door opening would be a possibility, but would obviously be expensive as all vehicles would have to be modified to include that as an option. Again, cost becomes a crucial issue.

In conclusion, future planning will be informed by the route utilisation strategies on which the SRA is consulting. The Greater Western main line RUS was published earlier this month, and the west midlands RUS is due to be published in February. Those will be used to develop the Greater Western franchise and to examine services between Worcestershire and Birmingham. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman and other stakeholders, such as my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster), will play a full and valuable role in developing the conclusions.

European Union Fraud

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Gillian Merron.]

9.30 am

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (Con): In 2000, in the wake of the resignation of the Santer Commission over allegations of fraud, corruption, incompetence and nepotism, we debated fraud in the European Union in this Chamber. At the time, my predecessor as Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis), and I welcomed the appointment of Vice-President Kinnock, who was appointed to oversee the fight against fraud and to reform the Commission. We had high hopes that he would bring about fundamental change, but, even then, we were concerned about the speed of the proposed reforms. One development that we welcomed particularly was the new anti-fraud body, OLAF, because its predecessor had been completely ineffective.

Five years on, we now have a new and enlarged set of commissioners under the leadership of José Manuel Barroso and Vice-President Kallas, who is responsible for fighting fraud. With the United Kingdom presidency of the EU fast approaching, it is a good time to take stock of what has been achieved and what remains to be done. The signs of improvement are evident, but painfully slow.

The Commission seems to be attempting to get a grip on fraud within its ranks, but about 80 per cent. of EU money is spent in member states where controls are even more lax and sloppy than in the Commission. My sense overall is that the European Union is still not taking fraud seriously. We urgently need a strong lead from the centre to drive member states forward into a new culture of zero tolerance of fraud and corruption, and that zero tolerance needs to start in the Commission itself. We must start putting warm words and plans—believe me, there are plenty of them—into action. We need a more rigorous approach to safeguarding taxpayers' money.

How much have things changed? Well, we can measure the financial competence of any organisation by its independent auditors' report. In November 2004, the European Court of Auditors published its audit report on the Community's annual accounts and, for the 10th year in succession, the court was unable to give those accounts a clean bill of health. According to MEP colleagues in Brussels, there are worrying signs that the Commission is now pressuring the Court of Auditors to fine-tune the rules, so that the accounts can be signed off in future years.

The Court of Auditors was also concerned about the lack of reliability of aspects of the Community's accounts. That was due partly to the Commission's accounting system, which could not record assets and liabilities correctly—surely a straightforward accounting procedure that we would expect in a reputable organisation. Even more worrying, the number of errors that was found was so high that it could not vouch for spending streams that covered 93 per cent. of expenditure. That does not mean, of course, that all the spending was wrong, but it is astonishing that we cannot be confident that as much as 93 per cent. of expenditure was properly spent. For example, the court reported that payments under the common agriculture policy and for structural funds totalling about €70 billion were affected in some way by errors. That conclusion was not new. It was a familiar story and we have been hearing it for a decade.

When will that familiarity breed sufficient contempt to spark some action? The accounts and accounting systems tell us that the Commission falls far short of full financial competence. That is one thing, but what about fraud? The value of reported fraud in the EU was 49 per cent. higher in 2003 than it was in 1999. Fraudulent cases worth an incredible €900 million were dealt with by OLAF in 2003 alone. Those statistics are one year old, so who knows what the situation is now? More worrying, the real levels of fraud are almost impossible to quantify at present.

It is impossible to separate suspected fraud from irregularity. On the one hand, the Commission defines fraud as a deliberate, criminal act with intent to achieve financial advantage. Fair enough, but, on the other hand, irregularities are failures to comply with Commission regulations. So, until a case has passed through the criminal courts in the relevant country, which may go on for years, it cannot technically even be labelled as fraud.

Member states report fraud differently. How can we track something down if we cannot agree on what it is? Some member states will not recognise fraud until a conviction has been obtained through their national legal system. Germany and Greece seldom report cases within a two-month deadline after detection. Some countries wait until recovery is underway before reporting cases of fraud. Greece often does not even report the date of the discovery. For the Commission to allow member states to pursue such varied practices is sloppy and suggests to me that it is not taking fraud seriously.

The figures that we hear about are only those that have been reported. The actual value is probably much higher. I have estimates of fraud at anything between 7 per cent. and 10 per cent. of the total EU budget. It could have been as high as almost €10 billion for 2003 alone. The Commission, of course, puts the figure much lower at about 2 per cent., but even that is almost €2 billion. Whatever the exact figure, the problem of fraud is immense. The situation has surely gone on long enough.

I turn now to the blame game. The Commission is too quick to shrug off responsibility for the astonishing levels of fraud and irregularity by blaming member states. They may well be culpable, but the Commission is too. It is not a moral responsibility, but a statutory responsibility set out in the founding treaty of the EU. It is time that the Commission seized the initiative with member states. We need common recognition that fraud is a problem and renewed determination to tackle it.

[Mr. Edward Leigh]

Some frauds are so ludicrous that they should be blindingly obvious. For example, certain Balkan countries have preferential trade agreements with the EU for exporting sugar. The anti-fraud authorities eventually came across some suspect activities with the importation of sugar into Greece from Croatia, where it had been produced. What was the problem? It was not a complicated, underground system nor a corrupt and complex fiddling of the books. No, the fraud was even more blatant than that and yet went unrecognised—Croatia does not produce sugar cane at all.

Individual embezzlement also threatens public money spent by the EU, even when that money is aimed at vital infrastructure for people living in difficult conditions. In April 2002, OLAF investigated a case from the United Nations mission in Kosovo relating to alleged misappropriation of funds intended for the electricity sector in Kosovo. It turned out that the money had been stolen and spirited into personal bank accounts in Gibraltar. A further attempt by the principal suspect to send the funds from Gibraltar to Belize was thwarted. OLAF managed to secure the return of €2.7 million. The suspect, a former United Nations official in Kosovo, is now serving a three-and-a-half-year prison sentence.

Such activities happen in the United Kingdom, too. We cannot sit in a warm bath of our own prejudices and say that it is all down to Johnny Foreigner. It is not. My Committee has reported on several cases when abysmally lax control by public bodies allowed serious frauds to be perpetrated on EU funds, and further control improvements are still needed.

I shall cite two examples. In 2002, my Committee published a scathing report on a notorious fraudster, a farmer called Joseph Bowden, who claimed against the common agricultural policy for different crops on the same piece of land and went on to give fictitious co-ordinates for some of the fields for which he was claiming. If those claims had been examined by experts, or anyone with a map, it would have been discovered that the fields were apparently in Greenland, the North sea and the Norwegian sea. He received a 30-month jail sentence as a result and new controls were imposed, but at the time he got away with it because controls were obviously lax in the then Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

My second concern is perhaps even more worrying. It could be said that that was just one fraudster and one case of lax controls in one Department, but the Committee also looked at the sheep annual premium scheme in Northern Ireland, an EU strategy designed to support sheep producers through payments for eligible sheep. When we investigated the administration of that scheme, we were shocked to find a catalogue of errors and control failures, all of which pointed to what we described as a "particularly slack regime" in place under the Department concerned, and I believe that there was almost certainly collusion. We found, for example, that some payments were made for dead sheep—surely something that is not unknown in Irish history, but there we are—even though there was often no evidence that they had ever existed. These dead sheep were never alive. When visiting farms, the Department's inspectors detected more than four times as many irregularities when accompanied by staff from the National Audit Office as when they were not accompanied by them, which suggests that they were on occasions turning a blind eye to the rules.

I acknowledge that in response to our findings the Department agreed to take strong steps to address the Committee's concerns. Indeed, following wider changes in the EU, the sheep annual premium scheme itself has recently ceased to exist. However, the failure to address the European Court of Auditors' recommendations over 10 years was, in the Committee's view, a serious error of judgment. Failure to manage the scheme properly led the Commission to refuse to pay some of the UK's claim, £1.5 million of which was attributed to Northern Ireland. Perhaps controls are much more lax in other European countries, particularly Mediterranean ones, but we, too, are not without blame.

Such cases undermine the integrity of EU funding. If Departments and agencies are as soft on fraud as we found, fraudsters will regard it as a risk worth taking. All bodies involved in the administration of EU schemes must make fraud a decidedly unattractive proposition; they must have effective inspection processes, a rigorous prosecutions policy and penalties that far outweigh the potential gains from fraud.

Our Committee has repeatedly emphasised that £1 of EU subsidy is as much taxpayers' money as any other form of voted money. We make no distinction between the rigorous safeguards that we expect to see operated for EU subsidies and any other form of grant payment.

Improving financial management in the EU has, of course, long been an important issue for the Public Accounts Committee, and in recent years it has increasingly become a priority for European institutions and member states too. Recently there seems to be a new spirit of co-operation between the Court of Auditors, the Commission and the European Parliament, to work towards the achievement of an unqualified opinion on the Commission's accounts.

The PAC's counterpart in the European Parliament, the committee on budgetary control, has taken a robust approach to the discharge of the budget this year. It has closely questioned members of the Commission and, for the first time, officials from the European Court of Auditors, on how a positive statement of assurance can be achieved. That focused approach and pressure to address difficult issues has been welcomed by Vice-President Kallas, the new commissioner charged with the job of rooting out fraud. However, he is the subject of alleged fraud in his own country.

Mr. Richard Bacon (South Norfolk) (Con): Given our experience on the Public Accounts Committee with the National Audit Office, does not my hon. Friend think that it is extraordinary that the European Parliament budgetary control committee is just now, for the first time, meeting the Court of Auditors and taking evidence from it? Should not that have been its meat and drink for years past?

Mr. Leigh: One would have thought so. Parliamentarians in the Westminster model find that extraordinary. I talked yesterday to my colleague, Mr. Chris Heaton-Harris, Member of the European Parliament for the East Midlands. It is colleagues such as him who are trying to change attitudes in the European Parliament, and although it is an uphill struggle they are doing their best. However, it is extraordinary that the budgetary control committee has found its teeth only this year.

There have been some moves towards a more accountable system that helps prevent fraud. One step was the introduction on 1 January of an accruals-based Commission accounting system, which is an excellent start, as the Commission is fond of telling us, but even a first-class accounting system cannot guarantee good financial management. A certain company, now a household name for its high-profile failures in corporate governance, used accruals accounting. I am talking about Enron, and we all know what happened there.

There have also been some useful wider developments in the Commission. There is now a strategic planning function to assist commissioners, a deputy secretary-general to cut through red tape and an internal audit service starting in May to look at control of management. We are told that there is now a human resources policy in the Commission—whatever that is—that will help manage whistleblowers better, and an audit progress board to ensure that recommendations are followed up. However, the impression I get from talking to Members of the European Parliament is that the only people who have suffered so far in the European Commission in rooting out fraud are the whistleblowers themselves. Even in the EUROSTAT scandal, it was Dorte Schmidt-Brown, an official who revealed what was going on, who lost her job, suffered a nervous breakdown and effectively had her career ended.

Hans-Martin Tillack, a German journalist, was arrested on 19 March on the orders of the EU's anti-fraud office, OLAF, and taken into custody. His personal papers, computer and archives were confiscated in an effort to identity sources of revelations about EU corruption. That was his crime. He was arrested because he was not prepared to reveal his sources who had told him about EU corruption. OLAF says that it is implementing a policy of zero-tolerance towards corruption and fraud in the European institutions and is working to produce a robust estimate of the level of fraud and error. We are told that at least we will understand the full scale of the problem. We await results.

I am pleased that my right hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) is present in the Chamber. He fought almost a lone fight in the Commission to try to give extra powers to the European Court of Auditors. Indeed, extra powers were given to virtually every other institution in the EU, but not the Court of Auditors. My right hon. Friend's warnings fell on deaf ears. However, I am delighted that he is here today. He is clearly an expert on these matters in the House of Commons.

In conclusion, there are signs of improvement in the way that the EU manages its finances and I am encouraged to see a glimmer of light, but it is, as yet, a light of expectation, rather than action. We need dedication and prompt action from the Commission and all member states, including the UK, to stamp out fraud. The UK's presidency of the EU in the second half of 2005 provides an excellent opportunity for us to drive forward further progress.

In dealing with fraud and corruption in an institution it is not enough to say that the rules are being carried out correctly. Moral corruption on a petty scale, and on a large scale, must be dealt with too. It is not good enough for any institution to say "We are carrying out the rules," if the rules are corrupt. Let us take one example of petty corruption. Members of the European Parliament are paid travel expenses on the basis of what is known as kilometrage, which involves fixed payments per unit of distance travelled. The sums paid are the equivalent to club class air travel. If Members choose a cheaper form a travel, and, of course, most of them do, they save considerable amounts, which they are allowed to keep because there is no mechanism by which it can be returned. That is an example of petty moral corruption. It can be argued that there are examples of much larger moral corruption on a grand scale, and one such example would involve the European fisheries policy. However, that is a debate for another time and place.

I said in my opening remarks that now was a good time to take stock. Taxpayers across Europe are rightly concerned at the apparent endemic inability of the EU to manage its finances well. We have every reason to believe that mongy is still pouring down the drain. We may not be able to say how fast the flow is, or whether it is quicker or slower than before, but it is time to plug the hole. We need a radical policy where we press for our own National Audit Office, which has a reputation second to none, to be allowed to pursue the trail of the money that we give to the Commission into the Commission.

Currently, the NAO has no rights of access in the European Commission. The Public Accounts Committee will go to Brussels in March to discuss what further progress is planned, within its rights of access. It will have no ability to cross-question officials, but some points are evident from the outset. We need the Commission's new accounting system to work and the Commission to drive forward consistency in member states' approaches to reporting fraud. We also need all public institutions across the EU to treat each euro of EU subsidy as they would every euro funded by their own national Treasury or finance ministry. That is a very clear agenda for the UK Government as they take on the presidency and I commend it to the Minister.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This is a 90-minute debate and it is advisable to remind right hon. and hon. Members that the usual convention is to start the first of the three winding-up speeches 30 minutes before its conclusion. While I am interested in the subject and am learning a lot, I appeal to all right hon. and hon. Members to bear in mind the time limitations. We need to start the winding-up speeches at 10.30 am.

9.52 am

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): When I heard my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) making his excellent speech, I experienced a strong sense of déjà vu, because the issues are of considerable antiquity. I grappled with some of the problems when I was a Minister with responsibility for Europe 10 years ago, and also when I was at the Treasury, as the Minister responsible for our contribution to the European budget. At the time, I failed to push through the necessary reforms. I received the brush-offs from the European institutions, and the warm assurances that everything would be different, that reforms were in place and that I had to wait only another year and everything would be fine. Of course, the reform never happened.

In the background, there was a strong sense of not in front of the children. The issue was seen as an internal matter where exposure would damage the European project, so there was a strong reluctance to bring many of the deep-seated problems into the open.

We are now well past that point. The public know perfectly well what is going on and are aware of the scale of the waste, mismanagement and fraud, which was so well described by my hon. Friend. That is now an open sore on the face of the European Union and contributes in large part to the widespread disillusionment and disenchantment that the public feel towards it.

The problem has got much worse during the intervening 10 years. The European budget is now more than €100 billion a year and growing, and, as we have heard, the accounts have not been signed off by the auditors for 10 years. If the EU was a commercial institution operating in the private sector, all of the directors would now be in prison. If it were a public institution operating in a member state, those responsible would have been kicked out long ago. Instead, the whole project simply rolls forward, despite the fact that it destroyed the last but one European Commission; the Santer Commission resigned en masse in 1999 because of fraud and mismanagement in its budget.

Fraud is still going on. EUROSTAT has been discovered to be riddled with fraud, with money siphoned off into secret accounts. The Government's contribution to that subject is the Treasury Command Paper 6134, which was published last April and goes into some detail. It is truly awesome that one of the agencies of the Commission had secret bank accounts and there was no audit trail. When that was discovered, no one lost their jobs.

My hon. Friend is right to remind hon. Members that the only people who ever lose their jobs are the whistleblowers—the people who draw attention to scandals. OLAF, the anti-fraud office, was rather dismissively referred to by the Government last year as part of the Commission, which is a telling observation. It is not an independent body as we would understand such things, but part of the European Union institution that causes most of the problem. It is a branch of the Commission and reports to it. It is not truly independent.

I had a rather sad conversation with one of the whistleblowers, Marta Andreasen, when she came to this country to give a lecture before Christmas last year. She was the first qualified accountant to be appointed chief accountant in the European Union. She pointed out that the system has no proper double-entry bookkeeping. I am a chartered accountant; I declare that interest. Every first-year student of accountancy learns about double-entry bookkeeping. In fact, it was a European invention. It was discovered by the Venetians in the 15th century. It has been around for quite a long time in Europe, but it has not yet reached Brussels.

Ms Andreasen reported the failings to her superiors and, of course, nothing was done. Her objections and complaints were ignored and, even more scandalously, she never received a proper hearing from the people who should be the guardians of our interest—the European Parliament. When Mr. Prodi retired as President of the European Commission he was congratulated in the European Parliament on the way in which he got rid of Marta Andreasen by the leader of the Liberal Democrat group. That speaks eloquently about the lack of assistance—to put it at its mildest—that we get from the European Parliament in guarding not only British taxpayers, but the European taxpayers.

I want to discuss opportunities for reform and to be positive. There was a giant opportunity in the form of the Convention on the Future of Europe, on which I sat. It was given a wide remit, in particular to reconnect with the citizens of Europe. Knowing that an important part of that reconnection was to assure the public that something would be done in future about the European budget and about the scandals, I submitted a six-page paper on 7 July 2003, which was referred to in kind terms by my hon. Friend in his remarks.

I set out the problem in detail. I referred to whistleblowers and their evidence, and I suggested some reforms, for example, how budgetary control committees in national Parliaments—in our case the Public Accounts Committee and the National Audit Office—should be given some way of following national money through into the European system to ensure, and to help, the value-for-money procedures in Brussels.

I suggested reforms to the audit process, and I suggested that where the European Court of Auditors had severe misgivings about a budget line, it should be able to block expenditure until it could sign it off as being regular and legal. I also suggested making reforms to the European Court of Auditors, to strengthen its authority and independence. I suggested that OLAF be given proper independence and be subjected to democratic scrutiny.

I advanced a case for greater transparency and openness. In that connection, it is interesting that, this afternoon, we are debating that issue in the European Scrutiny Committee, which, amazingly, still sits in secret, and there is a move by some Government Members to entrench that secrecy in our proceedings. I also suggested giving additional rights to whistleblowers in the European Union, to match the statutory protection that we give them in our country.

All that was completely ignored. It was never referred to in debate in the Convention, except by myself and a few of my allies. I submitted specific amendments to the evolving European constitution to reflect the need for some of the reforms that I have just outlined. Again, all of them were ignored and, sadly, they were not supported by the British Government representative on the Convention.

The only plan advanced by the European institution itself was to set up another European institution called the European public prosecutor. That body would consolidate new, awesome powers to prosecute and investigate at European level, right across the European Union, from Brussels. It is not the setting up of new institutions that we want; we have seen that too often in the past. We need to reform the existing institution before we give it more powers. That is one reason why the European constitution deserves to fail, and will fail. But my hon. Friend deserves to succeed in his noble crusade to do something about the matter at national level, and I very much hope that he does.

10.2 am

Mr. Richard Bacon (South Norfolk) (Con): I am pleased to have the opportunity to contribute to this debate on an extremely important issue, and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) on securing it. It is somewhat sad that the Chamber is not packed, because this issue cuts to the quick. We will have a response from the Financial Secretary, and I look forward to it, although I say in advance that I have almost no confidence in what he will tell us. That is an awful thing to say, because the Financial Secretary is a distinguished member of the Government, and we all have a lot of respect for him, but I am almost certain that he will give us not a crumb of comfort. I shall now explain why.

The epiphany for me came in a House of Lords report on European fraud, which said that "huge sums of Community money were lost each year because of fraud; that financial management was weak; that the failure both to detect fraud and take action when it was detected allowed the fraudsters to continue in business; and that for years there had been no political will to tackle the problem."

The report

"detected some signs that the situation might be improving, although there was a long way to go."

It went on:

"We were too optimistic. According to the Court of Auditors' Report . . . there has been 'little or no improvement' in the Community's financial management, despite repeated criticisms made in previous reports . . . Many certificates have been issued without the issuing authorities exercising any proper control over what is really going on; and the large increase in the transfer of Structural Funds has not been accompanied by any significant improvement in the way in which the programmes are managed. The report also accuses the Commission of having had enough time to take the necessary remedial measures but of failing to do so."

The report's summary concludes:

"Clearly there is still a long way to go to achieve the sound financial management which Community taxpayers have the right to expect."

As I say, that report was my epiphany, and it came out in July 1994. It talked about the previous five years, yet my hon. Friend has described the litany of problems that there have been in the 11 years since the report. If anything, things are now worse; my hon. Friend described how the scale of fraud has increased. That is why I do not have much hope that the Financial Secretary will give us any comfort. I found a rather good description of the situation on a German website recently. It said that the situation was "grundsätzlich betrugsanfällig", which means fundamentally susceptible to corruption.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) re-iterated that the people who try to sort out the problems get sacked. Marta Andreasen was an accounting officer. On the Public Accounts Committee we are familiar with that role; the job of the accounting officer is to make sure that moneys approved by Parliament are spent legally by the Government of the day. We all understand that an accounting officer can ask for a direction from a Minister if he or she is uncertain that what he or she is being asked to do is lawful. In that instance, the accounting officer will be exonerated by the Public Accounts Committee for having acted in a certain way if it should turn out that there was doubt about how public money was being spent.

Marta Andreasen refused to sign the EU accounts because, in her view, they were so dodgy. She was told: "Sign them. That's why you're paid a high salary." That is the culture and the attitude. That is what we have to face. Now the Commission is putting pressure on the Court of Auditors to change the basis on which the accounts are written up. That way, without changing the culture underneath, the goalposts are moved, and accounts appear to be clean when they are not.

The last time I was in Luxembourg at the Court of Auditors with the European Scrutiny Committee, I asked the court why it did not publish more value-for-money reports, as the National Audit Office does in this country. The response was, "You should try getting the budget committee and the agriculture committee of the European Parliament to take any interest in them." That, to us on the Public Accounts Committee, is an astonishing response, but that is the culture. We now learn—I did not know this before—that the Liberal Democrats in the European Parliament congratulated the Commission on getting rid of Marta Andreasen.

I have two further points to make, and the first concerns OLAF. Most EU taxpayers would be surprised to know that there is a distinct possibility that they have been funding Palestinian terrorism and suicide bombers over the past few years. The last time I was in Brussels, I raised that subject with Mr. Alberto Perduca, the official in OLAF responsible for monitoring moneys that go to the occupied territories. He said that he could not rule out that that was happening, largely because the moneys are transferred in actual cash. When Yasser Arafat was alive, that money went to his own bank account at the Bank Leumi in Tel Aviv.

My second and final point concerns the EU financial perspective. My right hon. Friend pointed out that instead of trying to sort out current problems, the EU was ever extending into new areas. I commend a speech made by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) on 15 June 2004, Official Report, column 731, in which he describes in some detail the proposals of the Commission to expand into a whole range of new areas, from health and education to training and social policy. There is even a target for increasing the rate at which European films are distributed outside their country of origin from 11 per cent. to 20 per cent. That is the position that we face: we have a system that cannot cope with what it is doing at the moment, and that cannot account to taxpayers for the money that it has spent, and yet it wants to extend further.

I am pessimistic, because there has been no apparent adequate drive for change. I would love to think that the Financial Secretary will say something that will give me cause for comfort, but the time has come for shock therapy. For years, people have been waiting for some sort of change, and they have not seen it. The only thing that the Financial Secretary can say that will give me any cause for optimism is that the British Government will finance—and will encourage other member states to do so too—only those areas of expenditure that receive a clean bill of health. If he does not do that, I am afraid that there will be just more of the same.

10.9 am

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, Pollok) (Lab/Co-op): The right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) talked about déjà vu, or, as we might say in Glasgow, déjà vu again. We have repeatedly had debates on EU fraud, with warm words coming from the Government and nothing effectively happening. It is clear that the EU is weak on fraud, and the Government's attitude seems to be that it is a price worth paying. They have not been nearly as outspoken as they ought to have been in the circumstances about this substantial waste of taxpayers' money.

The Government's attitude seems to be that because this is EU money, it does not matter; but it is our money that is being wasted. We are the second largest contributor to the EU budget; it is the money of the taxpayers of this country that is being wasted. I welcome the fact that the Prime Minister identified a share of the EU contribution to the recent flood disasters in south-east Asia as Britain's contribution. On that principle, the Financial Secretary should accept that a share of all the fraud that is occurring is fraud against UK taxpayers, and that it ought to be dealt with.

The Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee raised a number of interesting points, some of which I had not previously been aware of. I am sure that we all enjoyed the Croatian sugar export story; it would be funny if it was not so tragic, and I hope that the Financial Secretary will respond to it with a degree of seriousness. I was also aware of the farm buildings in the North sea, and the Irish dead sheep that may or may not have existed. However, I am reliably informed that none of those sheep were involved in the recent bank robberies in Belfast.

I ask the Financial Secretary to tell us what the Government's attitude is to the sensible suggestion of the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee that the National Audit Office should be able to pursue UK money into the Commission—that it should have rights of access to EU books and officials in order to follow through how our money is being spent. We cannot trust the EU system to police itself, and therefore it is essential to adopt a mechanism such as that proposed by the Public Accounts Committee Chairman. I will be very disappointed if the Financial Secretary does not suggest that he intends to support the request and to do what he can to make sure that it comes about; otherwise, the Government will be seen to be acquiescing in the present level of EU fraud, irregularity and mismanagement.

In my opinion, the Government have been more interested in covering up EU fraud than in exploring and revealing it. If that is not the case, I would be grateful if the Financial Secretary would give me an assurance that the Government will publish as soon as possible a list of all the frauds and irregularities that they are aware of and that cause them concern. Failure to do so will be seen as placing the EU project above the rights and duties of the Government and the interests of EU taxpayers.

I am sure that we have all noticed that the Commission has been pushing for a 35 per cent. increase in EU spending in the next budget round. I hope that the Financial Secretary will give us a clear and categorical assurance on behalf of the Government that Britain will not agree to that until such time as fraud and irregularities are removed from the EU budget.

However, we must remember that the EU budget is not the only source and site of fraud. When Greece joined the euro, it rigged its books to minimise the appearance of its deficit in order to make it eligible to join. The concept of cooking the books for political purposes is endemic to the entire EU project.

I ask the Financial Secretary to explain the Government's intentions with regard to dealing with fraud when Britain takes over the EU presidency. We have heard many warm words about those intentions, but what is the target in combating fraud? What are the objectives against which the success, or otherwise, of the British presidency can be measured?

I look forward to hearing the Financial Secretary's response.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con) rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair acknowledges that the hon. Gentleman who seeks to catch my eye is a member of the European Scrutiny Committee and, as such, I shall allow him to speak. However, I must point out that, as he heard only three minutes of one of his European Scrutiny Committee colleague's contributions and six minutes of that of a Government Back Bencher and Public Accounts Committee member, he will have missed many of the points made. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will avoid undue repetition, and I remind him that the first of the three winding-up speeches begins at 10.30 am and they can last for only 10 minutes each. I trust that the hon. Gentleman will bear those comments in mind when making his contribution.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): I am extremely aware of what you have said, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am sorry that I arrived a little late, but sometimes that is unavoidable. However, I will do my best not to repeat myself, and I have no desire to repeat what others have said.

Let me explain the question that I want to address. I am well aware of many of the arguments that I dare say have already been adduced, as I have been involved in this issue since the early 1990s. I was involved in the debate on the European Communities (Finance) Bill when some of my colleagues lost the Whip. On that occasion, there were frenetic discussions between the Whips Office, the Foreign Secretary, the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Prime Minister, because I had the temerity to table an amendment that said in effect that the rules governing the manner in which fraud is investigated in the EU should take account of and follow the procedures prescribed by our own Public Accounts Committee, several distinguished members of which are present today. I have persisted in that, and I have reason to believe that the Comptroller and Auditor General agrees with my principal point. I am also delighted that the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee is present, because he and I have persistently raised that question over many years.

The reality is that it is open to the other member states to change their rules to take account of the point made by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. Davidson) and my hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Bacon)—and I dare say, although I did not have the privilege of hearing him, my right hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory).

The fundamental question is, how do our country and other countries address the mismanagement and outright fraud in the EU? Several years ago, I visited the European Court of Auditors as a member of the European Scrutiny Committee—then known as the European Select Committee. We were informally told that although about £6 billion a year was the figure that some German professor had come up with, the fact was that the exact amount was not known, and not only was it not known, but it could be £20 billion or more. The situation is seriously out of control. A senior member of the Court of Auditors resigned because he was not getting the sort of answers that he wanted to such questions. I am putting it in a nutshell, but that is all I need to do because the incidence of fraud and mismanagement is set out in detail in the Court of Auditor's report.

These debates used to be taken on the Floor of the House; I remember complaining when they were referred to a European Standing Committee. Those Committees are useful, although they will be subject to reform, but issues such as the scale and range of European fraud are a matter of grave interest to all Members of the House and they should be taken on the Floor and not in Standing Committee. Because of the nature of the budgetary arrangements in the European Union, interaction between fraud in other countries and the financial perspective to which my hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk referred means that mismanagement and fraud in other countries impinge on our financial arrangements.

It is inevitable that in the desire to achieve economic management under the European Union Bill, which is published today, we are affected by what goes on in other countries. That Bill, which will give effect to the treaty implementing the European constitution, should deal with these questions but it does not.

There is the further question of the connection between resources and potential tax. If functions are set up and they are fraudulently handled in other countries, or if there is a failure to deal with fraud properly, there will be more and more pressure to bring in a tax system to match the increased functions and the increased resources that are called upon. That is a black hole in the middle of the European Union.

Mr. Bacon: Does my hon. Friend recall that when the European Union financial perspective 2007–13 was discussed at a seminar sponsored by the Commission in Helsinki 18 months ago, two items dominated the agenda—first, the British rebate and, secondly, common European taxation?

Mr. Cash: Absolutely, and the lies that have been generated from outside the House with respect to the matters that my hon. Friend raises are simply incredible. There is a determination to move to a common tax policy; that is connected with the budget and therefore with the question of fraud. The scale of the fraud speaks for itself.

The problem can be resolved, but there is a lack of willingness to resolve it. In fact, there is a determination not to. If one asks some of the other 26 member states what are the rules for the equivalent of our Public Accounts Committee, do we find that in the other member states they properly examine matters, with the scrutiny available through the National Audit Office and the Comptroller and Auditor General? Is there a determination in each of those member states to deal properly with the accounting system? The Marta Andreasen case and the complete failure of the then Vice-President, now Lord Kinnock, to deal with the matter is a good example of the massive problem of the accounting system and fraud in the European Union, which affects us and our voters. The way in which the whole of the European Union finances operate and the increase in the amount of fraud is a disgrace to the European Union and to those who have been responsible for trying to correct it.

Mr. Bacon: In the last year or so—certainly in the last 18 months—the Committee has visited the Cours des Comptes in Paris, the Bundesrechnungshof in Berlin and, last October, the Tribunal de Cuentas in Madrid. The European Court of Auditors in Luxembourg is modelled on that continental, juridical, legalistic model—not on the financial audit, taxpayer, value-for-money model, such as the one we have here. Does my hon. Friend not appreciate that the reform he is looking for will not happen because it is utterly inimical to the system?

Mr. Cash: I could not agree more. I am living in hope that some good will come of putting forward arguments that make sense and are necessary. I entirely agree with him, because, as I think I said earlier, that is exactly what the European Union does not want. It does not want its accounts to be looked into properly. It does not want to have proper auditing and public accounting. Indeed, a similar problem arises with corruption in Africa as well. The plain fact is that until we face up to the reality of the complete determination not to look into these questions of public accounts, I fear that the situation will simply get worse and worse.

We will have a referendum on the European constitution. The Bill was published this morning, and I can absolutely assure you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I and my colleagues will be highlighting these questions in our determination to show that, under the European Union constitution that is being proposed, nothing has changed and nothing will change. The EU does not intend anything to change, and we will put that message firmly across to the British voters, who will produce a resounding no.

10.27 am

Mr. Colin Breed (South-East Cornwall) (LD): Whether people are avowedly in favour of the European Union or totally against it, no one could suggest that anyone would countenance fraud and the misuse of taxpayers' money. Therefore it is absolutely right that we have these debates and, while there is a certain amount of déjà vu, they should continue, because these are extremely important matters.

The annual reports by the European Court of Auditors and the European anti-fraud office—and, indeed, the National Audit Office—are scrutinised at a number of national and European levels. In the UK, of course, they are considered by the European Scrutiny Committee and European Standing Committee B. As a member of the Scrutiny Committee for quite a little while, I concur with all who have spoken on the subject today that our scrutiny process, in general, needs to be significantly enhanced. It needs to be open, not held in secret as it is, and it ought to have many more powers to ensure that it can get to the bottom of things, not least the budget and the control of funding. All other areas of scrutiny could be significantly enhanced as well.

Part of the problem is that we have a majority Government, and therefore a Government majority on the Committee, whereas most other European scrutiny committees are comprised of coalitions. While they may not get to the bottom of all their finances, I suspect they hold their Ministers to account more. Far too often when I was on the Scrutiny Committee we were advised that the Minister had ignored the scrutiny reserve and had gone ahead and decided on a particular view at the Council of Ministers, of which he informed us later. Our European scrutiny process is in need of great reform and overhaul, and it needs to be held in public.

Fewer matters should be referred to the European Standing Committee and more should to be taken on the Floor of the House. That was often recommended by the Committee, but was never taken up. There is ample evidence that parliamentary time is available on the Floor of the House, particularly on Thursday afternoons, when we could properly debate the issues that we are discussing today.

The European Court of Auditors produces an annual report, as has been said, and I have had a good look at the most recent one. It is required to do so by the treaty that established the European Community to provide the European Parliament and the Council of Ministers with a statement of assurance—I am not quite certain what it assures at the moment—

"concerning both the reliability of the accounts drawn up by the Commission and the legality and regularity of the underlying transactions."

I understand that to be the payments actually made.

The court's assessment usually goes beyond what we would see as a pure accounting exercise; it also assesses the financial management and control structures of the EU Executive. As we have heard, for the 10th successive year it has failed to give the all clear to the accounts. It refused to give a positive assurance on the legality and regularity of 93 per cent. of the EU budget, which is an extraordinary figure. Most auditors would say that in the time available and in normal circumstances they are unable to get 100 per cent. of everything right, but for the court to say that it could not vouch for 93 per cent. is extraordinary.

The notes on the reliability of the accounts are quite instructive. I want to quote a couple of paragraphs from what was said. Paragraph III states:

"In the absence of effective internal control procedures for miscellaneous revenue and advances, the Court cannot be certain that the transactions relating to the sundry debtors item have been correctly and completely recorded."

Almost any auditor going into almost any public or multinational company would be unable to provide absolute assurance in the way in which it is expressed there. Paragraph VI (b) states that "in the case of the structural measures, owing to persistent weaknesses at Member State level in the systems for supervising and controlling the implementation of the EU budget, payments were still subject to the same errors occurring with the same frequency as in previous years."

That gets to the heart of the matter. The fact that, for 10 years in a row, the court has qualified or failed to sign off the accounts seems to have had no effect whatever. There has been no real improvement. Auditors will often make suggestions and indicate areas where there needs to be more effective control, and they would expect, a year later, to see at least some improvement. That is one of the most damning paragraphs; despite 10 years of not being able to sign off the accounts, the payments are "still subject to the same errors occurring with the same frequency".

I should like to make one further observation on the report. It relates to paragraph VII, which states:

"The Court notes the progress made by the Commission as regards the reform of its internal control system and the positive impact of this reform on the legality and regularity of operations subject to direct management by the Commission. However, progress is still required in terms of actual implementation."

Progress has been made in one area, but there is a problem with implementation. That seems to indicate that although new regulations are introduced and new instructions given, implementation is not followed through. That is another part of the damning evidence.

I turn now to OLAF, which also produces a report. Its report indicates that the irregularities that it finds are not necessarily fraud but are the result of simple, non-criminal errors. In that context, I want to give an example of one of my constituents, a farmer who—I believe quite properly—indicated that after the re-measurement of his fields some of his subsidy claims needed to be revisited. He reported that his fields were slightly different, and had carried different crops over the past four years, and in doing so he was made to feel an absolute criminal. He was then asked to return all the subsidy that he had received and told that he would be subject to a penalty, notwithstanding the fact that some of the changes would have resulted in credits and others in debits: in some cases he would have received too much, but in others too little. He thought that, having reported the matter, he would receive fair treatment—that a balance of the credits and debits over the four-year period would be calculated, and that if a payment was due he would pay it, and if not, a payment would be made to him. But he was told absolutely categorically that that could not be the case; he would have to pay back all the subsidy that he had received and a penalty would be imposed. He felt pretty bruised by the whole exercise.

That case would probably go down as fraud, but it was not a fraud. My constituent reported the matter and the difficulties were explained. He was extremely harshly treated. I do not know whether that was the result of an attempt to crack down on fraud, but obtaining money in such a way is not always fraudulent.

The main source of fraud undoubtedly seems to be farmers making fraudulent claims. Spot checks found that 25 per cent. of farm payments in Italy were in error or fraudulent, 23 per cent. in Greece, 21 per cent. in Spain, and 14 per cent. in France. Our error rate was said to be 6 per cent. That may be better than everybody else's, but it is still a problem. How many of those cases were actually fraud rather than honest mistakes I am not certain.

Mr. Bacon: When Marta Andreasen was appointed as the Commission's first budget execution director and accounting officer, there was some hope that those problems would be addressed and sorted out. Why did the Liberal Democrats support the sacking of Marta Andreasen?

Mr. Breed: The short answer is that I do not know. I was somewhat surprised myself. However, I have confidence enough in my own member at the Commission to know that it would not have been out of spite. There must have been significant reasons. I will find out and let the hon. Gentleman know.

The introduction of the integrated administration and control scheme in 2003 has had a significant effect in beginning to check some of the irregularities that were seen in the past. As that rolls out year on year it is beginning to have an effect. Some other reforms, although they have been painfully slow, are also beginning to be implemented. They include satellite imagery of farms to determine their size and to allow proper checking. We are not alone in raising the issue; budgetary matters are raised in other European countries in similar settings but that has only a minimal effect where it makes a difference.

I want to finish with the issue of zero tolerance. It is a good adage to say that we want zero tolerance of fraud, and I would agree with that, but I wonder whether we are prepared to face the underlying costs of implementing the systems that would achieve that. I recall from my banking days that the costs of trying to drive out some of the problems were sometimes 10 times what was being lost. There is a balance to be struck. We are nowhere near it at the present time, but if we want to pursue zero tolerance on all budgetary expenditure to drive out every single euro of fraud, the costs involved would be enormous. We need to take that into account before we go down that road.

Mr. Richard Spring (West Suffolk) (Con): First, I warmly congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh), the distinguished Chairman of the Select Committee on Public Accounts, on securing this debate and on his contribution, based on his considerable knowledge and expertise. What he said about the principle of zero tolerance is absolutely right. Nothing alienates people from the European Union more than the thought that taxpayers' money is being squandered in a irresponsible and unmeasured way. I thank him for what he has done this morning.

I absolutely accept that the European Commission is not inherently corrupt. However, it is bureaucratic, inefficient and vulnerable to fraud, and that vulnerability has been exploited. My hon. Friends the Members for Stone (Mr. Cash) and for South Norfolk (Mr. Bacon) and the hon. Member for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. Davidson) made this point tellingly this morning. The Government are to assume the presidency of the European Union. We have the NAO and other close mechanisms for inspecting any type of financial irregularity in this country. If the Government have, as they say, influence in the EU, it is fundamental that they seek to address the problem in the next year, because the situation has not improved to the satisfaction of people who consider these matters and feel depressed by them, as I do.

I pay particular tribute to my right hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory). I have looked again at his contribution on systems of management during the proceedings of the Convention on the Future of Europe. It is a telling document and a telling analysis of what could and should be done in that context. I pay tribute to him for often being a lone voice on these matters. He has been right in so many instances, and we are seeing that again this morning on immigration and asylum.

The first step must be to acknowledge the extent of the problem. The European Commissioner for Institutional Relations and Communication Strategy, Mrs. Wallström, has said that the Commission has the problem of being afraid of too much openness and has a way of thinking that is "in the walls here". That must change, because it certainly has not changed in any adequate sense of the word. As we have heard, there have been so many instances of fraud, including the EUROSTAT affair and the disgraceful situation involving Croatia and sugar cane. That cost the EU £700,000.

In its annual report in November, the EU's own OLAF said that the incidents of fraud in the aid budget increased by 9 per cent. to 637 over 12 months. The report stated that the international aid budget was dogged by "complex and well-organized" financial fraud. For instance, the EU funded a project to improve water supplies to 50 local authorities in Paraguay. An external audit found that 90 per cent. of the funds had disappeared into a foundation that had nothing whatever to do with the project. The report stated:

"Such fraud takes ... advantage of the lack of coordination in the monitoring and auditing activities between the various international donors".

OLAF's director-general has said:

"Of the problems we detect, more and more are in the aid sector, where things have to be looked into more closely."

He also says:

"All donors have systems of control, but we have to improve them".

I totally agree. After the terrible tsunami disaster and the terrible problems in Zimbabwe and other parts of Africa, international aid is very much at the forefront of people's minds.

[Mr. Richard Spring]

We have heard about Ms Andreasen, the European Commission's chief accountant, who was suspended by the Commission after exposing publicly how its accounts were wide open to fraud and abuse. I say with some pride that Conservative Members of the European Parliament helped Ms. Andreasen to make those shocking accounting practices public, thus fulfilling their public role. The European Court of Auditors has repeatedly confirmed many of her most serious allegations. I add in passing that a British accountant, Brian Gray, is seeking to carry on the work that she was originally put in place to do. We all wish him well in his role and in introducing some of the high standards that we have in this country. In any event, Ms. Andreasen got her reward in October by being sacked from her post.

Regrettably, in November, we yet again faced a farcical situation in which, for the 10th year running, the European Court of Auditors could not give a positive statement of assurance in respect of the overall EU accounts. It is simply unacceptable that the court found that 93.4 per cent. of spending was either unsafe or riddled with errors, up from 91 per cent. the year before. Indeed, the court said that once again there is "no reasonable assurance that the supervisory systems and controls of significant areas of the budget are effectively implemented so as to manage the risks concerning the legality and regularity of the underlying operations".

That speaks volumes for the court's view of the accounts, and is what qualifying the accounts really means. Spot checks by the court found fraud or error leading to demands for repayment in 25 per cent. of farm aid to Italy, 23 per cent. for Greece, 21 per cent. for Spain and 14 per cent. for France. Given the huge burden of the common agricultural policy, the fact that fraud continues under the umbrella of agriculture is an absolute disgrace.

I understand that the usual defence is that the blame lies with the member states. A senior EU auditor said that the Brussels budget is high risk because most of it is doled out to member states, making it hard to track, but—this is the important point—he went on to say that Commission officials set a dreadful tone, behaving like:

"rats in a bag seeking to evade responsibility."

It is absolutely wrong that hard-working, tax-paying families have their taxes so blatantly misused in this way.

We welcome the fact that the Commission has a reform plan, but I doubt that will be enough. The full resource accounting system that we are implementing in Britain has not been replicated in the European Commission—aspects of it have, but not the full system. We need to deal with this problem seriously, and to encourage the European Parliament in its role as watchdog, because it should take itself even more seriously in that role.

I accept that the Commission has made limited progress in this direction. I am pleased that it has taken up our proposal to have a Commissioner with sole responsibility for budgetary control. Frankly, reform must go further. As the treaties say, the buck stops with the Commission. That is a simple fact.

All Commissioners should have a Cabinet member with specific responsibility for all management control issues. They must take full political responsibility for failings within their department. This is hugely important if public credibility is to be reasserted. Quite frankly, it is absolutely wrong that these reports have been signed off, given the circumstances.

OLAF should be fully independent, with its own staff, budget and organisational priorities, subject to a new management board. Member states must account adequately for all expenditure on EU programmes. The Court of Auditors should undertake programme audits for all member states, rather than just a sample of them, publishing a detailed assessment of each. That should be followed up so that progress can be measured in subsequent years.

Until voters can have confidence in EU accounting, Conservative MEPs will refuse to sign off the Commission's accounts, and so would a Conservative Government. The British people contribute to the EU, and they deserve value for money. They do not expect to have their money stolen. Openness, accountability and honesty from the EU should not be too much to ask. After almost eight years in power, the Government have not gripped the issue significantly.

There have been some practical suggestions this morning on how to take the matter forward. I look forward to the Minister's explanation of what the Government will do about such a serious state of affairs, which must be part of the reason that the credibility of the European Union has never been so low, not only in this country, but in many other parts of the European Union.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Timms): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) on securing this debate, and on a very thoughtful speech, which is characteristic of him as Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee. I was pleased that he acknowledged that there were signs of improvement, as did the hon. Member for West Suffolk (Mr. Spring), though perhaps more reluctantly. He said that those improvements were painfully slow, but, nevertheless, acknowledged signs of them. I felt that the contributions of the other Opposition Members were weakened because they said that there had not been any signs of improvement. I agree with the hon. Member for Gainsborough—I think there have been.

I want to be a little more generous than the hon. Gentleman towards the Commission with regard to what has been achieved in the recent past and, in particular, to endorse the fundamental reform initiated by Neil Kinnock when he had responsibility in this area, but I agree that the matter gives rise to serious concern. All Members who have spoken made the point that a great deal more still needs to be done.

My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. Davidson) asked me for an assurance that the UK would not agree to proposals to increase the EU budget by 35 per cent. until the problem of fraud is solved. I can tell him that we will not agree to that proposal, period. Six member states, including the UK, have taken a firm view that the EU budget should be limited to 1 per cent. of member states' national incomes rather than the 1.26 per cent. that is implied by the proposal to which he referred. Our argument is that the current Commission proposal is unrealistic and unaffordable.

There are two important questions that we need to address in this discussion. First, how much fraud is there against the Community budget? Secondly, what is being done to reduce and prevent it? There is a good deal of uncertainty about the true extent of fraud, as has been rightly said in the debate. Most of the figures that are quoted relate not to fraud but to errors or irregularities, within which fraud is an element—although it is difficult to establish precisely how large an element that is. Member states are required to report all detected irregularities to OLAF, but they are not, under current legislation, required to identify actual or even suspected fraud. Some countries—for example, Germany—are not able in law to identify fraud cases until a conviction has been obtained. The UK has been working with OLAF and other member states to try to improve things. I am reassured that OLAF now has the staff and the expertise needed to identify the true extent of fraud. OLAF did not have those at the outset, and putting them in place took rather longer than we had hoped. That they are now in place is a welcome development.

The Commission's annual "Fight against Fraud" reports publish the amounts of irregularities reported each year by member states. The most recent report covered 2003, as we heard. The figures published there add up, as the hon. Gentleman said, to total irregularities of €921 million, and he fairly and rightly drew attention to the increase in that figure since 1999. I think it is also fair to draw the attention of the House to the decline in the 2003 figure of 20 per cent. from the previous year. That is one of the developments that I would emphasise as indicating that there are some signs of improvement.

That does not mean that there is any justification for complacency. The figures can go up and down from year to year. We cannot say yet that the figures are on a consistent downward trend, welcome though the reduction for the most recent year certainly is. Some cases take years to investigate. Total figures may not be included until investigation has been completed. There may be events contributing to an increase, such as the final closure of the 1994 to 1999 structural fund programmes, which required heavy auditing and, consequently, a higher detection of errors, contributing to the 2002 figure.

OLAF has estimated in the past that perhaps some 20 per cent. of the irregularities reported may turn out to be fraud. If that figure was right, taking the €921 million of reported irregularities, that would put the value on fraud at €185 million. If correct, although there are lots of caveats around that figure, that would be 0.2 per cent. of total Community budget expenditure. That is a significant sum, but not as large a share of the total as some that have been quoted in this debate. Although we cannot be sure of the true extent of fraud, we will continue to encourage OLAF to improve its analysis and encourage member states to identify suspected fraud when they report cases of irregularities. It is unacceptable that we cannot pinpoint the true extent of fraud; the sooner we can, the sooner we can expect to see a reduction in the regular critical headlines.

Mr. Cash: Given the seriousness of the situation, and despite the claims of slight improvement—I shall not dispute those, but I do say that it is only slight—why did the Government not take the opportunity to red-line the necessity of dealing with the question of procedures during the negotiations on the constitution? That would have ensured that we dealt with the matter properly.

Mr. Timms: I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman has acknowledged the possibility that there has been some improvement. It is important that the House should acknowledge improvement when that has occurred. There are very welcome assertions in the proposed constitution that address the issue; they provide reassurance and helpful underpinnings for the work that needs to be done in future. Perhaps I shall have the opportunity to come back to that in a moment.

The second important question is about what we are doing to reduce the incidence of fraud against the budget. The treaty—the new draft constitution—will make an important contribution.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Will the Minister give way on that point?

Mr. Timms: No, I had better not. I have only three minutes, and I hope to get to the precise point on which the right hon. Gentleman wants to press me.

OLAF is the key player in the fight against fraud. The Commission and the Council worked with commendable speed to set it up in June 1999 after the European Court of Auditors' uncomplimentary report in 1998. What material difference has OLAF made in comparison with its predecessor? We start to get a partial picture by examining the helpful and informative annual activity reports, which tell us, for example, about the Croatian sugar cane case, rightly referred to in this debate.

The latest activity report shows a service that is getting to grips with its predecessor's legacy. It is particularly welcome that the backlog of old and very old cases has been mostly eliminated. OLAF has become more effective, particularly in the past 12 to 18 months, and the new directors for investigations and intelligence have helped to drive that improvement. As I have said, OLAF is now up to its full staff complement and has more than twice as many people as its predecessor UCLAF. The fact that it has achieved that is welcome.

Mr. Bacon: Will the Financial Secretary give way?

Mr. Timms: I have only two minutes. I know what the hon. Gentleman wants to press me on.

Mr. Bacon: No, you do not.

Mr. Timms: It is important that I make as much progress as I can through the points that I want to raise.

I welcome the fact that OLAF was able to identify that an agent employed by a Commission agency had wrongly claimed more than €20 million in allowances, and that the agency was able to recover that cash.

The EUROSTAT case was referred to, and work on that is ongoing. There is absolutely no doubt that serious mistakes were made, but the systems put in place as part of the reform programme unearthed those problems at EUROSTAT, and decisive action was taken. Under article 280 of the treaty on European

[Mr. Timms]

Union, the Commission and member states are required to take measures to counter fraud and any other illegal activities affecting the financial interests of the Community. That article also requires member states to take the same measures to counter fraud affecting the financial interests of the Community as they take to counter fraud that affects their own interests—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Education Funding (North Somerset)

11 am

Brian Cotter (Weston-super-Mare) (LD): I am delighted to have the opportunity to debate education funding in North Somerset, and I am grateful that the Minister is attending.

Funding for education is a priority for us all. I am deeply concerned about the lack of such funding for North Somerset. The local education authority covers the constituencies of Weston-super-Mare and Woodspring. Funding for education in the area has consistently been below the national average, and education services there are beginning to suffer.

Concerned about current education funding levels in North Somerset, I asked the Secretary of State for Education and Skills about the average funding per pupil in England and in North Somerset. I was extremely concerned about the figures given in the ministerial response that I received. They showed that average funding for pupils in North Somerset had been consistently lower than the national average for a great number of years, and that the trend was set to continue. In 2004-05, pupils in North Somerset will receive £340 less on average than other pupils across England. That adds up to an £11 million shortfall this year in education for the region.

North Somerset has consistently ranked among the lowest-funded LEAs in England, and the provisional figure for 2004-05 shows that the trend is continuing. North Somerset is currently ranked 121st of the 150 LEAs in England and Wales for secondary school funding and 134th for primary school funding. The model that is used to calculate the funding needs of each LEA is fundamentally flawed. The relative affluence of the Woodspring constituency has been overvalued, and the significant social and financial deprivation in areas of Weston-super-Mare has been grossly undervalued. The funding model appears to bear little recognition of the difficulty and costs associated with addressing the needs of small groups in isolated areas. Rural poverty is not a consideration in the model. Those factors added together ensure that schools in Weston-super-Mare are not receiving a fair level of funding and are struggling to maintain standards.

Those levels of underfunding are certain to have an effect on local schools and education services. Teachers in Weston-super-Mare have worked extremely hard to produce excellent exam results, but cracks are beginning to appear in other areas. Presented with the figures for underfunding, I decided to conduct a survey among local head teachers to learn more about how poor funding levels were directly affecting local schools and education services. I questioned 37 head teachers about how underfunding had affected their schools and asked them to provide specific details of those effects. I circulated the survey to 37 LEA schools in my constituency, comprising five secondary schools, six infant schools, four junior schools and 22 primary schools.

Twenty-five head teachers responded to the survey, and the results were deeply concerning. Almost two thirds of those surveyed said that underfunding had affected their school. More than half said that it had affected resources and equipment, and a third said that it had affected the appointment of teaching staff. Almost a quarter of those surveyed said that large class sizes were a problem in their schools. The general comments made by head-teachers were also alarming. One wrote:

"If I had known the extent of under-funding, I would not have applied for a headship in North Somerset."

Another wrote:

"Years of under-funding in North Somerset is now taking its toll on the quality of education on offer."

Those are just a few of the outcomes of the survey, but head teachers also identified many other significant problems caused by Government underfunding. They included the impossibility of implementing Government-set targets in certain areas. One example is teachers' planning, preparation and assessment time. As I am sure the Minister is aware, from September 2005, all schools must guarantee their teaching staff a minimum of 10 per cent. of their timetabled teaching time as PPA time. In order to guarantee that that time can be spent away from the classroom, head teachers must have support staff available to provide cover. However, the lack of funding means that local heads are unable to hire the staff that they need.

For example, Mr. Bruce Dale, head teacher of Mendip Green first school in my constituency, said:

"By the time you've paid the wages, there's little left with which to appoint auxiliary staff."

The cost to local schools of employing additional staff for PPA time will be £65,000 to £70,000—money that these schools simply do not have. It will therefore be impossible for most schools in North Somerset to meet this Government-set target, for which they could again be penalised with reduced funding. That is clearly unfair.

The environment in which pupils are taught has also been affected by underfunding, according to local head teachers. Indeed, 41 per cent. of head teachers surveyed said that underfunding had affected their school buildings and maintenance. Many such buildings have seen very little refurbishment since they were built, which for some schools goes back to the 1950s.

To put the problem into context, I shall use an example involving Mr. Ron Richards, the head teacher at Priory community school in my constituency. He had to organise a meeting with the school's business manager to check whether it was okay to replace a 27-year-old faulty central heating boiler. He said:

"I didn't have a choice about paying for it to be fixed, but it has already put our maintenance budget into the red. In this day and age, it's incredible we have to worry about minor, but necessary expenses such as this."

In such a situation, there should have been no question about the cost of the repair. It should simply have been done automatically. To put it quite simply, schools in Weston-super-Mare and the constituency as a whole should be better funded so that necessary expenses such as those incurred by that basic maintenance requirement can be dealt with immediately and do not create such a significant problem for the school's budget.

I must take a moment to credit the teachers in my constituency who have worked extremely hard to ensure that pupils in Weston receive the best possible education. However, in order to fund projects in schools and ensure a high level of education, head teachers are forced to look for increased funding wherever they can find it. Many are forced to apply for grants simply to top up their funding to national levels. Grants are all very well, but gaining them requires a lot of time and preparation, and there is not always certainty. Applying for grants is time consuming, but without them, the schools in my area would be unable to provide much-needed education services. Head teachers are therefore forced to spend their precious time completing grant applications one after the other, rather like beggars.

The education problems in Weston have previously been recognised by the Government. As I am sure the Minister is aware, in 1998, Weston became one of the first 25 education action zones to be established by the Government. That meant additional funding of £750,000 a year for three years, subsequently extended to five years. Following on from that, Weston was transformed into an excellence cluster on 1 September 2003. That means £650,000 of additional funding for schools across the zone and ensures that all the secondary schools receive leadership incentive grants.

I admit that those grants and that additional funding have enabled Weston schools to provide services that otherwise would have been impossible with the basic funding levels. For example, Worle community school has been able to run a learning support unit to provide extra support for pupils with special education needs. Since the establishment of that unit, no permanent exclusions have been made at the school. The head teacher, Trevor Bailey, believes that that is largely attributable to the unit.

Excellent work has been done as a result of the grants that have been received, but those grants and additional funding from the excellence cluster scheme will end in April 2006, and there are currently no Government plans to renew the funding. If basic funding levels remain as they are, several services in local schools will have to be scrapped. Local schools should not have to rely on those Government grants to provide much-needed services. The basic funding level should be sufficient to carry the provision of necessary services.

Head teachers in my constituency have expressed grave concern about the short termism of the Government's attitude. Special grants are a help in schools, but part of what they do is simply cover up for a short time the fundamental problems caused by the lack of basic funding. The only way to ensure the long-term future of education services and projects in local schools is to provide improved basic funding year on year.

Teachers in my constituency work extremely hard to try to ensure that the shortfall in education funding is not translated into a shortfall in local pupils' education and opportunities. They have taken on a great deal of additional responsibility and given up their own time for that purpose. Several teachers have brought to their schools resources and equipment such as paper and pens from their own homes to use in lessons as they know that funding is simply not available to provide enough of those resources in their schools. Bruce Dale of Mendip Green school, whom I have already mentioned, said:

"The lack of funding is ridiculous. It has meant buying everyday school items is fast becoming very difficult."

The increased pressure on teachers to maintain high standards in local schools is unacceptable and inevitably means problems with retaining local staff. Why work in a school in North Somerset with low funding and increased stress when one can move to a different LEA for increased funding and decreased stress, do the same job and receive the same rate of pay?

I ask the Minister to take note of what I am saying today. We have a genuine problem. The consistently low levels of Government funding for North Somerset have caused cracks to appear in the education system in my constituency. Despite the continued hard work of local head teachers and their staff, it is inevitable that, without the necessary funds, they will not be able to prevent the growing problems. Head teachers are battling to climb a descending escalator, and as they have admitted in the survey, in some areas they are beginning to lose the service that they have provided until now.

Pupils across the country deserve the same standard of education and the same opportunities, but the current funding levels are beginning to put pupils in my constituency at a distinct disadvantage. Many of these pupils already come from deprived areas and simply deserve a better deal. In the light of the increasing problems and the growing concerns of local head teachers, I ask the Minister to look again at the funding model and the levels of funding for North Somerset. I should also like him to meet me and head teachers so that we can discuss the way forward.

11.15 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Derek Twigg): I congratulate the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare (Brian Cotter) on securing this debate, and I note his concerns about education funding in North Somerset.

I would like to start by talking about the performance of schools in North Somerset. When we speak about education in the House, it is important to recognise the outstanding work that is carried out in our schools. I am pleased that figures published in April 2004 show that there are now 3,900 more teachers in schools in the south-west than in 1997 and 500 more teachers in the region than in 2003. The "School Workforce in England" statistical release shows that in the south-west full-time equivalent teacher numbers have increased from 36,300 in 1997 to 40,200 in 2004. The number of support staff has increased from 13,100 in 1997 to 23,200 in 2004. In North Somerset, regular teacher numbers have increased from 1,360 in January 1999 to 1,500 in January 2004—a 10 per cent. increase. Over the same period, the number of school support staff working in the county has risen by almost 50 per cent., from 490 to 730. The teacher vacancy rate in January 2004 was 0.4 per cent.; there were five vacancies.

I want to put on the record my gratitude for the work of the teachers and pupils in North Somerset who have been responsible for significant improvements in the quality of education in the county. For example, the percentage of pupils leaving primary schools in North Somerset who are doing well in English has risen from 70 per cent. in 1998 to 79 per cent. in 2004. In maths, the figure has risen from 64 per cent. to 77 per cent, and in science it has risen from 78 per cent. to 89 per cent. I am sure that hon. Members will agree that that represents outstanding work in primary schools.

Looking at the transition into secondary education, there is equally impressive evidence of what is happening in North Somerset at key stage 3. Some 75 per cent. of pupils achieved level 5 and above in 2004, compared with 72 per cent. in 1998; in mathematics 78 per cent. achieved that level, compared with 65 per cent. previously; and in science 73 per cent. did so compared with 61 per cent. I am pleased that the number of pupils achieving the important five A to C grades in their GCSEs has continued to increase steadily, moving from 50.9 per cent in 1998, compared with the national average of 46.3 per cent., to 54.9 per cent. in 2004, compared with 53.7 per cent. nationally.

On funding, it is worth reflecting on the increases in funding that North Somerset has received since this Government came to power. We estimate that, between 1997–98 and 2004–05, North Somerset's total funding per pupil has increased in real terms from £2,690 to £3,520—an increase of £830. Capital investment has also greatly increased. In 1997–98, capital funding in North Somerset was £4.3 million. Its 2004–05 allocation is £27.1 million, while for 2005–06, the allocation so far is £17.9 million.

Looking ahead to the national picture, recurrent funding for schools will increase by about £2 billion in 2005–06. As the hon. Gentleman will know, last July, my hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office announced school funding arrangements for 2005–06. Further details were announced as part of the provisional local government finance settlement early in December. The settlement builds on the package of funding measures introduced in 2004–05 in response to the funding difficulties of the previous year.

The settlement for 2005–06 promotes continued stability and certainty in school funding. For 2005–06, all secondary and special schools will have an increase in their budgets of at least 4 per cent. per pupil where pupil numbers stay the same. The guarantee for primary and nursery schools is higher, at 5 per cent. per pupil, which recognises that those schools need extra support to implement the final phase of the work force reforms from September 2005, as the hon. Gentleman mentioned.

We have also ensured that every LEA has the resources, headroom and flexibility to deliver the guarantee and provide support to help schools facing additional pressures. Next year, all LEAs will receive an increase in their school formula spending share of at least 5.5 per cent. per pupil. North Somerset's increase is significantly higher, at 7.2 per cent. per pupil, and follows its above average increase of 6.5 per cent. per pupil in 2004–05. Also, standards fund support, school standards grant and Learning and Skills Council funding for sixth forms will all increase by 4 per cent. for 2005–06. Of course, we expect LEAs to play their part in ensuring that funding reaches schools. We expect them to assess and support the needs of every school and to ensure that resources, on top of the minimum guarantee, are targeted effectively to deliver the highest possible standards.

The point has been made that North Somerset receives lower funding than many other authorities. Although North Somerset has, like other authorities, benefited from the significant increases in funding that the Government have committed to education, the funding on a per pupil basis is below the national average. Indeed, I understand that the hon. Gentleman tabled a parliamentary question last September about the level of funding per pupil.

I have checked with my officials, and we have not received any representations in the past year from the LEA about any serious concerns regarding underfunding in schools. I take the point about seeking a meeting, and I shall certainly see whether we can arrange a date and time. I shall come back to the hon. Gentleman on that, but I stress that we have so far received no representations from his LEA saying that there are specific problems in schools in his constituency.

Brian Cotter: I thank the Minister for those remarks. Did I understand correctly that he would be prepared to have a meeting with me, head teachers and others?

Derek Twigg: I shall go away and see whether that can be arranged.

The Government aim to give all pupils an equal opportunity in life. Pupils from more deprived backgrounds have additional learning needs and require additional help to access that equal opportunity. That is why the funding formula takes into account the level of deprivation in each authority and gives additional funding accordingly. Schools serving deprived communities face significant challenges in handling and educating pupils and therefore need additional support. Even with the extra funding, attainment is still much lower in deprived areas.

North Somerset is less deprived than many other authorities. It has well below the average proportion of pupils from families receiving income support—the most heavily weighted deprivation factor—and below the average proportion from families receiving the working families tax credit. Compared with the national average, North Somerset also has significantly fewer primary pupils with English as a second language and secondary pupils from low-achieving ethnic minority groups.

The funding formula gives additional resources to sparsely populated areas such as North Somerset to help pay for transport costs and the higher costs of maintaining a large number of small schools. The authorities in such areas face higher costs in delivering the same service. The formula also gives additional resources to high-cost areas to reflect the higher cost of recruiting and retaining staff. North Somerset receives some extra funding through the area cost adjustment to reflect those costs. It is for the LEA to ensure through its local funding formula that additional funding for additional needs reaches the schools that need it.

Although North Somerset is one of the least deprived authorities, I appreciate that there are some deprived areas in Weston-super-Mare. I am therefore pleased with the progress being made by the Weston education action zone, which has successfully evolved into an excellence cluster and is embedded within the wider local authority approach to school partnerships. It is one of two large groupings of schools through which the LEA and its partners are increasingly moving towards local and community provision of education and other services, including the change for children programme.

Excellence clusters are designed to bring the benefits of excellence in cities to small pockets of deprivation. As part of that programme, the Weston excellence cluster will receive an allocation of at least £650,000. The Government are also currently piloting two federations.

Brian Cotter: As I said earlier, the excellence cluster scheme has been very handy, but will the Minister consider the fact that the funding will come to an end in April 2006, even if he cannot comment on that this morning? I appreciate his acceptance that there is a particular problem in the Weston-super-Mare constituency. The Woodspring constituency is much more affluent. I am particularly concerned about Weston, as the MP, and I wanted to emphasise to him—I believe that he acknowledged this concern—and to officials that the Woodspring aspect affects the weighting for Weston. I welcome the comments that he made, but I am also concerned about the ending of the funding in 2006.

Derek Twigg: I recognise that the hon. Gentleman makes a strong point about his constituency. I shall turn shortly to funding issues, which I will take further.

The Government are currently funding two pilot federations in North Somerset. Federation is one way for small schools to make their resources go further, by collaborating with other schools under joint governance arrangements. Through federations, they can deliver the curriculum through collaborative approaches that enable sharing of facilities, staff and expertise. For example, federations offer scope for shared heads, administrative and support staff, and information and communications technology.

As I said, one of these federations is the Weston education partnership, which consists of four mainstream secondary schools, two special schools and a college, which will receive £600,000 over three years, from 2003–04 to 2005–06. The federation aims to overcome a culture of poor educational achievement in the town and to improve the number of people progressing to further and higher education.

I expect that the hon. Gentleman is aware of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's announcement of 8 July 2004 about the funding changes we propose for the longer term set out in the Department's five-year strategy for children and learners. The strategy includes a dedicated schools budget and three-year budgets for schools aligned to the school year, which will give schools financial security and freedom in their forward planning so that they can concentrate on their key role of school improvement, teaching and learning.

We will shortly consult on the education funding proposals set out in the five-year strategy. The proposals are not, however, about an arbitrary change in variations in funding per pupil between various authorities. LEAs will continue to be funded under the formula on the basis of relative need. Our top priority in making any funding changes in 2006–07 is continued stability and predictability for schools in their funding. The consultation document will set out our proposals on how funding might be distributed between LEAs from 2006–07.

Turning to the work force agreement, which the hon. Gentleman mentioned, perhaps I can add a word about school work force remodelling. That reform is all about freeing teachers to spend more of their time on their core responsibilities. Their core responsibility is, of course, classroom teaching, but there are also the key professional activities that support teaching, such as time for planning, preparation and assessment. We have always been clear that work force reform should largely be funded from better use of existing resources.

Schools will be able to implement the national agreement only by moving towards new ways of working. The more radical schools are realising that grasping the remodelling agenda can mean better outcomes for teachers and pupils and lower costs. Schools that abandon unnecessary tasks, redeploying support staff to ensure that the use of their time and expertise is maximised will get the best from existing ICT infrastructure and reduce reliance on expensive supply teachers, and will find that the reforms are achievable.

The hon. Gentleman may be aware that the national remodelling team is working closely with LEAs and other partners to help schools implement the changes in support of the agreement. The team is working with a network of LEA remodelling advisers who are available to school leaders and can give them help and advice on remodelling the school work force and managing important change.

The funding that local authorities receive per pupil reflects their relative need compared with that of other authorities. Any changes that we make in future will continue to reflect that. In setting the guaranteed increases in 2004–05 and 2005–06, we are allowing for additional costs on which authorities and schools are already spending. That is because we are aiming at stability rather than at changing the pattern of spend. Our priority remains stability and certainty in school funding.

NICE Infertility Guidelines

2 pm

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley) (Lab): Through you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I thank the Speaker for selecting this topic for debate this afternoon. Although there are not many Members present in the Chamber, the issue is one that concerns Members of both Houses. I shall put the debate in context by discussing what brought about the referral to the National Institute for Clinical Excellence and its guidelines as well as the work of the all-party group on infertility, of which I am chairman and of which some Opposition members are present.

I am sure that it is clear to many people in this House and outside that one in seven couples in the United Kingdom will experience problems conceiving at some point in their reproductive life. For about two thirds of them, the only way in which they will successfully conceive is through treatment consisting of either the use of ovulatory stimulatory drugs or techniques such as in vitro fertilisation—commonly known as IVF.

Unfortunately, although the World Health Organisation recognises infertility as a public health problem, the condition has not received public funding to allow those with fertility problems to receive treatment on the national health service as patients with other health problems do. As a result, about 80 per cent. of couples have to resort to paying for their own treatment, the cost of which can run to tens of thousands of pounds. Even in areas where funding is available, couples can be on a waiting list for years and might exceed the age limit before they receive treatment. I suspect from the evidence that I have received from my local primary care trust that in years to come there will be a increase in the age of people on the NHS waiting list, who cannot afford the option of turning to the private sector for treatment. Many people are forced into the private sector for treatment because of non-availability of the treatment on the NHS, although I accept that the Government are trying to make the system fairer than it was 12 months ago; I shall come on to the detail of that later.

The all-party group on infertility works closely with the National Infertility Awareness Campaign, which is an umbrella body formed in 1993 as a development of national fertility week. It was established with the support, which it continues to enjoy, of all the major infertility charities, patient support groups, most members of the medical profession dealing with the subject, and the pharmaceutical industry. I am not sure whether I should declare the fact that I also chair the all-party pharmaceutical industry group, although I have no pecuniary interest in that respect.

Most of us are generally dissatisfied with the level of infertility treatment that our constituents receive. I have been an MP for more than 20 years, and I have encountered about six cases in which I have sat with a couple who could not afford to go to the private sector as others can. I have shared both their disappointment with what was not happening in the national health service, and their disappointment as a result of wanting a family but, unlike many of us, being unable to have one without difficulty.

In November 2000, following pressure from NIAC, other stakeholders and, I suspect, from MPs, the Government asked NICE to produce clinical guidance on the treatment and management of infertility. The Secretary of State for Health at that time, my right hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn), made it plain in a Department of Health press release at that time that his aim was to ensure that

"infertile couples get fairer, faster access to clinically, cost-effective and appropriate treatments."

In May 2003, NIAC approached supportive parliamentarians for their assistance in setting up an all-party group on infertility, both to raise awareness in Parliament of infertility issues and to maintain pressure on the Government to drive forward implementation of the guideline. As I recall, the guidance was at that time in draft form but had been leaked to the press. Some extraordinary claims were made in the press—for example, that the guidance would cost up to £400 million—and some cancer charities were dragged into the debate, saying a choice would have to be made between infertility treatment or dealing with cancer. I thought that was a misguided debate and do not know how it reached the press, but as a consequence of that initial debate, the all-party group was formed.

At first, we put together a report with a group of experts working in the field of infertility in both the public and the private sectors. The report outlined the structures needed to meet the NICE recommendations in full and was timed to coincide with the guideline's publication. Exactly what NICE was likely to recommend in its final report was no secret after the first leak of the draft, and we and the specialist group concentrated on that. In particular, the report recommended ways to achieve cost savings in the investigation and treatment of infertility by streamlining procedures, avoiding the duplication of tests and treatment and reducing the numbers of embryos transferred.

The report also discussed concerns surrounding the commissioning of infertility services and the problems associated with that following the move towards specialised commissioning by primary care trust consortiums. The aim was to demonstrate to PCTs how the guideline recommendations could be met in the most cost-effective way—that refers to what the then Secretary of State said back in 2000. Copies were sent to all PCTs as well as to the Department of Health—my hon. Friend the Minister for Public Health will have received one—and since then the group has continued to raise awareness in Parliament of the plight of infertile couples and the need for speedy and full implementation of the guidance.

It might be useful to say what the key recommendations in the guidance were. They were, first, that all women should be screened for chlamydia before they undergo procedures to check whether their fallopian tubes are blocked; secondly, that women who have no history of problems with their fallopian tubes should be offered an X-ray to see if their tubes are blocked, rather than an invasive procedure; thirdly, that couples with unexplained infertility problems, slightly abnormal sperm count or mild endometriosis should be offered six cycles of intra-uterine insemination; and fourthly that couples where the woman is aged between 29 and 39 who have an identified cause of their fertility problems or unexplained fertility of at least three years' standing should be offered three cycles of stimulated IVF. Our report certainly looked at far more than just IVF, but I suppose that IVF took the lion's share of the debate because of its costs and the pressures on the health service to supply it. We might have been remiss in not looking at the guidance as a whole, because the focus is on IVF treatment issues and the deadline of April this year. However, there is a lot more in the guidance that I would have liked the NHS to address, but up to now, according to my information, it has not done so.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): I entirely endorse the right hon. Gentleman's remarks. However, does he agree that one reason that we have focused on the number of IVF cycles is because in some areas—my own constituency, for example—the policy prior to the NICE guidelines was essentially for there to be investigation of impaired fertility, but not to the point of going on to support assisted conception through the NHS? Very often, from the patient's point of view, they have been supported by the NHS up until, but not through, the assisted conception that would help them to give birth.

Mr. Barron: The hon. Gentleman is correct. Everybody knows that there were large areas of England and Wales where IVF was never offered—probably the only thing that was not. He makes a fair point: it is likely that people would have concentrated on IVF because, in some parts of the country, that was the piece of the jigsaw that was missing.

The guidelines that I have read out were published by NICE and form its key recommendations. I think that, to some extent, we took our eye off the key recommendations by concentrating on IVF. When the guidelines were published, the Secretary of State for Health, my right hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, North and Bellshill (Dr. Reid), responded by announcing that

"As a first step, by April next year I want all PCTs, including those who at present provide no IVF treatment, to offer at least one full cycle of treatment to all those eligible."

Moreover, he added, the NHS was to "give local priority to couples who do not have any children living with them."

This was in the Department of Health press release of 25 February of that year.

My right hon. Friend's final comment seemed to be the only criterion that either the Government or NICE were saying was to be used. I always found that point strange. In my own constituency for many years, having a child living with them was one of the hurdles that the local health authority, as was, raised against people having IVF treatment. The child or children in question, however, might have been one of the partner's from a previous marriage or relationship. It was effectively a denial of a person's right to become a mother or a father through that technique. I do not want to use up today's debate on criteria, however, because we could go on for many hours about how criteria have had different impacts in areas throughout the United Kingdom.

Mr. Lansley: Although the hon. Gentleman said that that was one of the criteria that were related to the NICE guidelines, social criteria as such were outside the scope of the NICE guidelines. The only real guidelines in that respect were, for example, the clinical characteristics or the age of the woman, but not that social criterion.

Mr. Barron: That is correct. The Secretary of State is not with us, and the Minister for Public Health probably will not know the answer to this question, but it would be interesting to ask why that criterion was put in the Department of Health press release at that time. There were many others that could have been in there that would operate locally as well.

Although NIAC and the all-party group welcomed the Secretary of State's announcement as a starting point for full implementation, there was a degree of disappointment about the lack of any clear time frame for the remaining two IVF cycles to be put into place. As is now well-known, one cycle offers approximately a 25 per cent. chance of conceiving, compared with a 70 per cent. chance of success over the recommended three cycles. Waiting lists tend to consist of women who are getting near to the age cut-off, and my local PCT is saying that it will treat women who were under 40 when they started treatment until they are 42 years old, and then the cycles will be over. That is very important.

On 25 February, the same day that the announcement was made, I actually rose at Prime Minister's Question Time and asked him directly when he expected full implementation of the guidelines. He responded to me, saying that he hoped that "over the next couple of years we shall see at least very substantial progress towards implementation of the full NICE guidelines".—[Official Report, 25 February 2004; Vol. 418, c. 278.]

Of course, "the next couple of years" is substantial progress from the Secretary of State's less forthcoming

"In the longer term I would expect the NHS to make progress towards full implementation".

That was also in the Secretary of State's press release of 25 February. That phrase, "in the longer term", was reiterated last year by my hon. Friend the Minister for Public Health when she addressed the June 2004 national infertility day conference.

It has been nearly a year since the NICE guidelines were published, and the PCTs should have the necessary structures in place by now to meet the April deadline for providing at least one full cycle of IVF to all eligible couples. I alluded earlier to the fact that I have kept in touch with what is happening in my locality, primarily through the good offices of Dr. John Radford at the Rotherham primary care trust, whom I have known for many years and who is leading on commissioning for a group of PCTs. Last week I received a draft paper that sets out the criteria for access to NHS-funded specialist fertility services for patients who are the responsibility of 13 primary care trusts. I am sure that this time last year I would have been very happy that people were looking at commissioning infertility services in that way, particularly in areas where there was no cover for issues such as IVF, as the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) said earlier.

The 13 PCTs in question cover the North Derbyshire, South Yorkshire and Bassetlaw commissioning consortium—Bassetlaw being north Nottinghamshire from a geographical perspective. The consortium is known as NORCOM. Two of the PCTs cover my constituents in Rotherham. The paper sets out the draft minimum entitlement across the consortium to NHS in vitro fertilisation, intracytoplasmic sperm injection and intra-uterine insemination. There are currently significant differences between the NORCOM PCTs in respect of existing specialist fertility treatment policies, and phased introduction will be required to bring them all to one common policy. It is envisaged that each PCT will adopt at least the minimum eligibility criteria, and it is not intended that any of them will adopt a more restrictive policy than their current one. The present policy in Rotherham is to offer two cycles, so I am glad the consortium has addressed that issue. I have had anecdotal evidence, which I will not use in this debate, that there has been a reduction in the IVF treatment on offer. I would be interested to know if my hon. Friend the Minister has any evidence of that.

The NORCOM document continues:

"Initial investigation of patients is usually carried out by a network of specialist gynaecologists at District General Hospitals throughout the NORCOM area".

The report published by the all-party group on the day that the guidelines were published considered whether specialist centres were needed. I understand they operate in Scotland. I would be interested, if my hon. Friend has time today, to hear whether she thinks we should consider that option. The document continues:

"In any healthcare system there are limits set on what is available and on what people can expect. Primary Care Trusts are required to achieve financial balance; they have a complex task in balancing this with individuals' rights to health care. It is the purpose of the criteria set out here to make the limits on fertility treatment fair, clear and explicit. Nationally this is undertaken through the work of the National Institute for Clinical Excellence and this paper reflects this. The paper should be read in conjunction with the NICE Fertility Guidance.

"The NICE Guidance places NHS assisted fertility services firmly in the mainstream of NHS provision".

I think everyone, no matter where we are at this stage, should be pleased about that. I certainly am. The paper then states:

"Patients as a result will expect the NHS to provide this. This document includes recommendations for the first part of the phased introduction of the Guidance. Further phases of the implementation will be defined in the light of future Department of Health requirements and the prioritisation and availability of resources".

It goes on to list a series of criteria the that will be used in that commissioning area. What is interesting about the "mainstream" comment is that from now on, I assume, the PCTs in my area will be looking to central Government for direct guidance about what they should do next, and when they should do it. One issue has been dealt with, because it was centrally driven, so PCTs will expect direction from the centre on what should happen next and when.

In her speech to the national infertility day conference last year, the Minister said that the April deadline was "a starting point" to support PCTs in meeting the first stage of implementation and the subsequent implementation of the guidelines in full. The Department of Health agreed a broad programme of action last June, and last year the Minister answered parliamentary questions that I and other hon. Members tabled on this issue. Part of the programme was that the Government would

"look to strategic health authorities (SHAs) to work with PCTs to ensure that they have effective arrangements in place for the provision of services, to investigate the barriers to implementation of NICE guidelines and to help ensure that the barriers can be overcome."—[Official Report, 4 October 2004; Vol. 424, c. 1978W.]

The programme also included advice from NICE on the development of resource templates to enable PCTs to estimate the resources needed.

The Minister will realise that a number of key questions remain about PCTs' progress toward meeting the April deadline. In part, that is what this debate is about. Are PCTs being monitored, are strategic health authorities playing their part and are they and NICE providing assistance? Does NICE have a further role to play? NIAC and the all-party group are keen to learn what support the Government are providing to PCTs, given that no additional funding has been provided either to meet the April deadline or to assist with the implementation of the guideline in full. What will be the repercussions for PCTs that fail to meet the guidelines? That question is relevant at this stage in the countdown to April.

The next issue is the old chestnut of NHS waiting lists. Will there be action by the NHS centrally to measure and, we hope, reduce waiting lists for couples needing infertility treatment? Now that the Government have gone so far as to ask for the delivery of one IVF treatment cycle by this April as part of the start of implementation of the guidelines, we could not accept people having to be on waiting lists for months, if not years, to get that first IVF intervention. I would be grateful if the Minister had any comments on that.

It must not be forgotten that even if PCTs meet the deadline to provide at least one full cycle of IVF, there will still be postcode provision of infertility services in the United Kingdom. People in Scotland can access up to three cycles: I am led to believe that in the constituency of the Secretary of State for Health, for example, couples have been entitled to three cycles for a number of years. That is unlike the position in my area, although the position there is a vast improvement on that in some areas of England and Wales, in which there has been no offer of IVF treatment under any criteria for many years past.

Access to infertility treatment on the NHS is well known to be patchy—indeed, treatment by postcode remains an intolerable feature of the NHS. We called for the debate to stress to the Government the need for full implementation of the guideline to ensure that couples have access to the most effective treatment, regardless of where they live. Fair and equal access for all those with an established need is the only way to tackle the unacceptable postcode lottery of treatment.

It is crucial that the NICE recommendations are implemented as fully and as quickly as possible throughout the country to ensure fair and equal access for all. As the Secretary of State said last year, we cannot expect all areas, particularly those that have never offered any IVF treatment, to achieve that overnight. I think that we all accept that. However, 12 months have elapsed since publication of the NICE guideline. I hope that, by now, we are in a position to have an idea whether the 5 April deadline for the single IVF treatment cycle will be met and—given that we are now looking at implementing the second phase—an idea of the timetable for the second and third IVF intervention if other fertility services have failed the couples involved.

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam) (LD): I congratulate the right hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) on securing the debate. I share his disappointment that others cannot be present to take part in it, but I pay tribute to him for his work as chair of the all-party group on infertility and for giving us the opportunity to explore how far the Secretary of State's undertakings in respect of the NICE guidance have been implemented.

I would like clarification of the two phrases that were used by the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister: what is the difference between long term and substantial progress in the next couple of years? The debate should be about getting some idea of the timelines involved. The right hon. Gentleman posed some important questions that I want to take up; I also have a few questions of my own for the Minister.

The issue is charged with emotion; it is about the fundamental desire that very many of us have to have children. Infertility frustrates that desire, which is further frustrated if a person does not have the financial means necessary for private sector provision and as a result has to go on an NHS waiting list. Prior to the NICE guidelines, about 70 to 80 per cent. of couples paid for private treatment. It is not long since the NICE guidelines were published and the Secretary of State expressed the desire that at least one cycle of IVF be available to couples in each PCT area. Can the Minister say how much she expects that to change? Will there be a reduction in the number of couples who will need to pay privately to have the treatment as a result of the guidance being implemented?

The right hon. Gentleman has already given some of the figures but it is worth repeating one or two of them: approximately one in seven couples in the UK need help in conceiving a child and rely on treatment, either ovarian stimulatory drugs or IVF. Figures available up to 2001, supplied to my hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Mr. Marsden) in June last year, suggested that 28,076 patients had received IVF in that year, which was an improvement on 1997, and that 2,718 had received donor insemination in the UK, which was down from 1997. It puzzles me that more up-to-date figures than those for 2001 are not available. I hope that the Minister can shed further light on the matter and update the figures, so that we can see what progress has been made.

The NICE recommendations have been described in detail by the right hon. Gentleman, who is absolutely right to draw attention to the fact that most press reporting of those guidelines and the Secretary of State's response to them tended to dwell more on the number of cycles of IVF than on other aspects of the guidance. It is right to reflect that the guidelines referred to a host of other issues, not least that of screening, which is an important safeguard. At the time, the chief executive of NICE said:

"Implementation of our guidance will take time. We have therefore suggested to the Department of Health and Welsh Assembly Government that they consider giving advice to NHS organisations on how they should approach putting our recommendations into practice."

The debate is about the Secretary of State's advice and to what extent it should be just that; should it be about social considerations and how they affect the criteria formulated by the PCTs in framing their approach to implementing the NICE guidance? The Secretary of State said on 25 February:

"As a first step, by April next year I want all PCTs, including those who at present provide no IVF treatment, to offer at least one full cycle of treatment to all those eligible."

The Minister later emphasised that that is the starting point. However, it is not clear from anything that has been published or said to date what the subsequent steps will be. What is the timeline for getting us from where we are now, which is patchy provision of IVF and of NHS fertility services generally, to the ideal that the NICE guidelines set out? What progress has been made in achieving that first step?

Mr. Lansley: I rise to endorse the hon. Gentleman's argument. The NICE guidelines said that there should be implementation resource assessments and that a timeline should be established by PCTs. However, on what basis did the Secretary of State intervene to say that the assessments had to be conducted by means of focusing on delivering one cycle of IVF by April 2005, with no target date thereafter? Was there not a case for saying that progress should be made, but giving every PCT the obligation to set out by some point how it would implement the guidelines in full?

Mr. Burstow: I agree entirely. It would be wrong of PCTs to interpret the Secretary of State's comments in last year's press release as relieving them of their obligation to set out their plans for implementing the NICE guidelines. I hope that the Healthcare Commission will look carefully and critically at the extent to which PCTs have done that. It should also evaluate whether the April deadline in the arbitrary timetable set out by the Secretary of State is a sufficient response to the NICE guidelines.

I will go one step further and say that it would be useful if the Minister confirmed the status of the Secretary of State's statement. Does it have any formal force in terms of what PCTs should be doing? In particular, what is the status of his comment about giving "local priority to couples who do not have any children living with them"?

Surely in an NHS where the balance of power is shifted to local providers to make decisions of that sort, the Secretary of State should not give that sort of instruction, or implied instruction, to the NHS.

There are a number of concerns about the Secretary of State's recommendations, some of which the right hon. Member for Rother Valley itemised. First, the NICE guidelines come with a price tag attached, but exactly how much will they cost to implement? No additional resources were provided to allow the services to be developed; it is therefore incumbent on the Government to set out how they will assist PCTs and how they expect PCTs to plan for the implementation—not what they should do, but the mechanisms that they might wish to follow.

As the right hon. Gentleman said, the anecdotal evidence seems to point to a timeline that runs at least six years into the future. It would be useful if the Minister said whether that is a realistic assessment of how long it will take to implement the NICE guidelines fully. In answer to the right hon. Gentleman's question, the Prime Minister said that it would be a couple of years before we saw substantial progress. Yet when one looks at the NHS figures between 1997 and 2001, one sees that although the number of women having access to a cycle of IVF increased, the average number of cycles per woman decreased, and some people are concerned that access to more than one cycle will decrease further. The PCTs that already offer access to more than one cycle will take the opportunity of following the Secretary of State's advice from last year to level down, rather than to maintain their service at its current level. It is therefore important to monitor the situation at local level to ensure that that does not happen. As the right hon. Gentleman said, there is a 25 per cent. success rate from one cycle, but that rises to 70 per cent. with three.

I believe that Lord Winston expressed some concerns about the policy of offering one cycle, describing it as "half-baked" due to the financial and emotional costs of investigating whether a couple is suitable for treatment. There is a huge emotional commitment to going down that road, yet after making that commitment couples could be told, "You've had your one chance," even if they are reaching the age where they will no longer be able to gain access to the treatment. Infertility treatment is a huge investment for a couple, which is more than just financial.

There is also concern about specialised commissioning—tertiary commissioning and tertiary fertility services—and to what extent the roll-out of such commissioning is occurring. There is concern that the still patchy nature across the country of PCTs engaging with specialised commissioning will again slow the process of implementing the NICE guidelines. I would welcome the Minister's comments on that matter.

Can the Minister say whether the Department has assessed the cost of implementing the NICE guidelines in full? I should be surprised and stunned if the Department had not made some assessment. Does the hon. Lady plan to share the Department's figures with us? I hope that she does. Is the figure of about £50 million, which was the assessment made by the all-party group, a realistic assessment of the true cost of full implementation throughout the country? What discussions have taken place with Scottish Ministers, who are already supporting a three-cycle policy in Scotland?

There are financial pressures in the NHS; we need only read the Health Service Journal from one week to the next to learn about those pressures and their consequences. At present, there is a £500 million deficit in the NHS, which I am sure will disappear magically by 31 March until 1 April of the following financial year.

However, there is a real financial problem that the PCTs must grapple with. They have to find the resources to achieve the targets that are set by Whitehall, and everything else for which there is no target becomes a lesser priority. The NICE infertility treatment guidelines might fall into the second category, and we doubt whether the necessary resources will be delivered.

As we have heard, the anecdotal evidence suggests that progress is patchy. There are concerns that having one IVF cycle as a first step will give a green light to some PCTs to reduce the number of cycles that they provide. I hope that the Minister can tell us today what the plan is beyond the first step, whether that plan is on course, and when it will deliver. Will it be in six years, or in a couple of years? There are thousands of people outside the House who want the answers to those questions because they matter to them and their lives.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): I join the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) in congratulating the right hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) on securing this debate. I also thank the right hon. Gentleman for the work that he has done as chair of the all-party group on infertility; as vice-chairman of that group, I have seen that work at close quarters and I know what a close and dedicated interest he has taken in the work of the group. He has also secured influence over the subject, which I hope is reflected in the context of the debate. I do not disagree with anything that has been said. However, I shall elaborate a little on some points and try to capture some of the questions that I am sure that the Minister is expecting to answer. I hope that there will be ample time for her to do that.

This debate is not the first occasion on which we have discussed infertility—indeed, the history of debates on the subject goes back further than the right hon. Gentleman took it. On 6 May 1998, the Minister's predecessor, the right hon. Member for Dulwich and West Norwood (Tessa Jowell), responded to an Adjournment debate in which I participated. Agreeing with the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman), I said

"there is a case for national guidelines"—[Official Report, 6 May 1998, Vol. 311, c. 662.]

The then Minister said that the Government's policy objective was to ensure national consistency. At that point, it was intended to achieve that through national service frameworks and the National Institute for Clinical Excellence; subsequently, it has been done through NICE guidelines. We are therefore more than six and a half years past the point when the Government signalled their intention of getting rid of the postcode lottery for infertility treatment.

As the right hon. Gentleman said, the then Secretary of State for Health asked NICE to undertake the preparation of guidelines in November 2000. What happened then is a classic illustration of one of the key policy issues. While NICE was preparing the guidelines, there should have been a sense of what the developing consensus was likely to be, because work did not start from a blank sheet of paper: eminent bodies had already been examining the issue. Between November 2000 and February 2004, primary care trusts and others working in the field should have made themselves aware of what capacity would be needed to supply the infertility treatments that were likely to be recommended as both clinically effective and cost effective. That is what should happen when NICE does its work in future, but there is little evidence that it happened in the present case until the NICE guidelines were published in February 2004. NICE activity was a reason for there to be, in effect, planning blight in the system: services were not being developed. Therefore, in November 2000 the policy of some PCTs, including in my area was to provide assisted conception only in exceptional cases.

That illustrates something that has always depressed me since back in 1998, which is that the NHS is investing time, quality effort and resources into the investigation of infertility, but only those patients who are able to afford assisted conception are able to have treatment. That was certainly the case in my constituency, and my constituents justifiably regarded it as deeply unfair that they were unable to access assisted conception when in other parts of the country they would have been able to do so. We are trying to get rid of that. We want to establish a degree of consistency and a good standard of service. There is a special irony in relation to my constituency: the Bourn Hall clinic is in South Cambridgeshire. It is where the IVF treatment was conducted that led to the birth of the first test-tube baby, Louise Brown, in 1978. Bourn Hall was at the forefront of the provision of those services. It was deeply frustrating that people who lived in the same area as Bourn Hall could not access its services unless they were able to pay for them.

I am keen to achieve consistent delivery of infertility services. From time to time there are debates about the relative priority of IVF and infertility services. I have had them with constituents and colleagues in the House, and PCTs and health authorities have debated where the priority lies. Should resources go to infertility as distinct from other pressing health needs? Such judgments are always invidious.

We are now reaching the point where it can be seen that the job of the NHS is not simply to deal with the problems of physical ill health, but to achieve, wherever possible, a sense of well-being in the community and to promote positive public health. We should not underestimate the psychological and social harm that can result for couples who desperately want to have children but who are unable to do so. Equally, we should not underestimate the social benefit and enormous good that can result from enabling such people to have the opportunity of parenthood; the children would be loved and wanted. As it would depress us to discuss them, I will not go into the circumstances of unwanted children, children who are unloved by parents and not looked after by them, and the number of pregnancy terminations.

If the NHS should, for the reasons I mentioned, provide infertility services, what does it make sense to do? The question of providing one cycle of IVF was touched on by the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam. The point of the debate is that NICE examined what was not only clinically effective, but cost effective for the NHS to provide. The evidence, which I do not think is disputed, shows that to provide three cycles of IVF broadly speaking gives one, in each of those first three cycles, a good chance of conception. The figures vary but let us say it is a 20 to 25 per cent. chance. That number falls off dramatically after three cycles. Subsequent cycles are much less likely to have a positive result. The same is true of age. Beyond a certain age—35—the chances of conception diminish; the balance that the NICE guidelines struck was 39. The same would also be true for body mass index. There are clinical criteria, so we can avoid the NHS pushing resources into the provision of treatments that have much less chance of success.

Having said that, the object of NICE was to produce a sound evidence basis on which treatment could be provided across the NHS. I hope that NICE will have the opportunity to do much more such work. Its work should establish a standard that patients, their clinicians and GPs should be able to access and that the NHS knows it should be gearing up to provide.

The hon. Gentleman was kind enough to allow me to intervene during his remarks to highlight something that happened in February 2004. There ought to have been a straightforward process: even if PCTs had not prepared for the NICE guidelines, at least in the subsequent local delivery plans they should have set out a process, which, according to the NICE guidelines in paragraph 3.1 would have been straightforward. PCTs would look at the template and set up the kind of implementation process that is required; in a local delivery plan, they would show their timetable for delivery of the service. Such a process does not require them to do it tomorrow, nor does it set a rigid timetable, but it would have enabled every PCT to be accountable for how and when it will deliver the standard. I cannot see what purpose was served by the Secretary of State intervening to say, "Oh, by April 2005 you should have delivered one cycle of IVF," but not giving any indication of what would happen thereafter or to what timetable it should happen. Would it not have been better simply to have said, "We know what standard we are aiming for"?

I hope that it is not true that some PCTs are reducing the service that they provide simply in order to meet the aim of providing one cycle of IVF. That is not true in my area because we are, in a sense, gaining services from a very low base. I also hope that the situation does not mean that there will be primary care trusts that make no provision and establish no plans to go beyond April 2005 and meet the NICE standard. The object is to meet that standard and to know when that will happen.

It would be instructive if the Minister could tell us precisely what steps the Department, or the strategic health authorities on behalf of the Department, will take to ensure that PCTs show how they will meet the standard. It is not clear, for example, how the Healthcare Commission will do that. It is to inspect against core standards only. The performance rating that the Healthcare Commission will construct for primary care trusts will reflect those core standards, but we do not know whether it will embrace developmental standards in 2005–06, and to what extent this particular aspect of NICE guidelines will be included in that. None of that is set out yet, and it is not in the Healthcare Commission's consultation, which is too vague to enable us to establish whether there is any requirement on PCTs to show how they will meet the guideline. Clearly, that is an area that needs to be considered.

What we seek is an explanation of what the Secretary of State intended by his intervention in February 2004. We also want to know how the Department will achieve the delivery of services to the standard set out in the NICE guidelines, on which I hope we all agree. As I see it, there are two possible explanations why the Secretary of State referred to one cycle of IVF. The implication at the time was that it had to do with available capacity, not cost. Members of the all-party group had a number of discussions with those involved in the provision of infertility services; it seemed perfectly clear to me that although there are some capacity constraints, they are not such that they would require service provision to be restricted to one cycle of IVF. In many parts of the country, it would be perfectly possible to provide access to three cycles of IVF, and generally across the country we can scale up services to that level quite quickly. There is a passing difficulty associated with some of the smaller units, which might have been affected by the introduction of new European Union directives, which had implications for them, but they would reduce capacity only temporarily.

If the ability to access services is the problem, the Department can publish the evidence on which it based its judgment. If, however, the issue is not capacity, it must be cost. The hon. Gentleman asked about that. The all-party group looked into the costs and benefits associated with changes in infertility services, and we reached a conclusion that seemed balanced and reasonable to us. If the Department reached the same conclusion, it raises the question why one cycle of IVF was the constraint placed upon such services. In terms of expenditure and the reduction of cost to PCTs, that is much more drastic a constraint than would have resulted from dividing £50 million among 300 PCTs across the country. The sort of costs implied to PCTs were not so great.

The third point relating to the Secretary of State's intervention is where the additional social criterion came from. As the right hon. Member for Rother Valley said, it raises serious questions about the impact on couples if, for example, the children in the home are those of either partner's previous marriages or partnerships. It can therefore place mothers and fathers in a difficult situation in which they are deprived of their access to infertility services and their chance to be a father or mother by the application of a rather arbitrary criterion. Where did it come from and why was it necessary?

As everyone who has spoken in the debate has stressed, can the Minister say precisely how the Government envisage the timetable from now to the full implementation of the NICE guidelines? The review of the guidelines is probably due in about 2008. I hope that well before we reach that point, we will have had the chance to see how the standards are being met throughout the NHS and the benefits that are flowing from them, so that another review does not happen a few years down the line. We do not want to be here again debating why people are subject to a postcode lottery and, in particular, why expensive resources in the NHS are being used to support investigations and why only those who can afford it subsequently receive treatment.

I cannot tell hon. Members the number of times that I have been castigated by the Government, whose inaccurate view is that my party is somehow not concerned about access to services being based on need, rather than ability to pay. We believe in NHS services that are based on need. We are discussing an NHS service that is intended to be provided but which, at the moment for many people, is available only if they have the ability to pay. We know what service the NHS ought to provide. I hope that that will be achieved and that the Minister will tell us how and when.

2.57 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Miss Melanie Johnson): It is with great pleasure that I rise to respond to my right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) and to congratulate him on securing the debate. I recognise the work that he and the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) have done with the all-party group and the progress that it has made.

In July 2001, we took the first step towards removing an historical postcode lottery, to which reference has been made by several hon. Members, by commissioning NICE to produce clinical guidelines. That was on the back of the establishment of NICE in 1999, which the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire said had, at one time, caused planning blight as new developments were made. However, NICE has speeded up its work considerably, and the response of the NHS to the work undertaken through NICE is more accepting than it was when NICE was set up and in the years immediately afterwards. Progress has been made.

NICE worked with stakeholders in fertility matters. All the key organisations were involved, including NIAC, the British Fertility Society, Infertility Network UK and the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority. As hon. Members will know, the guidelines were published in February 2004. The Government, who commissioned the guidelines, obviously welcomed them. They are a useful tool by which to achieve consistency in the way that PCTs and health professionals approach the provision of fertility treatment, which means that wherever in the country they live patients will have some access to IVF. That will be a first. My right hon. Friend's constituency is at the upper end of the range of provision in that it currently makes two cycles available. It has done so for some time, whereas many other areas, such as the constituency of the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire, have made no such provision.

The guidelines go wider than IVF, setting out the clinical side and the cost-effectiveness of a range of assisted reproduction treatments. NICE recognises that it is not feasible for the NHS to implement the guidelines in full immediately. It is, in fact, for PCTs, as hon. Members have noted, to build them into their plans, taking into account local population needs and health care priorities. We are aware of what is happening throughout the country. I will deal with one of the points raised—the stage that different areas have reached—and then come on to the detail of the monitoring arrangements. I will deal with the question of a reduction in existing provision.

Where existing provision is greater than one cycle—that is, two, as in the Rother Valley constituency—we expect provision to continue at least at that level. I have been informed of only one report that a PCT was reducing its provision. The Department wrote to the PCT concerned, which confirmed that it was not reducing the number of cycles. That is the only information I have pointing in the opposite direction; I can assure my right hon. Friend that that is the best information I have.

Mr. Barron: I am grateful for that. I thought that my information was anecdotal.

I am happy to listen to what my hon. Friend has to say about monitoring, but the issue for me is that the target for the first phase of implementing the guideline is now being set centrally. The likelihood of my PCT going from two to three cycles will depend on central targets from the NHS, as opposed to a service being provided locally because of patient need. Will there be a change in thinking inside PCTs? We are saying nationally that they must do x and y by April of this year.

Miss Johnson: Perhaps it is time to come to why we issued the guideline, to some of the other comments on that, and to what will happen beyond April 2005.

Mr. Burstow: If the PCT to which the Minister referred had written back saying that it was minded to reduce provision to one cycle, what would the Department have done?

Miss Johnson: Although there are no formal means of instruction, there are informal means of conveying messages. Strong messages would have been sent.

There are questions about the implementation of the guidelines. I will come on to monitoring, the structured arrangements surrounding that and the amount of contact that there has been.

First, the guidance covers an enormously sensitive subject. Infertility causes huge distress. Because of that and the historical postcode lottery, the Government felt that this was a worthy area on which NICE could produce a guidance, one with a commitment on implementation. The definition of infertility is given as a failure to conceive after regular unprotected sexual intercourse over two years, in the absence of a known problem. Implementation has priorities, such as screening for chlamydia and assessing tubal damage. Nobody mentioned chlamydia in the debate, but it is enormously important in this context, because it is increasingly causing infertility, and we are storing up a problem in the longer term. We must put the questions together—hence the huge investment in the whole area of sexual health and sexually transmitted infections.

There are six cycles of intra-uterine insemination for couples with mild male infertility problems, unexplained fertility or minimal to mild endometriosis. Contributions to the debate have mainly concentrated on the couples qualifying for up to three cycles of IVF. The guidance provides a consistency of approach across the health service. In welcoming that, we looked to PCTs to meet, by April this year, a national minimum provision of at least one cycle of IVF for those who meet the clinical criteria in the guidance. Our purpose was to put down a landmark to show that progress had begun to be made.

[Miss Johnson]

My right hon. recently wrote to me on behalf of the all-party group, suggesting that the group's estimate of the costs involved was about £36 million. We believe, on the basis of the work done by NICE, that the cost of full implementation will be about £80 million. A number of Members have asked about the figures. They are already in the public domain; certainly, I wrote to my right hon. Friend about them.

Mr. Barron: Although we did not agree with the Department on the final figures, its final estimate was a great reduction on what had been suggested by the media, which said at one stage that the cost would be £400 million. Our figures take account of measures to avoid multiple births and how much they would save the national health service, and of the full range of infertility services, as opposed to the cost of IVF treatment, which everybody acknowledges is quite expensive.

Has the Department conducted any study on the overall costs of the guidelines—all the other treatment prior to IVF? Does that show that savings could be made? That was the issue in our report.

Miss Johnson: Not that I am aware of, but if that is incorrect, I will write to my right hon. Friend on the matter. I entirely accept the point: there has been a lot of investment in procedures to investigate a problem, without any follow-up for the remedy. There is no doubt that that is an issue.

Our costings are based on the best available estimates. It is difficult to work out what they will be because the costings per cycle range from £2,000 to £4,500. The investigation costs vary hugely, depending on the history and medical condition of each patient; a variable amount of money can be invested.

Mr. Lansley: Before we move away from the point, the Minister said when she began her explanation that it was not feasible to implement the NICE guidelines, and she has referred to the cost of doing so. However, as I mentioned, there is also the question whether there would be the capacity to achieve the standard of three cycles of IVF.

Is the Minister saying that implementing the guidelines is not feasible because that would cost £80 million, according to the Department's best estimate, or that, as the implication was at the time, the Government are prepared to accept the cost of implementation, but it is not feasible because the capacity is not available? Which is it?

Miss Johnson: I was talking about the practical, rather than monetary, feasibility. Different areas start from a different base; one of the issues in developing this policy is that some areas start from zero and others start from two cycles—some may start from three cycles, although I am not aware of any that do. Certainly, many areas have got to two cycles. That is a huge variation in the starting point, the numbers of people, the provision and, ultimately, the money and weighing-up of local priorities.

Perhaps this is the time to say something about how this fits with local priorities and about the question of devolution versus guidelines and targets.

Mr. Lansley rose—

Miss Johnson: I would like to develop my argument, but I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman one more time.

Mr. Lansley: The Minister is generous with her time. The Department has a sense that the capacity does not exist. In South Cambridgeshire, a PCT was commissioning IVF treatments only in exceptional circumstances, but that was a question not of capacity—Bourn Hall has capacity; local providers have capacity—but of the treatment not being commissioned.

If the Department set a central minimum standard related to the capacity to deliver IVF treatments throughout the country, did it undertake an exercise, which we could see, that estimated what capacity would be available? The HFEA could have assisted with that, because it knows well, through its licensing process, what capacity is available. Is there such an exercise? Can we see it?

Miss Johnson: Advice on those matters would certainly have come to Ministers, but I am not sure that there is any formal report or study of the kind that the hon. Gentleman is looking for, or anything that would be published.

We expected PCTs to give priority to those in greatest need. Hon. Members have referred to couples with no children living with them and those who have children, or a child of one or other of the couple, living with them. It was felt that if PCTs had to prioritise, some help should be given to them on how to do that, and it was fairest to prioritise those who had no children living with them. Hon. Members can disagree with that if they want to, but we had to look at a difficult situation and make some difficult choices rather than leave PCTs without any advice from the centre about how they prioritised those choices. That is not to say that couples with children living with them are not to be considered at all. I am talking simply about a ranking of priorities and a reflection of advice to PCTs.

We rely on the NHS locally, through the PCTs, taking account of the needs of the local population and discussing proposals with patients and the public. That debate is happening in the context of the resources that are allocated to the health service rising to record levels, from £69 billion in 2004-05—the financial year just ending—to £92 billion in 2007-08. The sums that we have been discussing should therefore be seen in the context of a lot of extra money that is going to the health service. Overall, the national average increase over that time is nearly 31 per cent. in cash. There is a real-terms increase for Rotherham PCT of 6.5 per cent. in 2003-04, 7 per cent. in 2004-05 and 6.6 per cent. in 2005-06. That is only a sample, but it is typical and representative of the increases across the wider NHS.

My noble friend Lord Warner, who speaks on health matters in another place, wrote to the NHS on 14 June 2004 to set out a programme of action to support the implementation of the NICE guidance and set that in context with the Government's overall policy for national standards in the NHS. He made it clear that broad partnership in local health economies is needed to ensure that patients get access to the quality of care that is recommended by NICE. However, that entails strategic health authorities working with PCTs to ensure that they have effective arrangements in place, are investigating barriers to implementation and are making sure that those barriers can be overcome. Lord Warner's letter referred to the Department's consultation on national health care standards for the NHS in England, which is now published as "Standards for Better Health" and includes a standard for patients to receive effective treatment and care that conforms to nationally agreed best practice, particularly as defined in NICE guidance. There is a direct link between the NICE guidance, the standards for better health care and the work of the strategic health authorities.

In relation to the NORCOM consortium arrangements, I am delighted that there is a wide consortium of 13 PCTs in my right hon. Friend's area that has developed a local commissioning policy based on the NICE guidelines. We are pleased to see that sort of local co-operation and partnership. To some degree, such arrangements answer the point raised by the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) about specialist commissioning and people working together across PCTs. There are a lot of specialist commissioning arrangements for different services, including infertility services: they are growing in sophistication and effectiveness and we welcome and encourage them.

What progress are PCTs making towards implementing the NICE fertility guidance? The NHS has needed time to take account of the guidance and draw up its plans, but we know that PCTs are working together. The evidence that we have says that they are working hard to implement the guidance and are focusing on moving in the right direction, for example, by offering one cycle of IVF where previously they offered none and maintaining services at least at the current level where they offer more than the minimum. If any hon. Member has anecdotal evidence to the contrary, we shall be happy to consider it, but we have no such evidence other than that which I mentioned earlier, which we investigated.

I agree that monitoring implementation is important. Overall, SHAs are responsible for overseeing PCTs' performance. If a PCT fails to implement the guideline, SHAs will explore the reasons and work with that trust to overcome the barriers. The independent Healthcare Commission, which reports directly to Parliament on the state of health care in England and Wales, will use the standards in assessing health care provision. The chief executive of the Healthcare Commission has confirmed that assessing the implementation of NICE guidance is one of the commission's priorities. It is currently consulting on the assessment process that it will apply.

I note that the NIAC is conducting a survey of PCTs, in partnership with the all-party group, I believe. We shall be interested to see the results of that survey. If barriers to implementation are identified, we shall bring them to the attention of the relevant SHAs. The basic principle is that PCTs, in liaison with local health bodies and patients' groups, take resources and priorities into account when deciding how best to implement the guidance.

On devolution versus standards and targets, I have to argue a little with the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam. I am sure that his comments on the subject were entirely well meaning, but they were somewhat muddled. There cannot be complaints about instructions and, at the same time, complaints that we are not tackling the issues. We must balance the need to give guidance and advice, to steer and to provide frameworks that drive progress with local commissioning and local production of services. One could argue that giving instructions works against local commissioning, but local commissioning might lead to ongoing postcode lotteries if developments do not take place within the right framework. We must achieve the right balance between putting a framework in place and local decision making on priorities and how to achieve them. That is what we have sought to achieve.

I have already mentioned that we put the costs of full implementation at about £81 million. We know the standard that we are aiming for: to achieve full implementation of the NICE guidance. We recognise that PCTs are starting from different places, which means that we are not in a position to give a formal plan beyond this year, but I am sure that we shall consider that after this year's implementation phase. We shall be look to see what the future holds, but I am sure that there will still be some PCTs on two IVF cycles and others that have only just achieved one. We need to work on that and allow what are felt to be the most appropriate choices to be made in local health economies.

My right hon. asked about waiting lists and other hon. Members raised questions about sanctions. Before I address those points, however, I should like to say that our estimate of the effectiveness of cycles is slightly different from my right hon. Friend's. Our estimates are that the pregnancy rate is about 25 per cent. for one cycle of IVF, about 33 per cent. for two cycles and about 50 per cent. for three cycles, which is slightly lower than the figures he quoted. I am sure that the figures vary according to the population on which they are based. However, those figures are the best that we have and are the ones to which we are working.

The hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire is right to say that there comes a point at which there is a fast-diminishing return. That is something that NICE considered. Hard as it might be for many couples to accept, we must recognise the problem and the advice that NICE gave us.

Mr. Lansley: I am surprised by what the Minister said. The figures are curious, because they appear to imply that the second cycle of IVF is significantly less likely to secure a positive result than the third cycle. Broadly speaking, the first cycle is the most likely to secure a result, and there is a slightly diminishing likelihood of success in each of the two subsequent cycles. One can argue about whether the figure is 50 or 70 per cent. at the end of three cycles, and the estimates vary, but I cannot imagine why the Minister would argue that the second cycle has less prospect of success than the third.

Miss Johnson: I entirely understand the hon. Gentleman's point, but that was not what I was arguing. Those are the figures that I was given, and I am not in a position to argue the point further.

On monitoring and sanctions, the Government have two main methods of monitoring: through the Healthcare Commission and through the strategic health authorities. The Commission's developmental standard D2, which is set out in the consultation document, says that patients should "receive effective treatment and care" conforming

"to nationally agreed best practice, particularly as defined in National Service Frameworks, NICE guidance, national plans and agreed national guidance on service delivery".

That is the formal basis of the monitoring arrangements.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley asked about waiting times. The NHS improvement plan has established a target of a maximum wait of 18 weeks from GP referral to the initiation of treatment, which is to be met by December 2008. That maximum waiting time refers to all GP referrals to hospital consultants, including in respect of fertility services. However, IVF is not usually the initial treatment referral made by the GP, and the need for it is usually diagnosed later, so it will usually take longer than 18 weeks from GP referral to IVF treatment. The same applies to other treatments that involve a series of investigations and prior treatments, so it is not true only of IVF. Once an individual patient has been diagnosed as needing IVF, however, it is intended that a guaranteed waiting time will be set for them, although the details are still being developed.

Mr. Barron: That seems to be a crucial point, because the chances of success of treatment of women with infertility problems diminishes with age. We do not want many of the women who are waiting for treatment at the upper end of the age scale falling off the waiting list because their birthdays have come along. Given that potential demographic problem, it is crucial that they are considered separately from the generality of NHS waiting lists.

Miss Johnson: I understand my right hon. Friend's point. When we came into government, waiting times in some cases were 18 months—and that was only for in-patient admissions, including the out-patient wait. Now, the process will last a maximum of 18 weeks from start to finish, and given that that is the maximum waiting period, some people will be coming in earlier. To hit our target, we shall probably need to hit about 10 to 12 weeks for most patients—we shall need to bulk them in the middle of the period to achieve the maximum wait target—so we shall be able to offer a substantial improvement across the board. In so far as it can, the strategy will encompass patients who are experiencing infertility problems and a number of other patients who have complicated diagnostic and treatment schedules.

The hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam asked about the need for private treatment. I find it difficult to answer his question, however, because we do not know how many people on NHS lists are already going for private treatment or will go for it at some point. It is very difficult to know how great the double-counting element is, and we do not necessarily have access to all the figures from the private sector.

On the number of people receiving treatment, the HFEA will fairly soon be updating the figures that the hon. Gentleman mentioned, which were from 2001. That follows work on its database of treatment services. It generates the figures, because it collates them nationally.

I think that that deals with all the points that have been raised. The debate has been useful and has raised useful issues. We are committed to an improvement in the services offered to infertile couples and particularly to progress towards full implementation of the NICE guidelines as soon as NHS services can achieve that. We are committed to ensuring that the implementation due in April 2005 takes place. We welcome feedback on issues or difficulties, which we shall take seriously, and we look forward to the channelling of some of our huge investment in the NHS into improvements to fertility services.

Children's Play

3.26 pm

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): I am delighted to have the opportunity to introduce this short debate and equally delighted that the Minister for the Arts is here to respond.

The Minister will recall that we had a similar debate about children's play 15 months ago, on 3 November 2003. There have been several developments since then. The report "Getting Serious About Play", which my right hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) produced, was published on 21 January 2004 after a fairly long period of gestation. Indeed, when we last debated this matter, we talked about how long it had taken for the report to be published.

Just last week, on 16 January, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport responded to what I shall characterise as the Dobson review. I am pleased to say that that ended a long period of uncertainty. The process has been fairly lengthy, and people from the play sector, and particularly the voluntary sector, have been involved in the discussions. The lack of decisions has caused uncertainty. There has been a positive outcome, but on the more negative side, people from the play sector were concerned about what the outcome would be.

It might be helpful for me briefly to recount the history of the review of children's play. Just before the previous general election the then Secretary of State "outlined the Government's intention to kick off Britain's biggest ever children's play area building programme in a second term."

He went on to say that £200 million from round 4 of the New Opportunities Fund would be earmarked to create 2,000 new children's safe play areas. That announcement was received with great applause from people connected with children's play, because they saw it as a real opportunity. Almost four years on, and as we approach another general election, whenever it will be, we have an opportunity to take stock of what has been achieved since that time.

Last week, the Secretary of State said that the Government

"reaffirmed its commitment to revitalising children's play areas up and down the country with a huge investment from across lottery distributors."

She added that she

"expected £200 million of lottery money to be spent on new and improved play opportunities."

I welcome that clarification; the news is to be welcomed and I do not disparage it. However, I know that the Minister will not mind my saying, as this is a fact, that that does not quite match up to the original commitment made four years ago.

That is the case because, first, that spending is an expectation, to use the Secretary of State's words, and not a firm guarantee. Put another way, it is an aspiration rather than a pledge. Secondly, the spending of £200 million would be across all lottery distributors, while the original pledge was that £200 million would come from the New Opportunities Fund. It is therefore no surprise that the play sector was promised and hoped for more. Thirdly, the planned spending period in which the money will be available runs from 2006 to 2012—a slightly longer period than was originally envisaged. Fourthly, and most importantly, the announcement makes it perfectly clear that, although the aspiration is to provide £200 million, that money is not earmarked or ring-fenced. It is not there specifically for children's play.

There is no point trying to disguise the disappointment, concern and perhaps anger in the play sector about the disparity between the two pledges. There was a delay in coming to a decision and there is a strong view that the pledge has been watered down. I shall quote one or two people from the play arena. Angela Neil, a participation worker for Torbay children's fund, said:

"On behalf of local projects within the Torbay area, I would like to voice our serious concern over the fact that it seems the promised extra lottery money will not now be made available. Many groups have worked long and hard to be in a position to apply for some of this 'promised' money. Dear Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, please keep your promise to give the extra £200 million lottery money to play."

Perry Else, who works on children's play in Sheffield, said, in effect, "We have done a lot of work." I quote:

"We've set up a coordinated partnership approach to provide for the city's 110,000 kids aged 5–14, but where's the money?"

Returning to my own area, my old colleague Rachel Adams said of Nottingham that she was "very concerned about the lack of information on the 'Play Review Money'—£200 million. Discussions have already taken place locally about how this money could be spent in the area—trying to gain a consensus on the most pressing needs and on how finance can contribute to sustainable development."

All those people are effectively saying, "We worked hard alongside the Dobson review. We were promised £200 million and the money that is available is not quite what we anticipated."

I acknowledge that point, but in this debate I want to be positive. I say clearly that £200 million is still a significant amount. I know that the Minister will make that point. Whatever has happened in the past, we need to try to move forward, as they say, and to work in a positive and constructive way. I have been impressed by the approach of the new distributor, the Big Lottery Fund. I have been particularly impressed with its chief executive, Steve Dunmore. Mr. Dunmore has been around the sector. He has talked to it and seems willing to listen, engage and consult. Everybody welcomes that step forward.

While ring-fencing the £200 million has been ruled out, the consultation on future spending plans for the Big Lottery Fund provides a possibility for it to consider different workstreams, frameworks and programmes. I hope that there will be continued discussion on that. We have between £100 million and £200 million between 2006 and 2012. How can it best be spent? What kind of framework can we put in place to ensure that that money is wisely spent? The play sector is keen to be involved in those discussions.

In her announcement last week, the Secretary of State expressed her desire to meet the authors of the report, "Getting Serious About Play—A Review of Children's Play", together with the lottery distributors. Although such a meeting would be helpful, a lot of value would be added if not only the authors of the report and chairmen of the lottery distributors were invited, but key figures from the world of children's play. They would not be hard to identify. My only direct request to the Minister today is that they be invited.

The announcement has been made and there is disappointment, but it is important to move forward and build a consensus on the direction of children's play. I hope that the Minister will seriously consider my request, because I want a number of things to come out of any such meeting and discussions. I am clear that we ought to use the principles of the Dobson review about the future funding of children's play. A lot of work has gone into that; people have devoted a lot of time, and there is, by and large, consensus on the way forward. It would be sad if the underlying principle of the review were thrown away.

The worst thing that could happen would be that a blank canvas with £200 million was made available and groups were told, "You come and bid, and we'll allocate on a piecemeal basis." That £200 million is a lot of money; it is a shot in the arm for children's play. I hope that we can develop some programmes and a framework to enable us to spend that money wisely, so that it is not only strong bidders who get money, and there is a more thoughtful approach to building benefits across the sector.

One theme of the Dobson report is focusing money on areas of disadvantage. I hope that we will pick up that theme. If we look at where lottery funds have traditionally been spent, we see that affluent areas have generally tended to do better than areas of disadvantage, unless help and support is given to people, and capacity is built in neighbourhoods to bid for those funds. I hope that we will focus on such disadvantage.

From my experience of looking around the sector, I know that there is an awful lot of good practice in children's play, although there is also poor practice. We ought to identify the best practice and promote good practice, and try to roll it out across the sector. The sector agrees with that approach and would strongly support it.

I am keen that we should continue the process of involving children and their parents in planning the kind of play provision that they want in their areas. It is interesting to listen to children talk about play. They have strong ideas about local needs and solutions. When one asks parents about their priorities for their neighbourhood, one thing comes high on the list: safe and exciting things for children to do. I hope that we will also pick up on that theme.

I also hope that the work being done by good local authorities working in partnership with the voluntary sector and the play sector to build plans for areas—not only plans that run from now, but approach plans over a period of years—will continue. If the play sector were invited to a meeting of the kind envisaged by the Secretary of State, it would not be long before there was agreement that such principles should underlie the funding of children's play and the distribution of the £200 million.

I want to focus on two points that were raised in our last debate. The Minister will remember that slightly lively discussion, in which I was anxious that lottery funding was additional and was not a substitute for mainstream local authority funding. I am keen to see such an approach, as I see signs across the sector of local authorities delaying in bringing forward play projects while the decision on the £200 million was made. In a sense, I want that £200 million to be cornerstone money that is used to build new development. I do not want local authorities and other funding bodies to be let off the hook; I want lottery funding to stimulate development across the piece. We can do that, and there is good will for us to achieve it.

As we now know, commitments on lottery funding for children's play are not for ever. It is quite clear that the money envisaged from the Big Lottery Fund runs from 2006 to 2012. It is important that we use that six-year period to develop an approach to children's play that we can learn lessons from, because when lottery funding falls out, as it inevitably will, those lessons will ensure that we can keep the programme going. Again, there is wide support across the sector for that approach.

Before I conclude, I want to return to another theme that formed part of our last discussion. I have now followed children's play for 25 years or so; I have long ceased to be a practitioner; I call myself a philosopher on the subject instead. One thing that has struck me throughout those 25 years is the fragmentation of funding bodies for children's play. In terms of what happens in Whitehall, the Department for Culture, Media and Sport is rightly the lead Department, but the Department for Education and Skills has a stake. The Home Office also has an interest in the matter, and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is also a clear player, because of a range of activities connected with local authorities. I hope that one thing to come out of the review and the discussion of the £200 million—this aspect is acknowledged by the Secretary of State—will be greater emphasis on co-ordinating the approach.

We can add value to children's play simply by making sure that we work better together. We ought to be able to use the planning and regeneration process, for example, to create marvellous examples of children's play. I am not confident that we are doing that at present, and neither am I confident that it is happening at a local authority level. Again, at district and county council level, the approach to play is fragmented. I note that very few performance demands are made on local authorities around children's play.

I had a look at "Every Child Matters: Change for Children", and I saw an elaborate graph at the back of the report showing who is responsible for what, yet children's play features only slightly in it. I am keen to raise its profile across the board in our approach to children. It would not be impossible for us to look at the notion of public service agreements with local authorities in respect of play, and it would not be hard to identify some clear targets that the Government could set.

As I said at the outset, a lot has happened over the past couple of years—or since the last manifesto was prepared and the commitment of £200 million for children's play. As all the parties now look towards their manifestos, I am keen that we see children's play as a way of preparing children and their families, as well as their local neighbourhoods, for the future. Investment in children is investment in the future, and investment in children's play is investment in all our futures. I hope that this short debate has contributed to the manifesto process.

The Minister has a longstanding commitment to children's play: £200 million is a significant amount. We can get a great deal of action and a lot of change if the Government, the lottery, the local authorities and the voluntary sector in particular work together in neighbourhoods to bring about change that will benefit not just children but the whole community.

3.46 pm

The Minister for the Arts (Estelle Morris): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping) on securing another debate on the subject of children's play. It does not seem a year since our last debate on the subject, but it has been. I acknowledge my hon. Friend's contribution to keeping children's play high on the parliamentary agenda and his commitment to the issue throughout his working life; the two are very much intertwined. As I said in the previous debate, it is essential that Parliament has the expertise of people who have delivered a service as well as being able to talk about it, and my hon. Friend has done both.

I apologise for the delay in responding to the report. There are several reasons for that, none of which is related to the Government's, or the Department's, attitude to play or their obstinacy in getting round to replying to my right hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson). It is not the job of those who work in the sector to understand the intricacy and bureaucracy involved in Government decisions, and it must have seemed an inordinate amount of time to them. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for not exploiting the delay in the meantime and damaging the trust between the Government and the sector even further.

The crux of the matter, as my hon. Friend said, is that things have moved on and the commitment to £200 million ring-fenced from the lottery fund has got into the same policy area as reform of the lottery. Had that not happened, there would not have been a delay and I would not be in the slightly difficult position of justifying what I accept is different from what was pledged originally. The intentions are clear, and I think we can reach a similar end, albeit by taking a slightly different route.

The irony in the reform of the lottery is that we are responding to the voluntary sector. On the whole, people do not want ring-fencing; they do not want the Government to intervene, or the top-slicing of grants for something that the Government want. All hon. Members know, from their time in politics, that everyone hates those pots of money unless they get one. I suspect that one part of the voluntary sector has had its money taken away at the very point when it was going to get a ring-fenced amount. If I were part of the voluntary sector and that happened, I would feel very cross.

However, in the wider sense, it is right that Governments should be less hands-on in terms of the NOF part of the funding. It also goes to show that the voluntary sector, which will include the play community, will have access to the millions of pounds that were formerly spent through the New Opportunities Fund, to which they had no access. They were rarely the chosen partners of delivery. The top-line message is that the announcement may not be as bad as the play sector thinks. It gives it slightly less certainty, because the £200 million ring-fenced pot was a belts-and-braces measure.

I will respond to one point in particular, which I hope will be helpful, and then answer questions and put on the record how we wish to proceed. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made clear, and as my hon. Friend said, we anticipate, or whatever word we chose to use, that because our approach to the lottery is hands-off, it is far more difficult for us to give an absolute pledge, but it is more than an aspiration. I aspire to a great deal—in terms of layers, there are some things that I will aspire to all my life and will never achieve, but this proposal is not in that arena. As much as Ministers can with the new arrangements for the lottery, this may be more of a determination to do all that we can to ensure that it is delivered. However, the decisions will be for the Big Lottery Fund to make.

I was pleased with, grateful for, and appreciative of, the comments that my hon. Friend made about Stephen Dunmore and the meetings that they have had so far. I want to say one thing that he did not mention, which I think will bring some assurance to the set down. One of the essential matters will be to ensure that the amount of money spent on play is monitored. I do not want a Minister in 2012—they will still be a Labour Minister—to have to come back to an Adjournment debate and suddenly be faced with the question of whether £200 million was spent over six years. The sector needs to know what progress it is making towards the £200 million during those six years.

I confirm that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is prepared to meet not only the lottery funders but the Children's Play Council, Tim Gill and my right hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras. I suggest that the Children's Play Council may want to put on the agenda the question of how the lottery distributors will monitor how much money is spent on play. That is important because I know that we are building trust where the terribly long delay has damaged it. If I can help in that, I will.

My hon. Friend raised a point about the need for cross-departmental work. We will have to see how that progresses, but I wanted to raise the importance of the issue. I am here on two counts: play is part of the remit of the Department for Culture, Media and Sport, but in this case play is also about the lottery fund. However, so many Ministers could have answered a debate on play—those from the Department for Education and Skills, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, the Department of Health or the Home Office. Such is the contribution that play can make to children's lives in so many areas that those Departments all have a responsibility. If we turn that around, every one of them can contribute to play through their policies.

My hon. Friend is right to say that, try as we might, cross-departmental working does not come easily to Ministers, for no other reason than the pressure of time. We have made an essential first step: now, my Department regularly meets each of the Departments that I have mentioned and is beginning to draw up a Government agenda for play by drawing together existing strands. The advantage of doing that in such a way is that one does not start again. Seeing where various Departments are on the issue of play and how to bring the existing work streams together works better than announcing—heaven forbid—one of those Cabinet cross-departmental committees that can be the bane of our lives, to start again with a different group of civil servants. Although we are late in starting and we are taking a different journey from the one that we might have imagined, I think that it can still lead us to a situation where £200 million has been spent on play by 2012.

There are one or two more points to reply to. It is absolutely essential that areas of deprivation are targeted. Historically, more affluent areas tended to get a larger share of the lottery. My hon. Friend will know as a constituency MP the effort that the NOF and the Community Fund have made to get more money to the coalfield communities and areas of greatest deprivation. The instructions that we will give to the Big Lottery Fund will be about looking after such areas and having regard to the fact that areas of deprivation should benefit most, especially in such matters.

We must learn from best practice. To some extent, the worst way to spend £200 million would be to give it out to 200, 400 or 1,000 projects, each of which did its own thing, and then, in 2012, to say, "Where do we go from here?" It is essential that there is some planning—some strategy, to use the word that my hon. Friend did. I hope that some of the work that people have been doing in anticipation of the money can be put to good effect. It needs to be about learning what works, getting an evidence base and bolstering the case for play when the lottery money runs out in 2012. I hope that when they talk to the lottery funders, that will be one of the approaches they can take.

Lastly—I believe this to be the case because I have heard it from more than one party—some local authorities assume that the lottery will pick up the play tab from now on, and they will be able to spend their money on other things. That is a dire warning because, as my hon. Friend said, lottery money runs out, by definition. It was never meant to be long-term funding. Lottery money should serve to yank more money into play. It should lever more money from local authorities and the community, private and voluntary sector. Otherwise, it does not do its purpose. It is an injection, a shot in the arm, for play: getting that evidence base, getting good practice, building capacity and making the argument. By 2012, however, the rest of society must have been sufficiently persuaded that the question "Shall we now stop funding play?" would be a very silly one to ask, because communities could not imagine a time without it.

Some of the things that my hon. Friend and I have talked about in this worthwhile Adjournment debate could form the agenda that must be the basis of a dialogue between the lottery distributors and the play sector in the years to come. I know that is asking more of the voluntary sector and the play sector. I hope that, step by step, we can persuade the doubters—through our decision to fund aspects of the sector, and some posts there—that we are serious about that, even if, because of another event, we are approaching it in a different way.

I am not sure how carefully plotted the timing of this debate was. I cannot recall whether the debate was requested before we responded, or whether the debate forced us to respond a week or two earlier than we might otherwise have done. I would like to think that this fairly long, convoluted Adjournment debate—upon which I again congratulate my hon. Friend—is the end of one phase, and has set out the map, dialogue and plan for the beginning of the second. I apologise that the first stage of the journey has been as long as it has, but I am confident that the second can get the trust and partnership back. At the end of the day, I have never heard of any difference of opinion between the Government and the sector about the importance of play.

Vulnerable Passengers

3.59 pm

Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington) (LD): If I am a little breathless, Mr. Deputy Speaker, it is because I left myself just a few minutes to arrive here, and Portcullis House was shut because of a fire alarm.

I welcome the opportunity to introduce the debate. I also welcome the constructive role that the Minister of State, Department for Transport, has played on the issue of vulnerable passengers travelling on public transport. I hope that the Under-Secretary has been briefed by him on this issue and on the fact that it was raised in Standing Committee A, considering the Railways Bill, on 18 January. In that debate, my hon. Friend the Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso) proposed new clause 2, which he had tabled at my request to enable the matter to be debated. The new clause stated:

"The Secretary of State shall instruct the Rail Passengers Council (RPC) and the Association of Train Operating Companies (ATOC) to launch a campaign to encourage passengers to be more considerate to vulnerable passengers and raise awareness of priority seating."

The new clause was debated and the Minister of State explained that he did not have the power to instruct, but it was a positive and useful debate.

I want to move the debate on and not simply go over the same ground, but it is worth putting on record the basic details of the case of a constituent of mine called Janice Norman. She was travelling on a crowded commuter train when she was 25 weeks' pregnant. She experienced what, regrettably, many pregnant women experience, which is the common British tradition of people raising their newspaper so that they cannot see the pregnant woman standing in front of them in the packed aisle. I have witnessed that practice myself, and have heard about it from my wife and many other women. My constituent was left standing in the aisle, and at some point during her journey another passenger barged past her, shoving her in the stomach so heavily that she felt it necessary at the end of her journey to see her GP. The GP did not believe that there was a problem at the time, but at 30 weeks, because my constituent could not feel the baby any longer, she went into hospital. The baby had to be delivered by Caesarean and, unfortunately, died after complications.

A port-mortem was carried out, which revealed that the baby had experienced some traumatic event at 25 weeks. The only thing that had occurred or that my constituent could recall was the incident on the train, which she had felt was very serious and necessitated a visit to her GP, so it seems as though that incident was the traumatic event. My constituent raised that with me and jointly we decided to set up what we have called a considerate commuters campaign. She has set up a website. I tabled an early-day motion in the last Session, which has been retabled in this Session, and as part of the campaign I contacted the Association of Train Operating Companies, London's Mayor and the Secretary of State for Transport.

It was as a result of that correspondence that the Minister of State responded positively and, in turn, contacted ATOC and the Rail Passengers Council. In the Secretary of State's letter, he expressed support for the possibility of launching a campaign to encourage people to be more considerate to other passengers and to raise awareness of priority seating. I welcome the Minister's support for that campaign.

This is an issue not only for passengers who are vulnerable because they are pregnant, but for many other vulnerable passengers. I received an e-mail from Sense, the UK's leading organisation for people who are deaf-blind or have associated disabilities. It raised similar points and, in particular, concerns about deaf-blind people, and about people with deafness who have problems with balance. As hon. Members will know, there is a link between people's ears and how well they can balance, and that is clearly an issue for people who are deaf if they cannot get seating. It is obvious that a woman is 25 weeks' pregnant, but it is quite hard to detect that someone is deaf, unless one can see their hearing aid. Many people—myself included, until I received the e-mail—would not have thought of offering their seat to someone who is deaf because they might have problems with balance.

To complicate the picture further, someone who works for Sense highlights in the e-mail that there is a group of people for whom giving up one's seat is about the worst thing to do. If people are deaf-blind, the only way to know that their train has arrived in the appropriate station is by standing close to the door and counting the stations and signals as they pass. Moreover, if they are left with little time to get out of a crowded train, the last thing that they need is for someone to give up their seat. It is quite complex for passengers to know whether to give up their seat. However, I welcome the Minister's support in the campaign.

I want to focus on two further points. First, what are the existing provisions and what should be provided? I am grateful to Transport for London for providing information about what should be available on tube trains. There are strict requirements for new trains. Apparently, Transport for London requires either 10 per cent. of seats or eight seats—whichever is less—to be priority seats. On a tube train, that would mean that for each carriage there should be priority seats next to each of the entrances. Transport for London is about to issue much larger notices, so that people will be able to see more easily where those priority seats are. That is welcome.

As for the Association of Train Operating Companies, there is some lack of clarity as to whether priority seats should be provided on all trains or whether they are currently provided on all trains, including the slam-door stock, although those trains should not be with us for much longer. I travel regularly on the slam-door stock, and if there are signs indicating where priority seating is, I never notice them when I get on the train, and I suspect that no one else does either. The existing provisions need to be clarified.

Secondly, there is the issue of what statistics are collated. Clearly, it is difficult for statistics on incidents such as that involving Janice Norman to be collated consistently, because people do not automatically think of reporting an incident to the train driver, who is required to carry a log. Train drivers are required to keep records of any unusual incidents that are reported and to record them in their log. However, I suspect that virtually no one would report the sort of incident in which my constituent was involved.

What can be done to collate much more consistent statistics on those incidents? I understand that the Rail Safety and Standards Board is producing a report, which was referred to in the debate in Standing Committee A on 18 January. The report was due to be published at the end of last month, but I understand that it will now be made available at the beginning of February. That report will be key. It is examining the safety implications for passengers of "crowding"—most people would recognise it as overcrowding, but I do not want to get involved in semantics—and will make key recommendations on issues relevant to this debate. I assume that the Minister will be familiar with the remit of the report and may well have seen a draft of it. I understand that it will highlight the need to have a consistent method of recording crowding—or overcrowding—on trains, and recommend standards by which crowding on trains, platforms or stations can be measured.

If those are the report's recommendations, I hope that the Minister will support them. I wonder if she has any views on how we can ensure that incidents such as that in which my constituent was involved will be recorded, so that we can build a picture of how widespread the problem is. If no statistics are collated, or if they are collated in an ad hoc manner, it is difficult to get a feeling of how widespread the problem is and what resources should be provided to introduce and publicise priority seating and deal with overcrowding.

Turning to national standards, I received a copy of a helpful letter sent by Philip Wilkes, a senior policy adviser at the Rail Passengers Council, to the Association of Train Operating Companies about standards in the industry. I hope that the Minister will be able, if not now, perhaps in writing, to set out her views on such standards. For example, does she think that an industry standard should apply for priority seating so that there is consistency in the percentage of seats made available, information about where those seats are located, and in which circumstances people should give up seats? Does she think that there should be a consistent standard of how reservation systems work for train companies? If a vulnerable, pregnant or disabled passenger rings up and says that they need to sit close to an exit, can the reservation systems of train operating companies handle that and give them priority?

There is also the issue of enforceability, to which I hope the Minister will respond. In the debate in the Standing Committee, it was suggested that by putting forward new clause 2, we were seeking to legislate for, or perhaps against, people's behaviour. Clearly, that is not what we were seeking to do, but it would be worth clarifying the position on the enforceability of priority seating—my understanding is that there is no enforceability. As a last resort, do powers need to be given to ensure that priority seating can be enforced?

Where do we go from here? This is not an issue only for Government, but principally for the whole industry, and also for commuters, who need to be more observant and considerate. However, I hope that the Minister will reconfirm her support for the "triple C" campaign—considerate commuter campaign—that Janice Norman has kicked off. I want the Government to consider introducing national minimum standards for vulnerable passengers for the provision of priority seats, reservations protocols, and also upgrades to first class, which I did not mention earlier. A limited number of train companies allow pregnant season ticket holders who hold monthly or annual season tickets to be upgraded to first class, provided that they can produce the necessary documentation. I am not quite sure what that is, but a photo might be sufficient.

I would also call on the Government to back the recommendations that I believe will be in the Rail Safety and Standards Board report. They include introducing national minimum standards for the level of overcrowding on trains, stations and platforms; streamlining and simplifying the reporting of overcrowding incidents, so that there would be one source and we would get a real picture of how serious the problem is, and reviewing the enforceability of priority seating.

I am not trying to legislate against people's behaviour. That clearly cannot be easily achieved. The antisocial behaviour that we experience all too often on our streets is spilling over into our trains, buses and tubes. The Government must back our campaign and ensure that public transport is enjoyed by all, not just those who are able bodied, inconsiderate or aggressive.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Charlotte Atkins): I congratulate the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake) on securing this important debate on the safety of vulnerable passengers on public transport. We take the issue very seriously, and I share his deep concern about the case of his constituent, Janice Norman. I should like to take this opportunity to offer my deepest sympathy to Ms Norman and her family for this terrible loss. I can fully appreciate her desire and determination, backed by her Member of Parliament, to raise awareness of the need to show consideration towards fellow passengers on public transport.

It is difficult to know exactly how one could collate information about such incidents, as they will be extremely varied. Many years ago, for instance, I was on a tube train with a youngster in a buggy, and I was worried that there was such a crush that people would fall over on top of the buggy. That situation was not life threatening, as in Janice Norman's case, but it was deeply worrying. I agree that the safety and comfort of vulnerable passengers must be ensured as far as possible, and the Government and the train operating companies already do a lot of work in this area.

As the hon. Gentleman said, the hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso) tabled a new clause to the Railways Bill seeking to require the Secretary of State to launch a campaign to encourage passengers to be more considerate to vulnerable passengers and raise awareness of priority seating. My hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department for Transport, acknowledged that this was a serious subject on which he had been in correspondence with the hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross, as well as and with the Association of Train Operating Companies and the Rail Passengers Council. My hon. Friend said:

> "In the strict technical sense we cannot pursue the new clause because it would not achieve anything. The Secretary of State has no power to instruct the RPC or ATOC to do anything. ATOC is the umbrella group of a private industry. We could instruct it all we like, but we have no power to tell it to do anything. We have set up the RPC, of old and of new, as an independent body outside Government. It is rather inappropriate for us, having set up an independent body, to then instruct it what to do."

He went on to say:

> "The new clause asks the Secretary of State to instruct two organisations that we have no locus to instruct. However, it goes further than that and would legislate for behaviour. That is the crux of the matter."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 18 January 2005, c. 294]

Clearly my hon. Friend could not accept the new clause, but he was sympathetic to the view expressed by the hon. Gentleman. He said that he had written to ATOC and the RPC asking them to consider the matter in more detail and asking whether they would be happy to lend their weight to a broader campaign. He added, and I would also like to add, that we would be more than happy to be party to such a campaign. He also referred to London Underground's "Love is . . . " campaign, which he said had had a modicum of success in focusing on what should be second nature—consideration of fellow passengers generally, and a high degree of consideration for people such as pregnant women, who are clearly vulnerable.

The hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross stated in the Committee that some train operators, such as South West Trains, Thameslink and South Eastern Trains, also offer complimentary first class upgrades to pregnant women holding season tickets when there are no seats available in standard carriages. My hon. Friend the Minister of State undertook to ensure that train operating companies that use that practice continue to do so, and that those that do not use it consider implementing it. That also raises an issue about ladies who have not got season tickets. Often, a pregnant lady will be more vulnerable if she is not aware of the situation and the trains. If one is a season ticket holder and regularly uses the train, one is more likely to be aware of the situation.

The Rail Safety and Standards Board, the industry's own safety body, is due to publish a report at the end of the month on the first phase of research into the health and safety effects on rail passengers of crowding on trains. That will include consideration of the different groups of people at risk, such as the very young, the elderly, pregnant women and disabled people. The Rail Vehicle Accessibility Regulations 1998 prescribed a minimum number of seats for the use of disabled passengers. In addition, as the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington said, most train operators also designate priority seats for those who have difficulty standing, such as pregnant women and the elderly.

Our aim is a transport system that works for everyone. We have done much to achieve that aim by improving the accessibility, punctuality, reliability and safety of public transport. However, it is clear that not all groups have benefited equally from our increasingly mobile society. Understanding and recognising the different perceptions and needs of all passengers is fundamental to our transport policy. The Department sponsors a wide-ranging programme of research and consultation on issues such as people's mobility needs and personal security. We have issued good practice guidance to assist planners and providers to deliver services that meet people's needs, including many of the most vulnerable. I am not sure whether that includes guidance on the number or location of priority seats, but I will write to the hon. Gentleman about that. I imagine that some sort of guidance is probably given, but it is clearly guidance and not prescription.

Tom Brake: When the Minister writes, can she also set out—she may be about to do so—whether she believes that there should be a national standard for priority seating? She highlighted the fact that there were discrepancies between the operations of the different train companies.

Charlotte Atkins: I am happy to do that and examine what we have done in the past on that issue.

Improving accessibility is one of our overarching national objectives for transport. Local authorities are encouraged and empowered through the local transport planning process to work with local people, transport operators and infrastructure owners to deliver transport improvements to all sections of society. However, there is only so much that we can do; we cannot escape from the fact that comfortable and safe journeys rely on courtesy and consideration from fellow passengers. The good will of the travelling public, as well as the ability to recognise the needs of other passengers and give up seats willingly, are all crucial. It would be difficult to enforce such behaviour, especially on train services where there is no guard or inspector, but that should not deflect us from the importance of raising the profile of the issue not only in transport but throughout society.

Although the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 does not include pregnant women, it covers some vulnerable users of public transport. The Government are committed to an accessible public transport system in which disabled people have the same opportunities to travel as other members of society. Regulations are already in place that require all new rail, bus and coach vehicles to be accessible to disabled people, and policy proposals for taxis have also been announced. Such an approach will help other vulnerable users as well.

The Disability Discrimination Bill, which is going through Parliament, builds on the measures already in place, and it includes measures to amend the 1995 Act in areas such as the definition of disability, public sector duties, premises and private clubs. It includes also measures on transport. The Bill contains powers to give disabled people the same right of access to transport services that they already have in relation to other services, such as shops and banks. It also includes measures to set an end date by which all rail vehicles will have to be accessible and strengthens enforcement. I hope that it will help to create a sea change in people's attitudes. Subject to the passage of the Bill, we intend to implement those changes as soon as is practical after Royal Assent.

The Government are aware that many people—particularly women, older people and ethnic minorities—are concerned about using public transport, especially at night. We are committed to reducing the fear of crime wherever it occurs in the transport system. We know that no single factor makes people feel unsafe, and that only a combination of measures addressing the whole journey experience can reassure people about their personal security. The Department is encouraging the spread of good practice in crime prevention techniques on public transport through guidance to operators, local authorities, the police and other interested parties. We are constantly talking to operators. We need to stress the importance of other vulnerable users, too.

Tom Brake: In those discussions with operators, was the Minister made aware of concerns about the secure stations initiative? Those concerns are certainly shared by my local operator, Southern; it finds the surveys that it is required to carry out as part of the process so onerous in cost terms that it is not willing to put many of its stations through the process.

Charlotte Atkins: I was not aware of that, although my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department for Transport, may be, as he is more closely associated with the scheme, which is of course designed to improve security. What the hon. Gentleman says is a real concern. If that is the case—and we will certainly look into the matter—we clearly have to address the issue.

Transport crime does not affect only transport operators, and it cannot be tackled by them or the police alone. Local authorities, town centre managers and the local community have an important role to play. We are talking very much about a partnership approach. Transport crime obviously impacts on the wider community and community safety initiatives, and it is important that the public play a role and look out for vulnerable passengers.

Many people are concerned about waiting for and using public transport, especially at night. We are concerned about the protection of bus passengers and staff against assault. Many vulnerable passengers are concerned about that issue. We are aware that young people are often the perpetrators, but they are also often the victims of bus crimes. We want to consider youngsters, too, because we want to ensure that they can use the public transport system; we all want to increase usage.

The safer travel on buses and coaches panel, STOP, looks at ways to combat assaults, antisocial behaviour and vandalism at bus stops and stations, and on vehicles and in waiting areas. The panel brings together those involved in dealing with safety and security and includes operators, local authorities, police and unions. It is charged with the important task of facilitating the exchange of ideas and spreading best practice. I hope that we can also get it to take up the other issues that have been mentioned. The introduction of accessibility regulations for buses has made it easier for those travelling with small children, luggage or heavy shopping to access bus services, and it will also make travel easier for other vulnerable users.

I hope that I have demonstrated that the Government take the issue of vulnerable passengers very seriously indeed. We have introduced regulations making all new trains, buses and coaches accessible to disabled passengers, and have announced our proposals for taxis. However, we have to be aware that staff input and training is important, too. We are making progress, but we are not at all complacent about the importance of ensuring that public transport is comfortable and safe for everybody.

Fire Safety

[Relevant document: Eleventh Report of the Regulatory Reform Committee, Session 2003-04, HC 684, on the proposal for the Regulatory Reform (Fire Safety) Order 2004.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[James Purnell.]

2.35 pm

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The subject for debate is fire safety. I advise the House that the Adjournment debate is a Government debate, but it will be appropriate for the 11th report of the Regulatory Reform Committee, Session 2003–04, to be taken into account. That Committee was, and still is, chaired with distinction by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike). I call the Minister to open the debate.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Phil Hope): I am delighted that we have secured this debate on fire safety. I welcome the opportunity to debate that important subject and am glad that there are so many hon. Members here to consider all the issues.

In the light of our proposals to reform fire safety law, the Regulatory Reform Committee, in its 11th report of the 2003–04 Session, asked for a debate on fire safety in the context of fire and rescue service reform. I echo your comments, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am sure that the Committee will welcome this further opportunity to examine our proposals. Indeed, to help it, we have sent a draft of our response to its report.

Latest statistics show that there were 284 accidental fire deaths in dwellings in 2003–04 and some 8,200 injuries. The main cause was the careless handling of smoking materials. In other premises, there were 18 deaths and 920 injuries. Many of those fire deaths were preventable. That is why fire and safety service reform is so important.

In recognition of that, the Government have set targets that will, from 1 April, be formally incorporated in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister's public service agreement with the Chancellor. Our national target is to reduce by 20 per cent. the number of accidental fire-related deaths in the home by 2010, with no local fire and rescue authority having a fatality rate, from accidental fires in the home, that is more than one and a quarter times the national average. An element of the target does relate to arson, which I will deal with later.

The national house fire death trend is down from its peak in 1997–98, when 385 accidental dwelling fire deaths and some 10,200 injuries were recorded. In commercial premises, too, accidental fire deaths are down from a peak in 2002–03 of 26 deaths, and injuries are down from a peak in 1996–97 of 1,300 injuries. Clearly, however, there is still much to do. Prevention is obviously the key, as many people die before fire and rescue service personnel are called out. The new legislative framework recognises that. Not only are we reforming fire safety law as it applies to business through the regulatory reform order, but the Fire and Rescue Services Act 2004 places fire prevention at its heart. The promotion of fire safety is now a core duty of fire and rescue authorities.

Changes in behaviour are vital. Simple measures taken by households, such as smoke alarm installation and regular smoke alarm maintenance, will help to reduce the number of fire deaths and injuries. Smoke alarm ownership now stands at around 80 per cent. compared to only 8 per cent. in 1988. That is partly due to regular publicity and television campaigns sponsored by the ODPM.

Andrew Bennett (Denton and Reddish) (Lab): On the subject of smoke alarms, how satisfied is the Minister that the alarms have working batteries in them? Is it not important to convince people that they should go for electrically wired smoke alarms, rather than battery-operated ones?

Phil Hope: My hon. Friend raises an excellent point. My very next point was that we need not only to increase ownership, particularly among the most vulnerable, but to ensure that existing smoke alarms are fully functioning. Later I will talk about some campaigns that the Department is running, one of which is called "Push the Button! Not your Luck". That is all about testing smoke alarms to ensure that they contain a working battery. As we know, families may, stupidly, take the batteries out to put into toys, particularly at Christmas, when there is greater vulnerability, and not replace them. His point about the hard wiring of smoke alarms, which he knows is part of the building regulations—every new house has to have a fully-wired smoke alarm—goes some way to addressing the issue.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge) (Con): The Minister will be aware that recent regulations introduced by his Department make it more difficult for householders to carry out modest electrical wiring installations in their own homes. Indeed, they require them to hire external contractors or, alternatively, to pay an inspection fee to the local authority. Does he not think that that is likely to deter householders, especially the poorest, from hard wiring smoke alarms?

Phil Hope: The hon. Gentleman is referring to the part P of the building regulations, which have recently been introduced and come fully into force on 1 April. There is a transitional period at present. His assertion is utterly wrong.

Part P provides new safety measures. If a person is putting new wiring into, say, a kitchen or a bathroom or outdoors—somewhere where there is water—we recommend that they use a qualified person, somebody with a competent person certificate. If they wish to do the work themselves, they can. They can use their neighbour, who might be an amateur electrician or somebody who puts in kitchens. We are simply saying that, under the new regulations, they must have the work checked by the local authority building control to make sure that it has been done safely. In that way, we will reduce the number of deaths and injuries not only from electrocution but from fires created by faulty electrical installations, particularly in high-risk areas such as kitchens, bathrooms and outdoors.

I hope that that puts the record straight for the hon. Gentleman. He should, like other parts of the media, make sure that he gets his facts right before he makes such assertions.

Mr. Hammond: I was not aware that I was a part of the media.

The Minister says that I am utterly wrong. Can he then give us an assurance that the part P regulations do not apply to the wiring of smoke alarms?

Phil Hope: The point about the part P regulations is that any additional wiring put into a household—a brand new circuit—should be done by a competent person to ensure that it is done safely. It can be done by somebody who is not competent, although I do not recommend that it is, but that person must inform the local authority and have the work checked to make sure that it has been done properly and safely. The hon. Gentleman, like others, would not want faulty electrical installations to give rise to even more deaths and injuries. He will want to do something to reduce them.

Andrew Bennett: Does the Minister accept that the part P regulations should not apply to smoke alarms, because they should not be installed in a kitchen or a bathroom, where they can go off, giving false alarms? When people get false alarms, the natural thing is to take the battery out and stop the alarm working. Smoke alarms should go to the point closest to the kitchen but outside it.

Phil Hope: That was a helpful intervention. My hon. Friend is absolutely right. We recommend that smoke alarms be fitted near to those points. I would go further and say that not only should there be one downstairs but, in multiple-floor housing, one upstairs as well, so that there is early warning if a fire breaks out. The installation of working smoke alarms has the greatest chance of preventing deaths, most of which occur late at night. Unfortunately, people are often already dead before the fire rescue service turns up, because they have died from smoke inhalation.

Dr. Doug Naysmith (Bristol, North-West) (Lab/Co-op): The Regulatory Reform Committee has not spent much time on this point, but, as it has been raised, I should be grateful if my hon. Friend the Minister answered a question about small operators doing small jobs, which they can apparently continue to do under the regulations. Is he satisfied that local authorities will be able to cope with the requests from small businesses doing small jobs to certify their work and will a fee be involved?

Phil Hope: We are now having a part P debate, which is more interesting than I anticipated, but I shall endeavour to answer the points.

First, if somebody adds, say, an extra socket to a line, excluding kitchens and bathrooms, where there is extra risk, they do not need to notify the local authority or use a competent person. Such minor alterations and repairs are not notifiable, so a large majority of the jobs that ordinary householders do in their own home are not touched by the regulations.

If householders are putting in a new circuit throughout their house, or something of that kind, they should use a competent person, or notify the local building authority, so that the authority can come in and check that it has been done safely, the householder and their family are safe and those who rent or buy the house subsequently can rely on its safety.

An electrician who does regular work during the year will join a competent persons' scheme. That will require a fee of about £300 per year depending on the nature of the work. Given that the electrician is doing hundreds of jobs every year, that cost is marginal to total annual earnings. If the person is doing a one-off job as an electrician, they can notify the local building authority. The local authority's building control inspector will then inspect and charge a fee, the level of which will depend on the amount of work. If it is a small and simple piece of work, it will require less of an inspection, so less work will be involved than in, say, inspecting the wiring of an entire house. Therefore, the fee set by local authorities will be affordable and done per item if the person undertaking the work is not a competent person. I hope that that clarifies the position.

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): Does the Minister agree that such regulation is important? The kitchen and the bathroom are two rooms in which people tend to do their own work, putting up new kitchen units, wall cupboards, shower units or whatever. There is a high risk in those areas. Unless cables are properly buried at the right depth in the wall and run vertically rather than diagonally or horizontally, those cables can be breached.

I bring to hon. Members' attention a tragic case that took place last year. A diagonal wire was put up with a magnetic knife rack. The screw from the end of the knife rack touched the wire for a number of years. It took the coating off the cable. A lady who was put something away from a dishwasher put her hand on the knife rack while touching the dishwasher and died of electrocution. She was the daughter of my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge).

Phil Hope: The hon. Gentleman gives a good example of how tragedy can strike. While I do not want to go into the specifics of that case, the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) has been directly involved with the Department in promoting the new part P regulations.

The reason that we are introducing the regulations is that 10 deaths and 750 injuries a year result directly from faulty installation and fixed electrical wiring in places such as kitchens and bathrooms. The regulations allow individuals to do the work but insist that they have it checked to ensure that it is done safely. That is an entirely sensible measure. A full regulatory impact assessment was done on the part P building regulations. The measures that we are taking to prevent people dying from electrocution or fire from faulty electrical wiring are absolutely right and sensible. I know that the rest of the country believes that they are the right way forward.

Ms Julia Drown (South Swindon) (Lab): I appreciate the Minister's point and am keen to avoid such tragedies. Given that kitchens are often a source of fire, does he not want to promote smoke alarms for kitchens with hush buttons, so that, if someone sees the toast burning, they can press the hush button and carry on? They can keep their smoke alarm and keep themselves protected without having the annoyance of the alarm going off all the time.

Phil Hope: A number of innovative approaches to community fire safety are being developed. My hon. Friend has named one. I will say something later about a different fire alarm that is suitable for houses with deaf people in, where light is obviously the key way of alerting someone who is unable to hear a fire alarm going off.

Often, automatic fire alarms in public buildings are responded to as a result of people cooking toast, which sets the alarm off. We need to find ways of dealing with those circumstances, so that we prevent fires and we make a response in the most efficient way that will reduce the number of fires.

Mr. Hammond: I am grateful to the Minister for his explanation. I do not claim to be an expert on the part P regulations. To go back to where we started, the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Andrew Bennett) suggested that it would be good to encourage people to hard wire smoke alarms. Accepting that smoke alarms should not be in kitchens or bathrooms, will the Minister confirm that hard wiring one outside a kitchen or a bathroom would not give rise to the need to pay a building regulations inspection fee? If he can give that assurance, we have closed this little loop.

Phil Hope: The hon. Gentleman does not seem to appreciate that the hard wiring of smoke alarms in new properties covered by the regulations will be undertaken by people who are competent. Those competent persons are qualified under the various regulations and approved by the competent persons' scheme to do precisely that. Because the costs are spread out over the whole year, they are marginal. I do not believe that the cost of the competent persons scheme is any barrier whatsoever to the fitting of 10-year smoke alarms in new properties, any more than are the building regulations we have at the moment.

Last year, the Department announced a four-year, £25 million fire prevention initiative in support of such measures. Over 1 million vulnerable households are to be offered help and advice to reduce the risk of fire in the home, backed up by the installation of free 10-year smoke alarms. Local fire and rescue services have already purchased several thousand of those smoke alarms, and are identifying at-risk households in their area to offer free installation.

Some of the work on smoke alarms is innovative. The Cheshire fire and rescue service, in conjunction with the Deaf Support Network, have identified over 250 households which require smoke alarms tailored for deaf and hard of hearing persons. I am pleased to say that Cheshire will start its installation programme later this month—something I am sure that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will be particularly pleased about.

To help establish and to develop community fire safety programmes more generally, some 26 fire and rescue authorities—those with above average accidental fire death rates—are receiving funding amounting to some £400 million over three years from the Government's community fire safety innovation fund to support their local initiatives. It is no surprise that that funding has been well received. It pump primes fire and rescue services to shift their efforts towards fire safety.

Last year, Cheshire ran a safer Cheshire project to cold call 40,000 homes in vulnerable areas to offer free home fire safety checks. Humberside fire and rescue service has targeted funding at fire safety advice to children at key stages 1 to 3, with appropriate materials. The Department is evaluating the work of those fire and rescue services in receipt last year and this year of community fire service innovation fund money to establish the range and nature of activities undertaken, and to develop good practice models in community fire safety projects. Once we have established good practice, that can be rolled out to other fire and rescue services across the country.

Ms Drown: I would be grateful if the Minister told me whether that funding can also be used for fire suppression methods. If that is the case, what is the Government's view on some of the newer methods, such as water mist systems and sprinklers? I ask because the Wiltshire fire service was one of the services that introduced sprinklers into social housing, and a recent fire in one such house—it had spread from outside—did minimal damage. The fire service reported to me how glad it was that sprinklers were there, because otherwise there could have been extensive damage and, for all we know, loss of life.

Phil Hope: Each fire and rescue authority is looking at the needs of its own area and determining what priority it should give to home fire safety risk assessments or to spending money on more smoke alarms. I know, for example, that the Merseyside fire service has issued many thousands of free smoke alarms, so its priority might be in another area. Whether a fire suppression method might be something that an individual fire and rescue authority wants to look at is a matter for that authority.

I will be speaking about sprinklers as a prevention method later. Obviously, the issue of cost and how many sprinklers could fit into a particular household with the money we are making available would be matters for those local authorities.

In addition to those funding streams, the Government's National Community Fire Safety Centre's national campaigns raise the profile of fire safety through the media to highlight our core message of prevention, detection and escape. This year, the centre will run its regular smoke alarm maintenance campaign, which focuses on that simple message about checking batteries once a week and replacing them once a year.

Another example of the fire safety message reaching the public was a recent partnership between Tyne and Wear fire and rescue service and Metro Radio and

[Phil Hope]

Magic 1152. The "Dying for Chips" fire safety advertisement brought home the importance of safe cooking. I am sure that hon. Members will have seen the fire and rescue services taking around their demonstration van about how a chip pan fire can start and how it can quickly be dealt with. Such messages are important in reducing the risk of death and injuries and preventing fires in the first place. The advert won the London International Advertising Award for "Best Station-Produced Radio and Public Service Commercial", beating off competition from the United States and Germany.

I turn now to arson. Our target is to reduce the number of deliberate fires by 10 per cent. by 2010. More than half of the primary fires attended by the fire and rescue services are started deliberately and many of them involve abandoned vehicles. Deliberate fire setting represents a significant drain on fire and rescue authority resources. Many local authorities now have good measures in place to tackle abandoned vehicles. I am pleased to say that the number of deliberate vehicle fires attended by the fire and rescue service in England in the year ending March 2004 fell by 13 per cent., after a long and frightening upward trend.

The Government have introduced new regulations enabling vehicles of no value, which comprise the majority of abandoned vehicles, to be removed by local councils after 24 hours. Other new powers enable local authorities to clamp and to remove unlicensed vehicles and to tighten vehicle registration procedures, so that those who dump cars can be tracked down and prosecuted.

The recent publication of the fire and rescue service national framework enhances our commitment to fire prevention, and it will be the subject of a further debate in the House next week. It sets out the Government's priorities and objectives for the fire and rescue service and what fire and rescue authorities should do to achieve them.

The national framework also sets out the support that the Government will provide. We will provide strategic direction while ensuring that authorities continue to make local decisions. The framework gives details about integrated risk management plans, which fire and rescue services are required to produce and to maintain. As part of their IRMP, they must include details for enforcing fire safety legislation in their area, making use of the risk-based inspection guidance that we have issued to them.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): My hon. Friend the Minister is making a good case for the importance of prevention. Some of us who debated the Fire and Rescue Services Bill know that the regionalisation of some services, particularly fire control, had implications. Before we go any further, can we possibly have the publication of the full business case behind the view that it is cheaper and better to provide fire control services at a regional rather than a local level? He knows that that debate is taking place in my own authority in Gloucestershire. We are somewhat hamstrung by not knowing the full figures, because they will impact on how the fire service is organised.

Phil Hope: My right hon. Friend the Minister for Local and Regional Government recently held a seminar in the House for Members who are concerned about the future of control centres.

Mr. Drew: I was not invited.

Phil Hope: My hon. Friend is more than welcome to access all the material presented. Unfortunately, he cannot have the material that for commercial reasons must remain confidential. The outline business case has been made available to the chairs of fire and rescue authorities, in order that people can understand the whole case. I will make sure that my hon. Friend gets the full seminar presentation, because it made clear how having regional control centres will make for a more effective service. Any resources saved can be put back into fire safety in the way that he and I would like to see.

The case made by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State is irrefutable. We are going forward with a clear timetable and by full consultation with all relevant bodies. The delivery of regional call centres will improve response and effectiveness, while saving resources that can then be redeployed. I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) that we are well aware of the concerns voiced by him and others who have made representations, but the case is strong—I will not repeat the history of it now—for moving in the direction that we are taking.

I emphasise that the fire and rescue services must include in their integrated risk management plans details for enforcing fire safety legislation in their areas, making use of the risk-based inspection guidance that we have issued to them. Taken together, all of that can be used to advance the prevention and risk-based approach introduced by the 2004 Act.

The Audit Commission is implementing comprehensive performance assessment plans for English fire and rescue authorities. The assessment will test the progress and capability of each authority in delivering a modern fire and rescue service and in meeting local community needs.

It is not only legislation that is directly related to the fire service that has an impact on fire safety. Early in 2004, the Government began a fundamental review of the fire safety aspects of the building regulations and the supporting document, approved document B. The review is considering fire safety in all types of buildings, including residential premises, schools and warehouses, and will draw on the findings of recent research and experiences. We expect to publish a revised draft of the document for consultation in the spring. I say to my hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) that the part B regulations in particular will consider the role that sprinklers might play in a package of measures for prevention and risk reduction.

Jim Knight (South Dorset) (Lab): While he is on the subject, will the Minister clarify the role of the Department for Education and Skills in respect of sprinklers in schools, and tell us how any announcements that it may make will relate to the announcement that he will make in the spring?

Phil Hope: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I know that he has a personal interest in this subject as the chair of the Fire Protection Association.

Jim Knight: I will declare my interest if I am called to speak.

Phil Hope: Indeed. My hon. Friend has pressed me and other colleagues hard on this matter. He is right that the installation of sprinklers in schools is being considered by the DFES, which has the lead on that issue. We understand that it will shortly issue new guidance—building bulletin 100, for the insiders who need to know the technical details—which will specifically address the issue of designing against and managing the risk of fire in schools. The part B document that we will publish later this year, hopefully in spring, will be cross-referenced with that guidance, so that the two go hand in glove.

Ms Drown: On the issue of schools, it has been interesting to get feedback from the fire service in Wiltshire. When it approaches schools that are being built under the private finance initiative in the county and asks, "What are your responsibilities if part or all of the school burns down? You need to replace the school, or parts of it, don't you?", the debate quickly moves on to sprinklers. Straight away, all PFI schools in Wiltshire install them. They are doing the risk assessment. I hope that those lessons might be learned by the non-PFI schools.

Phil Hope: That is helpful. Wiltshire fire and rescue service does an excellent job with fire safety measures, and I am delighted to hear about the initiatives that my hon. Friend describes. All that evidence and experience is being fed into the part B review and the DFES guidance, which will be issued shortly. We want to draw on best practice.

As well as the areas that I have described, the Government are, where appropriate, regulating to deal with fire risk in residential premises. The Housing Act 2004, which was given Royal Assent in November, replaces the housing fitness standard and the houses in multiple occupation fire safety legislation with the new housing health and safety rating system.

The last piece of the jigsaw that I will describe—my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) will be glad to hear me get to this—is the regulatory reform order, which focuses mainly on non-domestic premises, and covers the common parts of purpose-built flats and houses in multiple occupation. Existing fire safety law covering non-domestic premises has developed over many years, often in response to tragic fires in which large numbers of people lost their lives.

Most general fire safety legislation addresses the consequences of fire by requiring fire precautions, mainly making provision for safe escape in case of fire. However, the existing regimes do not generally address the problem of fire itself, or seek to prevent fires from occurring. The approach that we have taken in the regulatory reform order has been to seek ways to address the problem of fire at source. Prevention of fire reduces the likelihood of people being harmed and has a beneficial effect in other areas, such as the damage caused. We are carrying through the old adage that "Prevention is better than cure". I think that hon. Members will agree that that is appropriate.

Numerous pieces of legislation currently place fire safety requirements on the owners and occupiers of premises. Those legislative measures overlap and cause confusion to many businesses. For that reason, we believe that the regulatory reform order presents a good opportunity to bring as much fire safety law as possible into one piece of legislation. It has been a huge task. We appreciate the frustration from some quarters that the order is not yet in force. However, it is our duty to ensure that the legislation is workable and correct and that the guidance to support the order is ready.

Subject to the ironing out of several technical points, the order will shortly go back before the Regulatory Reform Committee and the equivalent Committee in another place for its second period of parliamentary scrutiny.

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): On the issue of the technical aspects of the regulatory reform order, I am sure that my hon. Friend is aware that, in article 31, entitled "Prohibition notices", the definition of houses in multiple occupation refers to the Housing Act 1985. Of course, the Housing Act 2004 has been passed. I assume that he will wish to have a look at how the order relates to the Housing Acts when he takes it back to the House. As I am sure he is aware, the 2004 Act expands the definition of a house in multiple occupation. Indeed, it allows local authorities to engage in licensing activities.

Phil Hope: My hon. Friend has put his finger on an important point. That is one of the technical points that we have had to take account of during the passage of the regulatory reform order. I am glad to be able to tell him that it has been amended to take account of the Housing Act 2004. That is the kind of technical point that we need to keep in our sights, so that the order is as accurate, up to date and useful as possible.

Mr. Hammond: Will the Minister clarify the procedure for an order under the Regulatory Reform Act 2001? He said that the order would now go back to the Select Committee for a second period of scrutiny. Will it then be reviewed by a Committee of the House, in the way that any other statutory instrument would be? In other words, will the rest of us have any further opportunity to scrutinise it?

Phil Hope: The hon. Gentleman asks me about parliamentary procedure. He will be glad to know that, unlike him, I have been focusing on the substance of the debate about regulatory reform orders rather than the processes. However, I will ensure that he gets a full answer to the question that he has raised.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab) rose

Phil Hope: I was going to ask my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley. My understanding is that the order will go back to the Committee that he chairs, will be given a thorough review on the second scrutiny by members of all parties and will come back to the House.

Mr. Pike: It will be considered by my Committee and we will issue a report. The order will not be debatable on the Floor of the House unless my Committee divides. It will be decided forthwith. I will explain why my Committee recommended that we have this debate when I make my speech, assuming that I will be called.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I can guarantee that.

Phil Hope: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that clarification. I am sure that the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) is, too.

We believe that it is right that the person in control of a premises where people go to work or visit should accept responsibility for the safety of those people. It is right that we should seek to prevent fires from occurring, and to minimise the effect of those that do occur. Fire prevention should be of equal importance to ensuring safe escape. We are seeking not to detract from the role that fire precautions play, but to enhance the role of fire prevention.

The flexibility of the new regime will allow fire safety solutions to be tailored to the circumstances of each business. Through that and through the reduction in the burden of overlapping and conflicting legislation, we can reduce red tape and costs for business, as well as reduce the cost of fire and the deaths, damage and injury that it causes. We can not just maintain existing protections but, through reducing the risk of fire, enhance them. That is a high aspiration. I believe that it is achievable, as I am sure my hon. Friends do, but it is taking time and I hope that it is worth the time and effort.

The Committee's initial report on the order expressed concern that the regime of IRMPs required by the national framework might be simply an administrative tool, and insufficient to ensure that the fire and rescue services enforced the regulatory reform order properly. I assure hon. Members that the national framework has sufficient legislative back-up to ensure that the new fire safety regime works better than the current arrangements.

The RRO will place duties on businesses and fire and rescue authorities to enforce its provisions for inspection and appropriate action where shortcomings are found. The Fire and Rescue Service Act 2004 gives the Secretary of State the powers to ensure that the local service is in no doubt about what is required of it. We have used those powers to require a local authority to include a risk-based inspection regime in its IRMP. Such a regime must form an integral part of the overall strategy for the protection of the community. If inspection or evidence showed that an authority was putting lives at risk by failing to establish a proper enforcement regime, the Act gives us the power to direct it, although it would only be as a last resort.

The measures I have mentioned, together wi recognition of the wider role of the fire service in dealin with accidents and emergencies that are not fire-relate go a long way to creating a modern prevention-bas fire service.

Andrew Bennett: I have listened carefully to my ho Friend. I hoped he might say something about candle When the Select Committee on Office of the Depu Prime Minister looked at the fire services, I w surprised to hear from one of the chief fire officers th he believed that candles were a growing threat. They a used in a lot of religious festivities and, increasingly, the home. A candle coming into contact with someon clothes can cause serious problems.

Phil Hope: My hon. Friend is right to emphas candles as a cause of deaths and injuries from fire many homes. The fire and rescue authorities I ha visited have shown me many examples of that. F instance, leaving those little tea-lights lit on top of television can cause it to melt, or even explode. Anyo who has been through a demonstration of a "flash-ove will know that it is terrifying. Within seconds, wh seems to be a small fire in the corner can engulf a wh room in an inferno of flame.

My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the ri from candles at celebratory events. I was pleased to in north London at Diwali to emphasise the importan of the safe use of candles at a time of religio celebration. The same is true at Christmas, when ma people have candles in their home. People buy candl to put in children's bedrooms. We should ensure th ordinary safety activities such as blowing out a cand before going to sleep, and not leaving a lit candle in room unattended, are understood. Many of the fi safety messages that children are now being taught school focus specifically on those activities.

Jim Knight: To add to my hon. Friend's list, there w a tragic fatal fire in my constituency followi Halloween, after night-lights were left burning insi pumpkins overnight. The details of the cause are yet come through, but it is clear that Halloween is anoth festival we should watch out for.

Phil Hope: Absolutely. That is why we do not ju come out with the fire safety messages at one time of t year. The message needs to come out repeatedl because we need to heighten awareness. I have been many classrooms and watched some of the excelle work that the fire and rescue authority staff do the The children fully understand their message and home as little fire safety ambassadors. As a result, n only they but their older brothers and sisters, th parents and their grandparents will behave more safel

Andrew Bennett: Would it not be useful for those wh sell candles to have to include a warning or some advi with them?

Phil Hope: That might be a helpful contribution. I a sure that candle manufacturers are aware of the ris that their products might pose for people who misu them and that they are always mindful of the issue safety advice.

To conclude, our reform of fire safety legislation represents the biggest change in 30 years, and the transformation of the fire and rescue service is the biggest such change for more than half a century. We are convinced that the way to save lives is to embed the risk-based approach in all activities, be it the use of candles or the use of smoke alarms. We can do that by requiring businesses to undertake and to act on risk assessments and by ensuring that our fire services have enough resources, share good practice and use the best practice available. We have introduced a comprehensive package of reforms, which is designed to drive down fire deaths and injuries and to create a modern, prevention-based fire and rescue service fit for the 21st century.

3.16 pm

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): I am glad to have the opportunity to speak in the debate. It may be helpful if I first outline the responsibilities of the Regulatory Reform Committee, because I am sure that most hon. Members do not know how it functions.

I have served on the Committee since it was established in 1994 in accordance with the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994, which was passed by the Conservative Government. At first, the Deregulation Committee, as it was, had a Conservative Chairman. It carried on after the 1997 election, but after the passing of the Regulatory Reform Act 2001, which was completed just before the 2001 general election, it changed its name to the Regulatory Reform Committee.

There are two elements to the Committee's procedure. One applies when the Government lay a proposal before us. In that case, we have longer to look at the proposal. We can take evidence and have the Minister before us. It all depends how simple or complex the proposal is. The other element applies where the Government have considered a report by the Committee; they can then introduce a proposal.

The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) asked about debate in the House. The proposal can be debated in the House only if the Committee divides on it, although there has been a Division on only one occasion, and that was on the check-off provisions. In such cases, there can be a debate in the House for half an hour. If the Committee says no and the Government still go ahead, there can be a debate in the House for an hour and a half. However, that has never happened. In fact, in such cases, the Government have withdrawn their proposal as a result of the evidence taken by the Committee.

Mr. Hammond: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his clarification of how the system works, but is he not just a little concerned that when the statutory instrument goes down the regulatory reform route, rather than the conventional route, the usual suspects — those of us who deal regularly with issues relating to fire, and who will be in Standing Committee next week debating the national framework — do not have an opportunity to look at these weighty and important matters? The Committee has done an excellent job, as I shall say in a moment, but it seems that that arrangement has slightly disjoined this particular regulation from the overall framework.

Mr. Pike: There was considerable opposition when the Conservative Government passed the original Act, and the Labour Government amended it. However, the arrangement is not a fast track; it is a second track, and there is full scrutiny. In all fairness, however, I must say that the participation of Conservative members of the Committee is almost negligible. I have raised the point in the House on one or two occasions and expressed concern that hon. Members who have been appointed to the Committee have not come along. That is not my responsibility. It is not the most exciting Committee for the purposes of attracting hon. Members to serve on it, as you know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, having heard me say so on other Committees on which we have served. The procedure, however, exists, it is agreed by Act of Parliament and we must work with it. I must recognise that my role is to take an objective view as the Committee works within the powers laid down by the Act.

Dr. Naysmith: This is an interesting area. Certain matters sometimes receive more scrutiny in the Regulatory Reform Committee than they do in the House.

Mr. Pike: I thank my hon. Friend for that comment, which is true. If some of the items that we deal with were tagged on to a Bill in a clause, they would receive no consideration, but we can take evidence and consider them in detail. They are given greater scrutiny by a limited number of people, which I think is the point that the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) was making. It was not in my power to determine that; we must work within the Act of Parliament.

Richard Younger-Ross: I tend rather to concur with the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge. If the Committee should divide on the matter it might find, because a lot of work has been done on fire and rescue in recent months, and because we debate the framework next week, that its response was well received by hon. Members who wanted further to examine the provision in the House.

Mr. Pike: It is not for me to decide whether the Committee should artificially divide to permit such a debate, but I hear what the hon. Gentleman says. We have considered that on one or two occasions, although we have never done so. The option exists; if we wanted to provide for a half-hour debate in the House we could, in theory, do that.

The only time in my 22 years in the House that I ever drew a high place in the private Member's Bill ballot I introduced a Bill on fire prevention, which unfortunately was prevented from making progress by the usual suspects on the Conservative Benches, who traditionally used to block private Member's Bills on a Friday. I am sure that I do not have to name them, because everyone knows who I mean.

The Committee called for this debate, in paragraph 58 of our report, because the proposal was the biggest that we had ever had before us, whether as the Deregulation Committee or under our present title. The Government proposal contains 52 articles and five schedules, so it is quite substantial. It would amend or repeal 79 separate items of legislation.

[Mr. Pike]

We held two evidence sessions in June 2004 with experts including the Fire Brigades Union; the Minister was our final witness and that evidence session was very useful. The Committee thought it appropriate to deal with the proposal under the regulatory reform order procedure—and recommended that—but because of its scale we thought that there should be an opportunity for more Members of the House to debate it. We therefore suggested that it should be debated in Westminster Hall, which we thought the most appropriate venue, or in the Chamber, because that would in theory provide every hon. Member with the opportunity to take part in a debate, time permitting. The Government responded positively to that suggestion, which is why we are here this afternoon. We should commend the Minister for that.

The order is intended to bring about a thoroughgoing consolidation of existing legislation on fire safety, thereby reducing the regulatory burdens on business caused by the overlap of current multiple fire-safety ratings and their related enforcement authorities. The order will replace the existing legislation in England and Wales and, for the first time, establish a single regulatory regime for fire safety in all non-domestic premises, based on the principle of risk assessment and with a single enforcement authority in each area with responsibility for fire safety. The Committee also said that Scotland should, if possible, be dealt with according to a similar timetable and with a parallel arrangement. That way we can have the same arrangements at the same time—as near as possible—in England, Scotland and Wales.

Article 9 of the order introduces the principle of risk assessment which underlies the Government's intended future approach to fire safety legislation. That requires that in respect of all premises covered by the order:

"The responsible person must make a suitable and sufficient assessment of the risks to which relevant persons are exposed."

That is intended to enable the "responsible person" to take such fire precautions as may be necessary to comply with specific requirement and prohibitions provided by the order.

The order defines the terms in the following ways. We raise the question of "premises", which is to say any place, including any workplace, any vehicle, vessel, aircraft or hovercraft; any installation on land, including the foreshore and other land intermittently covered by water, and any other installation; and any tent or moveable structure. Obviously we believe that the Government need to address those points, and it has to be clearly understood exactly what is being covered there.

"Responsible persons" means any employer with a control of a workplace, any other person with that responsibility or in any other case the owner of the premises. Again, the order is making an important point. "Relevant persons" is any person who is lawfully on the premises or any person in the vicinity who is at risk from a fire on the premises.

Ms Drown: My hon. Friend is emphasising, I believe, the need for further guidance on some of these issues. An issue that has been raised with me is large, single-storey premises. New premises of that sort have to have sprinklers, but existing ones do not, and the responsible person might have to make a judgment about that. Guidance to encourage the use of sprinklers in those large buildings would be appreciated by the fire service. Firefighters are relevant persons, so this may be an issue of protecting them in the event of a fire.

Mr. Pike: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. It is indeed the reason we wanted to have this debate today. The Government and the Secretary of State will be able to consider the points made today before they make their proposals. My Committee will also consider any points raised; hopefully the Government will have addressed them. I am going to list the particular points that the Committee said we needed guidance on. My hon. Friend will find that the point she just raised is covered there. Her query is perfectly valid because these issues are important.

Everybody in this Room has the same objective: we want to reduce the risk of fire, and the risk of injury and loss of life as a result of fire as far as possible by taking necessary steps for protection. We have no difference with the Government, and this is not a political issue; we all have the same objective. It is just a matter of making sure that we get it right.

What are we asking of the Government? First, that the Secretary of State should be required to provide guidance to responsible persons and to enforcing authorities as to what the words "where necessary" mean in articles 13 and 14 of the draft order. That was one of the items. Secondly, that the draft order should be amended to provide that firefighters receive the protection provided by the order when they are on premises carrying out fire authority duties other than firefighting. That touches on one of the issues that my hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) was making. It is not just when they are dealing with a fire that they need protection; they must also be protected when they are doing other work.

Mr. Hammond: Will the hon. Gentleman clarify what he just said about when firefighters are doing other work? My understanding is that the Committee recommends that protection should be extended to firefighters when they are not fighting fires, but that it accepts that they should be excluded from the definition of relevant persons when they are fighting fires. Have I misunderstood that?

3.30 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

3.40 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Pike: A firefighter present at a fire is a relevant person, because a relevant person is any person who is lawfully on the premises or any person in the vicinity who is at risk from a fire. Therefore, if the firefighter is there fighting a fire, he is a relevant person; if he is there at any other time, doing fire prevention work or any other work, he is not covered. We believed that that was a loophole and that the protection should be extended. Certainly fire officers go into premises on many occasions when there is no fire. We do not want there to be a fire every time they are on a premises.

We also believed that the draft order should be amended to give a clearer definition of a place of safety. In the interests of clarity and to ensure that the underlying intention was properly carried into effect, we agreed that the draft order should be amended to place a duty on the Secretary of State to issue guidance to fire authorities on their enforcement of the order's provisions and to monitor their enforcement activity, allowing the Secretary of State to direct them in that activity.

I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) would have liked to take part in this debate, but he is involved in the Third Reading debate on the Railways Bill and cannot be with us. He submitted a great deal of evidence to the Committee and was particularly concerned that the Fire Precautions (Sub-surface Railway Stations) Regulations 1989, which implemented the recommendations of the Fennell report on the King's Cross fire disaster, should be retained in the order. I understand that the Government will respond to that concern positively, to ensure that no loophole exists that would allow a recommendation following that appalling tragedy not to be taken into account.

We also said that the application of the order to fire protection systems in houses in multiple occupation should be clarified. One of my hon. Friends asked about the latest legislation. As the Minister said, that point has already been taken into account. We also felt that the power to amend the principal provisions of the order by a subordinate provisions order should be subject to the affirmative procedure. That falls into line with one of the first points made in intervention by the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge, who said that we should have an opportunity to debate these matters. The negative procedure means that there is sometimes a chance that amendments to an order will not even be spotted or considered. However, that is for the Government to determine. Finally, the Committee thought that the Secretary of State should be placed under a statutory duty to issue guidance on the implementation and interpretation of the order.

I know that many hon. Members want to speak, so I shall bring my remarks to a close. These are important issues, and my Committee has no great argument with what the Government want to do because we all want to achieve the same objective. We gave the proposal thorough scrutiny and paid it a great deal of attention, and we made our proposals in a positive way. This debate is helping my Committee and the Government to come to a final decision on the proposals. There is concern that these proposals are not being implemented. At the end of the day, they would enhance people's safety. We would not want any tragic deaths or injuries to arise from undue delay in parliamentary procedure. Having said that, we have to scrutinise these issues properly and fairly.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I call the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond), I must respond to the concern expressed about how the House considers draft regulatory reform orders. I refer those hon. Members who are interested to Standing Order No. 18, which describes in detail the way that the House considers these matters. The House is grateful to the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) for giving direction earlier in his speech.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge) (Con): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall look forward to reading that this evening.

I welcome this debate, because it gives us an opportunity to review both the order and the Committee's report on it, as well as the wider issues of the Government's fire safety agenda. I congratulate the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) and, through him, the Committee on their excellent job. The report highlights the areas of a weighty, complicated draft order on which we need to focus.

We had a little exchange about the procedure earlier, and I am somewhat concerned by what I have heard. The hon. Member for Teignbridge (Richard Younger-Ross) suggested that there should be an artificial division in the Regulatory Reform Committee, but the solution is exactly the one that the Committee has adopted where a matter is complex and would bear some additional scrutiny by people who are particularly interested. Apart from myself and the hon. Gentleman, as Opposition spokesmen, we have other people in the Room who have specialist knowledge of, and interest in, aspects of fire safety. The Committee can ask the Government for a debate and ensure that, with a three-hour debate, we get more scrutiny by the House than we would have managed had this been an ordinary statutory instrument, when we would have got just 90 minutes. We may have ended up, via a tortuous route, with a rather elegant solution.

I intend to raise a few salient points about the Committee's report and the draft order, and then look more widely at the Government's approach to the broader issues of fire safety—always bearing it in mind that some of us will be in Standing Committee next week, covering the same ground again when we consider the draft national framework.

The draft order is entirely consistent with the Government's wider approach, moving from a prescriptive to a risk assessment-based approach. That is clearly focused on the safety of people rather than the protection of buildings, which is the traditional way of drafting fire regulations in this country. In scrapping fire certificates and imposing a general duty on responsible individuals to carry out risk assessments and act on them to ensure the safety of relevant persons, it is undoubtedly opening the way to ending an unnecessarily bureaucratic approach to fire safety, where things are done simply because they are in the rule book, even when they have no particular relevance to the situation in question. This will allow a more flexible and tailored response. I welcome that—it is the right way to go.

Reading the Committee's report, I detected that, in some cases, it is precisely the Government's more flexible approach that gives the Committee cause for concern. Broadly speaking, we support this move to a goal-based system. I note that it shifts the burden from one of inspection, which was a tick-box approach for building occupiers, to one of judgment, which is a much more onerous burden on occupiers. Looking at the burden that this imposes on business, we must be cognisant of the fact that calling the fire brigade to do a fire inspection and issue a certificate is an easy way to discharge a responsibility. The responsibility that is being imposed on building occupiers will be much more complex and continuous.

I suspect that, in practice, insurers will play a large part in the regime. They will obviously want to ensure that building occupiers are acting appropriately, both in terms of their liability should there be any deaths or injuries and in protecting the buildings themselves. Can the Minister tell us whether there has been any discussion with the insurance industry about its role and how it expects to interface proactively with building occupiers?

I will make two other points in passing. The first is that the measure is a centralising one. The order sweeps away many local Acts that impose local solutions, some of which are admittedly outdated, and imposes instead a uniform regime across the country. I will say nothing more on that point. The second is that I want to draw the Committee's attention to regulation 45, which requires local authorities to consult—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This is not a Committee. It is the complementary Chamber. It is "the House".

Mr. Hammond: I stand corrected, Mr. Deputy Speaker. When I am in Westminster Hall, I find it difficult to remember that it is the House. I find it even more difficult when we are at two removes from the main Chamber. However, I will do my best.

I draw the House's attention to regulation 45, which requires local authorities to consult fire and rescue authorities on building regulation applications. If the Minister speaks again, I would be interested to hear his comments on the issue. The regulation seems to cut across the thrust of the order, in that it is a form of certification, inviting the fire authority to consider the plans and tick the box to say that they comply. There is a danger that occupiers will feel that, having had that input from the fire authority as a statutory consultee, they are not required to go any further, the consultation having discharged their obligations. I am not a lawyer, but I suspect that, if a case came to court where the question was whether the building occupier had properly provided safety measures or precautions, the fact that the fire and rescue authority had signed off the safety measures as part of the local authority's procedure for building regulations might weigh heavily in the equation.

Jim Knight: I am trying to think through the hon. Gentleman's argument and ask him to dwell for a second on the difference between the fire authority approving the building regulations and its being consulted on them. As I understand it, the fire authority will be consulted by the local authority, not asked to approve the regulations.

Mr. Hammond: The hon. Gentleman is right, of course, but I suspect that many occupiers will take the view that, if the fire authority has been consulted and has no objection to the plans, that is tantamount to approval of those plans. I raise the issue because, reading the document for the first time, it struck me that that regulation went in the opposite direction to the Government's general thrust.

Richard Younger-Ross: I understand where the hon. Gentleman is coming from. There is an apparent contradiction, but is there not a difference between the construction regulation, which exists under building regulations, which are not being repealed as part of the order—and the professional advice and approval that is given to the person constructing that building to ensure that they comply with the regulations—and the running of that building on a day-to-day basis, including the assurance that staff can evacuate it safely? That would include the position of furniture, the closing of doors and so on.

Mr. Hammond: The hon. Gentleman is right. The point is that the regime should assess the risk and respond to it. This leftover from the existing regime goes the other way and is bound to be treated, as such things are, as meaning that a set of rules should be applied and that a set of drawings should be examined to see whether there are a certain number of exits and to check the distance from the furthest point to the stairwell.

Richard Younger-Ross: Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that the part B building regulations should be repealed?

Mr. Hammond: No, I am not suggesting that at all, but I understand that it is proposed that fire authorities should be consulted by local authorities. I simply make the point that, with the certification regime having been abolished, it is slightly odd for the fire authorities to have to comment on individual applications. That is not a point on which I wish to dwell, but something to which I wanted to draw the Committee's attention, to see whether anyone would pick up on it—and indeed they have.

Paragraph 104 of the Committee's report mounts quite a serious challenge to the Government's view that integrated risk management planning will deliver an effective enforcement regime. The Minister referred to that in his speech and the Committee will want to consider the issue when it deliberates on the order again. However, it is important to note that there are doubts about the effectiveness of IRMP in delivering the required enforcement regime.

The Committee suggests that the Secretary of State should be required to issue guidance and to monitor enforcement regimes. However, I would not advocate that route. We must be clear who is responsible for the discharge of a fire authority's statutory duties. Is it the fire authority or is it the Secretary of State? The Fire and Rescue Services Act 2004 already gives the Secretary of State pretty substantial powers of intervention. On many matters it is debatable whether the balance of responsibility for the discharge of functions has already gone too far. I would much prefer a regime in which legal responsibility and public accountability were clearly with the fire authorities. Authorities would be left to do what they have to do and would be held to account if they failed to discharge their duties.

I should also like to draw the Committee's attention to paragraph 77 of the report. The hon. Member for Burnley has already talked about provisions being made where necessary under articles 13 and 14. The Committee was concerned about a possible dilution of existing safety standards for equipment and buildings. Things that must currently be provided in every case would have to be provided only where necessary as a result of the risk assessment to provide the appropriate levels of safety.

I understand entirely where the Committee is coming from, but without the discretion that is being introduced we might as well have a prescriptive rule-based system, rather than a goal-based system. If there were a move to overlay the risk assessment-based system with a set of prescriptive rules that applied in every case, the balance of regulatory. burdens would change considerably. Occupiers of buildings would not only face many of the burdens that they already face—sometimes they are required to make provisions that are not necessary on a proper judgment of the risk—but would have to make and continually revise risk assessments, and do what they required.

Ms Drown: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's point. We want to make things as easy as possible for people who are charged with making establishments safe. Does he appreciate the point that people look to further guidance on these issues; otherwise, we have people up and down the country reinventing the wheel because they do not know exactly what some of the terms mean? Sometimes, that additional guidance is helpful.

Mr. Hammond: Yes, my next sentence was going to be that if there is guidance, it needs to have a very light touch. I am concerned to draw attention to the danger that starts with saying that we should scrap the prescriptive regime and introduce a case-sensitive, responsive regime. Then, we say, "Hang on a minute, we do not really want people not putting these fire doors in, or leaving these fire extinguishers out, so let us require them in be put in anyway—in every case". We will have piled burden upon burden, instead of stripping some of them away. It is very important that we do not fall into that trap.

Mr. Pike: Surely the hon. Gentleman realises, having read that section of the report—which he obviously has done—that it was based on the evidence of the chief fire officers and the FBU. I understand his concern, but the danger is not a lowering of standards which puts things at risk. This is a difficult place in which to draw the line.

Mr. Hammond: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is right, but with the greatest respect to the FBU and the Chief and Assistant Chief Fire Officers Association, I point out that their position is to say that they do not really care about a bit more of a burden on business—quite rightly, as their job is to look at these matters from a fire safety perspective. The FBU has a campaign for a target of zero fire deaths. If one were seriously to pursue such a target, huge additional burdens would need to be imposed. This is about balance. As is obvious from its very name, the hon. Gentleman's Committee must, when considering any legislation, have in the forefront of its mind the balance between the good that will come from it and the additional burdens that it will impose. In this case, the fact that a raft of prescriptive burdens is being removed is encouraging It may allow the new duties to be imposed with a reduction in the overall burden. However, if we go back and start reapplying some of those prescriptive rules, we will squander some of that benefit.

I would like the Minister to clarify firefighters' status as relevant persons. The hon. Member for Burnley gave an explanation in response to an intervention which, I have to say, was diametrically different from my understanding that firefighters are generally excluded from being relevant persons. The Committee's concern was that in certain circumstances, where firefighters are not fighting fires, they ought to have the same protection as any other relevant person in the building. However, the Committee accepted that the responsible person could not have the same duties to firefighters who were actively tackling a fire as to people who were in the building for other purposes. Could the Minister clarify that point?

Phil Hope: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right; the draft order was defective, in that firefighters were excluded whatever they were doing. The revised order has ensured that a firefighter will be protected as a relevant person, except when there to fight the fire. The draft order will be amended to remove that anomaly, and a firefighter will be treated as a relevant person when not engaged in emergency duties. They might be engaged in giving information, or something of that kind. I hope that helps the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Hammond: I am very grateful to the Minister. That does clarify the point and I thank him for it.

Ms Drown: Does the hon. Gentleman share my concern that this sends out a message that not everything could be done? Fleur Lombard was a firefighter who died in the Avon area, in a large single-storey premises. It was as a result of that fire that regulations were introduced to ensure that there were sprinklers in large retail premises. That will save firefighters' lives. They are worthy of us doing everything that we can to save them, as well as other people, including when they are fighting fires. Does he agree that we should do everything possible to protect their lives too?

Mr. Hammond: Of course, the hon. Lady is right. We should do everything that we can to protect firefighters' lives. The obligations of fire authorities under health and safety legislation are clearly directed at doing just that. It may be that such obligations would dictate that firefighters did not go into a building to try to extinguish a fire where lives were not at risk but property was, precisely because the building was not deemed safe to enter. However, it would be impossibly onerous to impose on occupiers of buildings a duty to ensure the safety of a person who had deliberately gone into a burning building to try to extinguish a fire. The regulation as the Minister has explained it is right. This outbreak of consensus is very disconcerting, and I cannot quite get used to it, but I am sure that we will find something to disagree on later.

[Mr. Hammond]

The Committee was concerned about the scrapping of the Fire Precautions (Sub-surface Railway Stations) Regulations 1989. The hon. Member for Burnley said that he understood that the Government were going to respond positively to that concern. That gives me slight cause for concern. I share concerns about sub-surface railway station safety, and I will say more about that. The regulations were introduced in response to a specific fire in a specific location, and sub-surface stations, like factories and offices, all have different characteristics. I hope that the Minister will assure us that, although the Government will retain some of the prescriptive regime, they will ensure that risk assessment overarches it, so that the different characteristics of different stations are taken into account.

Will the Minister also tell us what the Government are doing about firefighting in sub-surface stations during a chemical or biological situation? I understand that the chemical suits that the London fire brigade has are not compatible with its breathing apparatus, so the duration underground would be extremely short—20 minutes. If there were the unfortunate coincidence of a fire and a chemical or biological incident in an underground station, firefighters would be unlikely to get down to the scene, bearing it in mind that they would have to rely on non-mechanical means of transport, have any useful dwell-time down there and get back up again within that 20-minute resilience period. I am sure that the Minister is aware of that, and I know that the problem has arisen due to the incompatibility of equipment in the incident response units, but will he tell us what the Government are doing to ensure that the problem is resolved and firefighters are capable of dwelling at the scene of an underground fire with biological or chemical aspects?

I want to touch on an area that the hon. Member for Burnley did not mention directly: the extension of duties and obligations beyond responsible persons to third parties. The Committee concluded in paragraph 119 of its report that it was appropriate that third parties should be capable of prosecution if they failed to secure safety, and that raises a few questions. Under the existing regime, a court can order, for example, that the terms of a lease be varied to allow alterations to a building for fire safety purposes. The proposal under discussion states that without any intervention by the court, a third party could be vulnerable to prosecution for having failed to do something that another person requires to discharge their duties as a responsible person. I am sure that the example that the Committee and the Government have in mind is the landlord of a building. As I understand it, both the report and the order are silent on the question of cost.

How is the third party to recover the cost of complying with the requirements of the responsible person? In the case of a landlord, it might be thought that that was something he had to take on the chin—after all, he gets the rent. However, there could be cases in which the third party burdened with a requirement is not the landlord in receipt of rent. For example, many escape routes in buildings that were built in the 1950s and 1960s—I can think of one not too far away, just across the river—exit via escape routes in other buildings, or perhaps across roofs. I can envisage a situation where a responsible person, having carried out his risk assessment, determines that he needs works done on an adjoining building over which he has no control, and notifies the owner of those premises that such works must be carried out. Will the Minister confirm that such a situation is properly provided for with some kind of formal procedure, and that there is a means by which the third party can recover the cost of complying, or indeed any loss that he suffers if compliance with the requirements disadvantages his building? We will need that reassurance if we are to accept such a wide extension of the scope of the regulations.

The hon. Member for Burnley rightly anticipated the Opposition's support for the Committee's recommendation that the articles designated as so-called subordinate provisions, in which future changes can be made by delegated legislation, should be subject to the affirmative procedure rather than the negative one—although not, as he suggested, because we might miss them if they were negative resolutions. I assure him that we trawl the negative resolutions assiduously, but it is not always possible to secure a debate on matters subject to negative resolution. The affirmative procedure guarantees that there will be a debate.

In the Department's own explanatory memorandum, the power is mainly seen as enabling the Government to respond to changes coming from Brussels in the form of EU directives. Anything that weakened the power of Parliament to scrutinise measures affecting the lives and the safety of British people would be strongly resisted by hon. Members on this side of the House. The Minister shakes his head, but he will find that that is the view of many Members on both sides of the House, and of many people outside this place.

I was going to touch on sprinklers, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I see that there is greater knowledge on the subject among Labour Members, and I defer to that. If any issues remain outstanding when the hon. Members for South Dorset (Jim Knight) and for South Swindon (Ms Drown) have finished their contributions, I will try to raise them.

I have a specific question for the Minister regarding the order. I note that article 58 amends the Caravan Sites Act 1960. I do not have a copy of the Act to hand, but the amendment may be intended to remove the statutory separation distances between caravans which were originally imposed for fire protection purposes but have come to have a secondary purpose, in that they affect the way that residential caravan parks are laid out. I have a rather large number of residential caravans in my constituency, which may surprise some Members, and I would be interested if the Minister clarified that point.

I have set out the reasons why we support the order, in broad terms. It is a sensible measure, in line with the less prescriptive and more risk assessment-based approach. As long as policy is moving in that direction, and it is safety-driven, the Government will have our broad support on such matters, as they have had our broad support on the modernisation agenda. However, the Minister opened the debate by talking about issues well outside the regulatory reform order, such as the broader issues of the Government's fire safety agenda. He touched on some areas about which I am concerned and to which I shall return, as it is not obvious that the Government are moving in the right direction to improve fire safety.

Concerns have been expressed about IRMPs. I remind the House that they were at the heart of the modernisation approach that the Government espoused after the Bain report, during the firefighters' dispute of 2002–03. Modernisation was presented as the way to save money to meet the firefighters' pay settlement without reducing fire safety; indeed, fire safety was to be improved. On the face of it, that was a sensible proposal, but we are now in the second round of draft IRMPs, and I understand from the Minister for Local and Regional Government's response to parliamentary questions that, so far, no fire authorities have dropped the two, two, four shift pattern, although that was one of the economy measures at the heart of the modernisation programme, which was to deliver improvements.

I understand also that no fire authority has proposed in its draft IRMP 2, or in its IRMP 1 for that matter, the redeployment of fire appliances from one fire station to another at night. In the debates in the Chamber during the firefighters' dispute, an example given of a way to save money and improve services was that fire appliances based in business districts in the day would decamp with their crews at night to the outer suburbs where the risk is greater, but no such proposal has been made, according to the Minister for Local and Regional Government's answer to my parliamentary question.

I understand also that no beds have been removed from night-time manned fire stations, although one of the issues at the heart of the reorganisation of the fire service was to get away from the culture in which the night shift is all about sleeping rather than doing a normal turn of duty focused on community safety.

The public will need to be reassured that the modernisation proposals that will deliver the savings to pay for the firefighters' pay settlement will be delivered, because in many areas there is no sign of that happening yet. The Minister is well aware that in the absence of those savings there will be financial pressure on fire and rescue authorities. Clearly, when those authorities are working under serious financial pressures, they are not best placed to respond as they would like to Government exhortations to focus on improving safety and reducing deaths.

Phil Hope: The hon. Gentleman mentioned the funding of fire and rescue authorities. Does his party's proposal for £35 billion of cuts include an increase in funding for fire and rescue services?

Mr. Hammond: It certainly will not include any cuts in funding for fire and rescue services. I think that the Minister is referring to the James report. He will know that the savings that it identified could be made in local government, and we will encourage and assist local government in making them. Some of them were identified by Gershon and are definitely not double counted—the James report figures include the Gershon savings—and they will remain within local government for the improvement of front-end services, not sequestered by central Government. That is at the heart of the Minister's misunderstanding of how James went about his work.

Jim Knight: Is the hon. Gentleman saying that, in this case, the savings would be generated not by central Government, but within local government? In the context of IRMPs and asking fire authorities to make savings, the Government—and I think that the hon. Gentleman would support them in this—are not issuing a direction that fire authorities must do x, y or z. There may be guidance or examples of thinking that they want to move towards. He is not suggesting that there should be direction about exactly what should happen, so I am a bit confused about what he is proposing.

Mr. Hammond: I am simply noting that the key pillars of the modernisation policy have not been delivered yet—perhaps they will come. That may say something about management, unions or the way that the Government have managed and partially financed the process. However, if the hon. Gentleman reads the statements made in the House during the firefighters dispute, if he listens to what the Deputy Prime Minister and the Minister for Local and Regional Government said about modernisation and how it would change the operation of the fire service both to make firefighters' better paid and to improve fire safety, and if he checks the answers to parliamentary questions that I have received over the past couple of weeks, he will see that as yet those benefits have not been delivered.

It is for the Minister, not me, to say why that is the case. Hopefully, he can reassure us that in the next round—IRMP 3—we will start to see some of those savings coming through. Fire authorities will then be able to repay their transitional money, which they have no idea how they will repay at the moment because they are not getting any savings to enable them to do that.

In his opening remarks the Minister mentioned domestic accidental fire death targets with a great fanfare. He said that the target of a 20 per cent. reduction in fire deaths over the 11 years to 2010 will form the basis of a new public service agreement with the Treasury. That is good, but unfortunately the old public service agreement that the ODPM had with the Treasury had a target of reducing accidental fire deaths in the home by 20 per cent. over the five years to 2004—a target that the Government have lamentably failed to achieve. The Minister told me previously that the original target was being changed because it proved too difficult to meet. The Minister for Local and Regional Government told me on another occasion that changing a 20 per cent. reduction to be achieved by 2004 to a 20 per cent. reduction to be achieved by 2010 was not a relaxation of the target.

I will leave hon. Members to draw their own conclusions, but I would say to the Minister that the situation is difficult because the target lies at the heart of the debate. Everything that the Government are doing—moving to a people-centred rather than a building-centred system, and having a risk assessment-based system—is geared to saving lives. To have the Government at the same time significantly lower the target that they set themselves for reducing accidental fire deaths in dwellings sends out a very mixed signal.

The Minister mentioned arson. Those targets have been downgraded, too. The target in the 2005–06 draft framework was originally to achieve a 30 per cent. reduction in deliberately set fires by March 2009. That target has now become a 10 per cent. reduction in deliberately set fires by March 2010. That is relaxation on a pretty massive scale. I have had an exchange about that with this Minister and with the Minister for Local and Regional Government. The latter told me quite clearly that the reason for the reduction in the target was

"the huge increase in the number of abandoned vehicles, which is the main factor behind the rise in the number of arson incidents."—[Official Report, 26 January 2004; Vol. 417, c. 49.]

However, the Government's own arson control forum document says that in 2003 there was a 9 per cent. fall in the number of deliberate vehicle fires. It is not clear to me that an increase in deliberate vehicle fires is the reason that the Government have had to relax their arson targets. I would be grateful if the Minister tried to square what his colleague told me last January with what the ODPM arson control document says.

Jim Knight: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. Gentleman again, because I would love to hear his conclusion, but does he think that the target should be tightened and made tougher or, like his colleagues in the shadow health team, does he not believe in targets?

Mr. Hammond: I am happy to set targets, if that is the way that the Government assess it is best to work. However, there is no point them setting a target if they say to the House a couple of years later that it is too difficult to achieve so they have downgraded or dropped it. To change the target that is at the heart of the fire reform modernisation programme seems to send a mixed message about the Government's commitment to fire safety as the key driver in that agenda.

I also want to say something about regional management boards and regional fire control rooms, which were raised by the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew). There is a considerable degree of scepticism among members of fire and rescue authorities and among the public at large about whether reducing the number of fire control rooms from 49 to just nine to cover England is about improving safety. That project is progressing under great secrecy. The Minister has said again today that he cannot give details about the procurement project because it is commercially confidential.

Phil Hope: That is true.

Mr. Hammond: Well, the Minister says it is true, but on the one hand we have the Freedom of Information Act, while on the other we have the increased use of public-private partnerships, in which everything that happens is commercially confidential, so we cannot find out what is going on. Fire and rescue authorities cannot find out what the project is going to cost and they do not know what their ongoing revenue costs will be. There is a blight on their ability to plan, a blight on staff morale, and a real danger that between now and 2007 some authorities will find it very difficult to recruit or retain the staff that they need.

The Government have been told in no uncertain terms in the only place where they have asked the question that there is no appetite for regional government in this country. They should now abandon the plan to reorganise the fire service on the lines of the Government offices for the regions. We have no objection at all to fire authorities co-operating and working together collaboratively, but that must be in units that make sense in operational terms, not in arbitrary Government office regions.

I end by asking the Minister a specific question about dual fuel vehicles. I was sent some information about an incident that occurred in Norfolk—I am sure that he is aware of this case—where firefighters arrived at the scene of a vehicle fire and, fortunately, were advised by the driver, who was present and conscious, that the vehicle was fitted with dual fuel. They retired just in time to be at a safe distance when it exploded. No markings are required on dual fuel vehicles, of which the Government now operate a fleet.

Will the Minister give the Committee two assurances? First, will he see whether there is a need for visible marking on dual fuel vehicles to protect firefighters at the scene of a fire? Secondly, if there is such a need, will the Government lead by example in the interim before such marking can be mandated and ensure that their fleet of dual fuel vehicles is appropriately marked?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I call the next speaker, I point out that we have approximately an hour and a quarter left in this debate. I believe that the House would wish the Minister to have 10 minutes to reply to the debate. We have not even run out, as it were, of Front Benchers at this stage. Hon. Members should bear that in mind when they address the House.

4.30 pm

Ms Oona King (Bethnal Green and Bow) (Lab): This debate is extremely important and I am pleased that the Government have chosen to initiate it. In fact, it is such an important issue, I am surprised that it is only Labour Back-Bench MPs who have bothered to turn up to debate it.

I must report to the Minister that my constituents in Tower Hamlets are extremely concerned about fire safety. Those fears are the result of proposals to move one of two fire engines from Bethnal Green to outer London. It is natural that many residents have concluded that their protection from fire risk has been halved. For a variety of reasons, that is not the case, not least because in Tower Hamlets we have the best response times of any borough in London. None the less, there is the risk that fire protection may be reduced, and that is what I am here to talk about.

I place my remarks in the context of the Government's key proposal for fire safety, which is to move towards a risk-based approach. That means that fire resources must take account of communities that are most at risk, and it means moving away from using resources for the protection of buildings, for example, if those same resources could protect people instead. Most people would think that that is common sense, and I do not disagree. What I disagree with, and what my constituents are wholly opposed to, is the idea that fire safety in one residential part of London—Bethnal Green—might be reduced to increase fire safety in another residential part of London—Surbiton.

I shall use this opportunity to explain to the Minister the grave concerns of my constituents, and add some more general comments about the new measures the Government are implementing nationally to make people safer in their homes and to raise the protection of firefighters.

I begin with the new requirement for authorities to draw up community safety plans based on risk assessment. I understand the need for the London Fire and Emergency Planning Authority to review fire risks in London. I understand that it wishes to redeploy its available resources as efficiently as possible to give greatest protection to the greatest number of people. However, I strongly disagree that redeployment—removal—of a fire engine from Bethnal Green will secure that aim. The draft London safety plan states:

"We believe one of the most important things for us to do is to identify more accurately where people are most at risk and use this information as a basis to plan our work".

Everything the authority has done and all the information it has gathered showing where people are most at risk builds up a profile of a constituency that almost exactly fits the description of Bethnal Green specifically, and Tower Hamlets more generally.

Tower Hamlets has more fires than any other borough. Bethnal Green station is one of the borough's busiest and Tower Hamlets fire station responds to more emergency calls than any other borough in London. Of all deaths in fires, 62 per cent. occur in flats and Tower Hamlets has a high number of high-rise flats. My hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) will outline some of the statistics relating to disadvantaged communities, but the LFEPA recognises that deprived communities and those with high levels of social housing are exposed to the greatest fire risk.

Tower Hamlets has a larger proportion of residents living in social housing than any other London borough, and it is also the most deprived borough in London. I am delighted that the Government committed themselves to spend so much money when they announced £25 million in capital grants to English fire and rescue authorities to target disadvantaged homes to ensure that they have fire alarms and better protection from fire.

However, the aspect of the plan that concerns me most is that fighting fire in high-rise blocks is very different from firefighting in ground floor properties. One only has to ask the firefighters to learn that. It requires an element of common sense. When people arrive at the scene of the fire, they can obtain water immediately to tackle the fire at ground level. It stands to reason that that will be easier and quicker than trying to access someone on the 17th floor of a tower block. Given the extra staffing levels required to reach a fire in a high-rise block, the arrival of the first fire engine does not necessarily mean that firefighters can reach the point of entry and deal with the fire.

The draft London safety plan states that it is possible to improve the attendance time of the second fire engine in some areas by slowing it down in others, but information is lacking about the fact that people in high-rise blocks already have to wait longer for fire crews to arrive at their front doors. That is the specific point that I make in my submission responding to the LFEPA's consultation. It hinges on the levels of fire and risk in Tower Hamlets associated with the density of the population and the extra fire risk of living in high-rise blocks. It is also difficult to gain access to high-rise blocks. As anyone who has tried to find their way into an estate in Tower Hamlets will know, it is incredibly difficult to get there. Ordinary road layouts do not present the same problems for firefighters.

I understand that the Minister must delegate safety plans to local authorities, which know their local areas. I am sure that it is recognised that the people who know the local area best are local residents and local firefighters. Those people need to be satisfied that their legitimate and genuine concerns, which I share, have been fully considered.

I therefore request, as I did in my submission, detailed work on the risks associated with fire in flats and high-rise flats in particular. That should cover engine-to-fire response times for high-rise flats and the effect of increased response times for the second engine on whether enough firefighters can reach fires on high floors with the right equipment. The point is to assess the subsequent impact on risk to life.

In my view, the full impact of the proposal to remove the second pump from Bethnal Green cannot be quantified without more detailed research. I therefore ask that no decision to remove the engine should be taken before the research findings are known, analysed and made available to local residents and firefighters. I ask the Minister to give that serious consideration, because nothing could be more serious to local residents.

I want to mention the protection of firefighters and to raise their inclusion in the definition of persons protected under the draft order. The issue has been raised already, so I shall not go into it in any detail. I welcome the Government's positive response to the request of the Fire Brigades Union and others. However, firefighters risk their lives whenever they go into a burning building. As my hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) pointed out, there is a need to consider legal protection for firefighters whether they are at work in a firefighting role or not.

As to wider fire safety measures, among other things, the Fire and Rescue Services Act 2004 puts community safety at the heart of what the fire brigade does. I welcome the fact that local fire authorities are receiving new money and extra money from the Government to promote fire prevention measures, whether they bring about an increase in the use of smoke alarms in disadvantaged households or improve community education, so that communities can increase their protection.

Arson is an important issue in areas such as Bethnal Green. The Government's target of reducing deliberate fires by 10 per cent. by 2010 is welcome, as are the new powers that they are discussing to permit the removal of cars with no value. Most cars that are set on fire fall into that category.

My final comment is that nowhere is the fire services' wider role as the guardians of community safety better illustrated than in Tower Hamlets. They do a fantastic job and deserve our thanks. One way to thank them would be to consider my request seriously.

4.40 pm

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): It is appropriate that I should follow the hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Bow (Ms King), because my father was an auxiliary fireman between 1939 and 1945, and I understand that he was based at the Bethnal Green fire station. I was brought up with stories of Bethnal Green and east London, as well as of firefighters' hard work and the risks that they took, particularly during the war and the blitz. That always gave me a respect for the fire and rescue service. The service is of a very high standard and has a very good record.

The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) spoke about who was in charge at fires and about the risks faced by property owners in terms of their duty towards firefighters. There are two reasons why there are very few deaths on the job among British firefighters. First, we have some of the highest fire safety standards in the world; indeed, in the past, we have had the highest standard in the world. Secondly, there is the level of training in the fire service and the skill of the officer in command in determining whether a firefighter can go into a building. I understand that the injury rate for firemen in the UK is second to none.

I note the point that you made earlier, Mr. Deputy Speaker, about time, and I can assure you that I shall be briefer than the official Opposition spokesman. Of course, some of those who sat on the Committee that considered the Fire and Rescue Services Bill might say that that does not necessarily mean a lot, but I shall try to keep my remarks fairly brief. I am aware, of course, that there is a chance of a vote before or at 5 o'clock.

I want to start by going in the reverse direction from the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge and making some general comments before tackling the nub—the reform of existing legislation. Fire safety awareness starts at a young age, because it starts with education. When we were small children, most of us will have had some fascination with fire. It might have been a fascination with candles—perhaps with shaping the tops of them—or with seeing what burns in a corner of the garden.

When I was 14, we made Airfix models of fighter planes from the second world war. We would set fire to the tip of one wing, put a string on the other and whirl the plane round, with bits of black plastic flying off in all directions. We never managed to set fire to anything, but we made a black mess in quite a few places. Children have a fascination with fire, so it is important that, in talking about fire safety, we should also talk about education.

The Government have a number of very good initiatives, which the Minister outlined earlier. The ODPM website is full of fascinating facts and details—

Mr. Hammond: If you can get on to it.

Richard Younger-Ross: I had no difficulty getting on to it; the computers in the Library work wonderfully. I did not manage to explore all of it, because life is short and I have other duties. However, I wanted to look at the design and engineering section. I thought that it would be fascinating and that I could look at sprinklers and stuff about design and fire engineering. Sadly, there was only one entry—the national anthropometry survey of female firefighters. I suspect that the design, safety and engineering section needs a little adding to it, although I am not saying that the survey is not important. It is an issue and it is good to know that the ODPM is taking seriously the need for appropriate equipment for female firefighters.

A number of pages on the site give good safety tips. As time is short, I will not go through all of them. There is a list of the top 10 safety tips. All the different sections about fire safety need to be made widely available. I hope that there will be a programme and that the Government will consider how to spread the good word on fire safety.

I talked about children. When searching the internet, I came across one site called "Kids Fire Safety Tips". When I first looked at it, I thought that it would be a very interesting and exciting site. It could be developed and give some thought to the Minister. It is a website that kids log on to. It has wonderful things on it—Buzzy the Smoke Detector, Reddy the Fire Extinguisher, Squirt the Water Drop and others. It goes on for a number of pages. It is, in part, interactive. If we are to engage young children, we need to find things that they can relate to. The internet is one thing on which they can interact with issues to do with fire safety and which could be used as a tool for parents and teachers of younger children in schools.

Continuing that theme, I also found that in the US—perhaps there are some here, although I am not sure; the Minister may correct me—they do fire demonstrations on portable homes. One site from Dubuque—wherever that is—in the US says:

"Many children have a fascination with fire. A lot of adults do, too. But firefighters say that children need to be taught at an early age about fire safety, and parents should learn along with them."

Another site is about Rosenberg city council's fire marshal, Robert Brown. It says that

"his dream is expected to become a reality. Rosenberg City Council recently authorised building and buying a portable fire safety house, which is used to teach young people about home and fire safety."

I am not asking the Minister to respond to that point today, but perhaps at another time he could consider whether we could explore that sort of education programme to ensure that children's fascination does not lead to fire.

I also looked at internet sites on the south-west. One would expect that one of the greatest educators about fire safety would be the experience of fire. I was horrified to find that that is not always the case. That highlights the task that may lie ahead. One internet site dealt with

"Incidence and Perceived Risk of Fire"

It said that respondents in the south-west brigade district

"were the most likely to have ever experienced fire when compared to all other Brigade Districts, with some 23 per cent. of respondents ever having experienced a fire".

That is compared to 15 per cent. of the total national sample. It continues:

"Perhaps unsurprisingly, perception of possible risk of fire in the future was also slightly higher than average . . . Whilst claimed knowledge levels of possible causes of all types of fire was comparable to the total sample, respondents in the SWBD were considerably less likely than the total sample to carry out any action to reduce the risk of fire at night."

It is worrying that those people, nearly one in four of whom had experienced a fire, should take less care to ensure that they are safe at night. That issue needs to be addressed.

I will touch on an issue that the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge mentioned—fire trends. Sadly, the ODPM website does not have the same amount of data that the Minister has at his fingertips. The campaigns are working. We have talked about the reduction in arson over a period in the past year. However, although a lot of work has been done on accidental fires, the figures on the ODPM website on malicious fires for road vehicles show that, between 1991 and 2001, their number doubled. Indeed, the doubling has occurred almost since 1997: the figures rose from 39,000 in 1991 to 79,000 in 2001, but they were only at 42,000 in 1997.

That chart shows an increase in the number of malicious fires in dwellings, in other buildings and outdoors. That could partially be explained by what the Strathclyde fire authority told me when I visited. Youths are not only setting fires but setting them deliberately to ambush the fire engine when it arrives. They will set them up in a narrow place and then physically attack the fire engine. We can talk about fire safety and review all the regulation in the world but, unless we can tackle that increase in crime, much of it will be to no avail. Unless we are able to tackle attacks on fire crews, the recruitment of firefighters will not be sustained.

Jim Knight: There is a point that I am compelled to make. I accept what the hon. Gentleman says about Strathclyde, but firefighters are generally highly trusted public servants, particularly in areas of deprivation and among disaffected people. I commend to him the work of the Cheshire fire authority, which has an active young people's organisation delivering messages not only about fire, but antisocial behaviour. That work is positive and it has a positive potential for fire authorities, particularly given the change in emphasis towards community fire safety.

Richard Younger-Ross: I take the point, and I am sure that the work of the Cheshire fire authority is as the hon. Gentleman says. Many other fire authorities are the same. Devon has cut arson successfully. Having been able to secure funding, it would like more funding. Hint—please continue that funding, so that it can continue that work.

If we consider the consequences of arson, we are looking at 100,000 fires a year, 100 deaths a year, 2,500 injuries and a total cost to society, according to the reports that we have been given, of £2 billion. I appreciate that the Government are tackling that problem and we would support them to reduce it further.

We have heard about the general aims of regulatory reform. I will not repeat what the Deputy Prime Minister said, because it has been well laid out by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike). My background is in architecture, and I used to have to wade through a plethora of different fire regulations, depending on which building I was working on, to find the right set of regulations for the design of that building. The regulations did not all marry up: the standards for some buildings could be slightly different from those for others.

Therefore, we welcome the work to reduce some of those regulations to one document, which will be a reference point. However, I am not sure that we go far enough and I urge the Select Committee to do more in the regulatory review. Perhaps at a later date, if it can bear to come back to fire again, it will consider what other regulations we can bring together.

The order deals mainly with non-domestic regulation, but domestic regulation should also be considered. We have passed regulations in respect of the Housing Act 2004, there are the building regulations and there are other regulations relating to the design of buildings, which can be conflicting and confusing to designers. It is partly because of that possible confusion that I disagree fundamentally with what the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge said about consulting the fire brigade on applications under building regulations.

I used to work in an architect's office as an architectural assistant. When I took the drawings into the building control, it would look at the regulations. The matter would then be referred on. For some buildings, there would be another meeting with the fire officer.

It is not, as was described earlier, a question of following rigid rules. Fire officers have rules, but they also have a lot of common sense and flexibility in applying regulations. One of the curses of architects, particularly in London, was that they would go to see a fire officer one week, the officer would then change and they would be told that the designs that they drew up no longer applied. Fire officers are experts and can help an architect to structure the building to ensure that it is safe when it is inhabited. That is different from the maintenance of the building, which I understand is largely dealt with by the current regulatory review.

I have several concerns. One is the removal of certification. It sounds straightforward and we have been given figures. We are told that, if certification is removed, it will save business £137 million a year, or whatever it may be. I wonder whether the figures stack up and whether we have considered the actual cost to business of the removal of certification.

When the certificate is ready, the fire officer comes and looks at the building and one knows that the building complies. The certificate says that there is the right number of fire doors and the right fire extinguishers in the right place. One can discuss options with the fire officer. Again, as I said, fire officers are flexible. It is not all written down in black and white. On occasions, they will listen to alternatives.

If we want to train or increase the level of training of people in business, particularly small businesses, so that they have a better understanding of the risk of fire and the same level of knowledge of their building as the fire officer, we will put a heavy time and training burden on them. Small and medium-sized businesses have the greatest difficulty in undertaking risk assessment on health and safety and other aspects. Often they can achieve that only by bringing in experts to advise them, and such people often cost a great deal of money, in many cases more than the fire certificate would have cost in the first place.

[Richard Younger-Ross]

Therefore, I ask the Select Committee, in its second tranche, to talk to small businesses again and to ascertain whether the removal of certification is a saving or could be a burden. It sounds good, but I wonder whether the Committee has considered it fully.

Mr. Hammond: Just to be clear, are the Liberal Democrats opposed to moving to a goal-based system rather than the present prescriptive set of rules?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Teignbridge (Richard Younger-Ross) will have some time to think of an answer to that intervention, as there is another Division in the House.

5.1 pm

Sitting suspended for Divisions in the House.

5.24 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Pike rose—

Richard Younger-Ross: I give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Pike: Before the suspension, we were looking at whether my Committee would look closely at one or two points at the second stage. There are two things that I have to make clear. The Government must decide what to do with the order, taking into account any last-minute thoughts that they might have arising from this debate. We can take into account what has been said and anything else, but we have only one decision to make. Either we approve it, or reject it. We cannot amend it. I would like the hon. Gentleman to be clear on that.

I need to correct something I said earlier. I am a supporter of the programming of legislation in this House, and I inadvertently gave the wrong time. If the Committee divides on a proposal, the debate is an hour and a half. If the Committee rejects, and the Government go ahead, it is three hours.

Richard Younger-Ross: To save time, I accepted the second intervention. I shall answer both points at the same time.

The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge asked about onus-based legislation. On general principle, I accept that we should move to onus-based legislation. I was briefly trying to test whether the onus-based approach is entirely the right way forward—whether the whole onus should be on the employers, rather than having a system where there is a certificate that still places an onus on businesses to take charge of the evacuation of their buildings under the Fire Precautions (Workplace) Regulations 1997. The European legislation referred to earlier is also onus-based and puts responsibility on the employers. I am not saying that that responsibility and onus on employers should not be there.

I need to correct my own figures on cost savings. I had two wildly different figures in front of me and the Minister might, with some prompting, be able to say which one is correct. The figure I gave was a third, entirely spurious, figure. The business savings are estimated, according to the debate note that we were given, at £1.7 billion. However, the previous note I read, which comes from the Health and Safety Bulletin, estimates it at £1.65 million. Whether it is the million or the billion, however, I come back to whether the cost saving is adequate. It is a large factor, and if it is the billion, it is far easier to justify. The figure I originally saw was the million, and it was that which led me to question whether the saving would not actually be outdone by the extra burden of the onus-based regulation.

I thank the hon. Member for Burnley for his clarification in the second intervention. It is obviously sad that we do not have in this debate an opportunity to amend the legislation. Perhaps the Minister will take note of that, look at what is being said today, and ask the Department and the civil servants responsible for this legislation to research those figures, so that he is sure in his own mind that the measure will achieve what it says. That is the main purpose of my questioning.

I promised that I would be brief, and I will not go into a lot of detail on the other issues I was going to address. I make a brief point about sprinklers, however. The Minister referred to building bulletin 100 earlier and he used the term "best practice" in respect of sprinklers in schools. I hope—perhaps this is the prescriptive part of me—that we could legislate through the building regulations to ensure that there were sprinklers in schools. Not only does that have the potential to save life, but it will save property. From what the hon. Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) was saying earlier, it is seen by the private finance initiatives as a way of saving money, because of the insurance costs saved by putting sprinklers in.

I would go further than schools, though. We have to look at houses in multiple occupation, residential care homes and new build, and we should consider the practicality and costs being borne for retrospective fitting in some circumstances.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I advise the House that two further Members are seeking to catch my eye, and I will seek to call them both prior to the Minister winding up.

5.30 pm

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): I will attempt to be brief. I welcome the regulatory reform order for the way it pulls together so much earlier legislation, which, in many instances, pointed in different directions depending on which part of what legislation one read. The Fire Safety Advisory Board, the Regulatory Reform Committee and the ODPM should all be congratulated on the work that they did in pulling all those Acts together. As memory serves, the proposal did not surface during the course of the firefighters' dispute; there has been a suggestion that it did, but that is not borne out by the facts.

During my brief but astounding period as fire services' Minister, there was substantial debate about whether there should be a fire services Act, or whether it was possible to pull together all the legislation through regulatory reform orders. A number of people believed that it was not possible to move forward without primary legislation, and that the regulatory reform route would not work. What we see before us today demonstrates that that honestly held belief was not well founded. Not only does the regulatory reform method appear to have worked well, but it has had the added benefit of delivering succinct and compact new legislation. Fire legislation ought to be as much about fire prevention as about putting out fires. It is important that both the fire service and the legislation are moving in that direction.

With regard to the principle of risk assessment embodied in the order, I was enlightened a little while ago by the fact that, although the exact locations of accidental fires are not predictable, one can predict roughly where they will occur and, sadly, the groups of people who will be affected. For example, the likelihood of dying in a domestic fire is five times higher for those who are 80 years or older than for those in the 30–59 age group. One might say it is also a class issue because children in the lower social classes have a death rate no less than 16 times higher than those from the higher social classes. People in the poorest 10 per cent. of electoral wards are five times more likely to be injured by fires than those in the richest 10 per cent. It is therefore possible not only generally to assess risk, but to say what we ought to do significantly to increase protection for those groups whom we know to be at a greater risk from fire.

I shall quote one or two reports that have appeared in a paper in my part of the world over recent months and years. One headline says "House Blaze Kills Pensioner", and goes on to explain that the incident occurred

"after the smoke alarm failed to go off."

Another headline reads "Garment on heater sparks fire in flat", and tells of how a family had to evacuate a Gosport flat. Another article reports that a pensioner from West End, near Southampton, "took a bedtime sedative" and did not hear the smoke alarm going off. Yet another report says that two wheelchair-bound pensioners—a 91-year-old man and an 89-year-old man—died in a fire at a nursing home. Another relates how a housebound person receiving meals on wheels died in a house fire. Another headline reads "Pensioner's body blocked out rescuers". That person, also wheelchair-bound, collapsed in the back door of her blazing home in Woolston in Southampton, meaning that rescuers were unable to open her door.

I do not mention those terrible accidents with any sense of pleasure. Each was an individual tragedy, but each demonstrates the veracity of the fact that risk assessment can show where fire services should be engaged and what they should be doing in addition to putting out fires, in terms of the new roles set out in the order.

In that context, it is particularly important to consider homes where a number of people are living together, whether they be residential homes, care homes or houses in multiple occupation, of which Southampton has a substantial number. I draw hon. Members' attention to the read-across that the order has with the Housing Act 2004. In an earlier intervention I mentioned the definitions in that Act, and the need to ensure that the read-across was as accurate as possible.

That read-across, which can be used increasingly to ensure that a proactive fire safety regime for HMOs is in place, will deal with a high-risk group of people. We all know from experience how vulnerable such people are, either because of the way they live or, unfortunately, because the houses are not fully safe for such numbers. On HMOs, section 10(2) of the Act says:

"Before taking the enforcement action in question, the authority must consult the fire and rescue authority".

Conversely, assuming that the definition is absolutely right, the order requires that the fire authority consult the local authority. That will be important when we come to move forward.

The other point related to the Act is that the definition of an HMO has been expanded to include houses where students live, which were previously defined as single households. Given the conditions in which many students live, they are, I am afraid, another high-risk group. The Act also requires local authorities to set out licensing for HMOs with more than two storeys and five or more people living in them. In areas of high housing pressure local authorities may undertake full licensing of all HMOs, even if they fall outside that definition.

Those two definitions cover precisely the categories that I mentioned as having a high fire risk. It is important that, as local authorities introduce their licensing, the read-across of the new regulatory reform order into the implementation of the Housing Act is carried out, and proactive fire safety for HMOs can be undertaken as part of that. Since a number of local authorities will, for the first time, have a full and accurate picture of HMOs, it would be an omission not to follow that up by ensuring that the fire and safety regulations in those HMOs are applied in full.

Finally, I add that if a landlord consistently failed in their proper duty—running an HMO in a reasonable manner—the local authority could use its power to remove their licence to run such a house. I would include in "a reasonable manner" the risk at which some landlords are putting their tenants—of being injured or, in some tragic cases, dying—as a result of the way that a house is maintained.

I welcome the regulatory reform order, which marks an important new stage in the way that the fire service operates. I look forward to this positive way of saving an appreciable and increasing number of lives, as a result of fires not breaking out at all, rather than because firefighters are rushing to rescue people who have been engulfed in fires after a failure to take preventive action—once it is too late.

5.43 pm

Jim Knight (South Dorset) (Lab): I draw the House's attention to my entry in the register as a director of the Fire Protection Association. I have various other non-registrable interests in fire safety which can be accessed via my website at www.jimknightmp.com, since I have been interested in this subject for a considerable time. Principally, this was after learning—a number of years before I came into Parliament—that most fire deaths were preventable through the use of fire sprinklers. My interest in sprinklers has largely drawn me into what I fear many colleagues in the House regard as a slightly dry cul-de-sac.

[Jim Knight]

I welcome the regulatory reform order; despite the reluctance of the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) to praise it, the debate has shown that we all agree that this is a good move. Something that replaces 60 separate pieces of legislation with a single document must be welcome. I note that the debate pack that the Library, with its usual assiduousness, produced for us, describes that legislation as being the result of the piecemeal response to tragic accidents. In many ways it is my desire to move away from what I would describe as stable-door legislation—that which responds to tragedies—which makes this debate important to me.

My interest had, happily, not been informed by personal tragedy, or even constituents' tragedy, but that changed at the end of October last year when Laura Meadows, aged six, and her aunt Mary Meadows, aged 13, died in a house fire in my constituency. Four days later another constituent died as the result of an accident with an electric blanket. The previous year, Dorset had had only four fire deaths, and suddenly within a week there were three in my constituency.

I saw the effect that those deaths had not only on the families but on the communities involved. It raised a number of additional questions, which I will touch on if I have time. In essence, none of those three deaths would have occurred had the houses in question had sprinklers. I am working with housing providers in my constituency to see how we can encourage the greater use of sprinklers in domestic premises. Smoke alarms are very important, and I agree that it is important that they are hard-wired, and that people check their batteries where they are not hard-wired. In some cases, they give people more time than sprinklers. However, in most cases having an automated firefighter on the premises is the most effective way of dealing with a fire.

I do not want to say that passive fire protection such as fire doors and fire walls does not have its place; it certainly does. However, we should be focusing on sprinklers when it comes to fire safety. My hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) read out a series of press stories about the tragedies caused by fire. I occasionally come across a press story that talks about the success of sprinklers. There was one such story in Swansea in autumn last year, where lives were saved as a result of sprinklers being installed by a housing provider.

Richard Younger-Ross: The hon. Gentleman said that he did not want to pass over the role of passive protection. However, one of the problems with passive fire protection such as fire doors in houses is that home owners prop them open. As soon as the kitchen door is propped open, a fire, once started, will spread rapidly through the house. Education can help to alleviate that, but such actions will always be human nature.

Jim Knight: The hon. Gentleman is right. We have to try to understand human nature in such cases. That was certainly the case in the tragic Rhode Island nightclub fire a year or two ago: many of the deaths were caused by the crush of people trying to get out of the premises by the way that they had come in rather than by the fire exits. Again, human behaviour had not been properly accounted for.

The Government have an increasingly good record in this area. I was a member of the Standing Committee on the Fire Services Bill; I supported that, and I support the approach of integrated risk management plans. Moving to a risk-based system will result in a better deployment of resources, and it appears to be developing new roles for firefighters.

In Weymouth, firefighters are now knocking door to door to talk to residents about fire safety and to check whether they have alarms installed. I know of one circumstance in which a firefighter refused to leave an elderly person's premises until the housing association, which was the landlord, had come to the house and sorted out the problem with the smoke alarm which so alarmed him. That is positive and I hope that we will further develop that risk-based approach in the revision of part B of the building regulations by insisting on sprinklers where possible in high-risk properties such as high-rise flats, residential homes and so on. I look forward to being delighted when that is published in the spring.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) mentioned the requirement for sprinklers to be installed in retail premises over 2,000 sq ft, which was included in the building regulations in 2000. That was to be commended. I was also pleased that the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, as part of the Labour party's national policy forum, agreed that we should encourage the use of sprinklers in heritage buildings. The need was pointed out last weekend by the Northumberland fire, which took place largely in the roof. It is possible to put in sprinkler systems to prevent that sort of thing happening and to protect our national heritage.

It is time to go further. A number of myths about sprinklers exist. I have entertained the House before by talking about those: they cause water damage; they accidentally go off; they all go off at once; they are obtrusive; and they leak. Recently, an issue was made out of whether the piping might leak. An issue was also made out of the idea that the water pressure would not be right, but we managed to resolve that matter with the water industry. I will not further delay the House by dealing with those myths individually, but I will say that the debate pack includes a useful rebuttal.

One of the key problems is cost. The ODPM's analysis says clearly that the cost-benefit analysis has been done, which means that many domestic premises do not pass the test. For that reason a challenge has been issued—led by the broadcaster Nick Ross—to the industry to produce cheaper sprinkler systems, and I am optimistic that it will produce a better response. We already have one installer in Rochdale who can do new premises for under £1,000. I think that we can halve that if we take an imaginative approach to the British standard which is used in this case.

Ms Drown: Does my hon. Friend think it strange that people might consider spending £1,000 extra on carpets for their new-build home but they would not consider spending that on sprinklers? This is part of the challenge that we need to address. There may be a case for piloting different schemes and perhaps having sprinklers only in the key at-risk rooms. Will my hon. Friend join me in pressing the Minister to consider getting more people to think about the issue so that more sprinklers are installed?

Perhaps the situation will be similar to that with digital hearing aids, which initially cost the NHS thousands of pounds, until it said that it would provide them in every area. The use then went up by so much that the cost dropped right down, and the product became something that was available to everyone.

Jim Knight: I agree with my hon. Friend. There is a place for piloting, particularly in respect of retro-fitting. It is a difficult area. Few people would argue that all domestic properties should be retro-fitted at a stroke—that would fall on the wrong side of any cost-benefit analysis—but there may be ways of piloting measures in order to accelerate the roll-out.

There are economic savings to be made, on rebuild costs and on insurance, if the insurance industry wants to go there. There are also environmental savings from fire prevention which are not measured. There are design freedoms that can be gained from the installation of sprinklers to make buildings more practical and enjoyable for those who use them.

Richard Younger-Ross rose—

Jim Knight: I am mindful of the time so I will resist the temptation to give way again.

What is the Department doing to continue to assess the efficacy of sprinklers and the cost-benefit analysis of their use? I say to others—the water industry, housing providers, householders, the fire safety industry and insurance companies—that we can come together, as indeed many do, in the National Fire Sprinkler Network. If we know that there is a will on the part of Government to move on this matter, we can accelerate the welcome trend in the reduction of fire deaths.

Phil Hope: I am not sure whether time permits me to complete my winding-up speech before a possible vote in the main Chamber but I do not wish to diminish all of the contributions by rushing through. We have had a wide-ranging debate, covering many aspects of fire safety, which I am pleased about.

It is good to see so many Labour Members interested in this important issue. Many have spoken with a great deal of passion and commitment, citing examples from their constituencies of individuals or families who have been touched by the tragedy of a death or injury from fire. I am reminded of the conversations that I have had with leading members of the fire rescue services across the country that fire is one of the most devastating types of injury. It is not possible to recover from a fire injury in the way that it is possible to get over something like a broken leg. The injury is so profound that it lasts a lifetime, and if one gets burnt when one is young a series of skin grafts looms ahead over the years.

This is an issue that the whole House is keen to get right and it is important that the partnerships that we are creating to take forward fire safety measures are strengthened and improved.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) and his Committee for all the work that they have done so far—the job is not finished yet—on the regulatory reform order. We are grateful to him and his Committee and I hope that he will relay our thanks. It is sometimes not the most glamorous of jobs. The fact that he and his Committee have worked so assiduously on the detail has without doubt contributed to a much more thorough-going and useful change to the legislation. I am glad that between us we have clarified the procedure for what happens to the order as it emerges from the Committee.

One point that my hon. Friend raised that I wanted to mention was the production of guidance. It is important that once the order comes into place those affected—the responsible persons—have a clear idea of what is required of them. We shall produce guidance to that effect. We are committed to producing that guidance for the public at least 12 weeks, or three months, before the order comes into being. That will give those affected by it sufficient time to know what is expected of them and how to go about complying with those regulations.

My hon. Friend also mentioned, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead), the question of houses in multiple occupation and how the order relates to them. My hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test was right to point out the issues connected with the wider group of people involved. He mentioned students and others who are in accommodation of that kind. We have accepted the principle of the argument that, where a common fire precaution extends beyond the common parts of domestic premises in multiple occupation, the maintenance requirements should cover the precaution as a whole and not just the parts in common areas.

We take the view that that principle should apply to all types of premises that contain shared dwellings. It should apply not solely to HMOs, but to purpose-built flats and so on. We have not limited amendments in the draft order solely to HMOs, which is the point that my hon. Friend pressed. I am pleased to be able to respond so positively to his experience. As he represents a university town, I am sure that that is of particular interest to him as a constituency Member.

I want to put on the record my hon. Friend's record as fire services Minister. I have been privileged to carry that role forward since his time in office. In a way, we are seeing the fruits of much hard digging and labour some time ago. It is my privilege to present those results to the House.

Mr. Hammond: Will the Minister clarify the point that he has just made about obligations relating to shared or common detection and firefighting equipment? Who will be the responsible person? Will the responsible person for the common parts have a duty that extends into the individual dwellings, or will the occupants of those dwellings be responsible people in their own right?

Phil Hope: The hon. Gentleman made a similar point earlier in regard to third parties. I was going to come to that in a moment. It is true to say that third parties will be responsible. To some extent, they will not be in a position to reclaim costs. He mentioned an adjoining building which somebody has to use to escape. It will be up to the person responsible for that building to ensure that it is maintained in a way that enables that to happen. Any costs to that effect may be claimed against tax relief in the usual way, but a third party would certainly be a responsible person were they responsible for the egress or exit route of somebody in the neighbouring building.

Mr. Hammond: The problem with that is that, as I understand it, under the present system, the court would become involved in such a situation. To take an extreme example, what is to happen if the responsible person in a building determines—as a private citizen—that, as a result of his risk assessment and his analysis, he needs the next-door building to be demolished. Surely the Minister is not saying that the person who owns that building is obliged to comply without any possibility of compensation?

Phil Hope: The private householder will have a duty to co-operate, although they will not be the responsible person. If such measures are required, that person will have a duty to co-operate with measures to ensure that the responsible person—the second party, as it were—was able to comply with the regulations.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Bow (Ms King) made an impassioned speech about the future of fire safety in her constituency. She spoke powerfully on behalf of her constituents. I want to assure her that the London fire safety plan is about increasing fire safety, not reducing it. That is the essence of the IRMP approach. She is right that local people, including herself as constituency MP, need to know that their concerns about a variety of risks can be satisfied in the current consultation.

My hon. Friend has made strong representations on behalf of her constituents. Being a Member who enters into active and constructive dialogue in the way that she does makes that task a lot easier when we consider the issues. She is a powerful champion for the people of Tower Hamlets whom she represents. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) makes a remark from a sedentary position. My hon. Friend's contributions on behalf of her constituents make a genuine and real difference to their future and quality of life, including the services that provide and ensure safety in her constituency.

I know that my hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight) has a high reputation, not just in Committee, but in the Tea Room and everywhere else he can buttonhole me, for his knowledge of sprinklers. I promise that I shall visit his website, if he promises that he will visit mine—www.philhope.org.uk. I thought that I should get that on the record.

My hon. Friend is absolutely right to say that sprinklers are an important part of a package of measures to bring about fire safety. The part B review is under way, dealing with such matters as the role played by sprinklers. He has helpfully dispelled myths this evening, as he has done in other forums and venues. The challenge to reduce costs is a key part of the considerations and the cost-benefit analysis, which, as he mentioned, is critical to our judgment of the way forward in making building regulations.

Ms Drown: On the business of visiting websites, I extend an invitation to the Minister—and anyone else—to visit a demonstration house in west Swindon that has sprinklers in it. A fire can be lit within it without the sprinklers operating, and with the sprinklers. It is remarkable. If anyone has any doubts about the effects of sprinklers, they are most welcome to visit it.

Phil Hope: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that invitation. If I can, I shall certainly take her up on it.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset asked whether I will be reassessing any of the situation. He may be glad to learn that we are trying to ensure that we learn the lessons of the Rose Park tragedy in Scotland to see whether we can prevent similar tragedies . The Scottish Executive commissioned the Building Research Establishment, which has the sort of facility mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown), to study a replica fire under laboratory conditions and to examine the impact of potential improvements in fire safety measures for similar premises. We are on the case, with practical research and investigation, to ensure that we learn all the lessons and understand what works. We shall examine the outcomes of that work and consider what changes need to be made to part B of the regulations. In particular, the supporting guidance in the approved documents that accompany the regulations might be appropriate.

The hon. Member for Teignbridge (Richard Younger-Ross) mentioned a number of interesting points, particularly about the role that young people sometimes play in fire-setting. A strategy is emerging and there is a number of examples of very good practice, where fire and rescue services are dedicating activities to young people. I mentioned before the work done with children in schools and the curriculum packs that have been produced, but specific individual fire-setters have been targeted. If one imagines a pyramid of young people, most do not commit offences and can be educated at school, but at the top, there are a very few who carry out serious criminal activity. Can we intervene? Why do they get into that behaviour? What can we do to stop them?

There are some very good examples of interventions, such as the Phoenix project in Newcastle, and there is another example in the south-west. I know of firefighters who no longer play a role on a fire engine fighting fires, but have decided to work with young people. They have the ability to establish relationships. They are a uniformed organisation that is not the police, so young people are responsive to interaction with them. Because the firefighters' advice is rooted in their experience of fire and the impact of fire, it has a profound impact on some of those young people. Therefore, there is good practice out there, which I want to see promoted and developed throughout the service.

There was a small debate between the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge on cost and whether this was the right direction to travel. There is clearly consensus that it is the right approach. Just for the record, the net saving of £1.65 million a year cited in the regulatory impact assessment is the calculation derived in the Regulatory Reform Act 2001 from not having to produce a fire certificate. The actual savings are from £47 million to £137 million, but I was trying to distinguish between the package of savings and the specific item of not having to produce a fire certificate and the component of that that is a saving. Costs in there are low as well, but I wanted to be clear about the figures that the hon. Member for Teignbridge was quoting and tell him what saving is what.

Mr. Hammond: The Minister will know that the Select Committee said in paragraph 219 that, once the start-up costs were added in,

"businesses may find they suffer a net economic loss in the first year of the Order's operation, and could take several years before they break even."

I think that the Committee was concerned that that might taint some people's compliance with the new regime. Has the Minister made an assessment of that?

Phil Hope: In our view, the potential short-term new burden costs vary from a saving of £49 million to a net cost of £19 million. Those are the figures in the regulatory impact assessment. [Interruption.] I have two minutes left.

I have not addressed all the issues raised by the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge. He knows that we will have another debate next week on the statutory instrument, so I hope that we will have a chance then to address the questions that I do not manage to answer now. I assure him, however, that the IRMPs are an effective regime to deliver enforcement. Although I understand the Select Committee's concerns about it, we believe that it is the right way forward. I believe that the hon. Gentleman agreed.

I have answered the hon. Gentleman's point about third parties.

Mr. Hammond: As we will not get through the remaining points, perhaps I can press the Minister again on the third party compliance issue. It is an important point that is simply being brushed aside.

There is a big difference between compliance with a court-ordered action and compliance at one's own cost with the demand of a third party. Is the Minister saying that every person will be under an obligation to comply with the demand of any responsible person placed on them at their own cost? Can he answer yes or no?

Phil Hope: Clearly, third parties have a duty to co-operate. A third party would be a responsible person to the extent that they are responsible for the safety of persons generally and would be treated as any other responsible person. The hon. Gentleman may not welcome that reply, but there it is.

I have run out of time, so I thank the Committee for its contributions. I think that we have had a good debate, which will take the agenda forward.

Agriculture (South-West)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Vernon Coaker.]

9.30 am

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): It is a great pleasure to have another opportunity to talk about agriculture in the south-west. This is the second such debate that I have introduced in Westminster Hall and it is a great disappointment that we do not often debate what is still a key industry. I am delighted to see the Lord Commissioner of Her Majesty's Treasury, the hon. Member for West Carmarthen and South Pembrokeshire (Mr. Ainger), here to respond to the debate in his capacity as a Government Whip, but I am disappointed that his ministerial colleagues could not find a space in their no doubt busy engagement list to discuss an issue that, for many people in my part of the world, is hugely important. Although I accept that they have engagements elsewhere, many people will interpret their absence as symptomatic of the Government's indifference, and to some extent that of Parliament, to agricultural issues nowadays.

There was a time when we had a Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, Agriculture questions and regular debates on the subject—sometimes too regular during the foot and mouth disease crisis and, previous to that, the BSE epidemic. It is incredible that agriculture has virtually been airbrushed out of the political agenda. When we have had the opportunity to tackle Ministers, the attitude that is so often evinced is one of apparent complacency in the face of what I regard as a crisis in the industry.

Let me stress first the importance of farming to the west country. It is often said that farming no longer employs that many people directly and that it is no longer a major economic factor in the region, or indeed any region in the country, so why should we bother about it? We must remember that 80 per cent. of the landscape in the south-west is under agricultural production. Without that production, we would not have the landscape that people visit and which swells the coffers of the tourism industry in the west country.

Let us remember the scale of agriculture in the south-west: our production is three times that of Wales and equal to that of Scotland. Agricultural issues seem to receive much closer attention in the National Assembly for Wales and the Scottish Parliament than in this Parliament, where one has to struggle to have one's voice heard. In answer to a question on the general public's biggest worry about the landscape of the south-west, which people were asked last year in a Campaign to Protect Rural England survey, 38 per cent. of respondents said the loss of working farms. This is a serious issue.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): The hon. Gentleman is speaking cogently on a subject that he is very knowledgeable about. Will he bear it in mind that the loss of agricultural businesses also means a loss of valuable employment in the south-west, especially in remote rural areas, where it is often difficult to find alternative jobs?

Mr. Heath: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. In some ways, his constituency is not dissimilar to mine and it has high dependence on such jobs. The assumption that somehow everything will turn out all right and that new opportunities will appear through a magical process of diversification is wrong. The further demise of the agriculture industry will bring serious structural problems in the south-west.

Recently published figures show that income from farming has been reduced by 5.4 per cent., which Lord Whitty described as disappointing. Disappointing is not the word that I would use in that context. He then tried to put a gloss on that loss by saying that diversification is increasing. Let us be clear about diversification: we all support it and want new opportunities in the rural economy, but diversification per se is no substitute for productive agriculture. We still need the core business. We can diversify as much as we like, but if the core business falls through the floor, we will no longer have working farms.

Within diversification programmes, a lot of farmers in my area are actively examining alternative uses of their land for production in novel areas, yet the Government's response has been feeble at best in terms of, for example, encouraging crops for energy, introducing plant to treat grain for ethanol production or using miscanthus for combined heat and power schemes. Even in terms of productive diversification, we have a serious problem of attitude.

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): Ministers and others blithely recommend that farmers pursue a policy of diversification instead of continuing in their traditional manner. Does my hon. Friend agree that in the Government's south-west zone, which includes a large number of tourism areas, over the past generation, if not before, farmers have been at the forefront of diversification, particularly with farm holidays and many visitor facilities on farms? Ministers need to go out and see the initiative that farmers have been showing for decades.

Mr. Heath: My hon. Friend is right. I do not wish to point the finger at the hon. Member for West Carmarthen and South Pembrokeshire, because I know the sort of constituency he represents, but there is an urban mentality that does not see beyond the city limits in terms of what is happening and what could be encouraged. My fundamental point is that all the diversification in the world will not help if we lose the core business and do not have farms on which people can stay and enjoy their summer holidays. That is crucial to our understanding of the situation.

I intend to concentrate on dairy farming, because it is a key element of agriculture in my constituency. Other hon. Members whose constituencies are more given over to arable crops or to rearing sheep on upland areas may have differing views. My constituency is essentially a lowland constituency with some of the best dairy farms in the country. I have always argued—no one has yet satisfactorily argued against me—that there are more dairy cows in my constituency than anywhere else in this country, given that it is geographically large with a high concentration of dairy farms. Sadly, that number is reducing almost daily, which is why it was so important to secure this debate.

Before I move on to dairy farming, I shall make a few general points. There is a great deal of concern about the transitional arrangements for the revised common agricultural policy. I understand all the arguments and why the emerging programme looks like it does—to some extent it is a compromise proposal. What I cannot accept is the shambles in the Rural Payments Agency that will result in delays in payments for farmers. It is not good enough that sufficiently robust arrangements were not put in place early enough. That will have drastic effects on some farm businesses. If farmers cannot rely on their cash flow and have to renegotiate arrangements with their banks, that will be sufficient to cause huge financial difficulties.

I would like the hon. Member for West Carmarthen and South Pembrokeshire, if he can, to give a clear commitment that interim payments will be made when there are delays and there is a prospective difficulty for farmers. It has not yet been made clear whether that is the proposal, but I strongly recommend it to him.

The hon. Gentleman might have anticipated me raising the position of traditional cider orchards, which are a key element, although not a major factor, in my constituency. He will know that I have raised the issue consistently during the past year; I had an Adjournment debate on the subject. I have to say that I am extremely pleased at the progress that the Government appear to be making. The scientific report that sought a satisfactory definition of traditional orchards was well argued and came to the right conclusions. I cannot honestly see the difference between traditional and commercial orchards in the context of the environmental payments scheme, because all orchards make an extremely benign use of land, which should be encouraged.

I was particularly worried about losing a key part of the Somerset landscape—our traditional cider orchards. As I have said, the Department has done good work on the matter and said that it was going to Brussels to try to secure acceptance, but I have never had a definitive answer on whether that acceptance has been forthcoming from the Commission, and therefore on whether the saga of orchard definitions for the purpose of bringing orchards within the single farm payments scheme has come to an end. Will the hon. Gentleman put my mind at rest? If he can do so, I shall be delighted, as I will have won a small but significant battle on behalf of my constituents.

I move on to the issue of regulatory burden, which is key for many farmers. They are looking ahead at what inspection will result from the ghastly, enormously complex regime of cross-compliance. A simple argument has been put forward: farmers ought to know what the inspectors will inspect. In other words, the guidelines, when published, should be clear and understandable to everyone involved. I would go further and say that a single inspection regime and co-operation between the various regulatory bodies, whenever possible, would be extraordinarily helpful, as the man from the Ministry would not be tramping over farms regularly and unexpectedly, but the inspection regimes would have coherence of some sort.

The issue of agricultural waste regulations is looming. I do not think that we yet have any concept of the likely consequence of what is proposed for many farmers. I accept that the regulations come from Europe and that the Government are consulting on how they will be implemented, but I say to the hon. Member for West Carmarthen and South Pembrokeshire that if the impact is anything like we fear, it will put a colossal cost on to farm businesses—even more so if farmers are to be responsible for the cost of disposing of material that is fly-tipped on farms.

Fly-tipping is a big issue in many rural areas and it is estimated that anything up to 600,000 tonnes of extraneous material is tipped on farms. If farmers are to be responsible for getting rid of that through high-cost methods, it will be a very significant burden on them.

Over the years, I have continually raised the one-sided nature of regulation. The inspectors, the Ministry and the payments agency decide what is right and wrong; the farmer pays the penalty and is in the process often made to feel like a criminal for what is essentially administrative error. Yet there is no arbitration on whether a mistake has been made in good faith or whether the regulators, rather than the farmer, are wrong. I have long argued that there should be an agricultural ombudsman. We still need such a process—perhaps more so under the new arrangements.

My last point, which relates to dairying but has more general implications, is the problem of animal disease. Effectively combating animal disease could be a significant cost to the Exchequer, but also a significant issue in animal welfare. The compensation proposals are fine in some ways. There ought to be recognition of the differential value of different animals. For example, a cow is not a cow by definition, as there are many different breeds and different values according to circumstance. If we want the compensation scheme, and if we want the disease control measures to be effective, we must recognise the intrinsic value of the beast in question.

It is impossible not to mention bovine tuberculosis in a debate of this kind, but, to be frank, I do not know where we go from here. I have long argued that we need the scientific background, which the Krebs trials were supposed to produce, but we do not have it. However, we have the Irish study, a mushrooming problem of bovine tuberculosis and prima facie evidence of links with the badger population.

I do not want the eradication of the badger species—nobody does, or I hope nobody does. Equally, I want robust disease precautions to be applied to protect our domestic animal population. Laissez-faire, which is the attitude of the Department, is not sustainable even in the short term, let alone the longer term.

We all want an effective vaccination programme, which will prevent the spread of the disease from the badger population, but that seems to be like nuclear fusion power—something that is always 10, 15 or 20 years ahead and which we never quite reach. That is unfortunate. I can only urge that we redouble our efforts to find something effective. I do not believe that the answer is beyond the wit of the scientific community, if provided with sufficient resources and encouragement.

Let me move on to the key issue, which is that of dairying. We know from the Milk Development Council report and every other bit of evidence that we are losing a massive number of dairy farms across the country. Indications are that the number is 40 every week, and we have lost a third of them since 2000. We know that dairy farming, which has always been extremely hard work in respect of keeping holdings going, is now hard work for very little reward. The estimate is that the average dairy farmer receives less than £3 an hour for a 70-hour week, which would be illegal were that person to be an employee.

In the south-west, an estimated 1,000 dairy farms have disappeared over three years. The estimate is that we will lose a further 30 per cent. of those remaining over the next two years. That is a colossal reduction in the number of dairy holdings.

The noises from the Government and those associated with the Government appear to be based on platitudes. At Environment questions recently, the Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality was very keen to say that milk production is level and that there has not been a marked reduction. That is true—the market is seeing to that for the time being. He was keen to point out that there are big differences in profitability between different dairy farm businesses. That is true, and has always been true. Some have been able to invest since the BSE and foot and mouth crises and some have not. Those who have not find themselves less profitable than those who have.

Others have pointed out that land prices in the south-west are level or rising and that that indicates that we have a prosperous farming industry. I think the reverse is true, because the people who are buying the land are not the farmers but, in most cases, big business or those who want a bit of landscape for their ponies and are using City money to buy it.

The concept that small farms are of necessity less efficient is transparently not the case. Many small dairy farms are just as efficient as big farms. The issue is not whether they are more efficient, as Lord Haskins would have us believe. He seems strongly to recommend large holdings, which perhaps fit into his style of business better than the traditional family farm. The issue is that small farms cannot afford to suffer losses in the same way.

Some people are dealing with small farms that are making a loss and that require them to go out at all times and in all weathers to make an inadequate wage for themselves and their family. They are sitting on an asset that has huge capital value and eventually they succumb, whatever their personal feelings, to the view that this is not sustainable for them and their family. The result is that we are losing small and medium-sized farms and family farm businesses. Amalgamations are happening, and big agribusiness is taking up the slack and taking up the dairy farms.

That might be okay—I would argue that it is not—but there is an argument that it makes for a profitable and sustainable dairy sector, except for one thing. If farm-gate prices are inadequate to provide a return on the investment, there is no commitment from the big businesses to the sector as there is from the family farmer who has kept dairy cattle on the holding for many years. There is no commitment to stay with the undertaking—agribusiness will follow the bottom line.

Unless we do something about the profitability of the dairy sector, we will be in an intensely vulnerable situation where milk production will not stay level, but will fall through the floor because business will take its investment elsewhere. We are in dire danger of losing our dairy farming industry.

This is very serious issue. On the farm-gate price for milk, we know that farmers get a 40 per cent. share and that they got 60 per cent. 10 years ago. That is an unreasonable drop in profit share and it has been made up by an increase in the share of the big supermarkets. We know that is the case and that it has an effect on primary producers and on the processors.

There is a contraction of the domestic dairy processing industry. The processors are not the wicked elements in the chain and they are contracting in exactly the same way. The Diary Crest Yoplait plant in Yeovil recently closed down, which is a straw in the wind for what could be a major collapse on the dairy processing side.

If we are not careful, the remaining 4,000 or so dairy farms in this country will disappear. Effectively, we will be exporting our industry to our European competitors. I cannot for the life of me see the sense in that or why it is sensible not to produce milk on the finest dairy lands in Europe—in the west country—and to import it.

The key is the transparency of the supply chain in the dairy industry, the position of the supermarkets and the inadequacy of the supermarket code of conduct to do anything to moderate the attitude or performance of the big supermarkets. The market is distorted: between them, the large retailers form a classic oligopoly and they do not act in the interests of the whole supply chain. They may act in the temporary interests of the consumer, but I argue that, in the long term, it is very much to the detriment of the consumer to lose British milk, cheese and other dairy products.

Unless we have a system that strengthens the supermarket code of conduct and allows binding intervention, there will be no genuine market in milk. That is not to argue against free enterprise and the operation of the market; it is to argue for the operation of a fair market, rather than one that is distorted by the supermarket oligopoly.

It is extraordinary that the Competition Commission and the Office of Fair Trading, supported by the Government, argue against the vertical integration that was so crucial in this country. Wherever else we look in the world where there is a thriving dairy industry working within the constraints of a free market, we see effective vertical integration without the constraint that I have described. It is perverse that Tesco has a bigger hold on the market than Milk Marque ever did. I cannot understand how that was allowed to come about.

My plea to the hon. Member for West Carmarthen and South Pembrokeshire is familiar, as, like others, I have pursued the issue doggedly over the past few years: until we get the farm-gate price of milk up to a sustainable level, there will be no fair market for milk. Without a fair market, there will be no effective future for dairy farming. If there is no future for dairy farming, we shall lose the industry and it will move towards extinction.

I take no pleasure in saying that and I do not believe that I am being unnecessarily pessimistic or, as the Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality accused me of being a week or so ago, hyperbolic. I simply believe that we must do something now to save an industry that is a crucial part of the economy of my part of the world and of the whole United Kingdom.

I want the hon. Member for West Carmarthen and South Pembrokeshire to advise Ministers, as they are so busy in Exeter or elsewhere, that we need effective intervention now. The Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs must stand up to colleagues in the Department of Trade and Industry and make them see what damage is being done to the industry. We need an effective supermarket code of conduct that is not just a pious intention, but a reality that is enforced to provide a transparent and fair supply chain for milk. Only by providing that will we give farmers the security they need to plan their businesses and to ensure both the safety of their undertakings and a future for them and their families. To me, that is still important. It is also important in the context of the west country and Somerset, and I urge Ministers to take action.

9.59 am

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for allowing me to catch your eye. I start by declaring my entry in the Register of Members' Interests as a farmer and chartered surveyor. I congratulate the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) on securing the debate. Agriculture is an extremely important sector in the south-west economy, and he is right to say that we want it to flourish as far as possible. Many of our constituents and those of other hon. Members in the Chamber depend, directly or indirectly, on a profitable agricultural sector. I welcome the Lord Commissioner of Her Majesty's Treasury, the hon. Member for West Carmarthen and South Pembrokeshire (Mr. Ainger), who will respond to the debate on behalf of the Government. I am sure that it cannot be long before he is elevated to a speaking, rather than a silent, job. I am delighted to see him here this morning.

The speech of the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome ranged widely, and rightly so. In the short time available to me, I want to deal with a few issues affecting agriculture. As he says, the latest Government statistics show that agricultural profitability has dropped by 5.4 per cent. It is almost as though that came as a surprise to the Government; I could have told them almost for a certainty that there would be a drop in profitability.

There is an awful lot of gloom and doom about in the industry at the moment, as everyone knows. I was talking to a constituent of my hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) yesterday—a major agricultural adviser whom my hon. Friend will know well. In his 30 years of advising farmers, he has never known there to be such dismal prospects for the future. He told me of one very large East Anglian business that had made a profit for the past 20 years. Last year, for the first time, it made a loss. That is the trend in agriculture. Some of the responsibility for that malaise has to be laid at the Government's door. I do not want to make this into a political debate, but there are certain things that the Government can do.

First, the Government could try to help those sectors with great balance-of-payments deficits. The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome has gone into the dairy industry in great depth, and we basically know the causes of the problem in that industry. It seems strange that although the Government talk about wanting to establish strong co-operatives to market agricultural products properly, one of their first acts was to dismantle vertical integration in Milk Marque.

One of the problems in the dairy industry is that we export the cheap dairy products—liquid milk and milk powder—and import the expensive value-added products, such as cheese and yoghurt. That is crazy; we ought to be doing exactly the opposite. We are not only contributing to the balance-of-payments deficit, which is almost at a record in this country, but are, as the hon. Gentleman said, exporting jobs to our continental neighbours. That seems utterly crazy. We could well do with the jobs here. We in the south-west, along with those in the north-west, have some of the best temperate climates and soils for producing dairy products in the whole world. It seems absolutely crazy to set that land aside and do nothing with it when it could be producing perfectly profitable dairy products.

The hon. Gentleman did not like me mentioning Waitrose the last time I did so, but it has some very good contracts with dairy farmers, and I praise it for that. It has direct contracts with farmers and can offer them a slightly higher price. It knows precisely where its milk is sourced, so if there is any problem, it can rapidly identify the farmer and rectify the problem quickly. However, if the milk comes from goodness knows where, it is much more difficult to isolate the problem.

I would like to talk about one or two specific problems that my farmers have raised with me. One of the most important is tuberculosis. I see that the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) is present and I do not know whether he will catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but he and I have a major problem with TB. I took a delegation to see the former Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food eight years ago when this Government were first elected—of course, that was before the foot and mouth disease crisis—and he said that TB was the single most important animal health issue that we had to face. I regret to say that, in those seven years, it seems that very little has been done—in fact, worse than very little.

I do not particularly blame the Government for this but, throughout the foot and mouth crisis, all staff dealing with tuberculosis were taken away, so the eye was completely taken off the ball in relation to TB. I have to tell the hon. Member for West Carmarthen and South Pembrokeshire—who is in loco parentis, as it were, the Minister today—that the problem is getting worse, whether we like it or not. The disease is getting into the deer and hare populations, and that is extremely serious. Whereas badgers have a normal roving pattern of about 5 to 10 miles, deer rove for up to 30 to 40 miles, so the risk of spreading the disease is far greater.

We need to put much more emphasis on trying to find a satisfactory vaccine and trying to improve diagnostics so that we can differentiate between a vaccinated animal and one that has caught TB in the wild. There would be great benefit to all of us if the Government would put more emphasis on, and resources into trying to solve, that problem; they would not only improve the profitability of those farmers in my area who face that problem, but would reduce the huge compensation bill that they have to pay as a result of the disease.

I have a problem with registration under the so-called Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000. It is particularly unfair. I had a case in Wotton-under-Edge, where two sites were registered. The farmer appealed on those two sites, and suddenly found that a third site had been posted on the internet. It may also have been posted at the local council, but he did not know about it until after the date of appeal, so he could not appeal. That seems unfair. I have taken the matter up with the planning inspectorate and the Countryside Agency, but have had very unsatisfactory treatment. The Minister looks puzzled. After the debate, I will let him have the details and should be grateful if he were to look into that matter.

There is also concern about dogs in relation to the countryside and rights of way. Like the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome, I have a lot of stock in my constituency area—sheep, dairy cattle and beef cattle—and there is concern about dogs. There is also concern about gates being left open so that cattle stray on to roads and cause problems. Those issues should be carefully examined.

I also want to talk about the paperwork. We raised that matter at great length in the last debate on agriculture in the Chamber on 19 January 2005. I would like the Minister to inculcate a new way of doing business in his Department. It should impose the least amount of paperwork on farmers concurrent with preventing fraud. The whole ethos in the Department should be to produce the least amount of paper and to keep things as simple as possible.

I have enormous sympathy with my poor farmers at the moment, who, at a time when they are trying to sow their spring crops, are having to deal with hugely complicated paperwork related to the single payments. As was mentioned in the previous debate, it is almost impossible for ordinary farmers to administer the paperwork themselves; they may have to get outside advisers, which is expensive. Even if they can administer the paperwork themselves, the time taken in administration is a cost. We should inculcate a new ethos in the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs: keep the paperwork simple and keep it to the minimum commensurate with dealing with fraud.

I also want to deal with the whole business of the ban on hunting with hounds from 19 February, and the issue of cattle disposal. In certain areas of the country, that will be a real problem. We want to encourage farmers to take part in the national cattle disposal scheme, and I am sure that the Government will do more in that respect. However, there will be problems in individual areas, and I should like to know what the Government intend to do about them. We do not want a system in which farmers feel so pressurised that they simply go out and bury the stock or, worse still, leave it lying about somewhere, because that would be a real haven for disease.

I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for allowing me to speak in this debate. I am concerned that the pressure on certain sectors—the dairy sector and the arable sector in the Cotswolds—could mean that more people will put land down to grass that will be grazed extensively by sheep and beef cattle. I am then concerned that pressure will also occur in those sectors.

The Government need to take a long, hard look at agriculture. It is no good just saying, "Well, the farmers will have to look after themselves, and if they lose jobs, they lose jobs, and if they are not profitable, they are not profitable." Such an attitude is not acceptable. We want jobs to be maintained in rural areas, and we want agriculture to be profitable, because the glue that holds the rural area together depends on the profitability of agriculture. If agriculture is not profitable, the whole rural area suffers from a great depression and malaise.

We look to the hon. Member for West Carmarthen and South Pembrokeshire to give us some positive hope this morning and to tell us how he thinks things might improve. My goodness, the industry desperately needs positive good cheer from him today.

10.9 am

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I, like my near neighbour the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown), welcome the debate, and I congratulate the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) on securing it. I apologise for missing the first couple of minutes of the debate. Like the Lord Commissioner of Her Majesty's Treasury, my hon. Friend the Member for West Carmarthen and South Pembrokeshire (Mr. Ainger), I am on a Standing Committee considering a Bill, which causes some problems with double-booking.

I concur with what the hon. Members for Somerton and Frome and for Cotswold said. My starting point is that we have the figures for the total income from farming, and this year they are down. There was some optimism last year because the figures rose, which was promising, although they did not rise dramatically. The fact that they are down this year is affecting profitability. That brings starkly into play the amount of money that the state puts into agriculture every year, because without that £3 billion or more the industry would be in a worse than parlous state. However, I want to dwell not on that but on what the debate has been about. In the south-west, it is understandably about dairying, and it is also about diversification—the two d's.

I make no apology for starting with the problem of how farmers are paid. The Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee, of which I am proud to be a member, has in the past examined the Rural Payments Agency, and I think it is fair to say that we have, in our various guises, given it quite a hard time. Sadly, if a Soviet-style system for making payments to people is created, it is no wonder that it is bureaucratic and subject to all the problems that we know about which result in failure. As we enter this brave new world, I would like us to search for greater finesse and for a system that actually rewards, rather than relying on a highly bureaucratic system of payments.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way, and I am sorry to intervene on his speech, but I want to say something that I meant to mention in my speech. Does he agree that there will be a problem in moving from the old integrated administration and control scheme to the new single farm payment system? The IACS payments were mostly paid before Christmas, but the new payments will be made several months after Christmas. Does he also agree that if those payments are not made on time, there will be an opportunity cost, even if the farmer does not have an overdraft, which most farmers do? If the Government do not pay by the statutory date, they should add interest for late payments.

Mr. Drew: I hope that we would always pay as promptly and as fairly as possible, but I am just making the point that this is an incredibly complicated system, and we have made it more so.

Let us understand why. During the build-up to the changes, I was lobbied by three groups of farmers. I was initially lobbied by those who wanted to break away entirely from the production-based system, because they had farmed without subsidy throughout their history and they felt that if we were moving towards environmental payments it was appropriate that they were able to access that system. I also met those farmers, largely in the arable sector, who welcomed the area-based payments, because they saw it as a more straightforward method of payment and hoped that it would earn them additional rewards. Of course, I also met dairy farmers in the south-west who fought hard to maintain the historic payment system. The fact that all three groups were members of the National Farmers Union meant that the organisation was wearing many hats, which made things difficult.

The hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) picked up on my description of the system as a spatchcock. That is an appropriate definition. This is not an ideal system. We do not want a system in which, inevitably, there are some real losers—essentially in dairying—until other ways in which farmers can build up income have been looked at, and it would be utterly unfair if we immediately went over to a system of area-based payments.

There is also, dare I say it, an interesting British experiment going on. There are different methods of payment in different areas of the colonial parts of Britain. That may give us an opportunity to measure the effectiveness of the different systems, but I hope that we will eventually agree that it is right to pay farmers for what we want them to do, rather than to pay them a production subsidy to build up excess supplies, which is utterly unacceptable nowadays.

That takes me directly to dairying, an unhappy area which the Select Committee looked into—in fact, I chaired the Sub-Committee. Of all the sectors it is the one losing out most, something that obviously started a long time ago, rather than starting or ending with the current Government. That trend is due to the system of linking to currency fluctuations through the intervention milk price equivalent, which is fine when the currency moves in the right direction, but results in heavy penalties when it moves in the wrong direction. Anything that can lessen that impact is vital, as we will see when the new system of payments comes in. Like the hon. Member for St. Ives (Andrew George), who has been valiant in his attempts to achieve greater fairness in the sector, I support the idea of a statutory code. We, like him, want to see that fully evaluated—and, I dare say, we want more research on it—because if the threats that keep being made to the supermarkets are to have any meaning at all, we must be able to assess the benefits of having such a code.

In our last report, we found out that when the 3p was offered, as a result of farmers' protests, it did find its way into their pockets, yet there is still the missing 18p. In a sense it is not missing, because we know that it is shared between the supermarkets and the processors, although, as the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome said, the processors are under enormous pressure at the moment. As I have said many times before, the Severnside plant is at the bottom of my garden, and I know some of the pressures that it has to endure. The only answer, besides trying to get the system right, is to secure greater co-operation. Contrary to what my near neighbour the hon. Member for Cotswold said, Milk Marque was not destroyed by the Government; it was kicked to death over a long period. The level of confrontation surrounding Milk Marque—and the price levels that were fixed—meant that it was set up to fail. It should have been set up to encourage greater collaboration, and I should like to see that co-operation throughout the sector.

I would not mind if there was another OFT inquiry into the matter. It would highlight many of the problems, although such inquiries often do not find the solutions. The problem is that the OFT, if it reported, would, I suspect, consider calling for even greater rationalisation at the producer end. Like other Members, I do not want that.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Normally I agree with most of what the hon. Gentleman says about agriculture, but I disagree with his remarks about Milk Marque. Will he answer a simple question? Is the dairy industry more or less profitable since the break-up of Milk Marque?

Mr. Drew: I know who is profitable—the supermarkets. They would argue that that is because they do their work well. Processor profits may go up and down, but the fact is that producers have done very badly, inevitably because of the way that confrontation rules the sector. Confrontation has served no one but those at the end of the process. It is about time the sector recognised the need for greater co-operation, not just through vertical integration, which may allow us to compete internationally, but more particularly among farmers. We must encourage them to co-operate.

The simple fact, which has been alluded to on numerous occasions, is that if the normal supply and demand mechanism operated we would expect the supply to decrease as the price fell. That does not happen because there is always someone coming in, trying to pick up surplus cows and milk them more efficiently. I dare say that the way that milk, certainly liquid milk, now moves around means that we do not face a shortage. The point is that we have to recognise that the normal market does not apply to milk, and we have to look at ways of bolstering the supply by supporting farmers in other ways.

Mr. Heath: The hon. Gentleman said that there was a crying need for co-operation both between primary producers and between producers and processors. Every year I go to the south-west dairy industry dinner at the Bath and West showground in my constituency and there is talk of little else but how to encourage co-operation. None of that will work unless the big supermarkets' stranglehold on the bottom line is broken. Co-operation on its own is not enough.

Mr. Drew: It may not be enough, but it is a good start. The Select Committee report highlights the lack of co-operation as the biggest weakness in the sector. There are no magic wands. It is down to people trying to get on with one another. It is not just about farmers co-operating; it is about processors learning to co-operate with each other and to give up their cut-throat policies. They must face up to the supermarkets and ensure that we, as parliamentarians, and the Government put pressure on them. That is no easy thing, but it has to happen. That is another reason for my supporting a statutory code.

Bovine TB is an enormous problem, and I agree with the hon. Member for Cotswold that there are no easy solutions. The Veterinary Record this week carries the results of an interesting survey. I do not know whether it was carried out because of the Irish results. Although those were apparently conclusive the Irish have announced that it is impossible to contemplate the level of culling that would be needed to deal with the problem of the wildlife reservoir. Contrary to what the hon. Gentleman says, the facts about other wildlife reservoirs have been known for a long time. Whether the problem is down to politics or lack of resources, it is only since we have begun to look more carefully at where bovine TB occurs that we know rather more. That obviously arouses fears and makes policies that much more difficult to develop.

In the survey farmers were asked what policies they would suggest to the Government. Surprisingly, their top three were a cattle vaccine, continuing the current testing and cull policy, and, in only third place, a proactive cull of badgers. Even more surprising was the fact that the idea of localised action was seen as completely unacceptable. If farmers themselves are asking for that, it is incumbent on the Government to respond and to invest resources in the search for a vaccine. It is not easy; we know that the current work on the BCG vaccine has been fraught with problems, but we have to find one. We should all be united in that search.

On diversification, I get a slightly different picture in my constituency, where there are many holdings through the County Farms Estate. I met some new tenants just before Christmas. The quality of people who still want to come into farming is gratifying. They know what they are coming into and realise that they will encounter problems. Again, the numbers for dairying are down. It is difficult to invest in an updated milk parlour. However, people are coming into the industry to farm and to do a range of things. Sadly, they are not always helped by the way others in the countryside try to prevent diversification. All hon. Members will know what I am talking about here. If we are serious about farmers earning income in other ways we have to encourage them to diversify.

Some time ago in Gloucestershire we set up a group called the Rural Issues Task Force. That was mainly on the back of foot and mouth money, although the organisation slightly pre-empted that. We were able to see at first hand the invaluable work of the farm business advisory service, which advises farmers on the best way forward, including, sometimes, passing on the hard message that they are in the wrong vocation. That is difficult, but it sometimes needs to be said. However, the service tries to help other farmers to move forward.

I congratulate the RITF on its work under Henry Robinson, its chairman, who is well known to the hon. Member for Cotswold, and Robin Grist, its secretary. We would like to keep it going. If another Government came in and made alterations to the Small Business Service, of which the farm business advisory service is part, that would threaten it. The most important point is that we are keen to consider methods of diversifying, including growing non-food crops and making more effective use of environmental payments. That can be done only by collaborative work, as well as work at the level of the individual farmer.

I shall leave it at that. I could say some things about the fallen stock scheme, which has been a little slow to get off the ground, but in recent times has shown good signs of making progress. There are many problems, and there is a great deal of work to do. I look forward to hearing my hon. Friend the Member for West Carmarthen and South Pembrokeshire talk about those matters. We have to pull together to ensure that the countryside functions properly.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Mr. Speaker has ruled that as long as all the local Members are in, the Front-Bench spokesman can have 10 minutes each to wind up, so we do not have to restrict the speeches.

10.26 am

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I begin, as have others, by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath), not only on securing the debate, but on highlighting the seriousness of the problems facing farmers, particularly dairy farmers—in fact, farmers across a number of other sectors as well—in the Government's south-west zone? A recent Milk Development Council report highlighted the fact that 1,000 dairy farmers had gone out of business in the region in the past three years and it is anticipated that a further 30 per cent. will go out of business in the next two. Those devastating figures demonstrate the seriousness of the circumstances that farming faces.

My hon. Friend highlighted the role of supermarkets and the impact on farm-gate prices as well as the challenge of the introduction of the single farm payment system, which is already creating tremendous challenges in the Rural Payments Agency and DEFRA. He also referred to the break-up of Milk Marque, as did the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown), whose analysis was spot on. The Government were prepared to intervene to break up Milk Marque. If it required improvement in its internal practices, that could have been addressed rather than breaking up the organisation, particularly when it was no longer felt by the Competition Commission to be monopolistic.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: May I make this observation to the hon. Gentleman, who is entirely on the right point? We have weakened and broken up Milk Marque, but co-operatives on the continent, particularly in Holland, are growing bigger and stronger, so we are competing on an unequal playing field.

Andrew George: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. All speakers so far have highlighted the importance of farmers in this country getting back to the negotiating table between themselves and establishing a basis for greater co-operation to balance the negotiating muscle within the food supply chain.

Mr. Heath: Another example of highly developed vertical integration is New Zealand, where processing is intimately linked to production. A much larger entity is selling to our market than would ever have been the case with Milk Marque.

Andrew George: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's intervention. There are many international examples that can, I hope, be taken off the peg and applied more effectively and speedily to help to provide agriculture in this country with greater strength in the marketplace.

All political parties seem to be struggling with the knotty issue of bovine TB, as hon. Members on both sides of the House have mentioned it in the debate. It has been a challenge for many years, and it was perhaps made worse following foot and mouth disease, largely as a result of restocking policies at the time and the need to ensure that pre and post-movement tests were put in place. Perhaps they should have been in place, because problems were created in parts of the country that previously had not had such difficulties.

The political parties will have to face up to some difficult political decisions in due course. The fourth report from the independent scientific group will be out in the next week or so—it should have been published by now—and we are anxious to see it because it will give us further information about the progress of the trials. The Irish study, which I hope the ISG report will comment on, shows that there could be a solution, or a partial solution, to the problem of rampaging bovine TB if any Government were prepared to consider a policy of widespread extermination of the badger. As far as I am aware, however, no party is proposing that. Reactive culling clearly does not work, and although that is disputed in some circles, it is one helpful outcome from the work done by Professor John Bourne and others. There is much still to be debated on the issue and many dairy farmers in the south-west, as well as elsewhere, will watch developments very closely.

The hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) rightly referred to complications created by the introduction of the single farm payment system, the purpose of which was to create a more straightforward system that ironed out the complexities of the scheme in place until December last year. That leads me to the first of my two substantive points: the competence of DEFRA and farmers' lack of confidence in its ability to cope with the challenges ahead.

The Department failed to introduce an amendment to the Animal By-Products Order 1999 in time to be able to implement a fallen-stock collection scheme in May 2003. The order was introduced in July and there was a further debate on the subject in September 2003, when we were promised such a scheme in January 2004. After many questions and debates, it was eventually established a year later. What confidence does that give farmers that DEFRA, first, gives them priority and, secondly, has the competence to act?

Another product of last year's debates on the fallout from the foot and mouth inquiry was the emergence of the report by Jim Dring, which was devastating on the role of MAFF and DEFRA and their competence to cope with what was going on in Northumberland. It highlighted some serious questions that the Department has failed to answer.

The single farm payment scheme is the most significant change in agriculture in more than a generation. There was a decent amount of lead time before it was introduced in January, but information is still percolating out. Booklets were distributed late, farmers were informed late and there is a lot of confusion out there. From talking to farmers, I know that they are worried about the future because they are uncertain.

The Department has made it clear that it is not really competent to make payments in December this year, but the Rural Payments Agency is likely make payments towards the end of the payment window, which will end in June 2006. I hope that the Lord Commissioner of Her Majesty's Treasury, the hon. Member for West Carmarthen and South Pembrokeshire (Mr. Ainger) will address the need to ensure that farmers are properly compensated if the agency does not pay in the early part of the payment window, particularly farmers who are struggling on the margins.

The Department must be prepared to intervene in the market, just as it did with Milk Marque, to protect farmers from the overwhelming strength of supermarkets. If the competition authorities have acknowledged that convenience stores are a discrete market, surely supermarkets are a discrete market too. For example, Tesco holds about 40 per cent. of the market. Why are the Government not prepared to intervene?

Of course, it is an entirely rational decision of supermarkets to use their muscle in the market. No one complains about that, and one understands that if they do not do it, their competitors will and they will lose their place in the market. However, is what is happening through the food supply chain a proper use or an abuse of power through that chain? The Government need to address those questions.

The real Secretary of State for Agriculture, Lord Haskins, predicted only this week in the Farmers Guardian that the average size of dairy farms in the south-west will have to be 250 milking cows. Unless we are to go down that route, if that is Government policy, we shall end up with ranches across the countryside. That will not help either rural communities or the future of our farmed landscapes. It is time the Department got a grip.

Mr. Clifton-Brown rose—

Andrew George: I must sit down now.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Unless the hon. Gentleman resumes his seat very quickly, he is not going to hear what the Government have to say.

Andrew George: I have just resumed my seat, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) on securing the debate. I shall not repeat his comments on the absence of a Minister, but I sympathise with the position in which the Lord Commissioner of Her Majesty's Treasury, the hon. Member for West Carmarthen and South Pembrokeshire (Mr. Ainger), finds himself. He has already been given some material, but clearly he will be circumscribed in what he can say in reply to the debate.

It is also important to make the point that despite the cataclysmic changes to agriculture in the last few years and the advent of the single farm payment system, we have not had a debate in Government time on agriculture either in this Chamber or in the main Chamber for at least two years. I have established that with a little research, although the period is probably a lot longer. That underlines the Government's attitude to farming and the countryside.

Underlying all the concerns and the situation in the south-west, as well as the dramatic reduction in the number of dairy farmers, is the question of what we want, and what the Government expect, from our farmers in the next couple of decades or so, now that the single farm payment system is in place. Are the Government relaxed about having a situation such as that to which the hon. Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) just referred—a massive number of dairy farmers going out of business and a few others getting bigger, including the impact that that will have on rural communities—or do they want an effort to maintain the rural community structures that have served our countryside for so long?

If one considers the bald statistics of dairying, there seems to be little doubt that milk production has hardly declined at all, and there is no doubt that many dairy producers around the country are expanding production. That is a logical business decision based on how they see and cost their own enterprises. However, that somehow obscures the point that the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome was making, which is that when there is a dramatic diminution in the number of small and smaller farms, there is a fundamental impact on the fabric of the community. They have been the mainstay of our rural communities—particularly relating to dairying in the south-west—for many generations and the country has not really asked itself whether it wants to allow this deterioration to continue.

A number of hon. Members have rightly raised the issue of the single farm payment. I, too, take the view that the delays announced by the Rural Payments Agency are a direct consequence of the complexity of the scheme that the Government have introduced, coupled with the inevitable bureaucracy and the difficulty that this Government have in introducing any computer-based system, as we have seen. However, they have not fully understood the delay's impact on farmers.

Farmers were already facing an unusually extended period between their last integrated administration and control scheme—or IACS—payment, most of which was made in November 2004, and the single farm payment, which could be made in December 2005, leading to a wait that might be slightly longer than 12 months. However, that payment is now be to made in February 2006, although we all think it will be made in April, May or even June 2006. We are looking at anything up to an 18-month gap, which has serious cash-flow implications.

As a side issue, the tax implications are also serious, because farmers could end up with one year in which they have no receipts from the Government and another with two lots. The Government have not yet made any pronouncement on that, either. I have already called on them to make an interim payment of perhaps 30 to 40 per cent. of their single farm payment and I maintain that view. At that level, the payment would be well inside any margin for error and it could help farmers through that period.

The issue of bovine TB is central to the south-west and a few other parts of the country. I do not take such a sanguine approach as the Government, or even as the hon. Member for St. Ives, because there are big question marks over the integrity of the trials that are taking place. The case against reactive culling has not been properly made. With culling rates of 30 or 40 per cent., which is all that was being achieved in a number of the areas, there is not much validity to any conclusion. Let us compare that situation with the Irish trials, in which virtually 100 per cent. elimination of badgers was achieved and the validity of the conclusions is right.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman that we cannot have a policy involving the long-term elimination of badgers from large sections of the British countryside. I want a healthy cattle population to live alongside healthy wildlife; it is in the interests of cattle producers and of everybody concerned with wildlife that that be so. The Government are almost paralysed in respect of doing anything about badgers, yet they refuse to accept the evidence that there is a reservoir of TB that needs to be eliminated. We need a way to take out badgers in infected areas—I mean not just cattle infection, but badger infection—and somehow ensure that those are repopulated only with uninfected badgers. That is similar to what used to be described as the clean ring strategy, and we need to move much more quickly towards it.

The holy grail is a live test for badgers, which could be caught, tested for TB and, if they did not have it, let go. We are not there yet, but that is more likely to become reality than the vaccines, which, as we have all been told, have always been 10 years away. We are still no closer.

I endorse what my hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) rightly said about co-operation. It is odd that we are facing the merging of Arla and Camina, two of the biggest dairy co-operatives in Europe. Arla, the Danish co-op, has 80 per cent. of Danish milk supplies and a huge chunk of English milk supplies too, being the sole supplier of liquid milk to Asda supermarkets. In England, Arla operates as a commercial company. We cannot generate a co-operative operation on anything like that scale. Arla on its own—certainly Arla combined with Camina—will be a dominant force throughout Europe. That is an important issue.

I want to touch on the hill farm allowance scheme, which has not been raised. It terminates at the end of 2006 and applies to bits of the south-west and to many parts of the country. The Government have made no pronouncements on what will happen after the end of the HFA scheme. The sum involved is not large, but, given the perilous state of farming's economics, particularly in those disadvantaged areas, even it is important. We should expect a statement from the Government on their intentions.

The fallen stock scheme is clearly causing a number of problems. The Government should look much more carefully at extending the concept of exemptions. They should also look urgently at ways of licensing biodigestion systems as an alternative to the fallen stock scheme. That can take place on farm or in some local, centrally located sealed biodigestion system.

The situation in the south-west, as the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome described, is extremely serious. Farmers look to the Government, as they have for the past 57 years, for some guidance as to the future, but, sadly, they do not seem to be getting it. We have an excellent opportunity, however, due to the fact that someone who is, I hope, a would-be Minister, the hon. Member for West Carmarthen and South Pembrokeshire, is replying to the debate. With similar problems in his constituency, he perhaps has more understanding of these issues than any Minister in the Department.

Perhaps the hon. Gentleman can take the messages that have been sent out during the debate back to the Government. There is genuine concern out there in the farming community and in the wider countryside. Those communities look to the Government for an answer of some sort—not necessarily solutions, but guidance on how answers can be achieved.

Lord Commissioner of Her Majesty's Treasury (Mr. Nick Ainger): First, I congratulate the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) on securing an important and interesting debate. As the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) said, due to the constituency that I represent, I am well versed with the message and the information. Although I do not want to get into a competition with the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome, I might have almost as many dairy cattle in my constituency as he has in his. South-west Dyfed, as the area used to be called, or south-west Wales is one of the major dairy areas of Europe. I do not think that I can cover every issue raised in debate. I will concentrate on the dairy sector and TB while trying to respond to a few points made in the hon. Gentleman's opening speech.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman has not already had this further information on progress made in relation to traditional orchards. DEFRA, in consultation with English Nature, has developed the criteria, which are being submitted to the European Commission. Those criteria clearly define traditional orchards of particular environmental value, so that they will be eligible for the single farm payment. I hope that that gives him some reassurance.

Turning to the dairy industry and its problems and to the issues involving the power of the supermarkets, the Government are well aware of producer concerns about the power of supermarkets and that the market is unfairly balanced. As Members will probably recall, the supermarket sector was subject to a major investigation by the Competition Commission in 1999–2000 and was investigated again in 2003 when bids were being made for Safeway. The commission report of October 2002 concluded that the industry was broadly competitive. However, it recommended the establishment of a code of practice that would put relations between the major supermarkets and their suppliers on a clearer and more predictable basis.

The code of practice was set up and then reviewed by the Office of Fair Trading in 2003. The OFT report on that review found a widespread belief among suppliers that the code was not working, but no hard evidence to support that. Given the reluctance of suppliers to provide specific evidence of alleged breaches of the code, the OFT commissioned a focus compliance audit of the four supermarkets bound by the code to establish hard facts as a basis for any further action. The OFT hopes to publish the auditor's report in the next few weeks. Neither I nor the Department can pre-empt those findings, but I hope that firm evidence will come forward and action can then be taken.

On the dairy sector and the farm-gate price, as the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome identified, the south-west is a, if not the, major supplier of raw milk to the British market. The reasons for the current UK farm-gate price of milk are complex, as hon. Members have already mentioned, with different variations and combinations applying at different times. Factors such as exchange rates, the price on the world community markets, domestic supply and demand, the low value of the product mix, the low level of product innovation and the structure of the UK dairy industry and co-operatives, have all led to the current situation. The average price for milk deliveries in November 2004 was 19.6p per litre.

Members have understandably asked what the Government are doing and can do. It should be made clear that price negotiations between producers and processors or between processors and the supermarkets are private commercial matters in which the Government cannot get involved while current competition rules apply. However, because most problems with the farm-gate price are matters for the industry to address, the Government have taken action, in line with our strategy for sustainable farming and food, to facilitate industry action and get people working together. That is why we have established the dairy supply chain forum, under the chairmanship of my noble Friend Lord Whitty, to consider, among other things, how the sector can improve efficiency through collaborative action.

The forum was created to increase the efficiency and promote the sustainable development of the dairy supply chain. It is working to identify the challenges facing the industry and to provide effective and innovative approaches to those problems. The forum has had a positive effect in bringing together all sectors of the dairy supply chain, and we hope that trust and openness will increase. We hope also that that will change the culture of the supply chain, which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) pointed out, has been one of confrontation since the abolition of the milk marketing boards.

A number of robust discussions have taken place and I hope that developments will occur, particularly in relation to the comments made by the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown). It is clear that the British industry is producing too much of a low-value product and importing too much of a high-value product. I hope also that the developments that emerge from the dairy supply chain forum will work. There has been more and more internal vertical integration of co-operatives. I understand that, as a result of the acquisition of processing capacity, Milk Link is processing some 70 per cent. of the milk produced in the south-west.

There is movement, and the industry is responding to the need for vertical integration. Although I understand the comments made about Milk Marque, it was broken up because there was clear evidence that the pricing arrangements were not compatible with a fair market. The developments on greater vertical integration have meant that a number of co-operatives are involved in processing. That, I hope, will encourage innovation and the development of new, higher-value products that will improve the situation for the producers.

All Members who spoke mentioned the TB problem, which is clearly major and which the Government take extremely seriously. We are absolutely determined to tackle it by working in partnership with farmers, vets and those with wildlife interests. We all have an important role to play. The Government have not been standing still on bovine TB. Following consultation last year, the Department announced a range of new measures to improve surveillance and reduce the risk of disease spreading to new areas. Those measures include changes to the frequency of testing and the imposition of movement restrictions immediately a test becomes overdue.

The Department has been working closely with stakeholders on the development of a new TB strategy for publication early this year. We have set up a stakeholder group to develop a detailed proposal for implementing the pre-movement testing of cattle, which addresses a point made by the hon. Member for St. Ives (Andrew George). Members said that the solution is obviously a vaccine. We are carrying out a great deal of research on bovine TB, vaccine development, badger culling trials, the transmission of disease within and between species, and improved diagnosis. That covers the points made about the spread of TB among deer as well.

The Government are prepared to consider badger culling, but only if the scientific evidence available supports that proposal as a cost-effective and sustainable solution. The data from the four-area trial in Ireland will form part of the evidence used to assess potential policy options under the new bovine TB strategy. Work has already begun on the requirements for a field trial for a badger vaccine, while further work is still required on vaccine delivery, monitoring the effective immunisation of badgers and the effect of exposure to non-target species.

The tone of the debate has been that there is a serious crisis within agriculture in the south-west. The Department's policy is still to develop the strategy for sustainable farming and food, which is a comprehensive and long-term plan for the development of the industry. It is designed to support the farming industry through this period of change and leave it well equipped to succeed into the future.

One of the key underlying features of the Government's approach is a readiness to help farmers to make the change. Funding for the strategy of £500 million, which was announced in 2002, has been allocated and some £200 million will be spent on the strategy in 2005–06. We have a clear vision for the future of agriculture and a strong strategy for achieving that vision. We have ensured that all those with a stake in sustainable agriculture are part of the strategy, as a partnership is the only way to deliver what we want for and from farming. At the same time, we continue to address immediate challenges such as TB with robust, evidence-based policies.

Water Bills (South-West)

11 am

Matthew Taylor (Truro and St. Austell) (LD): I am pleased to have an opportunity to raise the subject of the rapidly increasing water bills that are hitting the south-west; indeed, bills going out to South West Water customers in the next week or two will have risen by 17 or 18 per cent. and that is on top of what are already the highest water bills in the UK.

This issue is not new. I have raised it in many Adjournment debates over the years following the privatisation of the water industry by the Conservative party, which soon got us into the issue of unaffordable water bills. Indeed, the increases, going back to the late 1980s and early 1990s, largely finished off much of the Conservative party in the south-west. It was probably the biggest single issue that contributed to the loss of Conservative seats, and rightly so.

The privatisation involved two major errors, which the Conservative Secretary of State for the Environment eventually admitted in the House of Commons and, I understand, in arguing in Cabinet that something needed to be done to create a fairer water-charging system. By the end of the Conservatives' period in office, he had lobbied on and introduced to the Cabinet proposals to invest money in cutting water bills, but was turned down by his Cabinet colleagues.

What we saw instead was a delay in the programme of environmental clean-up, which meant that the increase in bills was delayed for a short period. However, the clean-up costs could not be delayed for ever, and they are at the root of the proposed increases. The Conservatives created the problem and then, rather than offering a solution, merely delayed the costs of the necessary environmental work for a few years. In some ways, I have sympathy for the Minister, because he inherits the legacy of past mistakes as much as he faces a problem that he has to address for the future.

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): My hon. Friend is making a very good case. The privatisation was so botched that in his constituency, as in mine, many people are fed up with paying through the nose for high water bills, especially given that, when the clean-up comes, they get only primary or secondary treatment. They believe that they should get the best, but they are simply not getting that.

Matthew Taylor: My hon. Friend is right. I am sure that his electorate voted for him because of the many excellent qualities that he would bring to the House, but I am sure that they were also voting against his Conservative opponent partly because of this issue, of which we remain extremely aware.

As I said, the Conservatives made two fundamental errors when they privatised the water industry. First, because of the discounts, big profits were made by the water companies and the initial investors in privatisation. A small sum was set aside as the so-called green dowry to tackle environmental clean-up, but the Conservatives massively underestimated what that would cost. Incidentally, at the time the rules were set, the Conservatives boasted that they had led Europe into setting tougher environmental rules than other European countries had wanted. It was the era when the Conservatives suddenly caught the environmental bug; they boasted that the new rules had been set and estimated the cost of implementing them to be £1.5 billion. The actual cost was £6 billion—four times the amount. The green dowry was inadequate, and water bills shot through the roof. The south-west suffered most because only 3 per cent. of the population lives in the South West Water area, but one third of the beach clean-up took place in that area. It is no surprise that water bills in the south-west are now the highest in the country.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend on introducing the debate and securing the attendance of a Minister, which I failed to do earlier. Does he agree that one of the perverse factors is that, although the south-west has the longest coastline to clear up, it has the highest proportion of pensioners, so those least able to pay face the highest bills in the country?

Matthew Taylor: My hon. Friend is right. Having set out the reason for the bills being so high, it is worth my noting that the south-west is the poorest part of the country—Cornwall more so than the rest. People are on low incomes, so the impact of high bills as a proportion of their income is much greater. In an area where few people are employed by large companies that could establish good pension schemes for employees, many elderly people are on fixed, low incomes and basic state pensions. There are much higher levels of self-employment and small-scale employment than elsewhere in the country. The poverty issue is real. Other Ministers are dealing with that through the objective 1 programme and other work that is being undertaken, but I shall illustrate the scale of the problem that we face with water bills. South West Water bills for unmeasured supplies now average about £420 a year, double the average annual bill in London, which is roughly £204.

When I pressed Ofwat and the director general of water services on the issue, they outlined the increases that we will now face in the present round. The figures tend to be calculated in real terms without taking into account inflation. Given the estimate based on the Government's inflation targets, the cost of an unmeasured supply is due to reach £675 a year by 2009. Average salaries in Cornwall are 20 per cent. below the national average, and many people, not only pensioners, are on incomes of between £10,000 and £15,000 a year, yet they will be hit by a water bill of nearly £700. There is still significant unemployment and deprivation, yet there is no help with high water bills for people on low incomes.

People in London pay just over £200 a year, which is £4 a week—not a significant sum relative to other costs. That reflects the situation throughout most of the country and, thus, the provision that is made in the benefit system nationally. However, my constituents will be asked to pay three times that amount. A £700 bill is a significant cost for pensioners and others on low incomes. Confirmation of the scale of the increase has caused huge concern. When increases were relatively low, such worry died away to some extent, even though we paid the highest bills. There was a feeling of unfairness, but people learned to cope with the bills.

However, the thought of further high increases has now put the issue back up the agenda. Such concerns caused a wipe-out for the Conservatives in the past. They could have the same impact on the Labour Government if they are not seen to be taking action to help people with the problem.

For some people, water meters can provide a measure of relief because the average metered bill will be lower. However, by definition, those who choose the meter system tend to be low users. Families with several children are unlikely to opt for a meter because they may face increased charges. The problem with the shift to metering by people who will benefit from it is that, each time someone cuts their bill by shifting to a meter, the bill is increased for those who are on unmetered supply. Which group of people is most guaranteed to benefit from a metered supply? Those with second homes who do not occupy them for most of the year. They have moved over to meters in droves. That means that people who are fortunate enough to own a second home in the county now pay among the lowest bills, whereas those who live with family and are struggling to meet the costs of that now face the highest bills. That disparity will get worse. The projections of an increase to nearly £700 in the typical unmetered supply does not take account of that trend, so the increase could be higher still.

That is a significant issue, which the Minister may wish to look at. What can we do to ensure that the owners of second homes make a fair contribution to the costs of an environmental clean-up of which they are probably the greatest beneficiaries? After all, why do people buy second homes in Cornwall or Devon? To enjoy the beaches. Why are the water bills so high? To pay for cleaning up the beaches. However, second home owners are paying the lowest bills. That does not add up.

That problem will never be satisfactorily addressed so long as the water bills for 3 per cent. of the population are based on the costs of cleaning up 30 per cent. of the beaches and the natural environment around the country. WaterVoice South West has been very active on that issue, and I agree with it that we need to consider whether there should be such a variation between regions. I tried to persuade Conservative Ministers about that in the past, and I am now trying to persuade a Labour Minister. It might make more sense to have a mechanism for distributing the uneven environmental cost more fairly across the country. After all, many people from other areas enjoy the benefits of the expenditure when they visit our part of the country, but they do not contribute to it.

WaterVoice South West picks up on a crucial issue, which I want to put to the Minister. It investigates the meaning and consequences of the Ofwat director general's statutory duty to "ensure that no undue preference is shown and that there is no undue discrimination against any class of customer or potential customer".

That has traditionally been interpreted as referring to the old and the young, or to those living in rented accommodation and those in permanent accommodation. However, there is a question about whether it is reasonable to have discrimination such that people in one part of the country pay £200 or so for water and those in another part pay £700 or so. That is undue discrimination, and it needs to be stopped, particularly as that cost is borne by the poorest part of the country. Ofwat has not specified whether that duty is national or local. It has been interpreted in the way that is easiest for Ofwat and the water companies.

Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): The hon. Gentleman probably shares my disappointment that the cross-Government review of water affordability does not agree with pooling, which he has mentioned. It looks forward to the possibility of regulatory review, but dismisses the possibility of mergers. However, it refers to some important measures that can be taken now, without a change in legislation. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, as well as tackling and continuing to press the issues he has referred to, we should urge the Government to implement their recommendations as fast and as far as possible?

Matthew Taylor: I agree with the hon. Lady. Frankly, it is a matter of all hands on deck. There is a great measure of cross-party agreement on this issue in our part of the world. We will have differences about some of the detail of the solutions, but there is no doubt that this is a fundamental issue. We are talking about water bills that are going up to nearly the level of council tax. Members who represent areas where water bills are a couple of hundred quid may not understand how big the impact is in the part of the country where they are already more than double that and are set to be triple the amount.

If there is not to be a mechanism for sharing the cost more fairly around the country, the Government must at the very least look hard at how bills are forced up by second home owners and by those who run off without paying, which WaterVoice South West says has substantially increased bills.

If the Government do not want to spread the cost more evenly or cap the differential in rates, perhaps it would be possible to take one of two other measures. The first solution would be to allow some incorporation into benefit payments, possibly though housing benefit, to make at least some reparation for high water bills. There is no doubt that that would cost the Government money, but it would at least mean that those on the lowest incomes who were least able to afford the bills would get some directed relief.

Alternatively, benefit levels could be adjusted by region to take some account of this particular utility cost. The costs of other utilities do not vary by region in such a way, or certainly not to a similar extent. This is a unique issue. It significantly affects people on all income bands, but it particularly affects those on the lowest incomes who are in real hardship. Frankly, so far, Labour's solutions have not been adequate. I do not think that it has really understood the scale of the problem while in government. One suggestion made was that we should experimentally educate 1,000 pensioners on how to save water; that is not really addressing the issue. Nor is recycling the existing help given to pensioners in getting water meters. A big announcement was made about that, a scheme that is already in place. It is great to have some publicity for it, and it is important to make sure that people know about it, but that is not the same as providing a real solution to the problem.

I am fully aware that the Minister cannot possibly come up with a set of proposals now that will address the scale of the need. I am glad that he is here, that he has had the chance to hear the concern of Members of Parliament from across the region, and that I have been allowed the chance to set out the scale of the problem, which I have found often comes as a surprise to Ministers. We persuaded at least one former Secretary of State to take the case to Cabinet. He did not win it, and the Conservatives did not take the action needed. I hope that we can persuade this Minister at least to take the case to his colleagues, recognising that it is a serious issue. I hope that this Government may be more willing to deliver than the Conservatives were. This is an urgent issue; bills are rising now, and people will get news of their first set of big increases through the door any minute. I assure the Minister that it will be a very big issue in the election that is likely to take place in just a few months.

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): The hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell (Matthew Taylor), who I congratulate on obtaining this debate, has been generous on two counts: first, he acknowledged that there is no instant answer to the problem, and, secondly, he said that current Ministers have to deal with a legacy of past mistakes. I must say that this is not the only issue on which we have to deal with a legacy of past mistakes, some of which have an impact over many years and cannot be dealt with even in two Parliaments. I will not go on to expand on the opportunities that further Parliaments will offer. The hon. Gentleman has acknowledged two important points that will help us to have a constructive debate on how we deal with the issues.

The hon. Gentleman does not need to persuade a Welsh politician of the potency of the issue of water and water prices. I acknowledge that the problem is currently more acute in the south-west, but over the years it has been an extremely potent political issue in Wales.

Water bills contribute significantly to the outgoings of many householders, so any rise in bills will have an impact on customers. The Government are particularly concerned about the effect on those least able to pay. The problem is particularly serious in areas where water charges are already relatively high. That description certainly fits the south-west, where there are many low-income households. I am aware that the problem of the cost of water bills as a proportion of income is a particular worry in the area. That is why we have set up a local-scale pilot study, which will take place in the south-west, to look into issues of affordability and the impact of benefits, checks, water efficiency measures and metering. I am pleased that, although there was initially some negative reaction, WaterVoice, to which the hon. Gentleman referred, has engaged positively in the development of that work.

Matthew Taylor: On that point, WaterVoice South West is very keen to meet the Minister to discuss those issues, and south-west MPs would probably like to take part in that discussion. I hope that he, or his colleagues, are willing to agree to that.

Alun Michael: It is more appropriate for my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment, to undertake that. I shall convey the request to him. I should not be filling his diary on his behalf, but I shall pass on the request.

Let us start by looking at the realities of the present situation. Water companies must meet their costs, including those of environmental standards, as the hon. Gentleman acknowledged. Ultimately, all those costs are met by customers. Ofwat sets an upper limit on customer prices, but there is a strong and visible link between what the company spends and the customers funding that through their bills. It has been argued that that makes water companies more sensitive to the views of their customers. Strong evidence in the recent periodic review shows that companies' business plans now pay more attention to customers' priorities, and that is no bad thing. However, it is not the whole picture, and there are particular problems in the south-west.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Bradshaw), has taken a keen interest in the issue of the rising bills in the south-west, and has met a number of MPs from the region to consider the impact that the new price limits will have. In particular, he has discussed the issue with my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Linda Gilroy), who, as hon. Members will be aware, has a particular expertise and background in consumer matters.

It is worth pointing out that we face rising bills in 2005 because charges were cut in 2000. We are facing a rise only compared with five years of lower prices—that can be seen by the dip in the general graph—that were driven by a wish for customers to pay lower prices. However, the regulator Ofwat worked hard through the 2004 periodic review to keep the final price rises as low as possible, ensuring that customers pay no more than is essential to cover the variety of arrangements.

Mr. Heath rose—

Alun Michael: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I will not give way, as this is a very short debate.

Nationally, prices will rise by an average of 8.5 per cent. this April, with South West Water customers paying an average bill increase of £29 in 2005–06. Average household bills for water and sewerage in the region will go up by £87 to £444 before inflation by 2009–10. That compares with the company's proposal in its business plan for an increase of £120 over the period. It is worth pointing out that South West Water customers benefited from the average cut of 10 per cent. to bills in 1999. Although prices will rise between now and this time next year, customers in the south-west will be paying less in real terms than they did in 1999, with the average bill in 2006 being 2 per cent. lower than it was in 1999.

The hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell raised a lot of important points on water charging and the regulatory system, and acknowledged that they are not all new ideas. The Government reviewed the water charging system in 1997–98. That resulted in the Water Industry Act 1999, which includes protection against disconnection and the free meter option. However, we have not shut down the subject for ever, and we remain open to ideas on charging methods and tariffs. I will show the hon. Gentleman's specific suggestions to those evaluating the current position. Clearly, he has here today a bevy of supporters from his party in the south-west. He put forward a number of ideas for reducing the burden on South West Water customers, but they usually involve shifting the burden on to national taxpayers or water customers in other parts of the country.

We are not convinced that it would be right effectively to subsidise South West Water's investment, either through a national fund drawing money from all water companies, or by public subsidy from taxation to South West Water, as has been suggested. Such solutions would run counter to the present legislative and regulatory framework. I wonder whether Liberal Democrats in other parts of the country would be enthusiastic about a discussion with customers in regions other than the south-west, and with those who would feel the impact of any redistribution of the south-west's costs. If the cost of water companies' plans were met by a national environmental fund that drew its money from customers throughout the country, individual companies would have less need to listen to their customers. There would be a lack of accountability and a weakening of the driver that encourages companies to keep their costs as low as possible. As the hon. Gentleman indicated, I am describing the arrangements that we inherited. In changing them and trying to correct what is clearly a major problem we have to be careful not to destroy their benefits.

All regions, companies and customers have their problems and priorities. Whereas such costs as bathing water improvements have affected the south-west most heavily, other problems, such as nitrate removal, sewer flooding and the replacement of worn-out infrastructure, are at their worst in other parts of the country, including the Anglian region and the north-west.

Another suggestion is that we should change the way in which individual charges are met. I have some sympathy in principle with the view that unmeasured charges based on rateable values are outmoded. We are considering the charging system and seeing how it develops. We have a particular interest in how metering develops and its balance with unmeasured charging. I acknowledge the hon. Gentleman's point that a meter benefits small families or individuals rather than large families.

We acknowledge that there is an issue about water affordability. The Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee pointed to that issue, and last year a cross-Government steering group reviewed the way that lower income households are helped with their water and sewerage charges. A wide range of stakeholders were involved in discussions with the steering group, and the Government published its report last December. It concluded that there are measures in place to assist lower income households. Suggested ways for the Government, Ofwat and the water industry to tackle the issues include improving existing arrangements in the short term and studying the effect of the charging system in the longer term.

The report made six recommendations to help vulnerable groups. Following the review of affordability measures, the pilot to which I referred earlier has been established in the south-west. We want to operate it alongside the Warm Front scheme, as there are clear links between our proposals for benefit health checks and efficiency measures. We will also be able to tap into the experience that the Warm Front team has built up in reducing the heating costs of vulnerable households.

The pilot study will offer targeted assistance to help 1,000 households in the south-west to access advice on saving water, to install water efficiency appliances, to check for water leakages and so on. It is also worth pointing out that assistance through the tax and benefit system has increased significantly in recent years. As a result of personal tax and benefit measures implemented since 1997, by September this year families with children will be on average £1,350 a year better off in real terms and the poorest third of pensioner households will have gained £1,750 a year.

I fully understand that that does not reduce the impact, or the perception, of the weight of water charges. The hon. Gentleman raised important issues in opening this debate because, in general, the tax credit and benefit systems do not provide targeted support for the costs of a particular service, such as water charges. There are exceptions—he referred to housing benefit and the child care tax credit. However, rents and child care costs typically represent a far larger proportion of household expenditure than do water and sewerage charges.

Like the hon. Gentleman, we are concerned about the burden of water prices, particularly on customers in the south-west. South West Water customers have to pay more for their water and sewerage services than people in other regions. That is one of the features that developed out of privatisation, which required each customer to pay for the costs incurred by their water company. The hon. Gentleman acknowledged that and he was right to do so. Identifying the problems does not mean that there are easy solutions. Again, he acknowledged that.

So far, none of the ideas put forward fully solves the problems faced by customers, but Ministers are engaged in the ongoing search for a solution. Although we have yet to find it—I must acknowledge that—we have not given up. The affordability assistance pilot study will focus our effort on help to the most vulnerable customers, which is where help is most needed. I have no doubt that many lessons will be learned from that work which we can heed when considering long-term solutions to the problem.

Standards Board

2 pm

Peter Bradley (The Wrekin) (Lab): There is no doubt that there has been a decline in confidence in politicians and in our political systems that has accelerated since the 1990s. It is not always justified but we have to take it seriously, because we cannot afford to allow the public to lose faith in our institutions of government, whether at national or local level.

The Government have done a lot in recent years to try to bring government closer to the people through devolution, commitment to town and parish councils, constitutional reform and the incorporation of European legislation on human rights, and in the long-awaited and yet-to-be-completed reform of the House of Lords. But perhaps the two key principles in bringing government closer to people are the promotion of the transparency of our systems of government, through such legislation as the Freedom of Information Act 2000, and the enhanced accountability of those responsible for those systems of government.

Here, we have the Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards, and it is right that there should be a similar body in local government. That is why I support the Local Government Act 2000, and its creation of the Standards Board for England. The board is there to raise and sustain standards and public confidence in local government. I have to say at the outset that I disagree with the Conservative party, which says that it is unnecessary and should be abolished.

A great deal of mischief and nonsense has been talked about the impact of the Standards Board, particularly on parish councils. It has been alleged that there has been a wholesale exodus from that essential form of public service since the introduction of the code. My understanding is that that is simply not the case; the National Association of Local Councils tells me that of some 80,000 men and women who serve on town and parish councils, only about 80 have tendered their resignation because they are not prepared to submit to the code. The challenge is not to abolish the Standards Board; it is to make it work. We should certainly not throw the proverbial baby out with the bath-water, as I believe the Conservatives are proposing to do.

In general, standards are high among local councillors, but as there are 100,000 of them there are likely to be problems with individuals, and sometimes local authorities can have corporate problems and difficulties. Most councillors welcome the Standards Board. They recognise the need for guidance and support. They need the discipline of knowing that they are held to account. Above all, the public need to know that, too.

I have studied with great interest the evidence recently submitted to the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister: Housing, Planning, Local Government and the Regions Committee, and saw that there was widespread support for the Standards Board from the Local Government Association, NALC, leading councillors and senior officers. However, I have serious concerns about the Standards Board. I accept that its performance is improving, and I welcome the fact that a review of its code is under way. I hope that this debate will contribute to that process. But elements of the code are, in my view, badly flawed and open to exploitation. Also, there are delays in its processes that are themselves the cause of serious injustices.

My first concern is that, for too many, the code has become a licence—indeed, a charter—for complaint. We are all familiar with the serial complainers—the small-minded, small-town curtain-twitchers who are turning some local authorities into battlegrounds on which they can fight out their personal and political vendettas.

Back on 8 June 2000, my right hon. Friend the Member for Stretford and Urmston (Beverley Hughes), then the Minister for Local Government and Housing, said:

"we can expect that the full panoply of the process, leading to the establishment of a tribunal, would be necessary only a few times a year."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 8 June 2000; c. 427.]

I think that she underestimated. Partly because of the ill-defined breadth of the offences under the code, complaints are currently running at some 300 a month. That is up on the figures for last year, which were themselves 20 per cent. higher than the figures for the previous year. One third of those complaints come from fellow councillors, and no doubt still more come from political activists in the community. It is also noticeable that there is a concentration of complaints in the run-up to elections. Last year, 309 complaints were registered in February, 330 in April, and 257 in May; however, there were 444 in March. I am aware of at least one complaint made in the run-up to an election and dismissed after polling day where the accused lost his seat to the complainant.

In many cases, smaller local councils are paralysed by the length and complications of the Standards Board process. It is noticeable that 73 per cent. of complaints come from the smaller councils—district councils, town councils and parish councils. It is also clear that the Standards Board is too often brought to a standstill by the sheer weight of the complaints that it is required to investigate. Until recently, it had to attach equal weight to all complaints, even though 75 per cent. of them were not referred onwards, and even though in 87 per cent. of those that were referred it was found that there had been no breach of the code or that no action should be taken. I am therefore glad that changes were introduced in November that allow the Standards Board to refer complaints back to local authorities for investigation. I am also pleased about the commitment to review in 12 months' time whether the Standards Board should introduce deterrents to vexatious complainants. However, it is my view that excessive centralisation has led to the injustice of delay, with many cases unresolved for well over a year.

So, more needs to be done to reduce the burden and cost of complaints, the mayhem that they can wreak for local authorities, and the damage to the reputations of those belatedly found to be innocent of the charges against them. Key elements of the code are flawed and misguided. We in Parliament have to take our share of the responsibility for passing such legislation without anticipating some of its implications. Paragraph 3 of the code of conduct established in the Local Authorities (Model Code of Conduct) (England) Order 2001 forbids the disclosure of information given in confidence, and in so doing suppresses the duties of oppositions and the rights of whistleblowers; they are important rights in any public authority. Paragraph 4 creates an offence described as "bringing his office or authority into disrepute."

That offence is too broad and a licence for vexatious complaints. Paragraph 7 places on councillors an obligation to report allegations against others and provides a spurious justification for specious complaints.

I am most worried about the disclosure of confidential information—although, oddly, it is the element of the code that has received the least attention. It is a fundamental principle that a councillor's first duty is not to the authority of which he or she is a member, but to his or her constituents. Of course councillors should observe confidentiality when it is clear that the public interest is not served by disclosure, but there is a distinction between secrecy and confidentiality. Where in good faith councillors believe that the public interest overrides the principle of confidentiality, they have a duty to disclose confidential information. If that were not the case, local authorities could simply stamp any document or correspondence "confidential" if they did not want it to see the light of day. That is entirely counter to the Freedom of Information Act, the provisions of which were introduced only last month. It suppresses whistleblowing, and it can be, and is, used to suppress dissent and cloak and protect wrongdoing.

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar) (Con): Would the hon. Gentleman care to elaborate on how the procedures of Parliament would work under such restraints?

Peter Bradley: We have enshrined in our procedures parliamentary privilege, which enables us to refer to information that in any other forum would be regarded as confidential. Unless we can have a free flow of information and debate, there is little point in our being here. I am suggesting that the same principle that applies to us should also apply in other public bodies, and particularly in local government, because as much as we like to think of ourselves as being in the cockpit of power and having tremendous standing and importance, the decisions taken by local authorities often affect the lives of our constituents more regularly and intimately than our decisions. I am happy if I have helped the hon. Gentleman in that regard.

I may not please the hon. Gentleman quite as much in what I am about to say. Had the code been in place in the 1980s and '90s, I would have fallen foul of it frequently, as would my hon. Friends the Members for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) and for—she will have to help me—what used to be known as Westminster, North.

Ms Karen Buck (Regent's Park and Kensington, North) (Lab): Regent's Park and Kensington, North.

Peter Bradley: The three of us were colleagues and comrades in arms on Westminster city council in its heady days. Had we and colleagues not placed ourselves at variance with the code that has since been adopted, many of the wrongdoings at that council, with which we are all too familiar, would not have been detected and no one would have been brought to justice for them.

The case of our former colleague Councillor Paul Dimoldenberg, who is currently the leader of the Labour group on Westminster city council, as he was for some time in those days, exemplifies the need to reform paragraphs 3 and 4 of the code and to address the delays in process, to which I referred. It is an extraordinary irony, and perhaps an example of the Standards Board at its most confused, that a man of such high integrity, who played so important a role in exposing the worst political corruption in living memory and brought Shirley Porter and her colleagues to justice against all odds and all expectations, should now and over the past 18 months have faced indictment before the Standards Board—not for any political or personal corruption, and not as a result of a complaint from a member of the public, but as a result of a complaint by Westminster city council under paragraphs 3(a) and 4 of the code, which deal with confidential information and bringing a council into dispute. He is arraigned for exercising his judgment and revealing wrongdoing as he and we have done on many previous occasions.

I will not go into great detail about the case, but I want to outline the background to it. Councillor Dimoldenberg was concerned about the commitment of Westminster city council to press for the surcharge imposed on Shirley Porter and her former colleague, David Weeks, by, first, the district auditor and, ultimately, the Law Lords when all legal recourse had been exhausted. He had every right to be suspicious because, after all, many of those in the leadership of the council today are former acolytes of Shirley Porter, and he and we are all too familiar with the culture of secrecy, obfuscation and evasion that has long characterised Westminster city council. More to the point, he had evidence of the lack of progress being made in pursuing Shirley Porter for the surcharge. His concerns were shared by the media, which played a key role in uncovering the wrongdoings at Westminster over the years. It was a "Panorama" programme that gave rise to the objection to the district auditor that set in train the investigative process, and it was the long and honourable tradition of opposition parties working together with the media that shone light on the darkness with which many at Westminster would have preferred their activities to be cloaked.

Councillor Dimoldenberg believed that the council was dragging its feet and, back in May and June 2003, he gave evidence to the BBC to back up his claims. He gave the information not for broadcasting, but on a background briefing basis. On 30 June, "Today" broadcast an item that revealed some of that information. In retrospect, it is clear that Councillor Dimoldenberg's actions were fully justified. I shall cite one piece of information in support of that assertion: in the eight months prior to the broadcast, Westminster city council had been spending about £14,500 a month on legal fees—a large amount, although pocket money by west end lawyers' standards. In the 11 months following the broadcast, Westminster city council had increased its activity to the extent that it was paying its lawyers not £14,500 a month, but £120,000 a month. As a result, some 10 months later, in April 2004, it recovered £12.3 million of the surcharge that was imposed on Shirley Porter. There is an argument that she got off too lightly, given that the surcharge imposed was £42 million. But there was no adverse outcome to Councillor Dimoldenberg's disclosure other than the embarrassment of Westminster city council.

Despite the evidence of Councillor Dimoldenberg's standing and integrity and the positive outcome of his actions, Westminster city council lodged a complaint and, worse still, the Standards Board is pursuing it. I said "pursuing", but perhaps that is a misnomer because it is now 18 months since that broadcast on 30 June 2003. It took precisely 12 months for the Standards Board to produce a draft report and it will not be until next week that Councillor Dimoldenberg has his preliminary hearing, and there is no knowing how much longer the process will last.

It is hard to quantify the cost to Councillor Dimoldenberg. When I make references to him, he stands for many hundreds of other local councillors who, for different reasons, find themselves in a similar position. His legal costs are already in excess of £6,000, but that is nothing compared with the disruption to his life over 18 months. He has a demanding career. He is still carrying out his duties as a councillor in Westminster. He has a young family, yet he is being obliged to spend much of his time and energy defending his reputation. It is difficult for us to understand the pressure, stress and anxiety that those circumstances create. On top of that, Councillor Dimoldenberg has serious uncertainties about his future and reputation.

I make no apology for going into the case of Councillor Dimoldenberg in some detail because it exemplifies the urgent need for a public interest exemption to the paragraph in the code that otherwise imposes on councillors a duty of confidentiality. Had there been a public interest exemption, there is little doubt that Councillor Dimoldenberg would not be facing a charge that is as unjust as it is serious.

What is to be done about the code? In November 2004, as I said, Parliament allowed the Standards Board to refer back minor cases to local authorities for resolution. I am sure that that was the right thing to do. On 19 January, the Committee on Standards in Public Life published an aptly titled report, "Getting the Balance Right: Implementing Standards in Public Life", on the Standards Board and other issues. It expressed similar concerns to those that I have mentioned today and made not dissimilar recommendations. It said that the Standards Board needs to be "fundamentally transformed". It wants a more locally based system, more independent members on local standards committees, the removal of unnecessary restrictions on councillors representing their constituents and a clearer distinction between private and official conduct.

In its evidence to the Select Committee, the Local Government Association pressed for more local screening of complaints. There is a valid argument on both sides of that issue, but I think that I disagree with the LGA's position. It is very important that there should be no doubt in the public's mind that complaints are dealt with dispassionately at national level, even if they are referred back to the council for further investigation and adjudication. It is also important to remove any question of political bias in making complaints and considering them, even if that is a greater problem in perception than in fact.

We need to discourage trivial and vexatious complaints. The Standards Board has indicated that it may consider a review of the sanctions against vexatious complainants next year, and that is an important step forward. I hope that that will not be necessary and that the very threat of sanctions against such complainants will deter them. However, they must understand that the petty point scoring in which they indulge can have devastating effects on their innocent victims. They must be deterred if they can be.

It is also wrong that Members or political activists can make complaints purely for party political purposes, particularly during the run-up to elections. I hope that the Standards Board can find a way to penalise those who do so simply for the purpose of media exposure and for no legitimate reason. It is also important to remove the obligation on councillors to report allegations of misconduct. That obligation prevents such allegations from being resolved locally and expeditiously, sets in train the full panoply of the Standards Board and acts as an excuse or justification for trivial and personal grievances. The investigation process needs to be further accelerated, although progress is being made. There needs to be a much clearer and narrower definition of what is meant by bringing a local authority into disrepute. Finally, we need to qualify the paragraph on confidentiality with the public interest exemption, to which I referred.

I recognise that these are relatively early days in the life of the Standards Board, and that there have been some positive changes already. The Graham Committee has already come forward with further helpful recommendations and the ODPM Committee may also do so shortly. I welcome the fact that the Standards Board is reviewing its code. However, it is crucial that in seeking to strengthen public confidence in local government we do not undermine it and, in doing so, cause grave injustices when our purpose is to prevent them.

2.23 pm

Ms Karen Buck (Regent's Park and Kensington, North) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Peter Bradley) on securing this debate. I, too, will focus on the issue of public interest, the need to protect those who find themselves required to blow the whistle on wrongdoing and the fact that the code needs reform. I make no apologies for the fact that I shall use the same case to illustrate some of the flaws in the system as I see them.

It is no coincidence that three former Westminster city councillors are here; they will hope to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Experience of Westminster council has taught us what can go wrong in local government, and we have more reason than most to believe in the principles underpinning a body such as the Standards Board, and in the necessity for proper structures for holding the locally elected councillors to account.

On resuming—

Ms Buck: I wholly endorse what my hon. Friend said in support of the Standards Board—as an organisation and for its principles and much of its work. Alarm bells should ring if those of us who have been at the coal face of local government corruption should now be concerned about aspects of the code of practice and the organisation that all our instincts tell us to support.

In the helpful Library briefing provided for the debate was a news article from The Daily Telegraph, which expressed the view that the words "hammer" and "nut" spring to mind when thinking about the Standards Board. That may or may not be true. The words that spring to my mind are more likely to be "shoot" and "foot".

How can it be that the Standards Board that we needed so much at Westminster council throughout the late 1980s and 1990s is now directing its inquiries against the man who, more than anyone else—with due deference to colleagues here and other key individuals—exposed the institutional corruption: Councillor Paul Dimoldenberg? The investigations are not because of an allegation of an abuse of public funds, taking bribes, downloading porn on a council computer or not signing the register of members' interests. If those were the types of allegations, I would be the first to say—friend or no friend—that such allegations should be fully and properly investigated, because such behaviour has no place in public life. But, as my hon. Friend says, Councillor Dimoldenberg stands accused of bringing local government—his authority—into disrepute because of his whistleblowing actions pursuing Westminster council's recovery of the debt owed to council tax payers by Shirley Porter.

I note that the chairman of the Committee on Standards in Public Life, in presenting the Committee's recent report, told the magazine, Local Government First:

"The Standards Board needs to transform itself into a strategic regulator focusing on those most serious allegations that pose a high risk to the reputation of local democracy."

Such changes, he went on, would

"address the frequent, minor, vexatious and politically motivated complaints that cause a backlog of national investigations, leaving many councillors with allegations hanging over their heads".

He did not add what I have had confirmed in a letter from the Standards Board—that such complaints cost an average of £5,000 each to investigate. Of course, as my hon. Friend said, the accused councillor may in some cases build up many thousands of pounds of personal debt in fighting the charge. It has been noted, but should be repeated, that Councillor Dimoldenberg has spent a year and a half with these allegations hanging over him.

I wanted to spend a few minutes on the issue described here as being a politically motivated concern that the Standards Board is anxious to remove. However, we have a substantial inquiry that seems both highly political and yet strangely stripped of the broader context of public interest.

Central to the allegation against Councillor Dimoldenberg is that he passed information to the BBC that he knew to be confidential and that could have caused harm to the interests of the council. We need to remember that this is a man who has devoted two decades of his life to a virtually unremunerated public service, championing the interests of his constituents in some of the poorest neighbourhoods in London. His record in public life is one of disinterested and effective service in opposition, with neither hope nor ambition for higher office.

When first elected, neither Councillor Dimoldenberg nor anyone else could foresee that the council that he had been a member of for several years would be embroiled in the scandal that began with the sale of the cemeteries and then became the homes-for-votes story. Equally, from the late 1980s onwards, as that scandal unfolded, few people could appreciate the extent to which the so-called building stable communities policy—otherwise understood as homes for votes—reached into almost all corners of the council, implicating councillors and officers in actions that were sometimes reminiscent of a cold war thriller.

Councillor Dimoldenberg and his colleagues may well have been suspected of a touch of paranoia—this was before I joined the council—when they alleged that homes for votes extended beyond merely keeping council houses empty for sale into policies that knowingly shifted homeless families into asbestos-ridden tower blocks and, ultimately, led to a campaign of dirty tricks against councillors and against tenants and community organisations perceived as hostile. Inquiry after inquiry, from the district auditor to the Barratt report, subsequently reported that, clearly, if anything, none of us was sufficiently paranoid to comprehend the scale of what was going on.

That is the important context, which explains why we remain sceptical of what we are told about the Porter affair and its legacy—in this case, about Westminster council's commitment to recovering the debt owed to council tax payers, not least when Westminster's current leader, so different in many respects, none the less continues to refer to the woman from whom the council he leads is supposed to be collecting debts as a personal friend and to the vast apparatus of homes for votes as a "mistake".

I passed an e-mail to Councillor Dimoldenberg in May 2003, from a man who told me:

"I have been investigating"

members of the Porter family

"for the past year . . . I am sorry to tell you that I got a lot further than Westminster's lawyers investigating the matter . . . I offered to hand over my entire investigation and continue to develop the leads we had made. Did they want to know? No.

Dame Shirley Porter's money is alive and well and running around London. You need new impetus at Westminster council."

No wonder I was not as dismissive of that e-mail as I might have been under other circumstances, and nor was Councillor Dimoldenberg. Put simply, the trust we should, and normally would, place in the local authority has been comprehensively forfeited over the past 15 years and the road back has been long, slow and hesitant.

Even relatively recent events illustrate how reasonable it is that we should continue to regard with suspicion the council that Paul Dimoldenberg is accused of bringing into disrepute. For example, it continues to operate its own interpretation of the rules when it comes to standards. City solicitor Colin Wilson qualified the concept of confidentiality, when in an e-mail to council colleagues two weeks after the "Today" programme at the heart of the alleged confidentiality story, he said:

"I am not suggesting that you refuse him any and all confidential materials. Where Councillor Dimoldenberg is working constructively with the council, as he is on a number of issues, there may be no harm in giving him the material. On the other hand, where we are aware that he is opposing the City Council on an issue, and harm to the City Council interests could result from publication of the material he has asked for, we may need to refuse him notice".

The issue of confidentiality—the grounds for Councillor Dimoldenberg's referral to the Standards Board—is not the issue at stake at all. The issue at stake is simply determined by asking whose interests are being served. In other words, the situation is, "I inform, you brief and he leaks".

Peter Bradley: My hon. Friend has just read out a rather disturbing stream of consciousness from that senior officer. If he is right, who defines what a city council or any other local authority's interests are? Who defines what is in the public interest and what is harm? What is the role of opposition if it is not to oppose the council's policies with which it disagrees?

Ms Buck: I completely agree with my hon. Friend. That goes to the heart of the debate that we need to have about changes to the code and the way in which the Standards Board operates in future.

Nor was the instance that I mentioned the only one when representatives of Westminster council acted in such a way as to, at the very least, call into question the true nature of the campaign against Councillor Dimoldenberg. After the original referral to the Standards Board, the council's chief executive offered to withdraw the complaint. However, as an insurance policy, he asked Councillor Dimoldenberg to provide him with a signed, undated letter of resignation from the council, to be used whenever he considered that Councillor Dimoldenberg had breached the code of conduct.

That prompted the local newspaper to argue:

"Effectively, a democratically elected councillor would have been serving at the whim of an unelected and, as far as the public is concerned, largely anonymous official. Such a situation would be a travesty of everything a democracy stands for. Given Councillor Dimoldenberg's reputation for integrity, it is mindboggling that anyone in authority really believed that such a seedy plan could ever succeed . . . This was a crude attempt to interfere with the democratic process".

So this is a council that spawned the largest and costliest gerrymandering exercise in local government history—one which cost the taxpayer many millions of pounds and caused considerable distress and misery. Many officials and councillors were identified as being complicit. They were aware of wrongdoing but not aware of their duty to stop it. Only two individuals were finally found guilty and subject to surcharge. Many of the same councillors involved in the Porter regime remained in office and were responsible for collecting Shirley Porter's £42 million surcharge. A year and half after the case was finally determined in the House of Lords, there were few signs of progress in recovering the debt.

Yet, an opposition councillor who had exposed the wrongdoing and was wholly committed to the recovery of £42 million of taxpayers' money finds himself in the dock for attempting to move that recovery forward, even while senior council officers reveal their own, rather fluid interpretations of both confidentiality and accountability.

Celebrated humorist Tom Lehrer announced on the day Henry Kissinger was awarded the Nobel peace prize that he was giving up satire on the grounds that it was now redundant. While I express complete support for the principles of the Standards Board and for its staff, I am afraid that the referral of Councillor Dimoldenberg makes me feel the same way.

2.49 pm

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): I rise, first, to give the Chamber a short, if temporary, break from the affairs of Westminster city council, and secondly, because I want to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Peter Bradley) on this excellent but necessary example of post-legislative scrutiny—in this case, of the legislation that set up the Standards Board. Before I tell my story, it is important to state that I was a member of the Standards and Privileges Committee for six years. Only one Member of Parliament has a longer record of service on it.

In May 2003, the Labour party lost control of High Peak borough council. Among the councillors who were elected then for the first time were two or three members of the Glossopdale Independent party, one of whom seems to be a fair-weather friend. Almost immediately, those councillors started using the council e-mail system to copy all members of the council and officers into copious amounts of correspondence. Much of it was unprofessional, much was personal and some was libellous and offensive. Some may even have been funny, but the joke soon wore off.

One of those councillors, Leslie Wilcox—I stress that there are two councillors called Wilcox on High Peak borough council; I am talking about the one who represents Whitfield ward—consistently used the council e-mail system to belittle and undermine staff, and was rude to them over the telephone. He included large numbers of councillors and staff in his e-mails, often undermining the work of council officers in front of their juniors, instructing officers to do his bidding, expecting them to behave in an unreasonable manner and routinely accusing them of lying, plotting and secrecy, and copying his offensive and misplaced e-mails to the local press.

Over the months, the chief executive of the council and the reporting officer gave Councillor Wilcox verbal warnings about his offensive behaviour and his disregard for the code of conduct. Much of his attack was aimed at officers in the planning and development departments. It is widely believed that the attacks were a contributory factor in a number of unfortunate incidents. A senior director of one department has announced that he is taking early retirement earlier than originally planned. Another officer has been promoted to a job in another local authority, but the councillor's e-mails have followed him, undermining him in the eyes of his new employers, too. Another senior officer in the same department has had a heart attack, and yet another is considering legal action against the councillor after he publicly accused her of taking bribes. The level of stress-related absence in those departments has been increasing, and councillors have asked officers to record all examples of harassment and bullying.

So, after less than six months as a councillor, Leslie Wilcox was reported to the Standards Board following several encounters with senior officers who had attempted to alert him to the unacceptable nature of his behaviour and his need to stop. He was reported in late 2003. That action was supported not only by the Labour group—the largest group on the council—but by the ruling alliance of Conservative, Liberal and independent members.

In early 2004, the Standards Board took some 10 statements from councillors and officers in its investigation of some seven separate complaints that had been made against Leslie Wilcox. Then, in spring last year, everything went quiet, or at least it did so from the point of view of the Standards Board. Councillor Wilcox was continuing his campaign of harassment, offensive language and the belittling and undermining of councillors and especially officers.

In June, I wrote privately to the Standards Board, expressing concern about the time that it was taking to deal with the case. I discussed it not only with senior officers of the council, but with the independent chair of the standards committee of the council. My intervention was based on the fact that six months into the investigation, Councillor Wilcox's behaviour was as bad as ever, and no amount of internal warnings was curbing the abuse. I stress that I was not presenting any evidence to the Standards Board myself, or trying to influence the outcome of its deliberations; I was simply trying to get the report published, as the situation was going from bad to worse.

Also in June, the Standards Board chief executive, David Prince, apologised to me in writing for the fact that the investigation had taken so long. In September, the Standards Board told the independent chair of the standards committee of the council that its report was almost complete and would be presented in four weeks' time, at which point it would have to be decided whether to send the case to the national adjudication board for England, or to deal with it at local Standards Board level.

In November, the investigating officer from the Standards Board told High Peak borough council that the board appreciated the urgency of the situation—at last—and that the draft report would be ready by "the end of December at the latest".

In December, the council withdrew the e-mail facility from Councillor Wilcox and another sometime member of the Glossopdale Independent party, because the level of abuse had grown even more intolerable. Throughout that time, however, the council continued—correctly, I believe—not to refer cases involving the councillor to its own local standards committee, as it did not want that to prejudice the outcome of the Standards Board investigation.

On Boxing day, I was assured that publication of the draft report was imminent. That was more than a month ago, and we still have no report more than a year after the investigation commenced. Meanwhile, Councillor Wilcox has discovered that you do not need to be on the council's e-mail system to send abusive and disruptive e-mails to every council member and officer. Councillors have thick skins; like all politicians, they have to. However, we should not allow public servants—council officers—to be subjected to such unacceptable behaviour by a councillor.

What is also unacceptable is the Standards Board's response to the case. Its tardiness has allowed a bad situation to get worse. By allowing this behaviour to continue for the best part of two years, it has brought itself into disrepute in High Peak. A bully continues their behaviour even when told not to. The way to combat a bully is not to roll over in front of them and pretend that they are not there, which is what the Standards Board gives every impression of having done in this case.

As a new councillor, Councillor Leslie Wilcox does not know and has never learned what it means to be in the privileged and responsible position of representing a ward. He does not know what it is to be a democrat and to work as a partner with other councillors and officers, and he will not be told. I am not asking my hon. Friend the Minister to adjudicate in this case—the facts speak for themselves—but I want her to know that the Standards Board was initially seen by councillors and officers in High Peak as a friend of local democracy and the independent arbiter of what is acceptable behaviour. In this case, it was seen as a solution to an otherwise intractable problem. It is a necessary part of the regulation of public life, but there is a great danger that if it cannot act promptly and effectively in open-and-shut cases such as this one, it will not be seen that way in future. That is not good for democracy.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. John McWilliam): Order. The hon. Gentleman used the word "you", which refers to me. I assure the Chamber that I have never sent abusive or insulting e-mails to any member of High Peak or any other council, although I will not pretend that there have not been occasions when I might have thought about it.

2.57 pm

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Peter Bradley) on securing this timely debate. Both he and my hon. Friend the Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North (Ms Buck) referred to our common history over many years of struggle on Westminster council. Our experiences from those days show the need for a better system of investigating complaints of misconduct. Were it not for the persistence of a relatively tight—in the sense of working together—group of Labour councillors, backed by a number of determined people working in the Labour party, combined with the persistence and professionalism of a district auditor second to none, John Magill, I doubt we would have exposed those activities. Almost 20 years later we still have not seen the end of the story in that complaints still remain to be dealt with. I find it bizarre that Dame Shirley Porter, who was awarded her damehood for services to local government, still has that award whereas John Magill goes unrecognised.

After my experiences in Westminster, I was elected to this House and now have the privilege to serve as a member of the Standards and Privileges Committee.

[Mr. Andrew Dismore]

Those two factors give me an insight into different methods of dealing with particular problems. We need a system that is proportionate and exercises a degree of common sense, fairness and justice—justice delayed is justice not done. Only that way can we have a system that inspires confidence in the public and the people subject to it. Having seen the regimes of two Parliamentary Commissioners for Standards—Sir Philip Mawer and his predecessor—I have seen how the systems can change and develop for the better. In Sir Philip Mawer, we have a good public servant with a common-sense and fair approach to dealing with matters.

We have an effective way of dealing with mischievous and de minimus complaints, a procedure to correct minor errors, and clear advice and warnings against tit-for-tat allegations. I was the subject of a tit-for-tat allegation in the run-up to the last election. A bogus complaint was timed specifically to screw up my election campaign, but mercifully did not because of delays to the election caused by foot and mouth disease. Therefore, I can speak at first hand in saying that, even if it is a bogus complaint that is dealt with in a matter of two or three weeks, it imposes strain. The intensity of the pressure that it puts one under, the fears for the future and the sheer amount of time that it takes to deal with such complaints are very disconcerting. It does not bear thinking about that some of our councillors are under that pressure, sometimes for years.

We on the Standards and Privileges Committee deal with inquiries very quickly—in weeks, at most, unless the case is very serious, or if the person complained against does not co-operate with the inquiry. That is a better way of doing things. The fact that the work of the commissioner is subject to parliamentary scrutiny, with regular reports to us on progress, is an important check on the system.

We need to be aware of the impact on public life if we do not get those systems right. How can we expect people to devote many hours of service—when I was a councillor it was effectively unpaid service; now people are paid, although not well—to their local communities if the potential shadow of unfounded allegations takes so long to resolve? We need to find a degree of balance. I welcome the Standards Board's involvement.

I do not want to say a great deal about the case of Councillor Paul Dimoldenberg—it has been amply described by my two hon. Friends. However, I will say this about the case. Councillor Dimoldenberg is charged with bringing Westminster council into disrepute, which assumes that it has a reputation to bring into disrepute in the first place. Looking back over those days, I think that the reputation of Westminster council is probably the worst in local government, and rightly so.

I was elected, with Councillor Dimoldenberg, to Westminster council in 1982. I served with him as a councillor for many years, and he has been a personal friend for almost 25 years. I have never come across anyone who is so dedicated to serving his local community, without fear or favour, so determined to stand up for what he believes in, or of such great integrity as Councillor Dimoldenberg. To see him dragged before the Standards Board in that appalling and shameful way, while others go unscathed, is a real blot on our public life.

Councillor Simon Milton and Councillor Robert Davis, two leading lights in the Conservative party on Westminster council, met Dame Shirley Porter for dinner in Israel in June 2001, at a time when the allegations were still being investigated and when the council was trying to get its money back. Even now, Councillor Milton refers to Dame Shirley Porter as a personal friend. I find it utterly appalling that no criticism has been made of them by anyone in authority.

I also find it bizarre that, after all we now know about Westminster council, the Conservative party has still not had the decency to apologise for what occurred under Dame Shirley Porter's regime. That is despite numerous assurances from the then leader of the Conservative party and Prime Minister, John Major, and others, that an apology would be forthcoming if a case was found against her.

I have moved on, and now represent a constituency in Barnet. I should like to give two examples from Barnet. The first was of an unjustified complaint made in September 2002 against the then Councillor Alan Williams, who was leader of the Labour group and former leader of the council. He was reported to the Standards Board by the chief executive, whom he had criticised in the heat of debate in a council meeting. In council meetings, as in the House, we may often get carried away and say things that we regret. On that occasion, the chief executive was perhaps over-sensitive to criticism, and reported Councillor Williams. Some months later, Councillor Williams was interviewed by a junior Standards Board officer in what I can only describe as the star chamber approach; he was given no detail of the complaint against him or the evidence that he had to counter. We have experienced that problem in the House. Under previous regimes, when complaints were brought before the Standards and Privileges Committee, people were interviewed and cross-examined without knowing the case that they had to answer. That is neither fair nor natural justice—it is simply wrong. Councillor Williams was eventually cleared, some 10 months after the complaint was made; the complaint, which was in itself quite trivial, was dismissed.

That example calls into question the relationship between officers and members. My hon. Friend the Member for High Peak (Tom Levitt) referred to one aspect of that relationship. It is important that the right balance between officers and members is preserved. If officers think that they are going to have the whip hand over members, that can unfairly alter that balance. The best example of that was given by my hon. Friend the Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North, when she described the appalling behaviour of the chief executive of Westminster, in demanding an unsigned resignation letter from Councillor Dimoldenberg to keep in his back pocket as some sort of lever over him for the future. If anybody should be investigated by the Standards Board, it is the chief executive who expects that from an elected member in those circumstances.

The other case to which I want to refer is that of former councillor Alan Sloam. Looking at his case from the opposite point of view, he was reported—in my opinion, correctly—for very serious misconduct in August 2003 over attempts to fix parking tickets. The evidence was clear and, as far as I can see, uncontested, but it took until June 2004 for his case to be determined and for him to be disqualified. He then appealed to the High Court; the appeal was heard last week and was dismissed. The borough solicitor will not yet call a by-election to replace former councillor Sloam until the time limit for appeal to the Court of Appeal has expired. Going back to the restraints of sub judice mentioned earlier, that case is not sub judice because no appeal has yet been entered. However, from June 2004 to today, the electors of Colindale ward in my constituency have been one councillor light, and that looks as if it will continue for several more weeks. That cannot be fair to the other two councillors in that ward, who are having to carry a substantial extra work load in a large and demanding ward until a replacement can be elected. It is wrong that for nine months, a ward can be unrepresented in such circumstances. We can argue about the reasons for that, but ultimately, one of the arguments is whether the Standards Board is properly resourced in the first place to enable it to conduct inquiries promptly and effectively.

There has to be a procedure to get rid of the silly cases quickly and informally, as Sir Philip Mawer does. Many such cases are simply not reported to the House because they are so trivial: at every Committee meeting, several cases are dismissed because there is nothing in them. However, there must be a clearing of the decks to allow serious cases to be investigated promptly and properly and with a degree of professionalism. I question whether, from what I have seen of it, the Standards Board has the determination to investigate cases such as that of Lady Porter, or whether it has people of the calibre of a senior partner of Touche Ross. John Magill was backed up by the Touche Ross team, which devoted a lot of resources to investigating that case, and it is doubtful whether the Standards Board would ever have got to the bottom of the Lady Porter saga. We must operate with a degree of common sense, which is currently lacking.

The other thing that must be done is to recognise that the role of the Standards Board, as with our own Standards and Privileges Committee, is not just to punish the wrongdoer but to promote good practice. We hear far too little about efforts to promote good practice in local government, to raise standards, and to explain to people what they have to do to avoid getting into a mess in the first place. In this House, we have got much better at advising people what the rules and pitfalls are, and how to avoid getting into trouble. More of that needs to be done in local government.

The Standards Board is a welcome development, but in practice, it has not operated as well as it should. We do not have a system that commands the confidence—

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the end of the hon. Gentleman's peroration. There is a Division in the House, so the sitting is suspended for 15 minutes.

3.8 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

On resuming—

Mr. Dismore: I forget where I had got to. I think I was summing up by saying that we need a Standards Board that shows proportionality and common sense, and operates quickly and effectively, because justice delayed is justice denied. It is only through such a process that we can ensure that we have a system that inspires confidence in both those who are subject to its regime and the general public.

Matthew Green (Ludlow) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Peter Bradley), one of my near neighbours in constituency terms, on securing the debate and on his excellent speech. He made good recommendations about changes that should be made to the Standards Board and, more importantly, to the code of conduct that it is working towards. We also heard excellent speeches from the hon. Members for Regent's Park and Kensington, North (Ms Buck), for High Peak (Tom Levitt) and for Hendon (Mr. Dismore). I shall deliberately stay well away from the issue of Westminster. I would not dare to tread on those subjects.

Rather than go over some of the points that have been made, I want to raise a few additional concerns. Some are already being addressed—at least they will be if the Government accept the 10th report of the Committee on Standards in Public Life—and others have yet to be addressed. To put the problem in context, out of all the Members present I probably have the most councillors in my constituency. There are 81 parish and town councils in my constituency, and two district councils and a county council cover the area. Around 750 of my 63,000 constituents are councillors, so there is a councillor for about every 900 constituents. The Standards Board probably affects my constituents disproportionately.

As a result of the setting up of the Standards Board and the way it has operated, despite some improvements, some good councillors have decided not to continue even though its investigations have since found them not guilty. That includes councillors from all parties in my patch, people like Robin Bennett, a Labour town councillor, and Alison Cundall, a Liberal Democrat councillor, who were both subsequently found to have nothing to answer. For them it was pretty near the final straw and they stepped down from the council. They were not alone in doing so.

All political parties have difficulty persuading people to come forward to stand for elections, and this is an added problem. One set of elections that we can be certain will be on 5 May is the council elections. We know from talking to people and asking them whether they will stand for election that the issue of the Standards Board is in the mind of potential candidates. It puts some of them off. The publicity surrounding the Standards Board is driving people away.

Robin Bennett, who was an excellent town councillor in Ludlow, writes:

"I want to convey to you the sense of the appalling sequence of events locally in autumn 2002, facilitated entirely by the presence of the new Standards Code, and something of the emotional upheaval many of us felt at the time, leading to some giving up and others declining to take on council work, and others again learning to be so careful in their current behaviour as councillors that the energy that went into their previous local work has been seriously undermined and restricted. Friends do not believe the stories we have to tell, assuming that 'standards' means big stuff like not running off with the money or getting genuine advantage for yourself rather than doing your best by people and voluntary organisations."

That is typical of the mood of councillors in the dozen or so cases that I have heard about. They are only a small proportion of the councillors in my constituency who have been affected. Third parties can also be damaged by the publicity. The Standards Board can hold hearings in public. In one case, despite the fact that it was found that the two councillors had no case to answer, the private details of a third party were mentioned by one of the solicitors. The Standards Board could not stop the press reporting the details of a proposed financial settlement, and the party in question has no recourse.

The other side of the matter is that often the councillors complained against cannot respond to the press, but the press find out all the details of the case. A letter to me states:

"The press were told about my reporting immediately. Confidential letters sent to me and the person who reported me were in the press immediately and when I protested to SBE I was told that they had no control system. However, the actual complaint letter had the name tippexed out. It is thus clear that anyone may make an allegation, with impunity, and put that accusation in the press. I am aware of the national debate about the famous, but at local level, it is a destructive situation."

That has been the effect. The situation paralysed Ludlow town council for a couple of years, although it no longer does so. Numerous complaints were made, mostly against councillors by other councillors; there was a tit-for-tat element. That paralysing effect on councils goes to the heart of some of the problems, and highlights the need to speed up the process and keep it more local. Some of the reforms may be moving in that direction.

Another Labour town councillor from a different part of my constituency came to me for help. He had declared an interest on a planning application, but wrote letters to his fellow councillors. He was subsequently found not guilty of having breached any code of conduct. I took up his case. Part of the problem was that the legal advice that the town council works from is that of the district council officer. There can be different standards of advice from different officers. I have two district councils in my area, and their officers give two completely different interpretations as to what should be reported. An officer who is overly cautious or overly zealous—depending on one's point of view—about suggesting that things be reported can paralyse a local council.

There are concerns that the quality of the investigations is sometimes lacking. Let me offer another quote:

"The officers of SBE displayed a level of ignorance about the rules and workings on government (especially about the division of duties and responsibilities in an area where there are three tier councils)".

Part of the problem is that the Standards Board has people who investigate on the one hand in, say, Birmingham, where there might be a ward of 24,000 electors and three councillors, and on the other hand in parish councils of 500 people represented by nine councillors, as in my part of the world. There are big differences.

There is also the problem of the cost that councillors face. Let me offer a typical example, not from my constituency but from Salisbury. A councillor incurred £2,250 in legal costs to clear his name, and although he won his case he cannot claim for any of those costs, unlike in the normal legal process.

There are a number of other problems. My part of the country typically has single-member wards. One of the most disturbing things about the process has been the way that local councillors are prevented from speaking on a local issue, because they are deemed to have a prejudicial—not usually a financial—interest. Recommendation R28 in the tenth report of the Committee on Standards in Public Life deals with that, and I hope that the Government tackle it. If that recommendation had been in place, one of the hardest working independent district councillors in my constituency, Madge Shineton, would not have been found by the Standards Board to have wronged when she spoke at a planning meeting on behalf of her constituents who were trying to stop a pub being closed. She was found to be in breach and was barred from the council for six months. The people who really lost out were her constituents because there was no ward councillor for six months. I should add that there are not normally elections in that ward because all the political parties think so highly of Madge Shineton that we would hardly even consider standing against her, and yet she is the only person to have been found to have been in breach. The recommendation would have cleared her.

I am glad that the recommendations have been made, but they should go further. The relaxation in the recommendations of the tenth report will go some way to tackling another issue, which has been touched on—that of officers using the existence of the Standards Board and the code of conduct to pressurise councillors. It happens rarely, but it does happen. I know of cases; I do not particularly want to talk about them. A relaxation of the code and a more effective investigation system would tackle those problems.

I do hope that the Minister will agree to implement the recommendations and relax the rules.

Peter Bradley: This case probably pre-dates the introduction of the Standards Board, but the hon. Gentleman will know of, and I hope share my respect for, the former chief executive of Bridgnorth council, who was grievously wronged over an extended period by allegations made against her by elected members. The hon. Gentleman is right: just as elected members need to be protected against officers when they err from the straight and narrow, it is important that the Standards Board also protects the integrity and best interests of officers who do not always have the opportunity to defend themselves.

Matthew Green: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. The case that he cites is well known in the area; it slightly pre-dates the Standards Board. There were some tit-for-tat allegations that beset Bridgnorth council for several years, but they were dealt with effectively because they were dealt with locally. The allegations stopped immediately when one councillor, who I will not name, retired from the council. That is an interesting answer. There would have been a much bigger problem with the Standards Board in place, because it would continually have tied up everyone's time.

I finish by saying that the best way to ensure that local government is clean is to make certain that as much information as possible reaches the public, because if members of the public do not like the way a councillor behaves, they can throw them out. Too much of the Standards Board's time is taken up investigating conduct rather than misbehaviour. If a councillor is displaying appalling conduct, and they are abusing the electorate, as is sometimes the case, the answer lies in the ballot box. However, the Government might want to consider asking the larger councils—unitary authorities and county councils—to record their meetings. Something that keeps this House on the straight and narrow is the fact that what we say is recorded and published. If we say something that goes too far, there is a fair chance that another political party will publish it in a leaflet and use it against us. That is a very effective tool, which is not available to councils because what they say is not recorded.

3.38 pm

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar) (Con): I found that last speech very distressing, largely because I agree with just about everything that the hon. Member for Ludlow (Matthew Green) said. It is not good for me to find myself agreeing with Liberal Democrats. However, after years of Liberal neglect, one can now watch Brentwood council on the internet and every word is recorded.

This has been a most interesting debate, not least because it has given hon. Members, and students of constitutional history, a tutorial on the use of parliamentary privilege. Councillor Wilcox of High Peak will have something to chew over besides his cornflakes when he picks up his morning copy of Hansard. The man may have redeeming features, but, sadly, because of lack of parliamentary time, his Member of Parliament was not able to give us any of them.

Tom Levitt: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Pickles: Yes. It was just a light comment.

Tom Levitt: I appreciate the sentiment with which the hon. Gentleman made that remark, but for the record I repeat that there are two councillors named Wilcox in the borough of High Peak and the other is a fine, upstanding member of the community.

Mr. Pickles: Over the cornflakes tomorrow morning, one will be feeling smug and the other will be gnashing their teeth.

As not enough emphasis has been placed on what it is really like in local government, I quote briefly from "Getting the Balance Right", which states:

"it is possible for the Committee to conclude on the evidence it has received that despite incidences of corruption and misbehaviour, the vast majority of councillors and officers observe high standards of conduct."

That is absolutely right. I agree with the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Peter Bradley)—what matters in relation to standards should be the big stuff, not the trivial.

With some regret, I have to say that the Standards Board has become the problem, not the solution. It is damaging to the reputation and standing of local government and wastes taxpayers' money on frivolous and malicious complaints. It has done much to undermine confidence in councils and councillors. My party plans to abolish the Standards Board and, if time permits, I shall say what we will replace it with. There can be no doubt that the board is being used for partisan, malicious reasons. We have heard some very good examples of that, which I shall not repeat.

The Local Government Chronicle noted that just over 200 of 3,122 complaints made between March and April last year resulted in action being taken against councils. There remains a serious issue for the board in how it discriminates between legitimate and illegitimate public concerns.

Again, the fact came out that the process is risk free for the complainant. They can cheat, lie and fabricate and there is no comeback.

3.41 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

3.56 pm

On resuming—

Dame Marion Roe (in the Chair): As there have been three Divisions in the House during the debate, it will now finish no later than 4.15 pm.

Mr. Pickles: As I was saying, this is a charter for the disgruntled and the grudge bearer, against which there is no redress, unlike in the criminal and civil courts. Malicious complaints can be submitted that place a candidate or political party under a cloud of suspicion before they are cleared. We heard examples of that earlier today. We all know that mud sticks and reputations are ruined by dirty tricks. However, what makes matters worse is that the Standards Board refuses to publish the names of people or organisations that make the allegations, due to data protection legislation.

The Standards Board has a deserved reputation for dragging its feet with complaints. I shall give one example of how councillors appear to be guilty until they are proved innocent. One complaint against six Liberal Democrat councillors in Islington has taken more than two and a half years. I checked with colleagues before we resumed and that case is still going on, but it is unacceptable that it should be hanging over councillors for such a long time. As Sir Alistair Graham, chairman of the Committee on Standards in Public Life, who has been quoted already, has said:

"Justice delayed is justice denied."

He says that that appears to be compounded by some abuses of the complaints system for purely political or personal motives and it is often successful abuse, given the time taken to complete the investigations. We have heard various references to that committee's findings and I endorse its view with regard to proportionality.

[Mr. Pickles]

The Standards Board spends far too much of its time considering relatively trivial things. I also agree with the recommendation on culture, which says that local investigation is withering on the vine.

The Committee on Standards in Public Life makes a third point at paragraph 3.11 that is worth quoting:

"Local government is far more constrained by rules governing conduct than any other part of the public sector we have examined. It is therefore ironic, but not at all surprising, that despite the profusion of rules, the lack of clarity about standards has grown."

In a way, that body is beginning to have an impact on representative democracy. Unless we are careful, we will end up with the local delivery and management of services without a democratic element included.

The Committee on Standards in Public Life report suggests that the Standards Board should be transformed into a more strategic regulator and goes on to explain why. The good old strategic role is in many ways the outer circle of hell for many organisations that have outlived their usefulness and are heading towards the door marked "Exit". Once people have achieved nothing much, they are made strategic and after a few years they are got rid of.

Much reference has been made to parish councils. It has to be noted that nearly two fifths of parish and town councils do not attract sufficient candidates to fill their available seats, there has been a decline in the number of contested parish council elections over the past decade, there is a great problem finding candidates and the situation is worse. People might not have left en masse, but there has been an exodus of a slightly more disguised nature: people are not seeking re-election.

That is why we believe that the Standards Board should be abolished, and we shall do that in our first month in office. We shall seek to repeal the secondary legislation within the first year. District auditors will continue to play their role in investigating financial impropriety in local government and the local ombudsman will continue to investigate complaints made by the public about administrative failures. The police, the Crown Prosecution Service and the courts will take the lead in investigating and prosecuting any breaches of criminal law.

Existing civil law will cover such issues as libel and slander by councillors. We will repeal the codes of conduct for councils and replace them with light-touch advice on declaring personal and prejudicial issues. That will ensure that there is a simpler, straightforward transparency in the conduct of councillors.

What should the sanctions be? If councillors do not meet the highest standards of conduct, which the electorate expect of them, the electorate will take the opportunity to vote them out of office through the ballot box. Alternatively, the councillor may choose not to present themselves again for public office or the political parties may choose not to sponsor that candidate for election.

Mr. Dismore rose—

Mr. Pickles: Let me make a final point before I give way. It seems to me that this should be about the big things: financial corruption and the misuse of public resources. It should not be about using these itsy-bitsy things to get even with the council.

Mr. Dismore: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman and follow on from his last point with regard to Westminster council. He just referred to the importance of political parties taking responsibility for their people. Will he take this opportunity—one of many given to the Conservative party—finally to apologise for what Dame Shirley Porter did during her regime at Westminster council?

Mr. Pickles: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. At times, I have felt as if I were part of some elaborate Friends Reunited meeting of ex-Westminster councillors. The record shows that I defended Dame Shirley in this House, believing that she had a right to the presumption of innocence until she was proved guilty. I am happy, but sad also, to don the necessary sackcloth and ashes and recognise that what she did in Westminster was unacceptable. I support the current leadership of Westminster council in its pursuit of her to get back the necessary sums of money. It is a great shame—Dame Shirley had many things going for her—but justice has been gone through and a decision reached. I do not seek in any way to bow away or back-pedal from that. I hope that my response is sufficiently robust for the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Dismore: How about an apology?

Mr. Pickles: I rather think that that is what I have given. Does the hon. Gentleman want me to abase myself further? I deeply regret what happened in Westminster, although I cannot take personal responsibility. My party supports the current leadership of Westminster council in pursuing Dame Shirley and getting those sums of money back. I have gone as far as it is reasonable to expect me to go.

Perhaps I should make one final point. What caught Dame Shirley was not the Standards Board, but existing, robust procedures to ensure standards. They have been replaced by a system in which members and officers can hide behind the petty regulations of the Standards Board. It is certainly my view that this odious, useless and pointless body—it has achieved virtually nothing, is toothless in its desire and has spent an awful lot of money—should be wound up without further ado. However, I look forward to the Minister's explanation of how necessary the board is until it becomes strategic.

4.5 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Yvette Cooper): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Peter Bradley) for the opportunity to discuss the work of the Standards Board for England. The board's role is to conduct important work, helping to maintain the highest standards of public conduct for local authority members. I want to address some specific points that hon. Members have made; although they will recognise that it would not be appropriate for me to comment on many of the individual cases that have been raised, I do want to respond on some of the principles that have been discussed.

Clearly, promoting high standards of behaviour among councillors and elected representatives is an important objective for the Government. We know that many men and women devote their time and energy to the service of their communities. The vast majority of people elected to serve as local authority members already observe the highest standards of conduct—as indeed do the officials who support them. The strength of local democracy and the delivery of effective services depend very much on elected members' commitment and willingness to serve. We are lucky in this country to have high standards of probity, accountability and objectivity in our local political traditions.

However, we cannot disguise the fact that failings do occur from time to time. There have been cases, albeit rare, where elected members have fallen short of the conduct that is expected of them. That kind of misconduct not only harms the community that members are elected to serve, but can damage the wider reputation of local government and undermine the public's trust and confidence in the system as a whole. That is why an ethical framework is so important. In the Local Government Act 2000, a new framework was introduced to promote high standards of ethical behaviour. After a period to allow people to adjust, it is increasingly accepted by the local authority world as an integral part of public life. It aims to provide clarity about what constitutes acceptable standards of conduct; a fair and effective means of investigating allegations of misconduct; and a regime for response.

In November 2001, following consultation, the Government laid before Parliament a set of model codes of conduct, drawing on a set of principles of public life and laying down the conduct expected of members. From May 2002, the provisions of the code have applied to all councillors. This means that any allegations that the code has been breached can be reported to the Standards Board for England, which can decide whether to investigate. Some changes have already been made; regulations have now enabled ethical standards officers to refer less serious cases for investigation by local monitoring officers and the determination of cases by standards committees. This enables cases to be dealt with locally where this is the most appropriate level.

Hon. Members have raised a series of detailed points and concerns about the operation of the code. This is the right time to review the code. We have had the Graham report, which hon. Members referred to. We know, too, that the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister Committee is looking at the code and issues around it at present. The Standards Board will shortly go out to consultation on a review of the entire code. I will ensure that the issues raised in the debate are passed on and considered as part of that review. However, I want to address a couple of specific points that have been raised.

First, I wish to respond to a point raised by several hon. Members—notably my hon. Friends the Members for The Wrekin, for Regent's Park and Kensington, North (Ms Buck) and for Hendon (Mr. Dismore)—who expressed concerns about the issue of confidentiality and the way in which it is addressed. There is an issue about the relationship between the code and the Freedom of Information Act 2000. We need to ensure that the code reflects the introduction of that Act and operates clearly in line with it. The code of conduct was set out in 2001 in advance of the implementation of the Act. It makes it clear that members must not disclose confidential information, but it does not refer to the Freedom of Information Act 2000 nor does it refer to a public interest defence.

However, the Freedom of Information Act is clear about the importance of public interest and sets out what sort of information must continue to be confidential or exempt and what sort needs to be weighed against a public interest test. We must ensure that the code operates fully in line with the Freedom of Information Act. We clearly do not want to have a situation where, in theory, a councillor can be criticised under the code for releasing information that the Act says should be made public. Clearly, that would be unsatisfactory and unfair, not only for the councillor but for the public.

The Standards Board has already recognised such matters and is concerned about them. Ethical standards officers are expected to consider whether the information was properly confidential, perhaps under the Data Protection Act 1998 or other legislation, or whether it had been designated confidential out of expediency. Ethical standards officers are also trained in the Freedom of Information Act. So, in effect, there is an implicit public interest test on a case-by-case basis. However, in such circumstances it is important that consideration of such issues should be fully transparent and that councillors and the public know exactly where they stand and how questions of confidentiality and of the public interest will be assessed.

The Standards Board will therefore soon be consulting, as part of its complete review of the code, on whether and how that part of the code should be amended to deal specifically with the relationship between the code and the Freedom of Information Act and the way in which the public interest should be addressed. It will be asking specifically for views on issues such as whistleblowing, including the case for a public interest defence.

Peter Bradley: I am encouraged by what my hon. Friend has said. She has given a positive response to the points that have been made. However, how does it leave those who are subject to investigation under the current code, if the code were imminently to be revised because of the anomalies?

Yvette Cooper: As I said, ethical standards officers are already expected to be trained in the Freedom of Information Act and to consider whether the information is properly confidential. It is obviously a matter for the panel and the tribunals to take their decisions on individual cases, so we must make such issues explicit, but clearly freedom of information matters are already considered.

My hon. Friend the Member for High Peak (Tom Levitt) referred to vexatious complaints. So far the board has decided that less than a third of allegations have required investigation. It will be consulting specifically on whether further action should be taken in respect of vexatious complaints. For example, it has been asked whether it should be a breach of the code to knowingly make false complaints under the code. Hon. Members have raised several other issues to which I have not had time to respond.

Tom Levitt: My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) raised the subject of vexatious complaints. My worry is that the decision whether the case that I mentioned should be adjudicated nationally or locally still has not been made, 15 months since the complaint was made.

Yvette Cooper: On my hon. Friend's specific point, the board's target is to meet 90 per cent. of investigations within six months. I will ask the chief executive and the chair of the Standards Board to contact him about that individual case. Obviously, I do not know the details of it, but he must know what is happening with the case and the reason for the time that it has taken.

It is important that we now review the code. Equally, we should recognise the important work of the Standards Board. It would be a completely retrograde step to try to abolish the board at this time. Given the importance of high standards in public life, the Conservative party is wrong to try to abolish it, especially given the history of the issue and the importance of preventing problems such as those that have occurred in local government—in Westminster council and elsewhere—and the importance of ensuring that we have appropriate high standards throughout the country and that they can be maintained. Furthermore, we want confidence to be maintained in those standards. That is the reason for the Standards Board and the code of conduct.

Army Restructuring (Wales)

4.15 pm

Gareth Thomas (Clwyd, West) (Lab): Before I open this debate on an important topical issue in Wales, it would be appropriate, as I hope all hon. Members agree, to pay tribute to those who lost their lives in the recent Hercules crash in Iraq, and to those men and women who have served this country in Iraq and other areas in recent times.

I am grateful to have the opportunity to initiate this debate on Army restructuring in Wales, a subject that has elicited a large postbag of correspondence from my constituency and, I am sure, those of my colleagues who are present. I am glad to see the Minister of State in his place. I say at the outset that, as a Labour Member, I have no quarrel whatever with him on the bigger picture of the fundamental need to restructure the Army, to make it operationally more effective and responsive to modern needs, so he need not spend much, or indeed, any of his time defending that strategy. I would rather he tried to explain why the naming of the new regiments and the antecedent battalions has created so much of an outcry in Wales, and how it can be justified in operational terms. On the more substantive issues—before I go on to the more controversial matter of names, with which he will be familiar—with regard to the new regiment, the Royal Welsh Regiment, does he not accept that, whatever happens, there is a need to retain a regimental base or headquarters in Wrexham in north Wales?

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): Anyone who witnessed the regiment marching through Wrexham only last year on returning from its tour of duty in Iraq will be aware of the strength of support in the town for the regiment and its base, and how that will affect the future of the regiment. I have heard again and again from officers in the regiment about the importance of those local ties.

Gareth Thomas: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend, and I hope that the Minister will take that on board. I know that decisions on a regimental base have yet to be made but, at this stage, it is worth putting down that marker, as well as stating the need for the new Welsh regiment to have a home in Wales, whether in the south or the north.

The Secretary of State made an announcement on 16 December last year about the new infantry structure, which involves the creation of large, single-cap regiments with two or more battalions. In Wales, the new regimental structure involves the creation of a large single-cap regiment with two battalions, to be known respectively as the 1st Battalion of the Royal Welsh (the Royal Welch Fusiliers) and the 2nd Battalion of the Royal Welsh (the Royal Regiment of Wales).

In itself, I would suggest—and this is borne out by discussions that I have had with serving and retired soldiers from the Royal Welch Fusiliers—that that was an unfortunate decision. The relegation of the antecedent regiment's name to a position in brackets after the name of the new regiment was in itself insensitive and something of a slight to the memory of those historic regiments. As the Minister will know, the Royal Welch Fusiliers goes back 300 years. The same argument applies to the Royal Regiment of Wales and its antecedents.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): This is an all-party matter, and what the hon. Gentleman says is fully supported by all parties in Wales. Last night I was with the Blaenau Ffestiniog branch of old comrades of the Royal Welch Fusiliers, and I was told that recruitment is very much a family affair. Many of us believe that if the changes go ahead, recruitment will be badly affected.

Gareth Thomas: That is an important issue because, as we know, the British Army traditionally recruits on a regional basis, and Wales has been a fertile recruitment ground.

Mark Tami (Alyn and Deeside) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that what is asked for is very reasonable? It will not cost millions of pounds and will help to safeguard and protect the proud traditions of the Welsh regiments.

Gareth Thomas: I agree entirely. To rebut any suggestion that sensitivities about the name were not ventilated at an early stage, I should say that I know that the colonel of the Royal Welch Fusiliers, one Major-General Brian Plummer, to whom I have spoken in recent days, did in fact express that view and say that the old, famous names of the Royal Welch Fusiliers and the Royal Regiment of Wales should be given precedence in the new title, so the suggestion that the issue was never ventilated is erroneous, as I understand it.

Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd) (Lab): Am I to understand that military representations in Wales were made to the executive committee of the Army Board? Was the request listened to at that level—that is, by military personnel, and not political people?

Gareth Thomas: I am not privy to that information, but the divisional colonel-commandant may well have expressed a different view, a collective view representing the interests of not only the Welsh regiments, but others, too. As far as the Welsh regiments are concerned, my understanding is that the wish was expressed to the executive committee of the Army Board.

Mr. Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing this important debate, particularly given that it is highly unlikely that the Government will change their mind, although he is absolutely right that they should. I am glad to see the hon. Gentleman's colleagues behind him.

It seems to me that the executive committee of the Army Board unwisely took the advice of the colonel-commandant of the Prince of Wales Division, instead of listening to the Welsh regiment's colonel, Major-General Brian Plummer. The seven regiments that make up the Prince of Wales Division select a colonel-commandant between them. He was not privy to the Welsh view, or, if he was, perhaps he mistakenly failed to put it across.

The point made by the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mark Tami) is extremely important. I hope that the Minister will take on board the fact that the decision is neither tactical, nor expensive, but is based purely on common sense. It would aid recruiting and give people in Wales and their tremendous regiment, which was formed in 1689, exactly what people in Scotland have.

Gareth Thomas: On this occasion, the hon. Gentleman is correct. I hope that the Minister notes that there is a large measure of cross-party support on this issue. My point is that even before subsequent developments there was a strong head of steam behind retaining the old names. To add insult to injury, the Scottish regiments—and one has great respect for their traditions—were allowed the same concession that I and fellow hon. Members seek for the Welsh regiments.

Scotland loses a regiment and we are sorry about that, but the names of the antecedent regiments in Scotland are given proper respect and priority in their new titles. For instance, in the case of the Royal Highland Fusiliers, the title of the new battalion is the Royal Highland Fusiliers (2nd Battalion the Royal Regiment of Scotland). These are significant changes, and we are dealing with matters of sentiment and loyalty which are fundamental to the morale of our forces. I am sure that the Minister accepts that.

If the Minister was not already aware, I can tell him that the situation has gone down very badly, and, rightly or wrongly, the disparity of treatment between Wales and Scotland is perceived as a slight to Wales. I will quote from three letters, which are a sample of a much larger collection of correspondence that I have received on the issue. The first is from Mr. P W Jones, president of the Colwyn Bay Royal Welch Fusiliers Comrades Association. He said:

"As a Welshman and former serving soldier, I was dismayed to learn that in the Government's recent re-organisation of infantry regiments, Wales is being treated less equitably than Scotland . . . we are to have our proud name demoted to brackets and be known as 1st Battalion The Royal Welsh (the Royal Welch Fusiliers) . . . So my question is why is Wales being treated less equitably and why are proud names and traditions being cast aside? We have asked for no more than has been granted to the Scottish regiments. This unfair treatment of the regiments and Wales must be put right."

Another letter came from Mr. Bryan Lewis from Ruthin, a former national service subaltern in the Royal Welch Fusiliers who made his point quite strongly. Talking about that regiment, he said:

"It is the least that this Government can do to respect the traditions of this fine Regiment of which the Principality is truly proud and in showing some gratitude to those who have served the Regiment and their country with distinction."

The final letter, which was distributed to all Welsh Members, came from the right hon. Lord Morris of Aberavon, who served in this place with distinction for many years and is a former Secretary of State for Wales. He put the matter succinctly. He referred to the two old regiments, the Royal Welch Fusiliers and the Royal Regiment of Wales and said:

"Allowing them to place their current names first might, on the face of it, seem to be mere detail in the great scheme of things, especially when there is much that is positive in this reorganisation for our soldiers. But to them, of course, it matters a very great deal as history continues to show, and we fear that, despite general assurances to the contrary, the naming of the regiments in this way will soon strip them of their identity and traditions."

I accept what not only Lord Morris, but my constituents have said on the issue, and I ask the Government to reconsider their decision. I understand that negotiations and discussions are continuing with the Army Board and I hope that there will be movement on the issue. I know that a cross-party petition will be presented next week. A great many Labour Members have signed a letter expressing concern about the decision and explaining how strongly people in Wales feel.

I hope that my right hon. Friend agrees that we have a strong argument and that there should be equity. We are not asking for a lot. The regiments are proud and many people who have served in them lost their lives or suffered great injuries. They are asking for no more than a prefix rather than a suffix. They want their traditions and loyalties to be respected by the Government at a time when their services are, unfortunately, much required.

4.30 pm

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, West (Gareth Thomas) on securing this debate on Army restructuring in Wales and I appreciate his thoughts and comments on the tragedy in Iraq. In previous debates we have set out the logic underpinning the decision to restructure the infantry, but I recognise that the changes have generated and continue to generate considerable debate. My hon. Friend enumerated some Welsh views, which are mirrored elsewhere in the country, and the attendance at this short Adjournment debate indicates the strength of feeling on the subject.

My hon. Friend did not question the underlying organisational changes that have resulted in the decision to form the new Welsh regiment, but rather voiced his concern about the formulation of the names of the two battalions that will form the regiment. It is always worth putting on record the rationale behind the overall changes to the Army structure. I recognise that he accepts that rationale, but not everyone does and not everyone acknowledges the quality of the debate. There are those who still argue against the fundamental principle behind the changes.

Nobody would dispute that the Army must continue to evolve to meet future challenges; to do otherwise would be to jeopardise the fighting effectiveness of our forces. The changes to the infantry are only one aspect of a wider evolution that will enhance the deployability of the whole Army. Once fully implemented, the future Army structure will provide a force better suited to meet the challenges of the 21st century. We are moving towards a more balanced force organised around two armoured brigades, three mechanised brigades, a light and an air assault brigade, and the Royal Marines commando brigade.

It is important to emphasise that we cannot deploy forces that we are unable to sustain in operations. The Army has therefore been reorganised to be more robust and with enhanced enablers. That requires us to make significant enhancements to the key specialist capabilities, including communications, engineers, logisticians and intelligence experts. At the same time, we want to make fighting units, including the infantry, more robust by ensuring that they have adequate numbers and increased availability for deployment. It is our view in the Ministry of Defence that those enhancements can be achieved only as a result of a reduction by four in the number of infantry battalions, which will release 2,400 posts for redeployment across the force structure. That measure is made possible by the improved security situation in Northern Ireland.

I will come to the points raised about the name of the regiment in a moment, but there is a misunderstanding about the size of the Army. It will remain broadly the same size as it is today—between 103,000 and 104,000—until normalisation in Northern Ireland is complete, when it will settle at 102,000. It is worth noting that the Regular Army is measurably larger than it was in 1997, so we have been recruiting successfully and expanding the strength of the Regular Army as a result of a lot of effort. No area in the country has it easy in terms of recruitment: some are better than others, but when we compare establishment to real strength, we find that some areas are significantly under strength. We have been succeeding against some very difficult odds.

The most important factor in the changes to the structure of the infantry is the decision to end the infantry arms plot and the associated move to multi-battalion regiments. The arms plot was a process whereby we moved infantry battalions from role to role and place to place every few years. Although the arms plot maintained broad experience and variety, it hampered the availability of infantry battalions. As we have said time and again—some people are still not prepared to take on board the logic of ending the arms plot—of the 40 infantry battalions, only 26 or 27 are available for deployment at any time. Seven or eight battalions are unavailable due to the arms plot, which is some 20 per cent. of the total infantry strength. That is simply impractical and inefficient.

Ending the arms plot will make most of the 36 battalions available for deployment, as opposed to 26 or 27. The logic and benefits of that are undeniable. Ceasing the arms plot will increase our operational capability. I am grateful that my hon. Friend accepts all that.

In future, battalions will be fixed by role and largely by location. That will release resources routinely tied up in moving location or retraining. The Army will be more capable and effective, because as well as more battalions being available for operations, the new structure will provide continuity of expertise in respect of role and greater brigade stability.

Mr. Wiggin: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Ingram: In a moment. I shall come on to the naming of the regiment, but I thought that it was worth while setting out the background. If the hon. Gentleman is disputing the logic of what I have set out, I am interested to hear his position.

Mr. Wiggin: The Minister has talked about the effectiveness of the Army, and we all accept that arms plotting should come to an end, but I want to press him on one issue. There are three Welsh regiments—we must not forget the Welsh Guards. Can he confirm whether any of those will be stationed in Wales and, as a Royal Welchman and an Englishman, may I urge him, a Scotsman, to listen to his Welsh colleagues?

Mr. Ingram: I shall certainly listen to my Welsh colleagues. If the hon. Gentleman has been following what has happened to the Welsh Guards, he will know that, during my time as the Minister responsible for the armed forces, the Welsh Guards have been sent to Wales—to St. Athan—which is the first time in its history that it has been based in Wales. So, he obviously has not been following closely the traditions of that particular—

Mr. Wiggin: What about the other ones?

Mr. Ingram: All the other issues in terms of where people will be based—super-garrisons and so on—have to be determined. We are developing a process to get to the best position. Again, that applies to where we base the future regiments within the UK overall. There is sensitivity about that issue, which is important because we want maximum regional impact.

The end of the arms plot—I am grateful that the hon. Gentleman recognises that that is desirable; not everyone in his party does—means that the single-battalion regiments, including the Royal Regiment of Wales and the Royal Welch Fusiliers, need to reorganise themselves to meet the requirements for regiments of two or more battalions. There is a drive to all that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, West referred to the announcement made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence on 16 December, when he set out the new structure with regard not only to Wales, but to what is happening in Scotland and in every other part of the United Kingdom. Different decisions were taken accordingly.

We have made it clear throughout that the process of restructuring the infantry has been worked through by the Army. The process has not been manipulated or dictated by Ministers. It is best left to the Army, because the Army has the best understanding in historical and traditional terms and in terms of effectiveness and what it wants to come out of this important restructuring.

A key element of all that was the consultation with the divisions and regiments concerned. In making the recommendation on naming the Royal Welsh Regiment, the executive committee of the Army Board took into account of advice from the colonel commandant of the Prince of Wales's Division, in which the Welsh regiments sit. He is the representative of the regiments concerned. I do not believe that he arrived at this out of the blue— [Interruption.] Well, hon. Members say that that is the case, but there has to be a process of consultation. Every other division went through that process.

A lot of heat was generated—justifiable heat, I have to say, because of the scale of what was going on. I think I am being told here that in Wales one person made a decision, did not speak to anyone and simply passed it on to ECAB. I shall check that out, but I do not think that it will accord with what is happening in the other divisions. ECAB left the matter to the divisions in one sense, but it was not wholly left to them as it had to take into account a number of competing arguments in terms of some advice that was given. ECAB had to assimilate that advice and come to a conclusion.

The new regiment, we believe, will preserve a distinct Welsh identity within the future infantry and will explicitly identify the two new battalions with their antecedent regiments. Their traditional recruiting areas and links to the local community will also be maintained. We have made clear our commitment to maintain the traditions and ethos of the battalions in the new regiment. That will include further work—this is not a completed, rounded-off process—and the regiment and the division will have to consider accoutrements issues, such as the cap badge. It has not yet been determined whether there should be a single cap badge and I would be interested to know whether anyone here has a view on that matter.

Mr. Wiggin: I will happily intervene if the Minister wants to give way.

Mr. Ingram: No, I have already given way.

My hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, West asked about headquarters, basing and local identity. Again, I say that the Army is very sensitive to that matter, as the one thing it does not want to lose is the point of local contact. The preservation of local ties is a matter that it will have to work through carefully to arrive at the best solution. The key is maintaining the links between the regions and the Army units.

Some famous regimental names are going. The Glosters have an issue, as the regiment is being combined with the Devonshire and Dorset Regiment to become a single-battalion regiment of the Light Infantry. There will be a lot of pain and discomfort in the reorganisation, but to get to the position that I set out at the beginning of my speech we have to take some of the pain to get that big, maximum gain.

My hon. Friend compared the arrangements for the Welsh and Scottish battalions—I must say that this has not been an easy process for me in Scotland—and referred to the Royal Highland Fusiliers, which is not a long-standing regiment in the Army, but an amalgamated regiment, as he may be aware. It recruits in my area, but I have not had one letter on the matter as a constituency Member of Parliament, although I have received letters as a Minister. The west of Scotland—

Gareth Thomas: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Ingram: Let me finish this point. That does not mean that the issue is not "out there"; it just has not generated the same issues. That is not a reflection on Scotland's commitment to those regiments that recruit in Scotland.

Gareth Thomas: Why are the Scottish regiments being treated more favourably, as Wales would see it, than the Welsh? Will the Minister respond to the specific point on what we consider the relegation of the old name, compared with what is happening in Scotland?

Mr. Ingram: Many in Scotland do not take that view. Remember, before the announcement there were six regiments or battalions. There was a possibility that two would go, but to maintain maximum regional impact it was determined that it would be best to reduce from six regiments or battalions to one regiment with five battalions.

The determination was made that because the regiment would be the single biggest in the British Army in its new form—going to a single cap badge and a single tartan—this decision on the name should therefore be taken. Every other division was asked whether it had a comment to make on the issue and there were no adverse remarks. There were no representations on getting the same provision for the Welsh regiment. If that had happened, the decision may have been different.

We understand the strength of feeling and my hon. Friend is right: I have received a letter on the matter, which is being attended to, and a reply will be issued shortly. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is due to meet a cross-party group next week and the petition might be given to him then. He will also meet interests from elsewhere in the country that want to raise particular issues.

This is an important issue, but I believe that it is best left to the Army to come the conclusions.

Mr. Wiggin: On a point of order, Dame Marion. Just before the Minister leaves, is it possible, through you, to communicate the fact that Welsh regiments would prefer to retain their cap badges, and two cap badges are better than one?

Dame Marion Roe (in the Chair): That is not a point of order for the Chair.

Housing Proposals (Gloucestershire)

4.45 pm

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): I think that we are about to be interrupted by another vote, but I shall see what progress I can make. I am grateful to the Minister for turning up to hear what I have to say, and I look forward to hearing her response.

I intend to discuss the South West regional assembly's proposals for housing in Gloucestershire and, in particular, the consultation document that it has issued, which is entitled, "Shaping the future of Cheltenham and Gloucester to 2026." The proposals are part of the spatial strategy required by the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Act 2004. The title page of the document also includes the words:

"Work undertaken on behalf of The South West Regional Assembly".

I understand that some of that work was done by Gloucestershire county council.

I have a number of problems with the document, and I will list five of them. First, the consultation period on the document is very short. Secondly, the document is very confusing and, in some areas, incomprehensible. Thirdly, it has taken the wrong tack on housing. Fourthly, its proposals seriously compromise the position of the green belt, and fifthly, they certainly endanger the flood plain.

Powers given to the South West regional assembly and to the Deputy Prime Minister are quite strong. Some might even call them excessive, in terms of house building. In my view, it should be left to local bodies to decide the basis on which houses are built in their area.

Regional government was rejected by the people of the north-east, yet the Government seem to be introducing it by stealth, by giving increasing power to unelected quangos. The regionalisation of England is consistent with the breaking down of the United Kingdom through devolution, which is convenient if we are to move towards a federal Europe of regions, in which countries do not exist. Perhaps I digress too much, but that is an important argument against regionalisation. The quality, or lack thereof, of the document is also important. It demonstrates the folly of having too many layers of bureaucracy.

The spatial strategies will supersede the local plans and the county structure plan. Already, Tewkesbury borough council's plan has cost £300,000, largely because of costs associated with a Government inspection of the local plan inquiry. There are five other districts in Gloucestershire. I think that I am right in saying that Gloucester itself has not prepared a local plan; the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Dhanda) will correct me if I am wrong. A lot of money has been spent on preparing those local plans and the structure plan, all of which will be swept aside by the spatial strategy.

I shall discuss each of the points that I mentioned. Printed along the bottom of the document in capital letters are the words, "Have your say", yet the consultation period is just four and a half weeks; it closes on Friday 18 February. It is already 1 February, and this debate has been held as soon as it could be. The Government guidelines for the consultation period on this type of document suggest 12 weeks. Why, therefore, is this consultation period not 12 weeks? Was the publication of the document delayed? Has that truncated the consultation period and, if so, why was that allowed to happen?

I described the document as confusing. The proposals and the analysis are in parts incomprehensible.

Mr. Parmjit Dhanda (Gloucester) (Lab): I thank my neighbour for giving way. I have sympathy with much of what he has said. Dose he agree that the confusion has arisen at a time when the county council's local plan has not been agreed? He and I both attended a meeting with the Government office for the south-west a little while ago, and there was some contention about the local plan, not least the sustainability of the balance of 16,000 local homes proposed by the county plan, versus 6,000 in Cheltenham, which he knows that I oppose. That is a balance in one area rather than another. This matter arises when we do not know whether that plan has been adopted, so there is no coherence.

Mr. Robertson: The hon. Gentleman is right. The confusion is not helpful, and now we get another confusing aspect to the matter with the publication of this document.

Regional planning guidance note 10 suggests that 2,400 houses per annum are required between 2005 and 2016. The document that we are discussing tests other proposals, including RPG10 plus 25 per cent and RPG10 plus 50 per cent. It says:

"The Steering Group's studies have led to the RPG10 Levels of growth + 50% being discounted as a viable option due to transport constraints and the inability of the local economy to sustain this level of growth."

But it is not being discounted. The South West regional assembly and the Government could go for that option. The wording is not only misleading, but downright wrong. How can this be a serious consultation document if it says that one option has been discounted when it has not? Where have the plus 25 per cent. and plus 50 per cent. figures come from? Were they just plucked out of the air, or are they based on past trends and, therefore, a reliable extrapolation?

Furthermore, the document says that 60 per cent. of the houses should be in the principal urban area. That is also not true; that is not the proposal. The 60 per cent. figure is what the county structure plan third alteration panel report 2004 recommended, but that has not been accepted by the South West regional assembly. It has not been decided that 60 per cent. of the houses should be in the principal urban area. Page 5 of the document, headed:

"How Much Development are We Talking About?", is based on false premises. The highlighted area of the page—probably the most critical part of the document—is based on falsely represented assumptions and arbitrary figures.

4.53 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

5.3 pm

On resuming:—

Mr. Robertson: I was referring to the document on housing in Cheltenham and Gloucester as being very confusing, and I went through some of the detailed reasons for that. I also mentioned the misleading quote in the document, and was about to say that the highlighted bit on page 5 is probably the most important part, but is based on a completely false premise. Falsely represented assumptions, arbitrary figures, approximations, guesswork and a very misleading quote all appear in a very small part of the document.

My next concern is that the regional assembly and the other people who worked on the document are taking the wrong tack on housing altogether. I do not intend to be party political, but in opposition the Labour party said that it would end the predict-and-provide approach to planning. I welcomed that, but in the document we have proposals being made on the basis of birth and death rates, migration, household size, divorce rates and economic trends. Page 13 states:

"If this continues the population of Gloucestershire in 2026 is likely to be in the order of 668,000."

If that is not a prediction, I do not know what is, and if this document is not about providing in order to satisfy that prediction, I do not know what is. Unfortunately, the principle of predict and provide is still going strong. When will the Government fulfil their 1997 commitment to end that approach to housing?

I turn to the green belt. In Question Time on 19 January, in answer to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell), the Prime Minister said:

"For those families who are struggling to get on the housing ladder, it is important that we increase the supply of housing in a planned and orderly way that does not affect the green belt."—[Official Report, 19 January 2005; Vol. 429, c. 810.]

In this document, four options for that increased housing are put forward. Option 1 would be in a "Green Belt, greenfield area". Option 2 would also be in a "Green Belt, greenfield area". Option 3 says that it will have a

"Major impact on critical area of Green Belt. This development would encroach on the area that is most important for maintaining the separation of Cheltenham and Gloucester."

Option 4 also says that it would include the green belt. Therefore, all four options include major building—if not the entirety of the building—on the green belt. How does the Prime Minister square his words in the Chamber less than two weeks ago about protecting the green belt with the document that the Deputy Prime Minister will consider that proposes major incursions into the green belt?

I turn now to the flood plain. Two rivers, the Severn and the Avon, converge at Tewkesbury and continue down the Severn vale as the River Severn, causing flooding all the way down at certain times of the year. It will make matters considerably worse to build on or near the flood plain. Last year the Government's inspector, Mary Travers, suggested building 580 houses both on and near the flood plain between Longford and Innsworth. That was bad enough, but this document goes much further. Its proposals would involve a massive building programme either on or very near the flood plain. That could have serious implications, and it is wrong.

This is a poor document. It is badly written, its assumptions are general and arbitrary, and it proposes a development the size of Gloucester—which is a considerable size—to be built largely, if not entirely, in my constituency, on the green belt, and close to, if not on, the flood plain.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that one of the basic fallacies in this document and the one that comes from the third review of the structure plan is the failure to address the need for some building in rural areas? We do not want to swamp rural areas, but our villages are in desperate need of some housing, and that is left out of all these documents.

Mr. Robertson: The hon. Gentleman is right. I do not want to name areas, but there are places where villages are dying. They could do with a little extra building, and a little extra infrastructure, too. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that that need is not mentioned in this document. People trot out the mantra, "The houses have to go somewhere," but certain areas of the south-west are not developed properly; for example, Cornwall and Devon are not economically developed. All we will end up with is a self-fulfilling prophecy. If we build more and more houses in my constituency, the prices will fall, and people will fill up the houses and then turn around and say, "Well, there we are; we needed the houses."

I am digressing slightly, but I am concerned about this document. The consultation period ends on 18 February. That is bad enough, but I defy most people to understand what it is going on about, the figures that are being bandied about, where they have come from, what this means, what period of time we are talking about, and what is the total number of houses we are talking about. It is incomprehensible. Asking people to respond in such a short time and asking them to understand this nonsense of a document is asking far too much. We are talking about a serious matter, which, given all the problems that go with building houses, could completely change not only my constituency, but the surrounding areas.

I would be grateful if the Minister could address the points that I have raised about the document and let me know whether there is anything that she can do, not to wreck the whole process—I accept that there has to be a process—but to ensure that it is carried out fairly, professionally and competently, because at the moment that is not being done.

5.10 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Yvette Cooper): I congratulate the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) on securing the debate. I know that he feels strongly about the issue and that he has asked a series of written questions about it to which my right hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning has responded.

I want to set out where we are in the process in relation to Gloucestershire and the current debate on developing a new regional spatial strategy. The Government are committed to creating sustainable communities, to delivering the homes that communities need and to ensuring that we have a planning system that will put in place the long-term strategies for delivering the homes and jobs in a sustainable way. As part of that we must ensure that communities are fully involved in developing those strategies.

The Planning and Compulsory Purchase Act 2004, which came into effect last September, implemented a series of important reforms to the planning system. A key feature of the new system is the development of regional spatial strategies. Their aim is to ensure much greater co-ordination of all the work that is essential to deliver homes, jobs, infrastructure, services and facilities. Regional spatial strategies will need to be developed by the regional planning bodies. The reason for doing that is to recognise that many planning issues, including housing markets, go beyond local administrative boundaries. They therefore need to be considered at the regional level and at a more strategic level.

Regional planning bodies are required by the new planning Act to have at least 60 per cent. of their membership from local authorities with planning expertise. At least 30 per cent. of their membership comes from community interests, such as business, voluntary and environmental groups, to ensure that a wide range of views are brought to the planning process. Ultimately, the Secretary of State must also approve the regional spatial strategy, so that there is further democratic accountability at national level.

Regional spatial strategies are not aimed to be one-size-fits-all documents. They need to address particular issues that will come up in their own regions. They also need to seek advice and consider sub-regional issues, which might be more localised than the regional level, and discuss them with county and unitary authorities, which have strategic planning expertise. They also need to work in partnership with planning authorities and others to carry out joint studies, monitoring and other work that is essential to their work.

That is the way that work has progressed on the regional strategy for the south-west. Well before the new Act was in place, the South West regional assembly took the initiative in developing partnership arrangements with the local county councils and the unitary authorities. Joint studies have been agreed for eight sub-regions, based largely on the region's largest urban areas, including Cheltenham and Gloucester. They have been under way for some months and are expected to report in March. Their purpose is to feed into the more detailed consideration that needs to take place later on and into the development of the regional spatial strategies.

The partnerships have been asked to undertake technical work, not to set out proposals for housing or any other type of development. They have been asked to consider a series of alternative future scenarios and take into account issues around demographics, housing and economic studies, green belt and environmental designations, transport and a range of other considerations.

To ensure consistency and comparability between the eight studies in different parts of the south-west, all the partnerships were asked to consider the possible implications of three hypothetical levels of growth: a continuation of existing levels as set out in the current regional planning guidance for the south-west; an increase of 25 per cent. in those levels; and an increase of 50 per cent. in those levels. It is important to stress that those are not development proposals, but different hypothetical scenarios to complete the studies and test the work that was being done. Importantly, the partnerships were also asked to consult local people and stakeholders on that work.

Mr. Robertson: I am grateful to the Minister for explaining the issues very clearly. I accept what she says, but does she not agree that the document is very complex and that it will not be easy for anybody—even people involved in the process—to understand it fully and comment on it, especially given the very short time scale?

Yvette Cooper: I want to come on to the document to which the hon. Gentleman refers. It is entitled "Shaping the Future of Cheltenham and Gloucester to 2026", and is published by a steering group for the Cheltenham and Gloucester sub-region. That group is led by Gloucestershire county council and includes all that county's district councils, the Campaign to Protect Rural England, the community and voluntary services, the Gloucestershire strategic partnership and Gloucester First, which represents businesses. The group is independently chaired. The document contains technical work as well. The consultation paper sets out the steering group's thoughts on what might be the spatial implications of different levels of growth, and asks for people's views.

Mr. Dhanda: I hear what the Minister says. She makes excellent points, particularly about the fact that housing proposals are not made in this strategy. However, at a meeting last week, one of the developers highlighted something to me which implied that a specific scheme called Hunts Grove—of which the Minister will not be aware—in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew), is in that strategy as a given.

Bearing it in mind that there is controversy in Gloucester and Gloucestershire on whether that scheme should be included—not least because there is a competing scheme that would give money towards a £7 million bypass through my constituency—will the Minister urge people to take a closer look and ensure that there are not givens such as that scheme? Among others, the Government office for the south-west is itself in dispute about whether the schemes should be part of the strategy.

Yvette Cooper: Obviously, as my hon. Friend points out, I do not know the case that he mentions, nor its status in the current planning system.

I reiterate that the document sets out the preliminary work required to develop a regional spatial strategy. This is not a regional spatial strategy, nor is it a local development framework. It is not a planning document, but part of the process through which the local area is going to establish the regional spatial strategy. There is an opportunity for consultation on this document right now, and there will be further opportunities for consultation when specific proposals are put forward at a later stage. It is important to reiterate that.

As I have said, the consultation document makes clear the purpose for which it has been prepared and the fact that it does not set out housing proposals by the South West regional assembly. It is right that the community is asked for its views on these important issues at an early stage so that those views can be taken into account as the regional spatial strategy develops. That is what is happening in Gloucestershire and elsewhere in the south-west, with joint study area partnerships for Swindon, the west of England, Taunton and south-east Dorset. They, too, have already issued consultation reports. I understand that other partnerships will also be consulting shortly.

It is consistent with the reform of the planning system that the public are given the earliest possible opportunity to consider issues that can be complex and contentious, and, indeed, matters for strong local disagreement. There will of course be full consultation on the draft regional spatial strategy itself. That is where any firm proposals for housing growth will be made, and that will be the opportunity for full public discussion and consideration. The regional spatial strategy will be submitted to the Secretary of State in December, after full consultation. There will also, however, be a subsequent examination in public by an independent panel during 2006.

There are a series of opportunities for hon. Members' constituents to engage with the process. I recognise that these are issues which constituents want to debate in full. It is important to have as many opportunities as possible at every stage in the process, and not simply at its very end, when definitive proposals have been put forward.

Mr. Robertson: I accept that there are different stages to the process, but I would suggest it is off to a bad start in this particular case. The Minister says there will be further consultation in 2006. Without wishing to be pedantic, I have to say that that really proves the point I was trying to make about the document. It says "if necessary" there will be further consultation, which seems slightly different from what the Minister is saying. So will there be more consultation, or not? Is it intended that there will be, rather than that it will occur "if necessary"?

Yvette Cooper: Let me clarify that point, although I am obviously unsure of the exact wording on the page that the hon. Gentleman is talking about. A draft regional spatial strategy will be drawn up. There will be full consultation on that draft. It will then be submitted to the Secretary of State in December, and there will also be a subsequent examination in public by an independent panel during 2006.

I think we need to recognise the context here. We need to have wide public debate about the future of communities and the need to ensure that the planning system delivers the homes and jobs required. In the south-west, including the hon. Gentleman's constituency, the availability of enough affordable housing is a major problem. The current average house price in Gloucestershire is £191,000—higher than the average for the south-west as a whole. Between 2001 and 2026 the number of households in Gloucestershire is expected to increase by 22 per cent. We cannot ignore or wish away those figures. If we want to ensure that existing and new households in Gloucestershire, and elsewhere, have the opportunity to live in an affordable home, we must ensure that these issues are debated within the planning system, and that the planning system can deliver homes for the whole community, in the right places and at the right time.

The Government are committed to creating sustainable communities and to ensuring that community members have a full opportunity to debate these issues through the development of the regional spatial strategies. That involves a series of different consultations and discussions, in order to ensure that everybody has the full opportunity to debate the future of our towns and cities before final decisions are made. That is happening in Gloucestershire and elsewhere in the region. We need to see that good work continue, and we look forward to seeing it brought together into a regional spatial strategy to help us to deliver the homes, the jobs and the services that our communities need.

Fundamental Rights Agency

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be how adjourned.—[Mr. Ainger.]

9.30 am

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Hull, North) (Lab): I am indebted to Mr. Speaker for choosing the proposed fundamental rights agency of the European Union for general debate this morning. I shall, even outside the House, do my best to persuade my fellow citizens to vote for the European constitution. In 1997, the Government failed by not having an immediate referendum to give them the right to join the euro when they considered it fit. I have now made my position clear, so any strictures that I might have about the European Union must be put into that context. I am a Europhile, but I hope not a Europoodle.

I am a member of the Committee on Legal Affairs and Human Rights of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe. I was elected to the Parliamentary Assembly by my colleagues in the Yorkshire group of the parliamentary Labour party. I am the rapporteur on the overlapping jurisdictions of various human rights organisations in Europe: the Council of Europe, the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe, now possibly the European Union and, ultimately, the United Nations. It is important therefore that their roles should be defined carefully and that there should be no turf wars that could only be to the detriment of the citizens of Europe.

The proposed constitution of the European Union was a carefully negotiated document. It sought to define the roles of the Parliament, the Commission, the Council of Ministers and member states, based on the principle of subsidiarity. The proposed fundamental rights agency threatens to undermine that careful arrangement by the creation of a new institution with a yet undefined role, vague powers and no statement of its relationship to any of the existing institutions of the Community. It is a prospective gift for Eurosceptics, who can frighten their children before they put them to bed by telling them about the new ogre that will invade the civil and human rights of every free-born citizen of this country. It is a new institution with potentially wide-reaching powers, which never surfaced in the long discussions about the new constitution.

Lest it be thought otherwise, I should say that I welcome in principle and in theory the proposed new agency. Individual citizens in the Community have no rights against Community institutions if their human rights are infringed by them. They might have such rights—and should have—if the constitution is accepted and the Community signs up to the European convention on human rights. There is no proper system in the Community to examine European Union legislation in a manner similar to that carried out in this Parliament by the Joint Committee on Human Rights, as was pointed out in reply to the Commission's consultative document in a letter written on behalf of the Committee by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East (Jean Corston) on 9 December.

Furthermore, a power for a new agency to examine thematic matters throughout the member states of the European Union would be a most welcome innovation. For example, procedures on the European arrest warrant could be examined to find out its implications for human rights in member states. So far, I am supporting the idea that was suddenly sprung on us with so little thought and so little preparatory work. The proposal was the result of a deal between Austria—which, at present, has the headquarters of the European monitoring centre in Vienna—and Italy at the European Council meeting in Brussels on 12 and 13 December 2003 at which representatives of the member states,

"stressing the importance of human rights data collection and analysis with a view to defining Union policy in this field, agreed to build upon the existing European Monitoring Centre on Racism and Xenophobia and to extend its mandate to become a Human Rights Agency to that effect."

What did "to that effect" mean? Did it mean that the agency would deal with racism and xenophobia or something far greater? On 25 October, we received our reply. The Commission published a communication containing a public consultation document on the establishment of a fundamental rights agency of the European Union, in which it set out detailed ideas, options and questions regarding the field of action of such an agency, the tasks to be entrusted to it, its relations with civil society, the Council of Europe and other bodies, and its operational structures. Those three main options were pretty vague.

A general public meeting was held last Tuesday in Brussels at which such matters were discussed and at which the Commission, to a degree, revealed its hand. Although acceptable in many ways, that hand left many issues unresolved and undecided. For example, let us consider the relationship of the agency with the European Parliament, the Council of Ministers and the Commission. To whom would it answer? What powers will it have? Will it initiate inquiries? Will it initiate work or will it just relate to suggestions or proposals put to it? How will it be governed? What will be the scope of its work, given that it was supposed to be established on the basis of the European monitoring centre, which has a limited staff and limited finances?

The Commission, however, has put forward the idea that the agency will have a greatly expanded role and will therefore need more people working for it and extra finances. I am not necessarily against such things, but we do not know the thinking behind them. The real problem for us all is the degree to which the development will deal with the acquis developed by the Council of Europe over the past 55 years, which has encompassed not only standards on civil and political rights, social and minority rights, treatment of people who have been deprived of their liberty and the fight against racism, but importantly, European monitoring of the respect for such standards by its member states.

Such monitoring is carried out by several well established independent human rights bodies, with recognised expertise and professionalism on both a country-by-country basis, through country visits and on-the-spot investigations, and, increasingly, thematically. Two examples are the Council of Europe's human rights commissioner and the European Commission against Racism and Intolerance, which deals with racism, anti-Semitism and xenophobia. Through those mechanisms, the Council of Europe monitors respect for the range of human rights obligations of its member states and identifies issues of non-compliance. It addresses recommendations to member states and, in the case of the European Court of Human Rights, issues judgments binding on states' parties when the standards are not respected.

It is important to make clear in relation to such matters the fact that the Council of Europe covers all the countries of the European Community as well as more than a score outside the EC. There are established European standards of human rights, obligations and ways in which to work. The fear is that, if the new fundamental rights agency of the European Union duplicates any or all of the spheres of work of the Council of Europe, we may have a two-tier system of human rights standards in Europe: one tier for the richer countries in the European Union and one for those outside it.

One of the great advantages of Council of Europe membership has been that, in states newly emerged from communism or other dictatorships, independent organisations, lawyers, non-governmental organisations and independent citizens have been able to appeal to the general European standards to which countries joining the Council of Europe must seek to adhere, thereby ensuring that there can be no going back to the standards that existed before the fall of the Berlin wall. Such matters are of the greatest importance.

The Council of Europe does important intergovernmental work on various human rights themes, leading to the adoption of reports, new legal instruments, treaties, recommendations and guidelines by the Committee of Ministers, which also has a political monitoring procedure. In addition, significant human rights achievements result from the practical assistance work carried out to facilitate the attainment of requisite standards as well as from the work of Council of Europe institutions with a broader remit. Linked to that work are numerous activities in the field of human rights education and awareness raising, which seek to develop a genuine human rights culture in European societies. Indeed, last week the Parliamentary Assembly discussed in detail the important proposed conventions on trafficking and terrorism and found them both lacking in important respects. It was therefore able to carry out a thorough investigation of the matters by virtue of the common standards that member countries all accept.

I now come to the role of the new agency. To avoid duplication of the work of the Council of Europe, and to a lesser extent of the OSCE, the work done by the new agency should be fully defined on three levels: first, the field of action and its mandate; secondly, the tasks that it will be given; and thirdly, its working methods and management structures—notably the need to co-operate and co-ordinate closely with the Council of Europe and the need for Council of Europe participation in its management structures. I would go so far as saying, as would be the opinion of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe, that adequate representation of the Council of Europe on the governing body of any new organisation should be mandatory to ensure that there is no overlapping and to draw on the expertise of the Council of Europe in certain fields. If the relationship is ad hoc rather than laid down in statute or clearly defined, there will be a tendency for the new body to want to go its own way and to react to problems in its own fashion rather than having what it might see as outside interference. That would be very dangerous indeed. Given the tasks for the new agency, it has to be adequately financed and staffed. Its proposed role, even in the minimalist scenario, will not be possible with the present staffing and financing of the European monitoring committee.

I have a number of questions to put to the Minister. Do the Government agree that establishing an agency with monitoring powers over member states compliant with human rights standards would be tantamount to giving the EU a general human rights competence, contrary to the careful balance achieved in the constitutional treaty of last year between the responsibilities of the EU and its member states? Will the Government ensure that the agency will operate exclusively in the scope of Community law? Do they agree that the Council of Europe is the pre-eminent organisation in matters relating to the promotion and protection of human rights in Europe?

Will the Government ensure that the fields of action, tasks and powers of the agency will be carefully circumscribed in order to avoid duplication with the role and activities of the Council of Europe? Do they agree that it is important to avoid such duplication, not only in theory, but in the operational practice of the agency, and that it will therefore be essential to ensure that the regulations setting up the agency make mandatory provision for the full participation of the Council of Europe on the agency's management and executive boards, as is currently the case with the EU monitoring centre?

Furthermore, do the Government agree that the debate on the EU human rights agency illustrates the need to clarify who does what in Europe in matters concerning the protection and promotion of human rights? Do they agree that the Council of Europe has an irreplaceable role to play, particularly in ensuring a European framework for co-operation in the field of human rights, democracy and the rule of law? Will they ensure that the up-coming third summit of the Council of Europe will be used to lay the foundations of a stronger, more structured and better defined relationship between the EU and the Council of Europe? Will they make it a priority to set up procedures to ensure that the EU signs up quickly to the European convention on human rights?

I am indebted to the Government for their initial reaction to the EU proposals, as posted on their website. I read it with interest and encouragement. I also found useful the document prepared by our former colleague, Terry Davis, now secretary-general of the Council of Europe, and the discussion paper produced by the Library of the House.

The Government have a unique opportunity to put their firm imprint on the future of the new agency. We will shortly assume the presidency of the European Union, which will give my right hon. and hon. Friends an opportunity to ensure that there will be no federalising creeping encroachment by the Commission in the field of human rights and that it will not seek to intervene with the well-tried human rights mechanisms of so many member states in the EU. Although I will not be able to question Ministers, I will be watching with interest from my retirement to see how they measure up to the task that I have put before them today.

9.50 am

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): I am sure that several hon. Members in this Chamber were a little mystified when they first saw the title of the debate secured by my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara), and that around the precincts of the Palace of Westminster many people are scratching their heads and wondering what the debate is all about. However, this debate has real importance for how we steward the human rights process throughout Europe. Like my hon. Friend, I should say that as a member of the British delegation to the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe and to the OSCE, I come with motivation to put a certain case.

A turf war about who does what in the unfolding Europe—fighting for the rights of one institution relative to another—would be pointless. Let us consider the important issues in the debate around a fundamental human rights agency. As my hon. Friend said, we have a long established and well tried system and structures for the delivery of the culture of human rights and for monitoring the way in which those rights are implemented—through the Strasbourg court, the human rights commissioner of the Council of Europe and bodies such as ECRI and the Venice Commission. That is not to say that there is no role for the European Union in human rights. My hon. Friend made a good case for where there can and ought to be competence for a fundamental rights agency in enshrining those fundamental rights within the European Union, but the agency must not be in competition with bodies that already do such work.

I say that not simply to defend the Council of Europe, but because competing agencies will almost inevitably result in confusion and give those who want to avoid the strictures of a proper culture and framework of human rights an opportunity to find a way through the system. My hon. Friend referred to double standards, and such standards would not simply be high in the European Union and possibly lower elsewhere, but multi-tiered. Those who sought to avoid the strictures would be able to move in and out of the different institutions as it suited them, to pursue their own case or to avoid being brought to some accountability for the human rights of the European populations.

The Council of Europe already does a remarkably good job. In this Parliament there are many whose experience of the Council of Europe would testify to the fact that the existing institutions have steadily expanded the culture of human rights across the European continent and, indeed, beyond—to all our advantage. The debate around the fundamental rights agency and the period of reflection between now and the third summit is therefore an opportunity to begin to establish a proper framework for delivering the architecture of the Europe that is already emerging, ensuring that the boundaries between different institutions are well defined.

I do not wish to say much more than that, because I am here to support my hon. Friend. I say to the Minister that even though the debate might seem a little arcane, it does matter. It is important that we get these things right. It is important that we are not aggressive, trying to prevent the EU from taking competences in areas where it ought to have them, but that we are clear about what we want of the agency, about the parameters of its operation and about where—geographically and in terms of content—and how it can operate. If we establish that, we will profoundly strengthen the culture of human rights in both the EU and wider Europe. We have an opportunity to make what already exists work better and to allow the new agency to work properly. If we get it wrong, we will have a period of confusion, rivalries and competition, which in the end cannot assist anybody, least of all those who have proposed the creation of the agency.

Mr. Michael Moore (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale) (LD): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Tony Lloyd), who possibly revealed the truth about our attitude to the debate. I admit that, when I saw it on the Order Paper last week, I reached for the textbook to brief myself on the proposed agency. I pay tribute to the hon. Gentleman and, most importantly, to the hon. Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) for bringing the matter to the House's attention and giving us an opportunity to consider it and hear the Government's views. As both have highlighted, the debate about human rights and how they are monitored and checked is a key area for us in Europe. It is vital that we maximise the impact of our scrutiny and efforts, and do not create competition between different institutions in different parts of Europe.

The work of the European Monitoring Centre on Racism and Xenophobia, which was established in 1997, has been extremely important. The collection of objective, reliable and comparable information in these key areas is of use in Europe as a whole. In principle, we certainly support the intention to expand that role to a broader human rights agency. Fundamental human rights are at the heart of the European Union, and never more so than now. The new charter of fundamental rights in the constitutional treaty is an important development, as is the stipulation that the Union will accede to the European convention on human rights.

As has been made clear in the debate, at the heart of all the different discussions and inputs about the new agency is the question of its purpose and scope. The European Union as an entity has long been committed to the principles of liberty, democracy, respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, and the rule of law, as set out in treaties past and present, in keeping with the founding principles of the member states themselves. Explicitly, the European Union respects fundamental rights as guaranteed in the European convention on human rights.

The key issue as the agency is set up is whether it should monitor the activities of the European Union's institutions or take a broader role in overseeing the compliance of member states with the principles that they are committed to upholding. For our part, we believe that the agency should have a narrow remit, focused on the bodies and institutions of the European Union. That is important in principle and for practical reasons.

In principle, it is important that the European Union should respect subsidiarity. Each member state has obligations to respect human rights under the European convention and its monitoring mechanisms, not least through the Council of Europe. There are also clear political channels for member states to deal with each other when concerns emerge about human rights issues in a particular country. We must not underestimate the key role that NGOs such as Amnesty International and others play in that process.

In practical terms, the efficiency of any human rights agency surely requires a degree of focus, and its effectiveness will depend on a manageable remit. Regardless of the political issues involved, it is not realistic to envisage a suitably resourced agency taking on responsibilities beyond the scrutiny of the EU institutions. However, we believe that it is important that the body be established. The EU is strong on declarations, but sadly not always great on monitoring or enforcing them, so, within a well defined area, the agency will tackle that deficiency.

The Commission's consultation paper raises further issues about the extent of monitoring within the EU framework and asks specifically whether the agency's scope should include a review of compliance with the charter of fundamental rights. We are keen supporters of the charter, and we welcome its inclusion in the new constitutional treaty on the basis that is clearly set out: it is not mandatory or legally binding and that its provisions apply, as is often stated in the treaty,

"In accordance with national laws."

That is an important statement, but given the explicit flexibility of interpretation, it would be difficult for any human rights agency to be efficient or effective in monitoring that—quite apart from difficulties that we might have with the principle of subsidiarity. We believe that the agency should have a role in considering the policies that have been developed in the EU, particularly extending work that is already done on racism and xenophobia and in key areas of policy making such as immigration and asylum.

There are critical tasks for the agency to undertake, the most basic of which—the collection of reliable data—is already carried out by the monitoring centre. It is vital that as the agency is set up it develops links with civil society and the institutions about which we have already heard this morning. It is fundamental that the agency should not be in competition with the Council of Europe or national institutions that have already been set up for the purpose of overseeing human rights. Therefore, within a limited remit, it should be properly resourced and it should have suitable expertise and, above all, independence.

The agency is important. I am pleased that we have had an opportunity to debate it and, along with other hon. Members who have spoken, I hope that in this important year for the Government, as they hold the presidency of the European Union, we will see the agency move from theory to practice.

10.3 am

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) (Con): The hon. Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) suggested that those of my outlook might want to frighten our children at bedtime with stories of the fundamental rights agency. I assure him that at bedtime I want to calm my children, which I do by reassuring them that we will have a resounding no vote in a referendum on the constitution. If I want to get them straight to sleep, I read them the constitution, which works very quickly; I recommend it to hon. Members who have young children to get to sleep at night.

I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing the debate. He said that he is pro-constitution, but stressed that he is a Europhile, not a Europoodle. He set out some of his concerns about the proposed agency, and he raised worries about the vagueness of the powers that it may have, the uncertainty of its remit and the opportunities that it will apparently provide for people to use it as a weapon against the European project. He stressed that he is in favour of the constitution, but the irony of his remarks is that nearly all his reservations about the agency apply just as strongly to the constitution as a whole. The vagueness of purpose, the uncertainty over its powers and the endless grey areas that need to be defined by case law in the European Court of Justice apply equally to the constitution, particularly to the charter of fundamental rights.

The hon. Gentleman has rightly pointed to those matters with regard to the fundamental rights agency, which whatever else its functions may be, will have a clear remit in the field of interpreting the charter of fundamental rights. I hope that he will reflect on his entirely reasonable, proper concerns about the agency and how it may be brought into being, and perhaps in so doing also reflect on his support hitherto for the constitution. I hope that in due course we will see him joining us in urging people to oppose the whole thing, not just any one aspect of it.

Examples abound of how vague and uncertain the charter of fundamental rights is and, therefore, how vague and uncertain the scope and remit of the agency might be. To give just one example, article I-15(3) of the constitutional treaty says:

"The Union may take initiatives to ensure coordination of Member States' social policies."

Is that a fundamental right? Apparently, it is. I think that all are comfortable with the work of the European Monitoring Centre on Racism and Xenophobia, but extending its remit as far as monitoring the co-ordination of member states' social policies would be truly remarkable and would transform something being done to monitor racism, which is clearly valuable and proper, into something much wider. That ought to raise concerns throughout the House. I am sure that the Minister will be very clear that the Government intend not that the agency's scope and remit be that wide, but that it should be clearly defined, limited, and restricted to aspects of EU, not domestic, law. The question, to which I will return, is whether they can deliver on that commitment.

Another instance of the uncertainty to which I refer arises in the article of the charter of fundamental rights on the rights of the child, which I have pursued with Ministers through written answers. It is remarkable that Ministers are unable to give assurances about the scope of the provisions in the charter. They say that they believe it applies only to EU law, although if an agency were set up that had the powers to monitor, comment on and perhaps investigate actions that were relevant to the charter of fundamental rights, its work may spread into the domestic law not just of the United Kingdom but of other member states.

This debate is welcome and I hope that before we have a referendum we have many more such discussions on the implications of the proposed constitution. The Opposition are unpersuaded of the need to expand the role of the monitoring centre, or to risk undermining its work. That was raised as a concern by the Law Society. The hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Tony Lloyd) was concerned that changing the institutions could undermine some of the good work that is done by the monitoring centre and that we could move backwards during the process of changing the structures and institutions of the European Union. The hon. Member for Hull, North also referred to the good work of the Council of Europe.

This is a clear example of what we might term institutional mission creep. Institutions gather momentum to reform themselves, expand their role and move into new areas, not necessarily because of the pressing need for them to do so, but simply because they are there and they start to look at what else they might do.

We need to ask some fairly fundamental questions about the proposed agency. First, are our domestic agencies failing? Secondly, is the existing monitoring centre performing usefully and effectively? If the answer to the first question is no, our domestic institutions are not failing and are working well, and the answer to the second is yes, the monitoring centre is doing an effective and proper job, the proposal for a new EU-wide agency with new competences needs very close examination.

I have a number of other concerns. If the role of the agency is based on the charter of fundamental rights, surely it should not be under construction before ratification of the constitution, which I believe is likely never to happen. Surely Commissioner Frattini was talking nonsense when, in relation to the establishment of the agency, he said:

"The EU charter of fundamental rights is now part of the EU constitution so we are morally and politically obliged to do this".

Notwithstanding Mr. Frattini's recent helpfulness to my party in matters of asylum and immigration, his remarks on the agency do not bear scrutiny. Is this not yet another step towards the creation of a binding EU justice and home affairs policy? Will the Minister confirm that it is Her Majesty's Government's view that the agency should concentrate more on human rights than fundamental rights? If so, does that not show the tension between UK attempts to limit the widening of EU competences and the inexorable institutional momentum towards seeking wider powers?

Furthermore, do the Government believe that the agency should have a role in applicant countries or in assessing non-EU countries' human rights records? Is it the Government's view that the agency should have a role in assessing action under article 6, which might result in the suspension of the rights of member states in the Council of Ministers?

What will the new agency do that is not now done in the UK by the Equal Opportunities Commission, the Commission for Racial Equality and the Disability Rights Commission, which are themselves shortly to be combined into the commission for equality and human rights? Is it not inevitable that the agency will result in duplication in EU institutions, given that the Council of Europe performs some of the important functions, and in member states? Should the agency's remit extend to member states such as the UK or to proposed European Union law only?

What estimate has the Minister or the Commission made of the cost of expanding the role and function, and establishing the agency, as opposed to the existing costs of the monitoring centre? What will be the UK's contribution towards those costs? I assume that the intention is that the new agency will be based in Vienna, where the monitoring centre has its headquarters. Can the Minister confirm that that is the case, as I have not seen any clear statement to that effect in any of the documents that I have looked at? Will the agency's function be solely relevant to EU legislation and institutions?

In that context, the Luxembourg presidency has spoken of the priority for a draft framework decision on criminal suspects' rights. Do the Government support that? Similarly, the Luxembourg presidency has mentioned a draft framework decision to harmonise penal sanctions for racist offences. Do the Government support that, and, if so, why?

Even though organisations such as Amnesty International have supported the proposal in general terms, it is worth noting that Amnesty International did so with some scepticism. It warned that the agency is likely to have a marginal role as member states will not allow it "to exercise any real oversight of the respect for human rights in their own countries."

Is there not a danger that the proposal could fall between two stools? If the Government—I hope that they will—assure us that they would seek to limit the agency's role to EU law and EU institutions, is there a danger that it will contribute nothing new and that the whole exercise will turn out to have been pointless? I look forward to hearing the Minister's response to hon. Members' questions. The challenge that faces him is profound: to give clear guarantees and assurances about something that is undefined. He must explain the need for a body which arises from a constitution that is not in force and that in all probability never will be.

So far, all who have spoken in this debate have favoured a narrow remit and the preservation of the role of important institutions such as the Council of Europe in protecting human rights. The question is not just whether Her Majesty's Government say that they agree with that narrow remit, but whether they can deliver on that. So far, the indications are that they either cannot or will not stop the institutional creep or the spread of competences in the European Union. If the constitution were ever to be in force, that process would accelerate and be ever harder to control.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. David Lammy): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) on securing the debate and on his thoughtful speech, which was characteristic of his extensive knowledge of human rights issues and his wealth of experience as a member of the Joint Committee on Human Rights and the Committee on Legal Affairs and Human Rights of the Council of Europe. I read with interest his report to the latter Committee on the plans to set up a fundamental rights agency for the European Union.

We have had an interesting debate and I am pleased that there appears to be little difference between the views of my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North, supported by my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central (Tony Lloyd), and the position espoused by the hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Moore). Our position was set out in our response to the consultation document issued by the European Union Commission on 25 October. The hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) raised a number of issues that I thought were dealt with very clearly in that consultation document. Information is available on our website and the Government make their position clear.

Mr. Brady: The difficulty in dealing with matters of EU legislation is that the Government make clear their position, but the eventual outcome can be completely different. Will the Minister give an undertaking that the Government would veto any developments that are not entirely in keeping with the commitments given and the views expressed in that consultation?

Mr. Lammy: The hon. Gentleman knows the rules of the game; he knows that we are at the beginning of a negotiation and that the outcome on the fundamental rights agency requires unanimity across Europe. He knows that; I know that. We are having a serious discussion about the role of human rights across Europe and the role that a fundamental rights agency would play. The Government do not go into negotiations presupposing their outcomes—he knows that. Indeed, all Governments have taken that view over the past few years.

Fundamentally, like my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North, the Government welcome the decision of the European Council to extend the remit of the European Monitoring Centre on Racism and Xenophobia in order to create a fundamental rights agency. Also like my hon. Friend, we believe that the role, remit and powers of the agency deserve careful consideration if it is to add value to the existing protections for human rights in Europe. That said, it is important to point out that, as I said to the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West, we are still at the very early stages of negotiation on the remit and powers of the proposed agency, and this very Adjournment debate contributes to that process.

We are interested in hearing what others say. A final decision on the agency will require a unanimous decision by all 25 member states, so our presidency of the European Union later this year will have an important task in leading member states towards an agency that will genuinely add value to Europe. That has been at the nub of this debate. We have heard a range of views, and it might be useful if I gave some background on the proposal.

In December 2003, the European Council decided to extend the remit of the monitoring centre to convert it into a human rights agency. In October 2004, the Commission sought member states' views on the agency's field of interest, its remit, its geographical scope, the task that it might be given and its structure and size. The Commission proposed two options, based on two alternative visions of what shape the agency might take. The first option would confine the agency's remit to Community law. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North knows, that option would avoid duplicating the work of other bodies that operate at national and international level, and would complement the existing Community system of protecting and promoting fundamental rights, as my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central was keen to ensure.

Mr. Brady: The House of Commons Library note on this debate quotes a United Kingdom Government representative who insisted that the agency's remit should be confined to EU law. He added:

"It should concentrate more on human rights than fundamental rights".

The Minister has welcomed the extension of application to fundamental rights. Does that indicate a change in the Government's policy on this matter? If not, can he give an indication of what that representative meant by what he said?

Mr. Lammy: There is no change. I have made the Government's position clear. If the hon. Gentleman allows me, I shall go on to explain that that remit is specific to EU institutions. There is a role for a fundamental rights agency to play; that is what we proposed in the published document on our website, which I encourage him to read.

Mr. Brady: I think that I understand from the Minister's answer that he believes that a role in fundamental rights with regard to EU institutions would be appropriate. I think that he said that. Is he making that distinction: the agency should be relevant to human rights only when it considers things other than EU institutions, but its remit could extend to fundamental rights in reference to EU institutions?

Mr. Lammy: I did not talk about rights in the way that the hon. Gentleman puts it. I talked about European Community law, and in that sense I do not accept the rather simplistic distinction—I hope that he will forgive me—that he draws between fundamental rights and human rights per se. I talked about European Community law, and I shall stick to that position for the purposes of Hansard.

The second option proposed by the Commission was for an agency with a more interventionist role and a very wide remit on freedom, democracy and the rule of law, in addition to fundamental rights. We sent our response to the Commission on 10 January. Hon. Members will be pleased to know that it indicated our clear preference for the first option. We expect the Commission to produce a draft regulation in June to establish the agency, following in-depth consultations with all involved in the development of fundamental rights in the EU. Once the draft regulation has been issued, member states will begin negotiations on an agreed final version in consultation with the European Parliament. We hope during our presidency to complete the work necessary to bring the agency into existence, with a view to its commencing its business on 1 January 2007.

The UK Government strongly believe that the new agency should focus its attention and energies on ensuring that the institutions of the European Union comply with human rights when they propose new laws and implement existing ones. All member states are required, of course, to observe the European convention on human rights. However, the EU has not yet established an independent body to advise its institutions on how best to take into account the need to respect human rights, and the new agency should fill that distinct gap.

Such a role is very important, as our Joint Committee on Human Rights has shown continually in the domestic context. The proposal fits with the Government's intention to establish a commission for equality and human rights that would take forward that promotional role and ensure that our domestic institutions are doing the job of promoting human rights. In the same way, that work can be done within our EU institutions and there is a role to play there.

We believe that the agency's primary purpose should be data collection and analysis. In doing that, it would build on the functions of the monitoring centre and expand its reach from anti-discrimination into the wider field of human rights. I say again to the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West that there is now a broad consensus about the key relationship between the fields of equality and discrimination and of human rights. Human rights underpin all those issues, competing and conflicting as they may be, to ensure that that human rights-inclusive goal can meet the aims of all in society who experience a particular discrimination, because of gender, race, sexuality or whatever. That is a broad consensus, and I am surprised to hear that the official Opposition are departing from it.

Mr. Brady: The Minister is—I am sure inadvertently—misrepresenting the Opposition's position. I have made no comment against the combination of the various agencies to ensure equality. My question was whether it was not the case that the UK agencies are able to fulfil those functions and do not need to be augmented by an EU agency that might interfere with, or possibly diminish, their role.

Mr. Lammy: I am absolutely delighted that the hon. Gentleman has said that the official Opposition will support us on the establishment of the commission for equality and human rights when we bring forward that Bill later this Session. On his second point, I should say that I thought that I made it clear that the body would be about European institutions. The hon. Gentleman continues to talk about the domestic position.

Mr. Brady: Five minutes ago, the Minister said that one of the agency's roles would be to monitor human rights performance in member states. He really needs to be more consistent in his position. Will he now be clear? Will the agency have that monitoring role or not?

Mr. Lammy: We are entering something of an oxymoron. I talked about data and analysis and that key role for European institutions. I thought that that was patently clear, and I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman has failed to understand the point. There is a key role in Europe, as there is domestically. That is why the Government put forward their proposals a few weeks ago. The agency should operate in areas in which it can best add value, instead of trying to cover the whole range of human rights issues. It should prioritise its work thematically—my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North said much on that—and concentrate its activities where the need for more information and increased awareness of fundamental rights is greatest. However, as all hon. Members except the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West have said this morning, we must avoid duplication.

The Government do not see the agency as a body that will examine the policies and practices of individual member states. Such a remit would be inconsistent with the principle of subsidiarity. The agency's focus should be on EU institutions and on member states only when they are implementing EU legislation. We are worried that to give the agency a wide remit would result in substantial duplication and possible conflict with existing agencies. Above all, we do not want unwelcome and inefficient duplication with established or developing institutions in the Council of Europe, the EU or member states, or the creation of another source of authority on the interpretation of human rights in Europe. The Council of Europe and the European Court of Human Rights already give a strong and internationally respected lead on that. To create new sources of authority is likely to lead to confusion, a dilution of authority and, perversely, a weakening of protection for fundamental rights.

There is, therefore, an important path to tread and an important line that we must not cross. That is what the Government will seek to do as we enter the negotiations. I hope that that gives my hon. Friends the Members for Hull, North and for Manchester, Central and the hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale the assurance that they seek. We do not believe that the fundamental rights agency should play a policy or operational role in human rights issues in third countries. There might be merit in giving it a role in assisting candidate states to membership of the EU, but that should not replicate the work of other institutions in assessing candidate states. Rather, it should complement existing initiatives, providing an educational and supportive role. The agency might work alongside civil society in candidate countries, including with NGOs, universities and community groups, with a view to ensuring the long-term sustainability of human rights promotion in the country.

[Mr. Lammy]

The monitoring centre was established in 1997 to provide the community and member states

"with objective, reliable and comparative data at a European level on the phenomenon of racism, xenophobia and anti-Semitism in order to help them when they take measures or formulate courses of action within their respective spheres of competence."

That is important work, which needs to continue. We must ensure that it is not diluted in any way.

The tasks of data and information gathering carried out by the monitoring centre and the transmission of its findings to Community institutions and member states to help influence policy formulation have proved beneficial. For example, the monitoring centre has produced important reports on anti-Semitism and on the way in which the education system in EU states is still failing migrant and minority pupils. It has also highlighted continuing racism in Europe against the Roma community. Indeed, if we get it right, the fundamental rights agency can bring even greater value to all of us across Europe.

Mr. McNamara: I support all that my hon. Friend said about the achievements of the monitoring centre. The monitoring centre has an agreement with ECRI to cover possible duplication and the statutory representation of the Community on ECRI and the Council of Europe. Do the Government intend to seek to ensure that the statutory representation in respect of the Council of Europe will extend to the new agency's management board?

Mr. Lammy: At the heart of what my hon. Friend asked about is the key relationship between the two bodies. We are keen to ensure that the Council of Europe retains its authority. The example of the monitoring centre gives us an established format for establishing that relationship. That is an option that member states will discuss in the negotiations. My hon. Friend will understand that, at this stage, it is difficult to say what the outcomes of those discussions will be, but the Government's position is clear: the existing agencies, including the Council of Europe and its authority, should not be undermined by the new FRA. The structures of the FRA will have to take that fact clearly into account.

Mr. McNamara: I am grateful for that carefully phrased answer.

I am also concerned because, when the Commission's representative discussed the options in Brussels last week, he did not support the concept of an active role for the Council of Europe on a new management body. That is the attitude of the Commission. In my talks with them, representatives of the Commission have taken a "Sinn Fein" attitude towards the Community and shown a desire to go it alone without any representation from elsewhere. That is why I raised the issue. I urge my hon. Friend and his colleagues in the Government to ensure that the creeping power that the Commission seeks does not emerge.

Mr. Lammy: My hon. Friend could not have put that concern any more strongly. It is heard and understood. He knows that if he wants to continue that dialogue, meet the Government and take forward any intelligence nuances that he picks up as the process goes forward, he is welcome to do so.

As well as the importance of continuing work on racism and xenophobia, there are likely to be other areas of social or legal policy in which similar data gathering and opinion giving could be of real relevance and value to EU institutions and member states when implementing Community law. For example, data on discrimination, including disability discrimination, may help to provide evidence about the impact of EU policy in the area of employment rights. The agency could usefully gather data on the impact of new EU legislation in the workplace, such as the recent directives prohibiting discrimination on the grounds of religion or sexuality. In addition, the agency could perform a useful role in assessing the extent to which data protection practices ensure respect for private life. So, we believe that the agency should gather data in co-operation with member states, the Council of Europe and civil society, but it will be necessary for the agency to ensure that data gathering does not replicate the work undertaken by the Council of Europe's bodies or by national human rights institutions.

The hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West asked how much the agency will cost. There is an estimate. The annual budget of the monitoring centre in 2003 amounted to about £4.5 million. The European Community subsidy was the principal revenue of the centre in 2003. The centre also receives financial support from the Austrian authorities. That is the basis on which we go into these discussions.

Mr. Brady: I am grateful to the Minister for telling us the current budget of the monitoring centre. He referred, albeit while giving the Government's view that the agency should not have a much wider remit, to a role in advising, assisting and educating EU applicant countries. What estimate or assessment has he made of the addition that would be necessary to the budget to cover those activities?

Mr. Lammy: We have an existing budget as an indicator. We go forward at the beginning of negotiations with a clear view, as a Government, of what the outcome should be, but clearly other member states will take a different view. For that reason, it is difficult to suggest today what the eventual budget might be. The hon. Gentleman may wish to inquire further down the line when the matter will be clearer, but, as I have said, the budget of the monitoring centre was £4.5 million in 2003.

We recently announced our intention to legislate for a commission for equality and human rights in order to promote equality and human rights together and to challenge discrimination. We think that the fundamental rights agency could replicate much of the work going on domestically. I welcome the position of the official Opposition on having a commission for equality and human rights in this country; that is very helpful. It is for those very reasons, which are now shared by parties across the House, that we welcome a fundamental rights agency. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North again on securing this debate.

Structure Plan (Kent and Medway)

11 am

Mr. Derek Wyatt (Sittingbourne and Sheppey) (Lab): Thank you for granting me an opportunity to discuss the Kent and Medway structure plan, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is a wholly good thing for a county such as Kent—I include Medway—to take stock and to reflect on the needs and aspirations of its people. If we do not have the chance to dream, and to dream big, and to back those dreams with more detailed plans, we are the lesser for it.

I shall be interested to hear from my hon. Friend the Minister how the plan was initially conceived. I know of no public meetings, no bus that went up and down the county, and no polls that were taken, but a plan has come from somewhere. It seems that the plan was started back to front: to have an aspiration or some idea of where the county should be in 2021, the people of Kent should have been talked to.

Kent and Medway together are the largest local authority area in the country, with a turnover of billions of pounds. It has not been possible to find out the gross domestic product of the county, so may I suggest to the Minister that GDP figures be produced for each county, district and, where possible, constituency? Such figures would help the people of Kent to understand better what we have and, as important, what we need, especially when we are discussing the future needs of the county through the structure plan.

We know a great deal about poverty indices and which wards in Kent suffer from neglect. Kent had a necklace of poverty around its coast for much of the 1970s, 1980s and 1990s, but thankfully, under the Labour Government's stewardship, there are signs of green shoots everywhere, not least in my constituency, where the Government are investing more than £300 million. That investment includes £44 million for the northern distributor road in Sittingbourne, £21 million for the Rushenden link road, which we hope will happen soon, and between £40 million and £60 million for the new secondary schools for the Isle of Sheppey. We have already had a £13 million new community hospital and our new £100 million bridge is being built as we speak. Sadly, all that may be at risk, as the Tories have announced the closure of the Thames gateway should they win the next election. In that event, my constituency and many others in Kent would be returned to boom-and-bust economic policies and poverty and deprivation would rear their ugly heads once more.

For Kent and Medway to be the best in Britain is no longer enough. The Kent and Medway structure plan needs to have at its core an understanding of the impact of globalisation, as India and China threaten Europe and America's economic hegemony over the coming two decades. The plan needs to demonstrate a better understanding of the impact that formula 1 high-speed broadband will have on our communities. I am not sure that the plan understands either of those profound changes.

In 2002, as the founder of the Oxford internet institute I was invited to lecture in north Sweden, in a region called Lulea. It is not possible to go much further north before reaching the Arctic circle, yet Sony Ericsson has its 3G research centre at Lulea university of technology. In 2004, I visited Helsinki to meet the owners of M-real, which owns UK Paper in my constituency, but I took time out, thanks to the UK ambassador to Finland, Matthew Kirk, to visit Nokia and to spend some time with the mayor of Helsinki. Like Singapore, Helsinki is a smart city—completely online and completely broadband, some of it wireless—and it is incredible to consider that the whole country is too. Finland has a population of 5 million and is incredibly mountainous, but it is online and broadband. That broadband was paid for by the regional development agency. It is not just any kind of broadband—not the 512 k on offer from BT, but 2G and 4G. It is more formula 1 than model T.

Interestingly, as a result of such provision, the north Baltic area, including Sweden, Finland, Latvia and Lithuania, has the fastest-growing GDP in the whole of Europe. Landlocked, cold and distant by 20th-century standards, it is smart and already connected by 21st-century standards. A history of the 20th century written in the mid-1970s would have failed to include venture capital, the personal computer, the mobile phone and wireless and broadband. The Kent and Medway structure plan must have those values underlying the activities; it does not.

If we were debating this issue in February 2021—when I will be 72—what could we say about Kent and Medway and the place that we bequeathed to our children and their children? Our duty would have been to provide enough added-value employment opportunities in a greener environment, with new housing that we could be proud of and an infrastructure to match. Only aspects of that are available today in Kent and Medway. We do not have enough added-value or smart employment opportunities, we have been slow on a green audit, few of our housing estates have any architectural value or merit, and our infrastructure, especially our road and rail investments, needs more attention.

The greatest centres of added value are to be found in California, mainly in the bay area. Those centres in San Francisco, San José, silicon valley and Oakland gave birth to the modern economy. They had at their core two great universities—the university of California at Berkeley and Stanford university, the private university founded by Leland Stanford. Those institutions have embraced globalisation and they have as the heart of their being the biosciences and technological industries that make for smarter communities. The Kent and Medway structure plan needs to have biosciences and technology as the added value for our children's sake.

The Kent and Medway structure plan has no vision or understanding of where we need to be as a county. The largest local authority in the country has no world-class university and no plans to create one, or to bring one in from outside, or to initiate a franchising arrangement with an Oxford or a Cambridge—or a Stanford or a Berkeley, for that matter. How can we have such low expectations?

The Kent and Medway structure plan needs to be re-thought. It lacks vision, and the county continues to fail to attract world-class businesses. It is shameful that the whole computer industry passed us by. Motorola chose Swindon, Slough and Basingstoke. Microsoft and Oracle opted for Reading. Apple and Cisco Systems homed in on Stockley park. Hewlett Packard—now HP—made a base in Bristol. Intel also settled at Swindon. Not one chose Kent, which is worrying, especially as both Microsoft and Intel continually feature in the top five companies in the world. One of the fallouts from that failure is that Kent has still not made inroads into establishing a venture capital base.

In the 1960s, the Robbins report on higher education highlighted the need for new universities. Out of that came the new university of Kent at Canterbury. Since its establishment, it has welcomed the Open university, Christ Church university college, Canterbury, and more recently the university of Greenwich, which used to be Woolwich polytechnic. I know that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Medway (Mr. Marshall-Andrews) has always wanted a university for Medway, and he has now realised part of his dream.

Kent and Greenwich universities have been working together to find common ground. The science of computing has spawned spectacular successes where a university has developed a spin-out science park. Surrey was the first to do so. Surprisingly, Cambridge and Oxford were relatively slow to come to the dancefloor, but their respective parks now make a substantial contribution to the UK's GDP. They have drawn their success from the example of the Ivy league universities in America, especially Stanford, which spawned Hewlett Packard, Yahoo and, more recently, Google.

Into this mix, in 1998 and 1999 the Labour Government introduced the regional development agencies. The South East England Development Agency—SEEDA—ignored the science park phenomenon, and chose instead to create small hubs or clusters. Perhaps it is too early to judge their success, but I believe that it was a mistake not to link them directly to our universities. Science parks have become the vogue, and in all cases they are attached to universities. Leeds university, Leicester university, Bristol university and Bath university announced science, technology or innovation parks in 2001. Liverpool university and Liverpool John Moores university followed suit last year—interestingly, funded by the local RDA—as did London and, more recently, Nottingham and Nottingham Trent, which all announced science parks.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer is a science enthusiast and has increased science research funding substantially in the Budget. At the same time, he has ensured that our investment and share option tax breaks are better than those of California. The UK has the fourth-largest GDP in the world; California used to have the fifth, although it has slipped recently. That is why it is important that we follow the California model.

According to the league tables of the The Times guide to universities—notwithstanding the usual reservation about league tables—Kent is placed 44th in the UK and Greenwich 94th. Kent has disappointed in comparison with other 60s universities: Warwick is fifth, York is seventh, Bath is 11th, Loughborough is 24th and Essex is 27th. However, we have a newcomer in Kent: Imperial college at Wye. Imperial is ranked third overall, after Cambridge and Oxford, and first in technology and science, although it is only a university college of London university. Imperial is hampered by its location in Kensington and it cannot develop a science park except at Ashford. I was the only MP who attended the Kent and Medway discussions on science parks in September. Kent county council said that there was no intention to develop a science park at Ashford—you couldn't make it up. Kent needs a world-class university, and Imperial is the only game in town.

The two major science companies in Kent are Pfizers at Sandwich and Abbott's at Queenborough. We should be working with those two American companies to create an equivalent of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology at Ashford and a collegiate university system for Kent based on the university of California model that would enable university colleges to be sited at Ramsgate and Margate, Dover and Folkestone, Maidstone, Sittingbourne, Tunbridge Wells and Tonbridge, and Dartford along with those already established at Canterbury, Medway and Greenwich. Imperial would, over a 20-year period, subsume both Kent and Greenwich.

Does the Kent and Medway structure plan have those two companies at the forefront of the bioscience and technology plans for our grandchildren? It does not. Instead the plan has identified four small science centres, none of which will be world class or an integral part of a university. One was called the Sittingbourne research centre until a name change last year. Now called the Kent science park, it is owned by the LaSalle pension fund on behalf of Mars and it wants to double its footprint. It wants to build an additional 10,000 homes on top of the 10,000 announced last week by the Government, and it wants a southern ring road to a new motorway junction of the M2. However, according to an anonymous phone call that I received last Friday, it will allegedly enrich two landowners to the tune of £80 million.

Can the Minister confirm that if that wretched scheme were to see the light of day the Government would introduce a substantial windfall tax on gains from farming land that is given planning permission for housing? In that way the cost of housing would be reduced, which would greatly help our younger families and our key workers who are frozen out of the property market in Kent. Above all else it is clear that the Kent and Medway structure plan has no real understanding of the place of biosciences and technology. If the plan is adopted our children and their children will be the poorer.

Let me add a few comments about the housing needs for Kent and the lack of detailed infrastructure modelling, although Kent county council's "Kent—What Price Growth?" is more than a stab in the right direction. I have raised the matter continually over the past eight years and even proposed a ten-minute Bill on the subject. Incidentally, I wonder when the Government will respond to Kent county council's request for £9.6 billion worth of infrastructure over the next 30 years.

Wherever I look in my constituency, the new build housing has not had any section 106 gains. At Warden Bay we were promised a primary school; it never happened. Guess what? We were promised another on the Meads estate at Bobbing; it never happened either. Now I learn that the large Thistle Hill estate being built on the Isle of Sheppey will not after all have a primary school. Three different developers have reached a section 106 agreement with Kent county council, but have walked away smiling. They have lined their shareholders' pockets, but they have not improved the quality of life of my constituents.

My constituency needs quality housing of every sort. We are desperate for housing estates in the great 19th century traditions of New Earswick and Port Sunlight, not the appallingly designed new rabbit hutch estates that currently adorn the north Kent coast. We need at least 3,000 houses for our young couples, our older people and our key workers. As Sittingbourne and Sheppey's economic base grows, we will need more housing to attract businesses.

The structure plan is weak on how we build, side by side, both the hardware of the infrastructure and the software, by which I mean our people. We will have a shortage of water in the next five years. Without wind power from the Thames, Kent will not have enough power. Where do we get more carpenters, builders and painters from? Where is the skills audit in the plan and where are the plans to build co-operation between our secondary schools and our further education colleges? I could say more, but I know that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Medway wishes to add something and so I will stop there.

Mr. Robert Marshall-Andrews (Medway) (Lab): I understand your semaphore perfectly, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I will indeed be brief, as we want to hear from the Minister on this important topic. I congratulate my good and hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Mr. Wyatt) on securing the debate, which he opened with a characteristically articulate and informed speech. He has been an outstanding Member of Parliament for Sittingbourne and Sheppey. He was rewarded by a massive increase in his vote in 2001. I do not suggest that those who did not receive massive increases in their vote are not outstanding Members of Parliament, but some of us take rather longer to mature than others.

The debate gives me the opportunity to indulge in the rare, unalloyed, indeed practically unendurable, pleasure of congratulating the Government in very large measure on what they have achieved in terms of structure within my constituency during the last eight years. When I first became the Member of Parliament for Medway I was asked what I expected from my stewardship. After a certain amount of thought I replied that two things seemed to be needed more than any other to change the structural basis of the Medway towns. The first was a university: ours is the largest conurbation in Europe without its own university. The second was the development of the Rochester and Chatham riverside—a massive area of post-industrial dereliction caused by the death of the dockyard 17 years ago. I am delighted to say that although neither has been completed, both developments are now inevitable, due in no small measure to the Government's intervention.

Some £15 million has been given towards a new university based in the Medway towns—an outstanding contribution, which has made that development possible. Within 10 years we will have 10,000 students, which will change and revolutionise the intellectual and employment face of the towns in that part of Kent. Some £26 million has been granted by the Government to underpin the development of the Rochester riverside on a site for which the expression "brownfield site" might have been newly minted. That, too, will transform my constituency. There is no word for gratitude in politics, but there is a word for achievement, and that is a considerable achievement, on which I congratulate the Government.

I share my hon. Friend's reservations about the present structure plan. In my own constituency, I am concerned about the silence that radiates around development within the precious green areas that we have and that we must maintain. When I first arrived in my constituency, it had the most unenviable reputation—possibly in the country, and certainly in the south-east—for overdevelopment. That was probably linked to the fact that many of its councillors at the time were either developers or were linked to the development world. As a result, the Medway towns suffer in no small measure from a serious absence of green space, both within the towns and outside them. I hope that the Minister will take that into account when he responds to our points on structure and infrastructure in the Medway towns. I hope that he will say that the time has come to call a halt to development within and outside the towns.

It is an unhappy fact that the threats to the green space in my constituency come from the council, which is now resurrected not quite in its old aegis but in something like it. Names such as Watts Meadow and Copperfields will mean little to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but they mean a great deal to my constituents. Those areas are currently threatened by a council that is remorselessly and recklessly selling off its own green space within the Medway towns as part of what it perceives to be a structural plan which is, in fact, no plan at all.

I say this to the Minister and I hope that he will take it on board. The Hoo peninsula, which is part of my constituency, is a rare and wonderful green space, which I enjoy as much as any of my constituents. I am sure that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because I know your predilections and activities, would also enjoy it very much were you able to visit. If you ever manage to visit my constituency, I should be delighted to introduce you to it.

We have fought battles over that land—for example, we successfully fought off incinerators. There is much talk now about development on the Hoo peninsula but, as far as I know, that is wholly false. There is nothing in any plan that I have seen—certainly not in one derived from the Government—that threatens development on the Hoo peninsula over and above the local plan that was agreed many years ago. I hope that that will continue to be the case, but I serve notice now, not simply on the Government and on local government, but on the developers who for many years have looked upon that area of Kent with salivation, that any attempt to concrete over or build or that wonderful and wild area will be resisted in precisely the same way in which my constituents and I made common cause to resist Cliffe airport, now of unblessed memory.

There is much on which to congratulate the Government. There has been a great deal of expenditure, partly leveraged from Government by my colleagues in the Medway towns and myself. Sometimes it has been said, rather unkindly, that the more unpopular one becomes with one's Government, the more money they give for development in one's own constituency. I do not recommend that as a way of obtaining money from the Government, but it can be argued and might be true in my case.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister and my hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey for allowing me to make this short contribution. I congratulate my hon. Friend again on obtaining a debate on one of the most important issues facing the south-east.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Phil Hope): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Mr. Wyatt) on securing this debate on the Kent and Medway structure plan. He is well known as a keen advocate of his constituency and for bringing issues such as these to the attention of the House.

Given events that may or may not happen in a couple of months' time, I am not surprised by the unusual display of gratitude, recognition and loyalty to the Government by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Medway (Mr. Marshall-Andrews). The Government must be congratulated on delivering benefits to the hard-working families of Medway, and indeed Sittingbourne and Sheppey, despite events elsewhere.

My hon. Friend mentioned some specific cases. He will appreciate that I cannot comment on the merits of individual planning cases because of the Secretary of State's appellate responsibilities. If he will forgive me, I will therefore concentrate on the broader planning issues.

As I am sure my hon. Friend is aware, Kent county council, in partnership with Medway unitary authority, is preparing a new structure plan to cover the period 2001 to 2021, which has been the subject of an examination in public held by an independent panel. I understand that the two strategic planning authorities are still awaiting the panel's report. The authorities decided to continue with a new structure plan, although it will be superseded by the new south-east plan when that is adopted in 2007. In the meantime, local planning authorities in Kent will have to have regard to the structure plan, once it is adopted and until the south-east plan is in place, in preparing their local development frameworks.

My hon. Friend opened his remarks by voicing some concerns about consultation. Let me emphasise that the Kent and Medway structure plan was published as a deposit plan in September 2003. That was preceded by extensive pre-deposit consultation, including the publication in March 2002 of a consultation document entitled "Mapping out the future: Kent and Medway Structure Plan—Future Policy Directions", which was accompanied by publicity and public meetings in every district and borough. All the Kent Members of Parliament were consulted directly at this stage and on the deposit plan in 2003. The "Future Policy Directions" document specifically referred to the development of innovation hubs and clusters and the important links between higher education and research, about which my hon. Friend spoke so eloquently. A number of locations were discussed in this regard, including the Sittingbourne research centre, now the Kent science park. I shall come back to that later.

My hon. Friend mentioned issues relating to infrastructure, water and so on. It is important to put on the record one point about water. During the consultation, Kent and Medway councils received no representations from the Environment Agency about any insurmountable constraints to development in Swale from a water supply perspective. Evidence to the examination in public confirmed that view, conditional on Kent and Medway structure plan quantities not being exceeded. Decisions by the councils arising from the panel report should be subject to similar consultation processes.

On the need for homes for younger people, older people and key workers in the area, I am aware that the proposed housing numbers in the structure plan for the county as a whole show no significant increase over the previous plan, although there are two growth areas in the county. Indeed, representatives of the Government office for the south-east pointed that out to the examination in public in September last year and argued for higher numbers, in line with the Government's commitment to address the severe housing shortage in the south-east. We await the outcome of that examination in public. The panel is due to report early this year. I regret that it would be inappropriate for me to comment further on the details of the plan in advance of the report.

The next formal steps in progressing the Kent and Medway structure plan will take place when Kent and Medway councils consider the panel recommendations and propose modifications arising from those recommendations. The proposed modifications will, in turn, be subject to public consultation. Kent and Medway hope to adopt the plan by the end of 2005. I believe that my hon. Friend has made the representations that he spoke about this morning directly to the process. When the modifications are proposed, he will get another bite at the cherry and will be able to re-emphasise his concerns if the modifications do not address them.

There is also a statutory planning process to determine what the revised regional and sub-regional growth levels should be. At this stage, the South East England regional assembly is responsible for examining alternative spatial options as part of the preparation of the new south-east plan, which will include housing figures for districts in Kent. The regional assembly launched a public consultation on the matter on 24 January. I cannot comment at this stage, because my comments would pre-empt the outcome of the consultation and the public inquiry that will follow.

My hon. Friend rightly raised concerns about the infrastructure that will support development. Swale Forward is the local partnership that ensures that the area's infrastructure priorities are delivered effectively. It is co-ordinating a £26 million programme that is supported by the sustainable communities fund. Swale Forward endeavours to ensure that the aims and objectives of its policies and programmes make the appropriate links with other relevant strategies, such as Swale's infrastructure needs, the Swale local plan, the Kent and Medway structure plan and the regional economic strategy.

It is the role of Swale Forward to assess the infrastructure needs of the borough in delivering the required growth and regeneration. It is primarily the responsibility of Swale borough council to ensure, through the local plan and other strategies and plans, that sufficient infrastructure is provided to support agreed levels of housing growth. I am glad that my hon. Friend has put on record some of those developments. Two road schemes are under way—the second Swale crossing and the Sittingbourne northern relief road. Funding from section 106 agreements will support provision of other infrastructure requirements, such as health and education facilities and community needs. It is good to see that a new secondary school has been allocated for Sittingbourne, as well as the secondary school for Sheppey. A new community hospital has also been allocated.

I share my hon. Friend's concerns about the Conservatives' decision to abolish the Thames gateway. That decision will have a massive effect in removing the opportunities for infrastructure development. My hon. Friend is right to point that out. Many of us were taken aback at the Opposition's decision to adopt that policy, which makes no sense. That decision does not fit easily with the simultaneous call of the Conservatives on Kent county council for £9.6 billion of infrastructure regeneration cash. It seems to me that the local and the national are not working easily together.

My hon. Friend mentioned issues around gains from developing land. I emphasise that, in her recent review of housing supply, Kate Barker recommended that section 106 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990, as amended, which provided for planning gain contributions relating to increased development value resulting directly from the grant of planning permission, be reviewed to provide more certainty and simplicity. I confirm that the Government are considering the option of a planning gain supplement that would, if introduced, address some of the issues that my hon. Friend raised. That debate is under way and I am grateful for his contribution. We will draw it to the attention of relevant Ministers.

My hon. Friend raised a number of key points about the importance of the university development and the way that the structure plan creates the conditions for attracting bioscience and technology investment. I cannot comment on the plan because of my position in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. I draw his attention to parts of the plan that refer specifically to that development, not least to Pfizer which is one of the companies that he mentioned. The plan identifies Pfizer as a company that may grow and respond to some of the concerns that my hon. Friend raised. However, it is up to us to see what the panel says and consider whether the modifications and developments provide solutions to the problems that he is concerned about.

While I understand my hon. Friend's concerns about the make-up of the Kent science park, and the issues that he raised about the highway network, I point out that both Kent county council and Swale borough council support the expansion of that site as a science park.

Hazardous Waste

2 pm

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): When I resigned my post as a shadow Environment Minister, the Government's waste and environment policy was a shambles, and 18 months later little has changed. The Government have promised to review their waste strategy this year. The review must consider the current problems with hazardous waste disposal that have arisen following the implementation of European directives. Unless the Minister acknowledges that the problems exist and says how they will be overcome, they are set to continue.

We know that 5.2 million tonnes of hazardous waste is produced annually, a figure that increases 8 per cent. year on year. It must be disposed of safely and efficiently, and it must be our priority to ensure that the infrastructure exists to achieve that. Although environmentally sustainable methods of disposal should be explored and strongly encouraged, we cannot ignore the reality that 40 per cent. of hazardous waste is still sent to landfill. The implementation of the European landfill directive, the factor that continues to have the biggest impact on hazardous waste disposal, should be the focus of our debate today.

I want to examine the Government's preparation for banning the co-disposal of hazardous and non-hazardous waste in landfill sites, following the directive implemented on 16 July 2004. I believe that their approach had four flaws, relating to regulation, awareness, enforcement and communication, which continue to characterise their overall approach to hazardous waste.

First, the Government did not provide the regulation required by the waste management industry to invest in the new hazardous waste treatment infrastructure demanded by the directive. Regulations bringing into United Kingdom law the waste acceptance criteria—WAC—that regulate pre-treatment standards passed through Parliament only in June 2004, one year before they came into force. Strict regulation of the waste disposal industry requires detailed legal guidance, which in turn can be achieved only with accurately targeted investment.

Waste management companies, however, had only one year in which to identify potential markets, raise finance, gain planning consents, obtain environmental permits, construct facilities and conduct appropriate testing before finally accepting and treating hazardous waste. As it is a commercial decision whether to apply for a licence to treat hazardous waste and the Department for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs cannot force companies to do so, the Department should have done everything it could to encourage investors, or should at least have made it feasible for companies to make the necessary commercial decisions to obtain a licence. However, far from leading the way, the Government, through their indecision, have created uncertainty and confusion.

Secondly, DEFRA's lack of forward planning is underpinned by a lack of awareness and understanding of patterns and volumes of hazardous waste flows. Only six weeks before the ban on co-disposal, the hazardous waste forum's projections showed huge variations between best and worst-case scenarios: shortfall estimates varied between 350,000 tonnes in the interim year and, in the worst case, 2.9 million tonnes, an eightfold difference. However, that is not all. No account is taken of seasonal variations in hazardous waste levels as a result of fluctuations in the amount of contaminated soil produced by the demolition and construction industry. That problem is set to intensify as more brownfield sites are redeveloped.

Thirdly, the enforcement of regulations has been flawed; their implementation is neither stringent nor consistent. Non-compliance tends to snowball. The more people get away with the illegal disposal of hazardous waste, the more the business case for waste management facilities is undermined. Fly-tipping will become an ever more attractive option if waste disposal costs increase while penalties and enforcement remain static. An Environment Agency report stated that people fly-tip because it costs "money and time" to dispose of waste properly. That is a statement of the blindingly obvious. As the cost and trouble of proper waste management increase, so will the incidence of illegal disposal.

Will the Government accept the recommendation of the Environmental Audit Committee that the fines imposed should better reflect the seriousness of the environmental crime and act as a greater deterrent and punishment? Will the Environment Agency be directed by the Government so that we do not get what we did with the end-of-life vehicles directive? We do not want inadequately trained inspectors focusing on repeat visits to those tackling the task satisfactorily, but rather a concentration on the real rogues, who may not even be registered as producing hazardous waste. If matters continue as they are, all we will have is another Child Support Agency-type fiasco, where providing parents were pursued and the rogues ignored.

Fourthly, communication by the Government and the Environment Agency with waste producers and managers has been inadequate. The Federation of Small Businesses has identified "an information vacuum" among many of its members. A survey by the Environment Agency itself revealed that, in 2003, 76 per cent. of businesses were unaware of their legal duty of care to ensure that waste was managed lawfully. I would like assurances from the Minister as to the strategies in place to make businesses aware of their duties resulting from new legislation.

Subsequent to the implementation of the landfill directive, what has been the effect of the prior inaction and lack of forward planning? How has it impacted on both the hazardous waste industry and the environment? The immediate effect was to create a substantial shortfall in the capacity of the industry to treat hazardous waste. Only 11 merchant landfill sites are operational and, of these, only five can accept a wide range of hazardous waste streams. Infrastructure exists to dispose of only 1 million tonnes of hazardous waste annually, but 5 million tonnes are produced every year. This is compounded by the uneven distribution of commercial sites, which are concentrated in the north-east and north-west of the United Kingdom, while no sites able to deal with hazardous waste are located in Greater London. Hazardous waste must now be transported greater distances, which is costly, increases bureaucracy and risk, raises further capacity issues—as transportation must be with a registered carrier—and makes neither environmental nor economic sense.

Economic factors are rarely the best drivers of environmental policy as they tend towards short-term myopia, while many environmental benefits are not financially quantifiable. However, cost must be considered when it has a direct impact on the level of compliance. Implementing the landfill directive has resulted in a threefold increase in the cost of landfill and a potential further increase after July. The "polluter pays" principle is probably the best way to operate environmental policy, but the Government must think realistically rather than adhering to that dogmatically. Costs must not be increased unfairly due to poor policy implementation and, ultimately, they must not discourage the safe disposal of hazardous waste.

If enforced to the letter, the "polluter pays" principle will hit small and medium-sized companies hardest. Those with the tightest margins may begin to cheat, misclassifying their waste, disposing of it illegally or hiring unregulated, illegal contractors. Subsequent costs to society, regardless of the physical danger, could then outweigh the income garnered from making these smaller hazardous waste producers pay. Possibly, a fairer and more effective alternative would be for the Government to consider a threshold whereby small amounts of hazardous waste can be disposed of safely, at lower cost, and an incremental charge imposed thereafter.

Hazardous waste disposal problems have not yet been resolved. The additional capacity required due to the landfill directive is not forecast to be met until 2009. Other key challenges have not even begun to be tackled. I am sorry to say that the Government seem to have learned nothing from implementing the landfill directive.

The Government must rethink how they implement European directives. They must ensure proper parliamentary scrutiny of draft directives so that there is awareness and action well in advance of implementation, and only after industry-wide consultation. The main problem is not the directives, but the Government's approach to implementation, which has caused the United Kingdom to develop a far less comprehensive hazardous waste-treatment infrastructure than other member states have developed and has compounded their already weak performance on waste.

The Government's approach is still characterised by the same four flaws. There are still no regulations and guidance from the Environment Agency to transpose hazardous waste regulations or to produce the WAC for monolithic waste. DEFRA has not allocated sufficient resources to communicate responsibilities to waste producers or for resource enforcement: the £2 million available through the business resource efficiency and waste programme is inadequate.

Lack of awareness continues, as there are no real-time data on waste flows, and DEFRA is only now developing a waste data strategy. In this interim year between the end of co-disposal and the enforcement of WAC, it is timely to assess the impact of the landfill directive on the Government's waste strategy and to press for the end to the lack of regulation, of information and of enforcement and the mis-communication that has been a characteristic so far. The current strategy is wasteful and is certain to prove hazardous to our environment.

2.12 pm

Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Sayeed) on securing the debate. I know that he spends a great deal of time worrying about the subject, which has always been high on his list of priorities, and he is doing us all a favour by bringing it to the attention of the Chamber today.

At the end of the day, this is not a political issue in the party political sense of the word. Whatever the party we belong to, we know what we are trying to achieve. The quarrel is about how we achieve that and the administration of the policy. Waste, whether non-hazardous or hazardous, is a fact of life. It is part of our society, and given society's thunderous momentum, it is inevitable. The question is how we deal with it.

The Government have good intentions, which I do not criticise. They are making a genuine effort, but there is a shortfall between what they say they want to achieve, their method, and what they actually achieve. In true Blairite style, they have the big vision and all the ideas, and local concerns are dealt with, but are we achieving the results and producing the initiatives that we need? As someone who represents a south London constituency, I know that waste is a very serious issue. London does not have enough waste facilities. Waste has to be taken out of London, and the Government do not have the courage to deal with the issue of incineration.

A small illustration of the problem is the local municipal tip in south Croydon, which is being shut. It is open for only three days a week at a time when we need more tips and outlets. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire mentioned fly-tipping, and one of the problems is that small businesses must pay to use these tips. I might be off message so far as my party is concerned, but I believe that there should be no charge for municipal tips, because small businesses, deterred by the fact that they have to pay to use them, are engaging in increased fly-tipping. It is a serious problem in south London, and, in that regard, I am very critical of my local authority, which has not addressed the issue.

Recycling is to be encouraged; it is very welcome. The problem is that it is weight based, so local authorities, in order to meet their worthy targets, are encouraging people to recycle things that need not be recycled—too much green waste, but not enough of the hazardous substances that ought to be recycled. There is not enough plastic being recycled, because it is not heavy. If there is a weight-based target for recycling, plastic, which is not only light but voluminous—a plastic bottle takes up a lot of space but not much weight—is not attractive to local authorities.

Mr. Sayeed: Is my hon. Friend aware that, certainly two years ago, our party had a policy that involved setting a ratio between weight and volume? I think that it was 1 kg to 3 cu m. If the Government had adopted that, as was pressed on the now Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment, there would have been a greater chance of plastic and other light but voluminous materials being recycled.

Richard Ottaway: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. In fact, he pre-empts my next remark, which is that that is the direction in which we ought to be going. Whether there should be a multiplier effect or a tariff of some sort to encourage local authorities to recycle more plastic, I do not know, but that is the way to go. I hope that the Minister who, I know, takes these matters seriously, will respond to that point.

I come to the specific matter of hazardous waste. It is a tremendous problem. It is dealt with in a manner that was excellently described by my hon. Friend, and the rules of the game have changed. There are businesses that are prepared to dispose of hazardous waste commercially, meaning that when they invest, they want to make sure that their money is secure and they want to see a profit from it. However, the Government have not encouraged that process. As the deadline approached, investors complained that they had had inadequate detail from the Government about the criteria for the establishment of a hazardous waste disposal centre. They were prepared to invest, but they were not prepared to do so unless they knew what the criteria were—what the Government wanted from them. They wanted to know what the bottom line would be.

This is the first time that the private sector has been asked to invest big time in waste disposal; we are talking about serious money. The Government have to take seriously the fact that businesses want to have every last t crossed and i dotted before they will invest. It should come as no surprise that there was, and still is, a problem over the disposal of hazardous waste, because there is not enough private sector investment—the Government are not doing enough to attract it. The lack of detail is critical.

I said in opening that the Government are on the right track, but are not implementing the policy in the right way. This illustrates my point. Something can be done. It is well within our ability to deal with hazardous waste in a way that is acceptable to everybody, but the Government have not grasped the nettle, and they are not giving us enough detail. That is my central point to the Minister, and I hope that he will deal with it when he responds.

2.20 pm

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Sayeed) on introducing this important debate. Indeed, it is unique, because all of us on the Conservative Back Benches are ex-Navy men, although that has absolutely nothing to do with the subject.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving me the opportunity to add that I am a graduate of the armed forces parliamentary scheme. I am currently undertaking my second programme, so I, too, am connected with the Royal Navy.

Dr. Murrison: I am grateful for that intervention, which makes it clear that this occasion is, indeed, unique. I am afraid, however, that that has nothing to do with the subject in hand, to which I shall now turn.

[Dr. Murrison]

I want exclusively to discuss the disposal of hazardous waste, because I have a constituency interest in the issue. As the Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment knows, I have a cement works in my constituency; it is operated by Lafarge and its operation has caused a lot of difficulty locally. That bears directly on the subject of hazardous waste.

To a large extent, what we are really talking about today is the EU landfill directive, although it has not been mentioned as such. None the less, much of the pressure on us when it comes to the disposal of hazardous waste stems from the Government's need to be extremely careful—and rightfully so—about what we tip into holes in the ground. We would all agree that it is right for them to be careful about that, but my concern, which relates directly to what is happening at the Westbury cement works, is about the alternative. The worry in my constituency is that, instead of stuff being put into a hole in the ground, it is being put up a chimney without proper environmental controls.

Mark Tami (Alyn and Deeside) (Lab): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that some people see incineration as a panacea or a magic cure for the problem of waste, and particularly hazardous waste? They think that if we somehow keep burning this stuff, there will not be a problem any more. What we should be asking ourselves is why we produce so much of this stuff in the first place.

Dr. Murrison: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. Of course, it is tempting to tip things into a hole in the ground or to put them up a chimney without thinking how best to deal with them. The best approach would be not to create them in the first place, or to recycle them in a way that did not have an environmental impact. Tyres, for example, can be recycled in a very environmentally friendly way because they can be turned into road surfaces. That happens extensively in America, but very little in this country. It does not happen here, I believe, because we are under an imperative to meet the targets generated by the EU landfill directive, and one of the only ways to do that in a reasonable time is to dispose of them in cement kilns, rather than develop the technology necessary to turn them into road surfaces, as happens in the States.

The cement industry is all too willing to oblige the Government by helping to dispose of hazardous waste; it has certainly been disposing of tyres for some time, and it is now trying to do the same with recycled liquid fuel, which is an unholy concoction of all manner of poisonous substances that can be used as an alternative to fossil fuels in firing cement kilns. Of course, the cement industry is not necessarily altruistic, and it seeks, quite legitimately, to obtain a financial gain from its operations. My concern is that at least part of that gain should be used to ensure that the best available techniques are employed to dispose of hazardous substances, and I am not entirely clear that the industry has hoisted that on board sufficiently. Of course, we can ultimately filter just about anything out of the stack at a cement works, but there is a marginal utility in so doing, and it becomes increasingly expensive as fewer contaminants are released.

Nobody will insist that every last particulate is removed from the material coming out of the top of a cement kiln. Nevertheless, we must ensure that at least some of the profits that I am convinced the cement industry is making from the disposal of hazardous waste are channelled back into best-available technique so that we at least reduce the amount of pollutants leaving cement works such as the one in Westbury. I am not sure that that is happening.

The cement industry put pressure on the Environment Agency to reduce the standard for emissions from cement works and that has happened. The standards for dedicated incinerators are much more rigid than those for cement works. That is extremely worrying. The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment has given all sorts of sophisticated reasons as to why there should be a difference—for example, the temperature at which cement kilns operate—but few of them are convincing. I know from my chemistry days that halogens cling quite nicely to particulates. Both are produced in ample quantity if recycled liquid fuel is burnt. The worry is that the temperature will not affect them and that many particles full of halogens, which are potentially hazardous to human health, will exit the stack at Westbury. The case has not been made by the Environment Agency or the cement industry that what they propose is entirely safe. We should operate under the precautionary principle in this matter, but I do not believe that we are being precautionary enough.

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that what matters to his constituents and anyone else is the quality of the emissions and the air that they breathe. It is of little consequence to people who suffer—if that is the right word—the emissions whether they come from a cement kiln or an incinerator. Therefore, should not the Environment Agency's concern be the standardisation of emissions rather than determining what process generates them?

Dr. Murrison: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman. He is absolutely right. We need standardisation of emissions from incinerators, cement works and so on. The risk is that cement works will become quick and dirty incinerators. The Government are very reluctant—understandably so—to propose purpose-built incinerators with clearly understood standards. I fear that they consider cement works an easy, back-door way of incinerating material that offers the best prospect for rapidly satisfying their targets. The Government have leapt at this option. They have grabbed at it as an opportunity to achieve their targets in a way that is not too painful and that minimises the number of local inquiries that would undoubtedly be needed if they were to propose purpose-built incinerators.

My constituents and those who live downwind of the cement works at Westbury are not at all happy with that, as it is all being done on the back of their health. I am keen to impress upon people who ask me that, in my view, the health effects of what goes on at Westbury are likely to be very small indeed, if they exist at all. It is important to say that and to put the matter into context. Nobody should be shroud waving.

If we believe in the precautionary principle, however, we must do much more to monitor what is happening at sites such as the Westbury cement works and not be put off with blandishments from organisations such as the Environment Agency, which has not exactly covered itself with glory in this matter. That is why my district council is absolutely right to set up an independent committee to review the matter on behalf of the local people, who have lost all confidence in the agency. Expert advice is needed to reassure them that what is happening at Westbury is reasonable and will not damage their health.

The issue is even more serious because of the amendment to the substitute fuels protocol, which I believe is a sleight of hand. It will re-badge waste as fuel. It will allow material to be classified as a fuel provided that more energy is generated by its burning than is needed for its burning. In other words, if we generate one calorie more by burning a substance, we can reclassify it as a fuel. That has a particularly insidious significance, because it would then allow material that is not allowed to be imported to the UK to be imported as a potential fuel. It opens up the door to the possible transportation of hazardous waste from the continent of Europe into this country for disposal.

It is important that the Minister says quite categorically that that will not happen. Otherwise, we have the grisly prospect of tank-loads of such stuff trundling up from the south coast to works such as Westbury for disposal, with all the potential environmental consequences that that will bring, not least the cost in carbon of the transportation of a high-volume, low-value material such as recycled liquid fuel. My constituents and others would be up in arms if that were to happen. If it were to happen, and it is difficult to see how it might not, given the amendment to the substitute fuel protocol, it will be pinned firmly at the door of the Minister and his colleagues.

I am doubly concerned because the Lafarge cement works recently had an admission to make. It told the public that what it describes as "rogue employees" had, over the course of two years up to December last year, falsified the content of batches of its cement. That was an extraordinary revelation, and to date the company has been opaque when asked for details about that episode. It has done a great deal to dent the company's already sketchy reputation in my constituency. I have written to the Health and Safety Executive to ask what investigation it has carried out into the implications of that revelation, to the Environment Agency to ask if it will review the data that it has from Lafarge and its consultants, and to the Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment. To date, I have had no meaningful response.

I would have thought that such an episode should set the alarm bells ringing. So far, there has been a deafening silence. It is relevant to hazardous waste, because if Lafarge is trying to tell us, as the Environment Agency is saying, that the disposal of recycled liquid fuel in a cement kiln is safe, the company will use its own data to prove its case. Given that data relating to the content of its product have been shown to be false, what confidence can we have in its assertion that the disposal of hazardous waste at the Westbury cement works is safe? We would have to treat that assertion with a great deal of caution, and I hope that the Environment Agency will mount an investigation on the back of that company's revelation. I look forward to the written reply from the Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment to the letter that I have sent him on the subject.

I hope that given the doubt that has been cast upon the veracity of data coming from that company, West Wiltshire district council will redouble its efforts to ensure that there is some form of independent scrutiny of what is going on at that plant, and an assessment of the implications for the local population of the disposal of hazardous waste. Even at this late stage, I strongly urge the Minister to revise his thoughts on how we should deal differentially between the cement industry and dedicated incinerators. We must apply universal standards to both to dispel the notion that has arisen understandably and correctly that there is no even playing field and that the Government are using cement kilns as a back-door way of quickly disposing of hazardous waste.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Frank Cook): Before I call the first of the three Front-Bench spokesmen, may I point out that we have 55 minutes left? The convention is to divide the remaining time equally into three parts, although no one is necessarily required to fill their time. However, bearing in mind that the purpose of these debates is to give the Minister an opportunity to give the Government's views and answer questions, the Chair would frown on anyone who exceeded a third of the time available.

2.35 pm

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for that indirect warning. I assure you that I have no intention of exceeding a third of the time that is left. Indeed, it would be an interesting experience for one of these debates to finish early. We always miraculously seem to find just enough to say to occupy the hour and a half available on these occasions.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Sayeed) on securing this debate. He has a long interest in waste matters, as has already been said. He was, as he says, a shadow Environment Minister, and I remember serving with him on the Committee considering the Waste Emissions Trading Bill. We have had a bewildering succession of shadow Environment Ministers on the Conservative side—I am losing track of them all—but his knowledge of the subject made him one of the better ones. He is, therefore, well qualified to raise the matter this afternoon.

Before I approach the issues that the hon. Gentleman raised, I want to follow up directly the matters raised by the hon. Member for Westbury (Dr. Murrison). He makes some powerful points, and I want the Minister to be in no doubt that those concerns are shared beyond the Westbury constituency, and indeed beyond the Conservative party. I assume that the hon. Gentleman is speaking for his colleagues on that matter as well.

The basic principle of using cement kilns for incineration is one with which I am instinctively unhappy, because such kilns are designed to make cement, while incinerators are designed to incinerate waste. Mixing the two up in a cavalier manner is not satisfactory when we are considering public health, regulation of emissions and matters of that nature.

[Norman Baker]

Incinerators are largely unpopular up and down the country. In the view of local authorities, however, they are required: since the Government have been so late in transposing the EU landfill directive, the local authorities have no time to do anything other than build incinerators to meet their landfill reduction targets. As the hon. Gentleman says, there is considerable evidence that the Government, who do not want to get the blame for a chain of incinerators, are looking to do two things: shift the blame on to local authorities, and find a back-door way of dealing with waste. I fear that cement kilns are just such a back-door method.

Like the hon. Member for Westbury, I do not wish to overstate the case, but I believe that emission levels and, potentially, public health are being brought into the equation unnecessarily because of that strategy. Again, I urge the Government to look at what that means in terms of emissions from cement kilns and, indeed, the use of cement kilns for hazardous waste. The substitute fuels protocol was published yesterday, as I am sure the Minister is aware.

The hon. Member for Westbury also raised the question of transportation of waste from outside this country. I have looked into that in some detail.

Mr. Sayeed: I admit that the hon. Gentleman has alluded to this, but should not the real question be the quality of emissions? There are brick-making kilns in Stewartby in my constituency. The only thing that matters to anyone is the quality of the emission howsoever it occurs, no matter if it is from brick-making, cement-making or a designated facility.

Norman Baker: I absolutely agree. Indeed, that was the content of my intervention on the hon. Member for Westbury a few moments ago.

We were faced with an incinerator in Newhaven in my constituency, and I looked into the matter. As incinerators are now classed as producing energy from waste, there is no ban on the importation of material from elsewhere in the European Union for disposal of material—I call it disposal, they call it something else—in incinerators. Of course, one cannot import material for landfill, but it can be imported for incineration. There is the prospect, particularly for those of us who have constituencies close to mainland Europe, that such material will be imported, in the same way that the Government are increasing and encouraging the importation of nuclear waste, apparently to please the Treasury. Who is to say that waste will not be imported for disposal in incinerators?

Dr. Murrison: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that another damaging aspect of the substitute fuels protocol is the lack of public consultation that it ushers in? At the moment, there is a facility for public consultation that the substitute fuels protocol will degrade.

Norman Baker: I agree with that very good point, and I hope that the Minister will pick up on it when he responds.

At the beginning of his contribution, the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire talked about the lack of forward planning by DEFRA. I do not wish to be too down on the Government but it is a fact that, over the years, we have had a number of opportunities to make that particular point and nothing seems to get much better. We have had to deal with fridges, abandoned cars and next it will be batteries. There is to be a requirement to recycle 40 per cent. of batteries and there are no battery facilities, apart from the one that will be opened shortly. Yet again, we face mountains of waste, for which the Government are ill-prepared.

The same argument applies to hazardous waste; the Government were clearly unprepared for the co-disposal rules on 16 July, despite warnings made at great length by my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Sue Doughty) and others.

Richard Ottaway: If the hon. Gentleman does not mind, I would like to return to the subject of incineration for a moment. His opposition to incineration is well known, but how does he feel about combined heat and power? Is it all right to incinerate if something productive results from it, such as heat and power?

Norman Baker: I must not be tempted to go down the route of the entire waste strategy. The Government have a waste strategy, and my party adheres to it. My only complaint is that it is not implemented. In fact, it is implemented upside down in a sense, with landfill being encouraged most of all. Combined heat and power has a role, but we are not in favour of incineration, except for certain small quantities of hazardous waste—if that process can be properly controlled. Combined heat and power is clearly a better end result than letting heat drift out, but incineration is not necessarily implied in that process.

Richard Ottaway: Is that a yes?

Norman Baker: That is the answer I have given. We are in favour of combined heat and power; we are not in favour of incineration, except for the small, purposeful use that I mentioned for hazardous waste.

Richard Ottaway: I want to press the hon. Gentleman on this because it is an important point. One cannot have combined heat and power without incineration. If the hon. Gentleman is in favour of combined heat and power, logically he is in favour of incineration.

Norman Baker: I will try again. I am not in favour of facilities being created for the purpose of incineration from which combined heat and power is a by-product. I hope that is more helpful in clarifying my position.

Richard Ottaway: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Norman Baker: I am conscious, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that we have had a warning not to overrun, and I have allowed about five interventions. I shall move on.

One of the other matters raised by the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire was the lack of sites for disposal of hazardous waste to landfill, irrespective of the landfill directive and its requirements. That is a serious issue for my constituency where there is now a proposal that has suddenly emerged to fill that void. There are no sites for the disposal of hazardous waste anywhere remotely near to my constituency. No such site to deal with hazardous waste has been identified in the East Sussex, Brighton and Hove waste plan, but a speculative application has arrived for a site in Chailey in my constituency, which is wholly unsuitable. The proposed site is the old Hamsey brickworks, and it is unsuitable because it will lead to the generation of a huge number of lorry movements. Because there are so few sites, and there are none for miles around, a large number of lorry movements from Kent, Surrey and West and East Sussex will all bear down on that site.

It is interesting to note that when health authorities and primary care trusts are asked to comment on incineration facilities, the health issue they comment on most is the movement of lorries and the pollution that they generate, which is significant. There will be a massive increase in lorry movement if that proposal is accepted.

The proposal would also place the site on top of a geological fault, of all things. It is close to a stream and it is very close to a residential area, and it would be a nightmare if that were allowed to proceed. However, I am afraid to say that the Conservative county council, which is in charge in my area, has seen fit to ask the applicant, Lloyds Environmental, to combine the application for a landfill site for hazardous waste with a materials recycling facility. They are quite clearly different decisions, but it is being asked that they be considered together. On behalf of my constituents, who have written to me in large numbers, I call on the county council to reject that application. I hope that those comments will be picked up and relayed to the county council.

I also want to confirm my agreement with the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire on the issue of what is happening to the waste. We were warned before the ban on co-disposal of hazardous waste came into force that there were no sites. The Government were ill prepared for that. The question that has not been properly answered by anybody is: what has happened to the waste that has not been disposed of properly? There may have been a rush to deal with some of it before the ban came in. We may be having a quiet winter and that may have helped people to stockpile waste. Some waste may have been disposed of improperly through non-hazardous-waste channels and some may have been fly-tipped—there is a real issue there.

I have not had a decent answer to this question from the Minister when I have raised it before: what happens to a farmer who suddenly wakes up one morning and finds that he has got a field full of asbestos because someone else has tipped it there? He is faced with a choice. He can ring up the Environment Agency and say, "I've got a field full of asbestos," to which it will say, "Thanks very much. Here is the bill. We'll take it away." Alternatively, he is forced to pretend that the asbestos is not there in order not to incur a penalty for something that is not of his making. That is a difficult situation. I am afraid that it is quite possible that private landowners find material tipped on their land that they do not report because they will incur a financial penalty. What is the Minister's answer to that point and how will he deal with the issue? What reporting mechanism is in place to identify what hazardous waste is being fly-tipped on private land? The Minister seems rather occupied with his correspondence. Perhaps one of his officials will record my point and send him a note when he comes to reply.

I am sorry to bring in a party note, but it is important if we are going to talk about the issue seriously. As I said, I have respect for the knowledge of the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire on this issue. I would go so far as to say that I do not doubt the integrity and commitment of those who speak on the environment for the Conservative party. However, I am bound to say that their credibility has not been helped by the recent James report—the exercise carried out at the behest of the shadow Chancellor—which proposed swingeing cuts to the Environment Agency, which is the very body that we rely on to deal with the dumping of hazardous waste up and down the country.

In a letter that was published in The Times yesterday, John Harman, the chairman of the Environment Agency, wrote:

"The James report for the Conservative Party on the savings to be made from bureaucracy proposes cutting government grants to the Environment Agency by £47 million, which it describes as cuts in 'intrusive enforcement by the Environment Agency'.

"As the Environment Agency actually spends £19 million on enforcement—acting on breaches of the law . . .—my board would dearly like to understand what else is for the chop . . .

My board takes the views and objectives of the major political parties extremely seriously, and it is part of our duty to the public that we understand them properly. In the circumstances we can hardly fail to conclude that Mr. James's recommendations have no basis in even the most rudimentary understanding of our business."

The hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) is not responsible for the proposals in the James report, or for the shadow Chancellor, but if she and her colleagues want credibility on the environment, they had better undo that particular cut pretty damn quickly.

Dr. Murrison: On the subject of credibility and the Environment Agency, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will pay a visit to my constituency and speak to the The Air That We Breathe Group, which is a champion of the concerns of local people in respect of the Westbury cement works. He should ask that group what credibility the Environment Agency has. He would find that it is much dented. We should not for one moment suppose that it is a faultless champion of the environment. I fear that it is full of faults.

Norman Baker: The Environment Agency is not without fault, although I noticed that in the debate on the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill—yesterday, I think—the Conservatives proposed an amendment to give the Environment Agency more power to tackle fly-tippers. There seems to be some contradiction between cutting the powers of the Environment Agency and giving it more powers. The Environment Agency is not always as effective as it might be because it is under-funded. It cannot carry out the necessary inspections and the Conservative proposals would make that much worse. Tony Juniper, who has a key position as executive director of Friends of the Earth, said:

"The Conservatives' plan to slash and burn spending at DEFRA is a dangerous attack on Britain's environment and countryside. Cutting Environment Agency staffing risks undoing some of the excellent achievements made over recent years . . . Oliver Letwin's plans are nothing short of madness."

[Norman Baker]

I want the Conservatives to be credible on the environment; I want people in all parties to argue for better environment protection, because that is how we will get it. I want serious action on global warming, for example, but we ain't going to get it with the recent half-baked proposals to cut budgets.

Richard Ottaway: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman wants to be even-handed, and that he is aware that the chairman of the Environment Agency is a member of the Labour party, and not a completely neutral voice. Would he like to explore the Gershon report, which calls for substantial cuts in the recycling budgets? The Minister has been totally unable to explain how they will be achieved.

Norman Baker: I am happy to be even-handed. I spend most of my time criticising the Government in my contributions in the House, even if I have not done so today. We do not agree with the proposals to which the hon. Gentleman referred and they will not feature in our manifesto, which will be committed to properly funding local authorities and recycling projects.

Hazardous waste raises serious issues. The Minister cannot pretend that everything is hunky-dory and has gone swimmingly since 16 July. He must deal with the points made about the lack of facilities, the huge imposition on local communities where facilities are provided, and about the cement kilns and transport movements, to which I referred. I hope that he will address those matters when he replies, and if he cannot do so that, he will write to the hon. Members present and give them his full and considered views on the points that have been raised in the debate.

2.52 pm

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): May I join in the hearty congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Sayeed) on securing the debate? I also congratulate another illustrious predecessor in this excellent debate, my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Richard Ottaway).

The most staggering thing is that the credibility of the Liberal Democrats has been shot in the water. They opposed an incinerator in Guildford but built one in Sheffield, under a Liberal Democrat administration. However, I was not aware of the confusion and muddle of their policy on incineration and combined heat and power until we focused on their comments.

For the sake of clarity, I should say that we take very seriously the so-called allegations made by the two Labour stooges—the chairman and chief executive of the Environment Agency—who are both still members of the Labour party. Those allegations will be rebutted fulsomely in the same medium from which they emerged.

Locally, I enjoy an excellent relationship with the Environment Agency in the region, which had a difficult role in the scenario of the ghost ships, especially the Able plant. ENCAMS and other organisations in my local region also play an excellent role.

Norman Baker: Far be it from me to defend members of the Labour party, but it is unfair to call John Harman and Barbara Young stooges. I hope that the hon. Lady will withdraw that remark, because in my experience of working with them their approach has been entirely professional and independent.

Miss McIntosh: Had they been more even-handed in their analysis of Gershon, as well as James, Conservative Members would have taken their comments much more seriously, as would those who are deeply concerned about the environment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire has played a role in the Conservative party on which we continue to build. Hansard records that as early as May 2002 he alerted the Government to the problem of the delay and lack of preparation in signing up to the EU landfill directive. I am staggered that even now there are only 12 hazardous waste merchantable sites, which is a gross underestimate of what is required. By my hon. Friend's calculations, there are still 4 million tonnes with nowhere to go. That is very serious.

My hon. Friend raised the serious concerns that we Conservatives have about the pre-treatment required and the lack of technologies to dispose of and prepare such waste under the new criteria that will be set. We want to take this opportunity to press the Minister on the matter. I am sorry not to have the company of the Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment, who I gather was in Cumbria yesterday and is even further afield today. However, I hope that our concerns will be conveyed to him.

Of the 200 sites that were licensed before 12 July 2004, only five were licensed to continue to operate past that date. On 16 July, we had the capacity to dispose of only 1 million tonnes of hazardous waste, leaving a shortfall of 4 million tonnes. That significant amount of hazardous waste may well not be missing, but it is of great concern to us. The industry and the businesses concerned would welcome an assurance from the Minister that that shortfall is not missing and unaccounted for. Only eight sites had permission as of 12 December last year to dispose of hazardous waste. On 12 December, The Daily Telegraph apparently recorded that the cost of hazardous waste disposal had risen to £50 per tonne, compared with £10 per tonne for normal waste. Hazardous waste includes, among other things, computer monitors, fluorescent tubes and contaminated soil. More than 60 per cent. of hazardous waste is soil, according to the Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment.

As recently as 23 January, an article in The Mail on Sunday warned that mountains of TV sets could be joining that veritable electronic mountain. From August this year, they will also be considered hazardous waste. More than 2 million are disposed of each year. Industrial leaders and specialists in the field, such as the Environmental Services Association, say that no plans have yet been made to deal with the problem. Biffa says that there is no reason not to think that this will be a rerun of the fridge saga. That echoes the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire: this is clearly another example of the Government's failure to plan for EU directives and of a deepening of the hazardous waste crisis.

Other newspaper stories have something like 120,000 fridges being discarded on banks in Manchester. In spite of the fact that 2.3 million fridges and freezers are discarded each year, the Government can account for only 1.3 million. Perhaps the Minister could tell us where the other million have gone.

On 12 December 2004, it was reported that the London 2012 Olympic bid will lead to a crisis in hazardous waste disposal due to the removal of contaminated soil to construct the athletes' village. The cost of that would be immense, at more than £50 per tonne. In a further alarming report on 30 January, The Independent on Sunday reported that nuclear waste may have been dumped near Totnes.

We have also identified the forthcoming battery mountain. We have a number of questions for the Minister and would like some clear answers and assurances. It is extremely important that the UK Government do not agree to something that we cannot implement by the due date. Our battery recycling levels are very low, so can the Government supply a route map, showing how they intend to reach the standards set, before signing up to the directive?

We need an open assessment of the UK's battery recycling capacity. I understand that Britannia recycling of Bristol went into receivership in November 2003 and closed down, leaving only one company in the west midlands, of which I do not have the name. That one company appears to be the sole recycler of household batteries in the country.

Without adequate recycling capacity, the likelihood is that we shall continue to send batteries to France and other continental countries to be recycled. That is environmentally unsustainable. Will the Government state what plans they have—presumably through the Waste and Resources Action Programme—to grow the required capability in the United Kingdom? There is much good will among the public about the need to recycle batteries. We need to facilitate that and make it as easy as possible for the public to take batteries to accessible recycling points. These may well be best placed in schools, supermarkets or other easily reached facilities. The Minister's Department has maintained—

Mr. Sayeed: Is my hon. Friend aware that, under the IMO carriage regulations which deal with the transport of hazardous waste by sea, it is quite likely to be impossible or prohibited to send a battery which contains acid by sea?

Miss McIntosh: It is just as well that we have my hon. Friend's expertise in commercial transport by sea—not least by the Royal Navy—on our side so that we can give the Minister some possible direction in that regard. That was a very helpful intervention.

The Minister's Department's stance is that such minor collection points may need a waste management licence—which would take time and money to acquire. That is not the best nor the most appropriate route. The European Commission, in correspondence with Dr. Caroline Jackson MEP, who speaks for us in the European Parliament, has maintained that the batteries directive does not require such a licence, nor does other associated legislation. That seems therefore to be an area where we need less bureaucracy and more common sense. As schools, supermarkets or other facilities may soon be wanting to put in such collection points, will the Minister state once and for all that such collection points will not require the full panoply of detail—and burdensome administrative procedures—of a waste management licence, which was surely never intended for such small sites?

I echo what my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire said regarding hazardous waste, which—if it is unsorted—will have waste acceptance criteria applied to it from 16 July this year. They will require hazardous waste to be treated to a specified standard before it can be accepted into a hazardous landfill site. My understanding, however, is that the UK's hazardous waste treatment infrastructure is the least developed of any EU member state. For example, there are 16 high-temperature incinerators operating in France, compared with only two in the UK.

As for contaminated land, developers begin clearing land prior to developing in spring. Therefore, an increase in the amount of contaminated soils needing management is expected shortly. Contaminated soils account for 20 per cent. of all hazardous waste—approximately 1 million tonnes—so I wish to press the Minister on a number of points. Conservative Members want to see the licensing process speeded up, so that more merchant-dedicated hazardous waste sites are opened as soon as possible. I am grateful to the Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment who, in response to a series of parliamentary questions in August 2004, brought us up to date on the number of site applications there had been until then. In many cases, planning applications had been refused pending planning permission being granted, but a number were refused outright. Will the Minister bring us up to date again on whether the total of 12 is correct?

The official Opposition would introduce stricter penalties for the fly-tipping of hazardous waste, including making it an arrestable offence. Like the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker), who also raised this issue, I am only too aware of the prospect that in a deeply rural constituency such as mine it is only too easy to dump contaminated soil, asbestos and other forms of hazardous waste, including fridge-freezers and other items, on the land without the knowledge or permission of the landowner. Increasingly, that is causing great concern. I understand from the Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality, speaking in Committee yesterday, that the Government are saying that that will be an arrestable offence—arrestable, that is, by a police officer. However, we all know that a police officer can never be found in rural areas at precisely the moment one is required. We therefore hope that it will be considered important to extend similar powers of arrest to the Environment Agency officers, who are the very people being asked to tackle the issue.

The Government have so far not released any recent figures showing how many hazardous waste sites are in operation. Will the Minister do so today? What effect has the 85 per cent. decrease in hazardous waste sites as of July and August last year had on the environment? Does the Department have any evidence of an increase in fly-tipping of hazardous waste to date?

The Environmental Services Association and the Environment Agency agree with the Government that there is no longer any significant amount of missing waste. Will the Minister confirm that that is correct and give details of what has happened to the waste produced between July last year and now? Some 4 million tonnes are produced annually, but only 1 million tonnes have been accounted for.

There is no waste strategy in place. A waste strategy and/or guidance regulations drive investment, which was the point that my hon. Friends the Members for Croydon, South and for Mid-Bedfordshire made. We increasingly rely on commercial operations, without which there would be no investment. That is particularly important for the waste acceptance criteria, which come into effect on 16 July. The criteria require treatment of contaminated waste before it is landfilled. However, as the Department has published no framework, there has been no investment to date and the treatment technologies are not available.

The Government have persistently demonstrated that they cannot be trusted to deal with hazardous waste effectively. Tens of thousands of fridges have blighted the landscape and they will soon be joined by hundreds of thousands of TVs. There are more than 2 million TVs a year to be disposed of, but no plans to recycle them. We face the increasing challenge of household batteries and no recycling point easily identified, yet the Government are poised to sign up to the new EU directive. The Government seem totally unprepared for the fact that TVs will soon become hazardous waste. What is the Minister doing to prevent a TV mountain being created before August?

We have also built up a body of evidence, not least from proceedings on the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill, to show that the Government do not consult properly, if at all, with the waste management industry. What plans does the Minister have to change that? If people can, allegedly, dump radioactive waste in Totnes, what hope do we have of the Government preventing people from dumping less dangerous but equally serious waste? Again, where are the 1 million fridges?

I welcome this opportunity to debate the issue and would like to record again my appreciation of my two illustrious predecessors, most recently my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South, and previously my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire. I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Dr. Murrison) that we have no immediate plans to convert cement kilns into incinerators, but we see scope, albeit limited, for combined heat and power. I do not think that we shall match the giddy heights reached in Denmark of 58 per cent. of household waste incinerated—I bow to the knowledge of Denmark that the hon. Member for Broxtowe (Dr. Palmer) has—but we would look favourably on any possibilities for micro-generation from combined heat and power.

3.9 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): I congratulate the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Sayeed) on securing this debate and apologise for the absence of my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment, who, as many hon. Members know, is one of the world's leading experts on the subject. He is unavoidably abroad on ministerial business.

I apologise also to hon. Members who have participated in the debate and to those following our proceedings that, as a consequence of my hon. Friend's absence, some of the answers to the questions asked, particularly those asked by the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh), will not be as satisfactory as they would have been had he replied to the debate. I shall deal in writing with anything that I do not manage to cover in my short response this afternoon. I apologise in advance to my officials for the extra work involved in that.

It may help if I give some background to the current state of affairs on hazardous waste, and the way in which the Government envisage things progressing. Approximately 5 million tonnes of hazardous waste was consigned in England and Wales in 2002. Some 70 per cent. of that came from four categories: 25 per cent. was construction and demolition waste and asbestos; 20 per cent. was oil and oil and water mixes; 12 per cent. was from organic chemical processes; and 13 per cent. fell into the category of "not otherwise specified".

Approximately 39 per cent. of all that hazardous waste was disposed to landfill. In addition to consigned waste, some 4.5 million tonnes of hazardous waste was treated or disposed of at the site where it was produced. The solid element of that waste amounted to 500,000 tonnes. As we shall see, those amounts of hazardous waste are set to decline in coming years, as additional controls drive waste producers to consider waste prevention and minimisation above treatment and disposal.

Some of those significant changes to the management of hazardous waste have already taken place in the UK, and more changes are due in the coming year. The most significant, as hon. Members have already mentioned, relate to the implementation of the EU landfill directive, which was agreed in 1999. Most notable is the ban on the co-disposal of hazardous with non-hazardous waste in the same landfill cell. From 16 July 2004, hazardous waste destined for landfill has had to go to a dedicated landfill site for hazardous waste.

In addition, however, the landfill directive allows so-called stable non-reactive hazardous waste to go to a separate cell in a non-hazardous landfill. The term "stable non-reactive" denotes waste whose leaching behaviour will not change adversely in the long term under the landfill design conditions. Examples of a stable non-reactive hazardous waste would be asbestos or contaminated soil mixed with concrete. In addition to the co-disposal ban, there is a requirement from 16 July 2004 that hazardous waste be pre-treated before it is placed in landfill.

Further changes to the treatment of hazardous waste for landfill are being made this year. On 16 July 2005, the waste acceptance criteria will apply to hazardous waste going to landfill and to stable non-reactive hazardous waste going to separate cells in non-hazardous landfill. The waste acceptance criteria do not create new wastes, but set limits on the amounts of substances—mainly heavy metals—that are permitted to leach from the waste. To ensure that waste meets the criteria it must be tested, and guidance is available on those testing requirements.

The changes will improve the management of hazardous waste. They are already leading to more sensible decisions by waste producers and waste managers and are broadly welcomed by the industry. We are already seeing benefits, with early indications of a reduction in hazardous waste going to landfill since July last year. Waste producers must now consider the costs of hazardous waste management and be aware of the new controls, especially on landfill. They also have responsibilities to know what waste they are producing, its characteristics and how it might be treated.

Dr. Murrison: Will the Minister outline what pre-treatment of hazardous waste means?

Mr. Bradshaw: I am afraid that I shall have to write to the hon. Gentleman with those details. I do not have them at my fingertips.

Dr. Murrison: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it appropriate for a Minister of the Crown to come here and not be properly briefed?

Mr, Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order for the Chair. The Minister answering the debate is a qualified Minister of the Government, and in the absence of the fully qualified specialist on the issue under debate, who is on duty elsewhere, he is the best we are going to get.

Mr. Bradshaw: I did preface my remarks with a reference to the absence of my hon. Friend, and perhaps I might have hoped for more graciousness from the hon. Gentleman. I shall write to him on the point that he raises. Hon. Members can interrupt as often as they like to try to trip me up, but it will not achieve much for their constituents.

As a result of the changes, no longer can the response to hazardous waste management be either "dig and dump" or "that is someone else's problem".

One issue that was raised today, not least by the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire, who initiated the debate, is what will happen to waste electronic and electronic equipment—known as WEEE—once the new directive is implemented. We will see greater treatment and recycling of WEEE. New capacity is already being developed for the proper treatment of such waste; only two weeks ago, a plant opened in Wales that has the capacity to deal with 500,000 television sets a year. Once the treatment requirements of the directive are in place, and if they are communicated and enforced, industry will develop the necessary treatment. I assure the House that there is no prospect of what the hon. Member for Vale of York unhelpfully called television mountains.

Overall, the Government are committed to reducing the UK's reliance on landfill in order to reduce the environmental impact of waste and because, with landfill, we miss the opportunity to recover value from the waste.

The hon. Members for Mid-Bedfordshire and for Croydon, South (Richard Ottaway) suggested that there had not been enough consultation on some of the decisions, and that people had not been given enough time to make the necessary investment decisions—the hon. Member for Croydon, South particularly mentioned private businesses. That surprises me, because only the UK and Sweden have transposed the decision before the July 2004 deadline; all the other member states have yet to do so. We have gone through the compulsory consultation process. We have set up the hazardous waste forum. The Federation of Small Businesses, to which the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire referred, apparently complained that it had not been consulted or included, but it is represented on that forum. I will certainly respond to the hon. Gentleman's criticisms, but they surprise me.

Mr. Sayeed rose—

Miss McIntosh rose—

Mr. Bradshaw: I will give way first to the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire.

Mr. Sayeed: The reason for people's doubts about the Government is the way in which they have performed in the past. The fact is that there was a fridge mountain. The fact is that Ministers did not realise that the regulations stopped them sending redundant fridges to poor countries in Africa until it was pointed out to them. They have a history.

As for the WEEE directive, it was my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York who brought up the problem. We have facilities to deal only with 1 million tonnes a year. How are we going to deal with the other 4 million tonnes?

Mr. Bradshaw: I now give way to the hon. Lady.

Miss McIntosh: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way again. Like my hon. Friend, I do not wish to trip him up.

The Minister will appreciate that I spent 10 years trying to negotiate and sign up to some of those EU directives—all in Britain's best interests. The criticism is not personal to the Minister or his officials. However, the global impression that we get from his Department is that we are signing up to EU directives without having the necessary infrastructure in place and without giving business the lead time to prepare for them. It would help the Minister if we did not sign up to any more until we have the facilities in place. Further to that, Denmark and Sweden are incinerating and have stopped recycling because of the transport problems mentioned earlier by a number of hon. Members.

Mr. Bradshaw: I shall come to the transport problems if I have time. I take the hon. Lady's point that it is important not to sign up to EU directives; indeed, I am always extremely careful about what I sign up to, especially if I feel that we have not had enough consultation or that we have not considered the potential impact of what is proposed.

The hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire asked whether we approved of increased penalties for fly-tipping, as recommended by the Environmental Audit Committee. Yes, we do. I am not going to join the party political mudslinging that we heard earlier, but I am somewhat surprised at that comment given the official Opposition's opposition to the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill. That Bill will do exactly that; it will raise the maximum fine for fly-tipping from £20,000 to £50,000. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is aware of that, and I hope that he will try to persuade his Front-Bench colleagues to change their stance on the Bill.

[Mr. Bradshaw]

The changes are beginning to have a positive impact, but we cannot achieve our waste strategy goals alone. We need the active involvement of waste producers, the waste industry and the regulators if the very real benefits are to be realised.

As for the regulators, I decry the sort of language that was used by the hon. Member for Vale of York, when she described the chairman and chief executive of the Environment Agency as stooges. I do not always agree with the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker), but he was right to criticise the hon. Lady for saying that, and I look forward to her promised rebuttal of the Environment Agency's criticisms of the official Opposition's spending proposals.

The Environment Agency has been working hard; its work in this area is vital if we are to address the problems that were raised today by official Opposition Back Benchers. In addition to landfill and treatment site inspections and audits, the agency has undertaken more than 1,800 targeted producer inspections, numerous cradle-to-grave audits, more than 2,200 stop-and-search vehicle checks and audits of port facilities, and reports that there is no evidence from those checks that waste is deliberately being stockpiled or misdescribed in large volumes. The hon. Lady sought assurance on that. The agency will continue to monitor the situation and take enforcement action where necessary, but it needs the funds to do so. It is clear that the regulator is taking the issue of compliance seriously.

The issue of capacity has been raised. There were concerns, last year, that we would not have enough hazardous waste landfill capacity, but, as the Government predicted, that is not the case. Industry responded to the need for capacity by minimising hazardous waste, and there is now sufficient hazardous waste landfill capacity to meet current needs. Concerns were expressed that not all regions have a dedicated merchant hazardous waste landfill—Wales and south-east England have been given as examples—but each of those regions has separate cells in non-hazardous landfill for stable non-reactive hazardous waste.

We must not exaggerate the problem of transport. In response to the question raised by the hon. Member for Lewes, the proximity principle, whereby waste is dealt with as close as possible to where it arises, is clearly important, but hazardous waste has always been transported to the most suitable or best-value sites for treatment and disposal, regardless of distance. There are only two merchant high-temperature incinerators in the UK—at Fawley and Ellesmere Port. They are able to deal with our most intractable hazardous waste, which often has to travel some distance to those facilities.

We should not forget that our overall aim must be to reduce our reliance on landfill, which is at the bottom of the waste hierarchy, and simply leaves the problems of contamination and hazard for future generations.

Another plank of our controls on hazardous waste relates to its tracking and movement. That issue that was also raised by the hon. Member for Lewes. The hazardous waste directive provides controls in that area, and the Government have embarked on a review of the main controls implementing the directive—the special waste regulations. The Government had a consultation on revised hazardous waste regulations last year, which closed on 29 October. They will introduce the final regulations in the spring, with the intention that they should come into force on 16 July, to coincide with the application of the landfill directive waste acceptance criteria.

The new controls will provide a streamlined system. That is important, given that the amount and types of hazardous waste were increased in the EU in 2002. The new controls provide for a system of notification to the Environment Agency for sites producing hazardous waste, with exclusions for low-risk producers such as shops, offices, farms and charities. Companies that move hazardous waste off site will, as now, have to ensure that a consignment note describing the nature of the waste travels with it. However, the current requirement that companies obtain permission from the Environment Agency before moving hazardous waste will be dropped, as it adds little to the controls.

Overall, the focus of the controls is to move from the waste manager, who is already subject to regulation and permitting, to the hazardous waste producer. Thus, the regulatory effort can be directed at the beginning of the chain of hazardous waste management. The agency will be able to offer advice to waste producers on techniques to minimise their waste and on methods of treatment, and will be able to better target its enforcement on those that do not comply, which is in the interests of better regulation.

An important part of the controls in the hazardous waste directive is the ban on mixing different categories of hazardous waste, or mixing hazardous waste with non-hazardous waste. That is sensible, because mixing can make it more difficult for waste to be recycled or recovered, and can lead to higher costs if more hazardous waste results. The new regulations will apply the mixing ban, which we propose to apply to producers of hazardous waste.

Mr. Sayeed: The Minister may not be able to deal with my question—in which case, I hope that he will make sure that the Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment does—which is about having incremental charges, particularly on small and medium-sized producers.

Mr. Bradshaw: I will certainly ensure that my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment writes to the hon. Gentleman on that issue.

Let me deal briefly with the constituency issue about the cement works raised by the hon. Member for Westbury, on which he indicated that he had had a long-standing correspondence with my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment. I am unable to comment on the specific case, but I will ask my hon. Friend to respond to the points the hon. Gentleman raised.

In general—also dealing with the concern of the hon. Member for Lewes—cement kilns are and will be subject to the strict emission controls in the waste incineration directive. There is no prospect of lowering those standards. Cement kilns provide a useful outlet for some wastes. The recovery of energy from waste, to reduce the burning of fossil fuels, is good for the environment—something that I hope all hon. Members would welcome.

I should say a little about the hazardous waste forum. The Government set up the forum in 2002, in response to concerns about the impending changes to hazardous waste management. That forum has been an important body, offering advice to Government and the Environment Agency on the direction of policy, and giving us the mechanism better to communicate changes to businesses, including the interests of the Federation of Small Businesses, which is represented on the forum.

A survey of the forum's members has confirmed that its work is welcomed by both industry and business. We will maintain the forum in its current form, although we are always open to suggestions—from both sides of the House—as to how we can improve its work and outlook.

We have had a worthwhile and interesting debate.

Norman Baker: In the time available, will the Minister deal with a point that I raised, as did the hon. Member for Vale of York? One of the reasons hazardous wastes may not appear to be a problem in some quarters is because it is illegally dumped on private land. There is then no incentive for the landowner to report that—in fact, there is a disincentive, because he faces a penalty. Could the Minister—or his colleague, in writing—clarify the Government strategy for identifying how much hazardous waste has been put on private land? Is it their intention that the private landowner who is innocent in this equation bears the bill? Would that appear to be the position at present?

Mr. Bradshaw: Further to the Environment Agency's assessment that the problem had not increased, there are extra measures which the hon. Gentleman knows are included in the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill. I am afraid that I will have to write to him on the other points on which he requested clarification.

We have had a worthwhile and interesting debate. We have heard a number of concerns about the future management of hazardous waste. Overall, the combination of the landfill and hazardous waste directives controls will improve the management of hazardous waste in this country. That will benefit the environment now and for generations to come.

Premium Rate Services (Ofcom Review)

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): I make no apologies for again raising the abuse of premium rate services by unscrupulous operators who are fleecing our constituents. There cannot be a Member in the House who has not had constituents with unexplained telephone bills because of scams operated through computers, or through text messages on mobile phones about wholly fictitious prizes, or people ringing them at home asserting that they have won £5,000. Such scams require calls to be made to an expensive 090 number, which enrich the fraudster and impoverish our constituents. The related ring tone scam is particularly obnoxious because it is focused on children.

First, let me set the scene. What has happened—almost by default—is that a new currency has been invented. Traditionally, our telephone bill simply paid for telephone calls; now, it can pay for information and services. The revenue is shared between BT, NTL or Telewest on the one hand and the service provider on the other. Most of the services are entirely harmless—the weather, the traffic, news from "Big Brother" or "Who Wants to be a Millionaire?". Others—the so-called adult services—are slightly less so. A few, of which more in a moment, are simply frauds. The account for one's telephone, whether fixed line or mobile, has become a new form of cash, like a credit card, paying for services or content, but, crucially, without the associated safeguards.

Secondly, with technological advance and the breaking down of geographical barriers, more people outside the direct regulatory control of the UK can access our telephones and computers and use the new currency to siphon money out of our accounts. The rate of technological development and the ingenuity of the fraudsters mean that the target is always changing: they are now moving on from 090 numbers to international numbers and 0871 numbers, to which I shall come in a moment.

Thirdly, the complex structure of the industry—what it is pleased to call the value chain—means that the fraudsters get their revenue up front from the telephone companies. In some cases, that happens long before we know that a huge debit has been placed on our bill and even longer before the bill is to be paid, which makes enforcement difficult and compensation impossible.

Fourthly, the regulatory regime has lagged behind all those developments. ICSTIS—the Independent Committee for the Supervision of Standards of Telephone Information Services—was in meltdown last year. Although it is now on the path to recovery, complainants are told that they will not get a personal response to their complaint, but that they should look at the website adjudications for an outcome, which might come 12 months after the original complaint. There has been, and there remains, regulatory failure on a massive scale.

Finally, every number that is allocated to the fraudsters has been allocated by a public body and the money is collected for them principally by our reputable national telephone suppliers. Ofcom gives them the licence to print the money and BT collects it for them. One would have thought that with those two gatekeepers at each end of the operation—Ofcom on the one hand, and BT and the telecom companies on the other—we might have closed the scam down, but we have not.

Let me give specific examples of what is happening as we speak. A constituent writes:

"I am a constituent at Redenham Park. I receive on average six nuisance telephone calls per day informing me that I have won a fantastic prize and to claim that prize to call back on a phone number that begins with 090".

I had one such message on my constituency office voice mail on Friday, telling me that I had won a cruise or £5,000. I, too, was invited to ring an 090 number, with no mention that it was a premium rate number. The use of automated dialling equipment to call home numbers is illegal, but that has not deterred the fraudsters. The Information Commissioner is meant to be dealing with the issue. No service provider has approval for such service, but it is happening.

There is also fraud based on mobiles. At the end of November, I got the following text message on my mobile:

"Private! Your 2003 Account Statement for"— it then gave my number, which I do not propose, for understandable reasons, to read into the record—

"shows 800 un-redeemed S.I.M points. Call 0871 8738005 Identifier Code 46892 Expires 22/11/04", which was the day after I got the message. That was another scam. I did not call the number, but I did call ICSTIS, which was helpful. It said that this seemed to be "an operation designed to run up relatively small revenue through pre-recorded waffle."

I then wrote to Ofcom to find out to whom it had given the number and what it proposed to do. Its letter, which is dated 22 December, started by saying:

"Your experience is far from uncommon and it would appear that this 0871 number is beginning to be used in a way that is similar to matters that ICSTIS has been investigating in relation to Premium Rate Numbers".

There then followed a rather laid-back sentence:

"Ofcom will look further into whether there is any consumer detriment taking place in this instance."

That, of course, was after I had told it of specific consumer detriment, but perhaps MPs do not count as consumers.

The really depressing part of Ofcom's reply was its response to my question about to whom the number had been given. Ofcom wrote:

"Turning to specifics, it transpires that"— it then gave the number—

"is part of a block of 10,000 telephone numbers allocated by Ofcom to a company called Band-X Limited in December 2003.

Band-X subsequently allocated much of that block, including this number to another provider called Allied Telecommunications Ltd, who has in turn supplied this number to a service provider Iberian Holdings Ltd."

I was told that I could contact that company in New York on a US number, or in the UK—this was the final insult—on an 0871 number. So, if I wanted to ring the service provider to complain that he had ripped me off, I got ripped off again. There was, however, a morsel of good news. I was told that "the company that sent you the initial text message may be in breach of the Privacy and Electronic Communications (EC Directive) Regulations 2003."

I am told that the Commissioner for Information Society and Media is on the case.

Iberian Holdings Ltd probably paid nothing for that number because it offered to share the revenue with the next company up the chain. If someone is deceived into calling the number, Iberian Holdings Ltd might be paid within seven days; in due course, BT will collect the money from the customer, who might not have realised that he was making a very expensive call.

Given the changing nature of telecommunications, to which I referred, and the abuse, it is entirely inappropriate to issue 0871 numbers as though they were raffle tickets. The letter says that there is no requirement for any member of the chain to be a resident of, or be a company registered in, the United Kingdom.

There is also the ringtone scam. Two constituents e-mailed me to say:

"Recently our nine year old daughter had the misfortune to watch a TV programme during which adverts were shown offering cheap downloads for mobile telephone ringtones. Our daughter thought she had bought and downloaded a 50p musical ringtone. The scam was that after the initial 50p downloads she then kept receiving unsolicited offers by text on her mobile which cost her £1.50 a time (her mobile is a pay as you go). As well as highly distressing for her it soon proved very expensive and annoying for us as we had bought the telephone as a way for her to keep in touch with us when she was out playing with her friends (a necessity in today's world)."

They went on to say:

"The adverts did show legal messages . . . but on a rapidly scrolling bar that an adult would have difficulty followirg never mind a child! Basically our nine year old daughter managed to enter into a contract that should not have been binding. On finding a website for the company it was found that the contract could only be cancelled in writing and the termination would take effect at the end of the month following the month of notice . . . in this case the end of October. In the meantime the company would continue sending the text messages and would be scamming about £20 a week on texting our daughter! Of course the company had no telephone or email address that we could contact directly, only a postal address.

In the end we had to purchase a new SIM card for the mobile. Our telephone shop said they had numerous instances of this where children had been misled by these adverts . . . We would like to know if there are any measures in place or planned that are going to curb these telephone bandits. There seems to be no regulating authorities to prevent these scams from happening. I could provide details of the company".

They provided details of the company, and concluded:

"British Industry whinges about too much regulation but when you rely on them to self regulate and provide an honest decent service to consumers you get sharks like these ripping off children."

Another constituent with the same problem wrote:

"My son has recently fallen foul of the mobile phone ringtone scam. He downloaded a single pop ringtone for 35p without realising that he was entering into a contract to receive monthly downloads of further ringtones until he actively un-subscribed to the service. These additional downloads were costing him £4.50 per month. This facility is cleared aimed at children, as they want their phone to have the latest trendy ringtone. However as children they are likely not to be aware of the on-costs relating to these services. These on-costs are not made clear in the marketing adverts, and the process to cancel a subscription is alsonot made obvious. Given that these services are advertised on television and in the national press, I am surprised that they are actually legal. It appears to me as a means of obtaining money by subterfuge. Please could you let me know if there is anything being done to try and prevent this practice continuing."

I hope that the Minister for Small Business and Enterprise, whom I welcome to the debate, accepts that there is a problem with some so-called service providers.

The Ofcom review makes it clear that some terminating communications providers, which are in the middle of the chain between the consumer and the service provider, are responsible for a disproportionate number of the abuses. More than half the fines levied by ICSTIS have been against only five of the 70 terminating operators, so why not stop giving them more numbers until they have cleaned up their act? This is what I have been told—I quote from the review—

"Some stakeholders have argued that OFCOM should play a more active role in policing PRS by withholding or withdrawing premium rate numbers from TCP's (Terminating Communications Providers) who have been involved in persistent breaches of the Code of Practice."

That strikes me as plain common sense. It continues:

"However, OFCOM's legal advice is that such a policy would be incompatible with the requirements of the EC Authorisation Directive."

What on earth is going on? Everybody knows that scams are taking place. We know who is responsible, but the EC tells us that the people complicit in carrying out the scams cannot have their numbers taken away. The service providers are also cocking a snook at the regulators. From January to September last year, ICSTIS imposed fines totalling £2.03 million on 91 service providers. Half the fines were unpaid as of 17 September, and of the 17 largest fines—those over £50,000—14 were imposed on overseas service providers, on which we have the least hold.

Let us have a system of bonds, as I proposed during the last debate that I initiated on this subject. If companies had to put up bonds before they could offer services, they would have an incentive to behave, because if they did not, they would lose their bonds; in addition, we would have a means of compensating their customers. Disappointingly, the review says only that my proposal should receive "further consideration".

One of the review's recommendations relates to the revenue-sharing arrangement. It proposes that the so-called seven-day rule, to which I referred earlier, be replaced with a 30-day rule. That seems eminently sensible, as it would mean that the company at the end of the chain providing the so-called service would have to wait for 30 rather than seven days for its cash, thus increasing the likelihood that the scam would be discovered and the cash frozen. Is that rule now in operation and, if not, when might it be introduced?

I turn now to consumer redress. The review says:

"We also understand that there are likely to have been very few cases in which the customers affected by a breach of the Code of Practice will have received a refund, let alone compensation."

However, the review is not very forthcoming about that. I know from my postbag that BT is still chasing people for money that, in my view, is not payable. Let me repeat the advice that I am giving my constituents: if they have taken their complaint to ICSTIS and ICSTIS has confirmed that the call is part of a scam, they should not pay. I stand behind any of my constituents who refuses to pay for calls that he has not made.

Some of the changes mentioned in the review can be made only after a three-month consultation period. Can the Minister tell us whether that period has started and whether there is any way of reducing it so that we can implement the changes quickly?

To sum up, I would like to see faster and more effective action taken against the minority who abuse premium rate services: we need to cut off the numbers more quickly to freeze the flow of cash. There should be a proper compensation process, funded out of bonds. We should name and shame the guilty parties and stop them playing the game; provide better consumer information; reduce the 12-week period for investigating complaints; and increase the maximum fine, as proposed by the review.

I hope that, when he replies, the Minister will have some good news for all who have been victims of the scams that I have mentioned.

3.43 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Nigel Griffiths): I congratulate the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) on securing the debate and highlighting a scandal of fraud and ineffective consumer protection under the present regime. The Minister for Energy and E-Commerce apologises for not being with us today, and has asked me to respond.

ICSTIS is charged with protecting consumers, regulating companies and tackling unethical business practices. It is responsible for regulating premium rate services. Last year, thanks to increasing numbers of consumer complaints and representations from many of our colleagues, ICSTIS became aware of the scam that the right hon. Member has highlighted and acted immediately in response to the problem: emergency action was taken to cancel the numbers as soon as ICSTIS suspected scam dialler activity. I am advised that ICSTIS can shut down a company—prevent use of its numbers—in two hours. Last year, it cancelled more than 90 numbers following consumer complaints.

A bar was imposed on B and B services LLC, which had installed a dialler in consumers' computers without them being aware of it. It was fined £100,000, and two other operators were also fined £100,000. Last year, ICSTIS levied 95 fines totalling more than £2 million. Regrettably, although B and B Services paid its fine, 33 operators failed to do so. Many are based abroad, but several are based in Britain, such as DCL (NW) Ltd in Liverpool, which has failed to pay one penny of its fine. KT Promotions in Cheltenham was fined £10,000, and according to the data I received this morning, it still remains unpaid. Another Liverpool company, Mr. J. Harrison t/a TIS U-K, owes £3,000 in fines. Most disturbing of all is a case for which I require an explanation from ICSTIS and about which I will inform Ofcom: it concerns a Stockport-based range of companies, each of which has had a £10,000 fine levied on it. They include Dynamic Promotions, James Promotions, Quality Sign Services and Resource Promotions Mobile Services Network, and the common thread linking them, apart from not paying fines after having been guilty of malpractice, is that they are all based at Bromley House, Woodford road, Stockport, Cheshire. I shall ask ICSTIS whether it is able to ensure that anyone operating from that address is investigated, so that if they are connected, action will be taken to end the fraudulent activities for which fines have been levied.

The right hon. Member highlighted several areas in which he wants immediate action. He complains quite rightly that reputable telecom companies—the network companies—are profiteering from such scams by ensuring that they pay the supplier, the fraudster, too quickly. He called for a 30-day delay to allow consumers to see their bill, lodge their complaint and have a payment stopped so that no one loses out. That approach is wholeheartedly endorsed by the Government and forms one of the 18 recommendations that Ofcom made last year, which we hope will be implemented. In the meantime, I urge all telecom operators to take immediate action to renegotiate contracts with other companies, especially where they suspect there may be fraud, to ensure that the delay is built in and the fraud prepared for. It is wrong that they should profit, just as it is wrong that the fraudsters should get away with such bad and illegal practice. Telecom operators can take that step without delay in order to restore public confidence. There are many reputable companies operating in the telecommunications field; the sector legitimately contributes about £1 billion to the economy and it is wrong that a few rotten apples, exploiting consumers who, as the right hon. Member said, are unwittingly suckered into their schemes, should tarnish the whole industry.

It is important to recognise that the potential profits from such scams are huge. I therefore welcome Ofcom's second recommendation that the maximum fine that ICSTIS can levy for breaches of its code of practice be increased from £100,000 and that it be made commensurate with an estimate of the profits that have been made. I hope that Ofcom and ICSTIS will not delay the implementation of that and several other key recommendations.

I was disappointed to read that 12 weeks has been allowed for public consultation and responses from companies. I hope that reputable companies respond favourably and well within the 12 weeks. There is then a further 12 weeks for the European Commission to consider the recommendations. The Government will vigorously lobby the Commission to ensure that it fully understands the scale of the problem in Britain and that it co-operates with us in implementing Ofcom's recommendations to try to end the scandal.

In the meantime, we want Ofcom to use its emergency powers. I am advised that it can close a line down in two hours. It can act quickly if it gets a series of complaints about any number. It is to act as quickly as possible so that consumers—many of which are small businesses, for which I have ministerial responsibility—are not subject to further scams of this nature.

I hope soon to place in the Library a list of all the companies that have been fined by ICSTIS and details about whether they have paid their fines. I hope that appropriate action is taken without delay by Companies House, or whichever body is most appropriate, against the British-based companies that I mentioned.

Sir George Young: The Minister is being very helpful. Would he expect any numbers used by companies that have not paid their fines to be cancelled until such time as they have paid their fines?

Nigel Griffiths: I can give the House an assurance that the numbers are cancelled—generally, when a scam is detected. The fine is then levied and collected. I am assured that relatives and associates are also banned from offering any premium rate service in the UK and that Ofcom or ICSTIS is determined to name and shame the individuals who are involved in such companies. I hope that the House will be reassured by that information.

I want to be clear about this: public confidence in ICSTIS and Ofcom is undermined by such scams. We expect ICSTIS to continue to use its emergency powers and procedures to take enforcement action against those who abuse the PRS charging mechanism. In the meantime, we also want to emphasise consumer education and awareness, strongly to advise people to install anti-virus software on their computer to avoid the problem, and to warn the young, vulnerable consumers that the right hon. Member rightly highlighted against mobile phone scams. ICSTIS has recently improved its website to inform members of the public about rogue internet diallers. I urge people, as they are already connected, to go to the ICSTIS website and follow its advice.

I am aware that countries such as Germany have banned certain premium rate services. I stress that such services are valuable businesses in Britain and the vast majority of them are legitimate. It would be a terrible loss not just to business but to consumers as well if there were to be a reaction along German lines to such scams. I am assured that the proposals will help to eliminate scams by building in a delay and therefore preventing payment from being made too quickly. It is important to allow companies to retain that money and pass it back to the consumer, not on to the fraudster. I know this is perhaps not Ofcom's finest hour, but the right hon. Member and I will do all in our power to put a bit of spine in the regulation.

Sir George Young: It sounds as if the Minister is working himself up to his peroration. Will he say a word about the suggestion that bonds be put up before services are offered? They were considered in the review and a number of people are keen on them, but, as I said in my speech, the review's response was, "No, not yet, but we will look at it." Does he have a view on whether bonds would be a useful safeguard to prevent abuse, and to compensate consumers?

Nigel Griffiths: The issue is not whether bonds would be a safeguard, but rather the ramifications of introducing them. Of course they could be useful. They are being considered as part of the implementation of the Ofcom report and I am advised that they have not been ruled out. I shall draw the right hon. Member's comments and strong advocacy of bonds to Ofcom's attention. It is important that the range of issues is looked at quickly and efficiently and that consumers are not left vulnerable while that happens. That is why I am a strong advocate of the emergency procedures. We want to see them acted on, and we want to see the culprits' names published. I intend to put those procedures in the House of Commons Library as soon as ICSTIS is able to confirm all the details.

I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for raising the issue. I assure him that it is being addressed seriously. I shall ensure that he is kept well abreast of developments.

Enterprise Promotion (Leeds)

3.57 pm

Mr. Colin Challen (Morley and Rothwell) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak of the great city of Leeds and its enterprise culture. In June 2003 I launched early-day motion 1488 calling for an award to be created, along the lines of the European city of culture, for the European city of enterprise. Naturally, my view was that Leeds should win that title. Since then, much has happened and Leeds has been shortlisted for the title of 2005 British capital of enterprise. The city has a strong case to make and I would like to look at some of its achievements this afternoon and consider some of the issues that still contrive to hold us back.

My own constituency of Morley and Rothwell, which suffered the demise of its mills and mines a generation ago, illustrates well some of the steps we have taken in the district as a whole. Unemployment has practically halved since 1997, and employment has never been higher. Many new jobs have been created, although only a few years ago the future looked bleak. My hon. Friend may recall a visit he paid to my constituency in 2002 to help me to launch my business survey—one of the first steps I took as a newly-elected MP. Some of the comments I received were enlightening. Many employers were calling for better education for young recruits. When we look at getting people into jobs, we must ensure that we get the right skills. In that regard, I was pleased to learn that the fifth of my five local high schools was awarded specialist school status last week. Bruntcliffe high school will from now on be known as the Bruntcliffe business and enterprise college. The school has reached out to the local community, and has been involved with local businesses in the development of its plans. That will go a long way to meeting the needs of today's employers.

Only last Friday, I was at the awards ceremony celebrating 50 years of the Joseph Priestley college, which is largely based in my constituency. The college, too, reaches out into the community—it was not long after the Minister's visit that I was at the opening ceremony of the college's highly accessible high street IT learning shop in Morley. The college intends to deliver high-quality education where it is needed and make it easy to access.

Elsewhere in my constituency thousands of new jobs have been created. Only recently, 300 more jobs with mobile phone company mmO$_2$ were announced at its premises at the Arlington business centre. Some 160 jobs with DePuy International will be created at the White Rose office park, while Northern Foods will establish its headquarters at Thorpe Park. Not all jobs will be maintained or created by outside companies. Since last year I have been working with the Morley chamber of trade and commerce on a retail regeneration strategy designed to stimulate retail interest in parts of the town that have suffered a decline. I am sure that my hon. Friend will agree that we need strategies in place to deal with disparities that persist within larger, economically successful areas. It is probably true that out-of-town shopping centres, such as the successful White Rose centre, have created jobs, but many of them have come at the expense of local shopping centres. In that context I welcome the prospect of business improvement districts—BIDs—so that local people and local businesses can develop their own plans to revitalise defined areas of need. We must ensure that the benefits of economic success do not conceal areas where problems must be addressed. That is one reason why I support such initiatives as the local sustainability proposals, among others, that the New Economics Forum has put forward.

Over the past 20 years, during which we have had a Labour-controlled council, Leeds has become the UK's best performing city for creating jobs outside London. Some 90,000 new jobs have been created in all, which is an astonishing 30 per cent. increase. It would be remiss of me not to mention the distinguished leadership of the council through some of those years, which included my hon. Friends the Members for Leeds, East (Mr. Mudie) and for Hemsworth (Jon Trickett). They and their successors demonstrated that, with a clear vision and the city council acting as a genuine partner, new enterprise would find the city attractive. Since the local elections last June, which resulted in a confusing coalition of convenience, the leadership has been shared alternately by the Liberal Democrats and the Conservatives. Such a Tweedledee and Tweedledum style of leadership cannot be good for the long-term interests of the city. We are, after all, talking about people who would have held back the regeneration of the city centre by opposing the creation of the Millennium square, which has levered in £15 million of private investment, which is more than £3 million more than the cost of the improvement works.

In the civic quarter as a whole, where the Millennium square sits, £150 million has been invested, which shows how much confidence there is in city centre commercial development. People—not just Labour people—find it odd that whereas the right hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy) has declared that the Liberal Democrats would never form a Government with the Conservatives, he is happy to abandon Leeds to that awful fate.

I digress, however. Leeds and those of us who represent it cannot afford to become complacent and say, "There we are—we're the top dog, the capital of the north". After all, Manchester is trying hard to catch up. We must also ensure that, when we talk about the future enterprise prospects for Leeds, we mean sustainable enterprise. By that I mean not only that employment should be maintained, but that new development should be environmentally sustainable. In that sense, one of the biggest negatives of more employment is more congestion. My parliamentary colleagues and I—as well as just about everyone else in Leeds and elsewhere in the region who has given the matter any serious thought—all back the Leeds Supertram bid. Despite the revision of the bid, which has impacted on my constituency in a way that I would have preferred it not to have, the fact remains that Leeds urgently needs to start work on a new mass rapid transport system. Leeds is the largest European city that does not have one.

The benefits of going ahead are impressive. The increase in accessible jobs in neighbourhood renewal areas is estimated to total 83,000. They are not new jobs, but the measure of how people in poorer areas will have improved access to employment opportunities. The estimate of new jobs created in the wake of Supertram is about 28,000 by 2014. The new jobs that are created in Leeds must be accessible to the people of Leeds. It has been suggested that without Supertram, 70 per cent. of the new jobs created could go to people living outside the city, which would further compound the congestion problem.

I hope that my hon. Friends will press those points on the Secretary of State for Transport, as have those of us who represent the city. It is important that as the Leeds economy grows its opportunities are made available to all. Large cities tend to have doughnut shapes of poverty around their core that miss out on the dynamic growth of the city centre. Now that we tend to talk more of city regions, that is even more important. Until we acknowledge that the Yorkshire-Humber region does not get its fair share of transport finance, the development of sustainable economic growth in the region will be stunted.

Does Leeds deserve to win the 2005 British capital of enterprise award? If it did, it would not be the first award it has won. In the last couple of years, independent judges have found Leeds to be Britain's best city for business, the UK's favourite city, the visitor city of the year, the best place in Britain to live, the best UK university destination and, perhaps allied to that, the No. 1 city for clubbing—as a member of the Ackroyd street working men's club, I wonder if the award includes clubs in that category. With more than 100,000 students in higher education in Leeds, it is not surprising that the place has a youthful feel. It is relevant to the debate that a survey has shown that 50 per cent. of students in Leeds expect to run their own company. Many of those young people choose to stay and live in the city in which they graduate, adding to the increasingly diverse economy that drives employment in the city.

Although it still has a significant manufacturing sector employing more than 48,000 people, Leeds has become one of the UK's most important financial services centres, where employment has reached nearly 100,000 people. In 1991, only 57,000 worked in that sector, which shows how well Leeds was able to realign its economy after the second Tory recession. I acknowledge that some of those jobs are in the much-derided call centre sector and are the kind of jobs that are prone to offshoring. However, when considering recent analyses, it could be argued that more jobs have come to the UK as a result of increased markets in those sectors where call centres operate, so we must be sure that locally we are in a position to capitalise on such two-way traffic. The overall strength of the financial sector in Leeds can weather any storms on that front, which must be one of the key features to consider when judging what is enterprise. It is one thing to get something started but another to keep it going. As things stand, it is anticipated that the financial sector in Leeds will deliver another 28,000 jobs over the next 10 years and that 40 per cent. of all the new jobs will be developed in the Yorkshire-Humber region.

The Leeds Initiative—a partnership between public and private sectors—is charged with the task of driving the Leeds enterprise strategy forward. It is one of the first initiatives of its kind and has spawned several other initiatives in which partnerships and relevant interests can influence developments. It has set itself seven challenging measures of success: increasing the wealth created in Leeds and the region every year; creating at least 50,000 new jobs; improving Leeds and the region's productivity performance by at least 15 per cent.; improving Leeds and the region's ranking in the European innovation index; increasing the proportion of the work force employed in high-tech or knowledge-based jobs every year; being recognised as the best UK city for business and students; increasing the number of Leeds residents moving into work.

One of the city's strongest emerging sectors is in media, and the Leeds media initiative has identified more than 1,600 media companies in the city with over 13,000 people employed, which represents a 50 per cent. growth since 1993. It is a sector that tends to rely on small companies with 10 people or fewer. It provides one of the most exciting opportunities for further development of Leeds's diverse and multicultural nature, both in the city and in the wider region and I predict further strong growth in that area.

One last fact convinces me that Leeds deserves to be called the British capital of enterprise: the last census showed that Leeds was the only city in the country outside of London whose population actually grew. Normally, as wealth is created, one expects to see a flight to more leafy locations, but Leeds has become a place for city living. Other cities have lost population as they struggle to adapt, but if people can be attracted to live and work in an area, it means more customers and enterprise. On that measure alone, Leeds is indisputably the 2005 British city of enterprise.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Nigel Griffiths): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Rothwell (Mr. Challen) on securing the debate and championing the cause of Leeds. As the Minister for small businesses, I had the pleasure of meeting him and his constituents and seeing at first hand some of the leading small businesses in Yorkshire.

Leeds has undergone a remarkable transformation in the past 10 years, from an industrial city in decline to recently winning the title of Britain's best city for business. More than 85,000 jobs have been created in Leeds in the past 20 years—more than any other UK city—representing more than a third of job creation in the region. Leeds has the most diverse economy of any major city in the UK outside London, with 17,500 VAT-registered businesses in a wide range of sectors. In the past three years, more than 100 companies have moved into Leeds, representing key sectors from manufacturing to financial and business services, retail, media distribution, transport and leisure. In the past 20 years, Leeds has become a major centre in the UK for financial and legal services, creating more than 40,000 new jobs, accounting for more than a quarter of the income value of Leeds. Leeds has been a model of economic growth in many sectors. Modern creative industries account for 70 per cent. of local self employment bringing £269 million a year into the Leeds economy. Tourism has grown by more than 30 per cent. in three years, bringing 20,000 jobs and £750 million into the Leeds economy. As well as being Britain's best city for business in 2003, Leeds was named visitor city of the year in 2004.

That success is not accidental. It is underpinned by the stable economic conditions achieved by this Government, which have enabled sustained development of the Leeds economy. However, the true success of Leeds comes from the people. They have built the communities and developed partnerships, especially over the past 15 years, to create an enterprising environment. The Leeds Initiative was set up to bring together the main institutional stakeholders and to set out a development agenda for the city. A strong belief in partnership working and co-operation was instrumental in creating conditions for the transformation of Leeds city centre, from the relocation of the Royal Armouries museum, where I spoke with manufacturers in October, to the remodelling of public spaces such as Millennium square and the Victoria Quarter.

I am grateful for the acknowledgement of the part played in Leeds' transformation by the Government's policies on the regions. The creation of regional development agencies and the increasing funding channelled through them has been instrumental in supporting the transformation of the city centre. More than £15 million from Yorkshire Forward, the regional development agency, has been committed to major regeneration schemes in Leeds, including the £3 million Round Foundry and £1 million for the Leeds city centre masterplan. That regeneration has, in turn, levered in considerable private sector investment and inward relocation of major businesses. In the past decade or so, £2.4 billion of investment has been made in large property development schemes, with a further £1 billion-worth under construction and £3.4 billion-worth in the pipeline—a total of £6.8 billion. As the local strategic partnership, the Leeds Initiative has enterprise and the economy as a key theme in its second vision for Leeds. The vision addresses a wide range of issues that contribute to an enterprising economy.

Leeds has recognised the vital importance of education and skills in achieving an enterprise culture. Partners have worked hard to improve education standards in Leeds. Key stage 2 results for 2004 show that Leeds pupils are now above the national average for English and maths attainment. GCSE results have shown a steady improvement, rising from nearly 40 per cent. of students achieving 5 or more A to C passes in 2001, to 45 per cent. in 2004.

Mr. Challen: The thought has just occurred to me that with the announcement from the Government that Bruntcliffe high school is to be awarded the status of a business and enterprise college, this might be an appropriate time to invite the Minister to visit my constituency to congratulate the school on that award and to visit one or two local companies. One company, a small engineering firm called Ace Engineering, won an award against competition from China, which is a tremendous achievement.

Nigel Griffiths: It is always a pleasure to visit Leeds. I am reinvigorated by what I see. I thank my hon. Friend for his kind and warm invitation.

The excellence in cities programme was designed to raise educational standards and opportunities in city areas. Partners with the underperforming schools—businesses and community groups—are able to embed enterprise in schools. The Education Leeds Business Alliance, which provides the formal mechanism for the partnerships, is doing a sterling job. Every secondary school in Leeds has been adopted by at least one local business. Department for Education and Skills enterprise advisers also support Leeds schools in disadvantaged areas.

[Nigel Griffiths]

Leeds has been innovative in the development of family learning centres, which link disadvantaged groups to employment and enterprise opportunities. Four family learning centres have been established in deprived areas of the city. At the core of each centre are employment access and training teams, which help people to make the transition from welfare to useful work. The family learning centres work with a wide range of other partners, including local colleges, Leeds Metropolitan university, local schools, Sure Start, Jobcentre Plus, and public and private sector employees. More than 1,000 people have now obtained jobs by such means.

Universities in Leeds are at the heart of developing the enterprise culture. The university of Leeds and Leeds Metropolitan university combined have 46,000 students, who contribute to the local economy and, more importantly, to the quality of life in the city. Some 5,000 students have benefited from enterprise learning at the university of Leeds since 2001. Every year, around 1,500 Leeds Metropolitan university students study modules on enterprise. The result is that 50 per cent. of students in Leeds expect to run their own businesses at some point in their career. The universities are key partners in a range of enterprising activities. For example, the university of Leeds is a key partner in the Department of Trade and Industry's manufacturing advisory service, which operates four of the regional centres for industrial collaboration funded by Yorkshire Forward to develop commercial applications for research. Leeds Met has implemented a graduate business start-up programme in partnership with Business Link. That is now operating across the whole of west Yorkshire to provide business space, equipment advice, mentoring training and resources to all Leeds students, graduates and alumni who seek help.

Businesses in Leeds can access a wide range high-quality business support to ensure the success of their enterprise. Support is available on all aspects of start-up, business growth, export, and inward investment, as well as property search services and sector-specialised advice and networking. That support is provided through strong partnership working. The partners include Leeds city council, Leeds chamber of commerce, Business Link West Yorkshire, the Asian business development network, Asian trade link, which I have visited on several occasions, and many others. Most Leeds businesses are small or medium-sized enterprises. About 20,000 of them employ up to 10 people each, comprising 15 per cent. of the Leeds work force. In the financial year 2003–04, 1,448 individuals inquired about starting up a business in Leeds and 557 businesses were started. Some 3,500 established businesses were given specialist advice.

A range of regeneration funding has come into Leeds to support economic regeneration, including £98 million from the single regeneration budget. Some £12 million has been provided for the first phase of the regeneration of the Aire valley. The project includes the release of more than 350 hectares of land for development and is expected to create about 5,000 jobs and to safeguard a further 10,000. An investment of £20 million has been generated and major businesses are relocating in the Aire valley, including Arla Foods, Alvis Vickers and Royal Mail. To date, the project team has helped more than 500 people get jobs with inward investors. In addition, the Government's neighbourhood renewal fund has provided £37.5 million to help to improve services in the poorest communities in Leeds. For example, in the Beeston hill and Holbeck neighbourhood renewal area, more than £30 million of additional capital investment has been attracted in the past five years, including four new schools and a health centre.

The Government recognise the importance of transport infrastructure to increasing the success of the Leeds economy. That is why they have already provided £16.6 million for integrated transport and maintenance in Leeds in 2004–05. Leeds has also benefited from the £63.3 million spent on transport in west Yorkshire in 2004–05. In addition the Government have fully approved funding for two major road schemes in Leeds—the Leeds inner ring road and the east Leeds link road.

The proposal for the Leeds Supertram is clearly a significant component in the local strategy, which is why the Government agreed in 2001 to provide public funding of up to £355 million towards the Leeds Supertram, of which 75 per cent. was to come direct from the Government. Sadly, since that decision was made, the project's estimated costs have increased to more than £500 million. No Government could simply sanction such an increase without ensuring value for taxpayers' money. Particularly in the light of the National Audit Office report on light rail, we need to consider how light rail can be made more cost effective, and whether it is always the best solution. I assure my hon. Friend that the Department for Transport is currently working closely with the promoters of the Leeds Supertram together with Leeds city council on new costings for the project and alternative proposals. They are in the process of discussing the bid with promoters and obtaining further information from them. Representatives of the Department have met Metro and Leeds city council representatives several times at official level. The main issues that are being discussed at the moment are, I am advised, the scheme appraisal and the promoter's proposed procurement and risk-sharing approach.

At the conclusion of the discussions a final decision will be made, but all the work that is presented will be considered carefully, and decisions will be based on value for money, including wider benefits and affordability, as happens with all light rail proposals. The Government recognise the importance of good public transport for the future development of Leeds, and we are working on cost-effective solutions to the city's transport needs of the 21st century. I thank my hon. Friend for giving me the opportunity to join him in praising the great achievements of Leeds and its citizens.

Rehabilitation and Healthier Workplaces

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Jane Kennedy.]

2.30 pm

The Minister for Work (Jane Kennedy): I was going to say that it was an inspired decision of the Whips to choose this subject for discussion today, particularly in view of the fact that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State published the Department for Work and Pensions five-year strategy yesterday, but the timing is entirely coincidental. However, it allows us an opportunity to compare and contrast the ideas that clearly exist around the House on this important issue. We will see what flows from the debate, which I welcome.

Since 1997, our central vision in government has been to create a Britain of opportunity and security for everybody. I know that that is a sweeping statement of the kind that generally makes people yawn, but it is more than a mere statement of aspiration. Back in 1997, we were criticised in some quarters and accused of irresponsibility for making full employment a key economic policy goal, but I would hope we agree that today we are closer to full employment in Britain than at any time for a generation. Unemployment is at its lowest for a generation and 2 million more people are in work than in 1997.

As my right hon. Friend said in his statement yesterday, this Government believe that an employment rate equivalent to 80 per cent. of the working-age population is achievable in the long term, but if we are to achieve that we face major challenges. Back in 1979, approximately 690,000 people claimed an incapacity benefit. It was not called that then; it was a different benefit and a different rate. By 1997, the numbers had reached 2.6 million. Today, they are in the region of 2.7 million. That equates to 7.5 per cent. of the working-age population, or three times as many as claim jobseeker's allowance. Most of those people have been on incapacity benefit for a very long time: over 2 million have been claiming it for two years and nearly 1.5 million have been claiming it for more than five.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): I am obviously sympathetic to the figures the Minister is using. Does she agree that, even if the national average is 7.5 per cent., there are areas and pockets where the percentage is very much higher and there is what might loosely be termed a culture of incapacity, which is itself part of the problem?

Jane Kennedy: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. I am glad to be debating this subject with him today, and we can explore it with less party particularity than would be the case if others were in his place. We can have a useful discussion and compare and contrast the strategies that we have all been developing as we look at this problem.

I do not think we can genuinely say that full employment has been achieved when nearly one in every 13 of us is out of work and claiming an incapacity-related benefit. That not only represents a huge economic cost for the country as a whole, but places individuals and their families at greater risk of poverty and social exclusion. This is a challenge that is almost unrivalled in its complexity and sensitivity, but it simply has to be addressed if we are to win our fight for opportunity and social justice. To succeed, we must make a reality of that hackneyed phrase, joined-up government.

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): While the Minister is still speaking generally, will she reflect on the fact that the fastest growing group of incapacity benefit recipients is those who fail the contribution test? That number has risen by 300,000 under this Government. Those people, by definition, have no recent contact with the labour market. Do the Government have a parallel strategy to that work-related strategy to stop those people flowing on to incapacity benefit?

Jane Kennedy: Our primary focus is on people who would qualify for incapacity-related benefits, which means those who would qualify for the pathways at the moment. People who receive income support do not qualify: they would not come through the pathways and they would not necessarily qualify for the pathways programme when it is rolled out. That does not mean that they would not qualify for a range of support, but they would perhaps not formally come within the pathways regime.

Those people already qualify for support through the new deal for disabled people, and as we develop a more flexible approach to the work done through Jobcentre Plus and BOND—building on new deal—personal advisers in contact with such individuals will increasingly be able to offer a more flexible range of support to encourage and enable them to make early contacts with the workplace. They cannot maintain contact, because they have never had contact with the working environment or may not have earned sufficient for contributions to be paid.

Mr. Webb: The Minister is being very gracious with her time and I thank her for giving way.

I want to pursue the point a little further, as I have not grasped it. I think that the Minister has just told the House that the credits-only people—nearly 1 million out of the entire case load—do not go into pathways to work, yet they are the fastest growing group. Can she explain why someone who becomes incapacitated because of a bad back but does not satisfy the national insurance rules should not get the specialist pathways-to-work help, yet someone who comes from employment with exactly the same ailment and the same prospects of getting back to work qualifies? Why is there a different approach?

Jane Kennedy: I am advised that people on income support on the ground of incapacity are included in the pathways. I apologise to the hon. Gentleman: I had not appreciated that they are included because they get IS top up, and that top-up payment qualifies them for inclusion in the pilot. Therefore, they will be drawn into the new programme that we are to develop. I am grateful for the inspiration that has allowed me to correct that misunderstanding.

Mr. Boswell: I simply invite the Minister to confirm the impression I have now formed, which is that someone who is incapacitated but of working age will be entitled to the pathways, whatever the route or source of their benefit at that point.

Jane Kennedy: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his helpful intervention. He is right.

Central to our strategy will be promoting the idea that we should all work in a healthier environment, enabling access to occupational health support, which includes quality rehabilitation services where appropriate. That is why the title of the debate, which refers to rehabilitation, was deliberately chosen, although our discussions will be much broader, given the wider debate on incapacity.

The objective of improving access to occupational health and healthier working environments represents an agenda that we share with employers, who need to deal with sickness and absence management and occupational health more proactively. We also share the agenda with the trade unions, which work to protect their members' health and safety in partnership with employers, and consider that an increasingly important role. We have a shared agenda with the insurance sector, which should be providing alternative and perhaps more positive routes of redress for those involved in compensation claims; for example, through employers' liability insurance.

We share an agenda, too, with the health service and especially with general practitioners, who deal with maintaining the highest levels of health for all and promoting well-being, including work as a health outcome. Equally, the Department for Work and Pensions has a clear agenda: supporting people on benefits to enable them to return to work. The effective co-ordination of all those agendas is crucial.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): On the relationship with the health service, Standish hospital in my constituency sadly closed just before Christmas. I declare an interest: some us would like to take it over and do some work on rehabilitation. Ward D at that hospital was a rheumatology ward. During rebuilding about 20 years ago, a specialist flat was provided on the ward for people with rheumatological problems, to help them to be rehabilitated into their homes. Sadly, the flat fell into disuse. That seems to be quite a common story in the NHS. Will the Minister lobby the NHS to ensure that when people have rheumatological problems or osteoporosis, such occupational health support is provided? That provision should be part of all such wards, not an afterthought.

Jane Kennedy: I am interested in what my hon. Friend describes and I would like to hear more about that example, because I have a clear view that more could be done. We are in close dialogue with colleagues in the Department of Health about how occupational health and similar support services should be provided to people in work, and also on the possible reshaping of the culture and the advice that general practitioners and other health service practitioners give. Certainly, occupational health needs to be higher on the agenda in the training that GPs receive.

I have already said that this is a complex area and that there is an ever-changing range of issues involved, but our strategy can be articulated simply. First, it is about prevention: ensuring as far as possible a healthy society as well as healthy workplaces. Secondly, it is about retention: helping people who become ill or disabled to stay in the work that they are already employed in, where that is appropriate and practical. Thirdly, it is about intervention: giving active and positive support to those who become unemployed through no fault of their own and claim inactive benefits.

We believe that, with the right help and support, greater numbers of people should be able to retain their jobs or get back to work. What do we do about that and how do we stop large numbers of people who have worked, and perhaps could work, failing to do so?

Effective and timely advice and support would help people with common health conditions to manage those conditions before they became intractable. However, nearly 33 million working days are lost each year to occupational ill health. The Health and Safety Commission and I recognise the importance of improving absence management and increasing access to occupational health and return-to-work support. Such support could have an important impact on reducing the numbers leaving the labour market due to ill health, but only 3 per cent. of companies have access to or use occupational health or return-to-work support. That is a staggering statistic.

Employers, health professionals and the Government must all work together more effectively to create healthier workplaces and to play a bigger role in rehabilitation to enable more people to get into work and to help them to stay there.

The Health and Safety Commission document "Strategy for Workplace Health and Safety in Great Britain to 2010 and Beyond" is aimed at creating the right environment in the workplace and, in particular, at dealing with emerging health issues and the changing world of work.

We recognise that the Government need to provide leadership and practical support to achieve that ambition. Yesterday, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced the Government's plans—alongside the extension of pathways to work—to develop and trial Workplace Health Direct. That is a Health and Safety Executive-led project, which will provide occupational health advice and support for small and medium-sized firms. It will be primarily a telephone helpline.

Workplace Health Direct is an important development that will make a real contribution to preventing incidents of illness and injury in the workplace, to managing sickness absence and to securing an early return to work. Those pilots will build on the considerable work that the Health and Safety Commission has already done in tackling sickness absence.

The Government want to enable more people who have a health condition, impairment or injury to remain in or return to work for the benefit of everyone concerned. Offering appropriate and effective support is clearly critical. We feel very strongly that vocational rehabilitation has the potential to contribute to help us and other stakeholders to deliver those goals.

However, although there is good evidence on restoring function, especially for some specific health conditions, evidence on effective vocational rehabilitation is contradictory and inconclusive. We have already started to resolve that by improving the evidence base, and the job retention and rehabilitation pilots that we have discussed in the House before, as well as our evaluation of the pathways to work pilots, will provide important new evidence.

We intend to drive forward that work through the Department for Work and Pensions framework for vocational rehabilitation, which will act as a focal point and provide a mechanism to develop that agenda.

We are keen to increase the number of people with health conditions and disabilities who stay in work. However, as we discussed earlier, our immediate focus is on ensuring that significantly greater proportions of people on incapacity benefit avoid an unnecessary slip into long-term incapacity. The systems that interact with such individuals have so far failed to come together and work to their mutual benefit. Were those individuals given good return-to-work advice from the outset from their employer or their general practitioner? If they were equipped by the NHS to manage their health problem, and perhaps pressed by the Department for Work and Pensions to address any obstacles they might face and helped to find work, I am sure that employment outcomes could be massively improved.

That represents a fundamental transformation in how people with health conditions who are not working are treated. Everyone with the capacity to get back to work should be supported, and helped to recognise their capabilities and responsibilities. The main way in which we are taking forward reform of the systems of supporting such people is the pathways to work pilots.

I do not know whether hon. Members have visited a pathways pilot, but we are implementing a completely new framework that starts to get claimants and all key stakeholders together. In particular, we provide support from a highly skilled personal adviser when people can most readily be helped back to work—primarily, those first weeks and months as they begin to claim benefit. However, it is gratifying to see in pilot areas such as that represented by my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies), who is sitting quietly behind me, almost 1,000 people who had been on benefit for a long period volunteering to participate in the pathways to work programme.

We also provide groundbreaking NHS rehabilitation support, so that people can learn to manage and cope with their health condition—the condition management programme. Again, this is a revolutionary approach to encouraging people to think about their health condition. There are elements of the expert patient programme that the NHS has had in place for some time, but this is much more proactive.

Mr. Drew: I thank my right hon. Friend for giving way again; she is being very generous. She may be coming on to the important issue of companies that choose to test their employees for both alcohol and drugs use—or, dare I say it, misuse. Have the Government a clear perspective on whether that would be appropriate if counselling and support were available to employees who were deemed to have a problem? Is that something that we should be encouraging in the world of work?

Jane Kennedy: There are clear arguments for some employers to do the testing that my hon. Friend talks about. In some occupations, there is a prudent case for it. However, as he rightly points out, when a problem with an employee is discovered, the proper approach is to work with them to overcome it. I am confident that the best employers are developing that best practice. That was not an area that I was going to touch on, but I am grateful to my hon. Friend for drawing it to the attention of the House.

Through the pathways, we have developed strong local partnerships with the voluntary and private sector employment advisers of the new deal for disabled people. This is where the policy outlined by my party and that of the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) almost coincide. There is a certain overlap in our objectives, although his party is driven down this route by ideology rather than what is practical in the circumstances, and I look forward to hearing about that shortly.

We have encouraged part-time work and work trials for people in receipt of the benefits in pathway areas, and introduced a return-to-work credit, so that it always pays to get back to work. We provide in-work support to help people to manage the transition back to work. Finally, we are working with local GPs in the pathways areas to help them to understand the importance of avoiding long-term absence from work from a patient care perspective.

The totality of our approach is based on best practice from occupational health research and clinical management. The research shows that early intervention and modified work in the workplace are two of the most effective tools that we can devise to enable people to remain in or get back to work. These are early days, but the approach appears to be paying off. Jobcentre and health service staff have responded well to the new service. We are already starting to see the fruits of that response in the number of people being helped back to work. Anyone who visits a pathways area will be profoundly impressed with the enthusiasm of staff as they engage in the complex and sensitive role that they are being encouraged to undertake.

Mr. Webb: The Minister makes a strong case for the success of the pathways to work pilots, and the five-year plan that was published yesterday includes a graph that shows that incapacity benefit outflow rates are enhanced in pathways areas. Therefore, I am puzzled why the Government are not applying the scheme everywhere. Why are they rolling it out to only a third of the country and why will that take some years? If it is so wonderful, surely we should be doing it for everyone now.

Jane Kennedy: We are still in the early days of testing different methods of engaging people in the pathways areas. Not all pathways areas are offering exactly the same package of support. For example, in one area, to test what worked, the first contact that personal advisers had with individuals was a mail shot. In another area, first contact was made by an adviser telephoning the individual, talking them through what pathways was, and following it up with a mail shot inviting them to an interview. Perhaps unsurprisingly, the response to the second approach was much more positive from those in receipt of the benefits.

We are still testing to see what works best and what gives best value for money in what is a resource-intensive approach. We need to be sure that, when we expand the scheme across the country, we expand the most effective and appropriate approach for the customers whom we are dealing with.

Mr. Boswell: I am glad that the Minister is taking into account the evidence of pilots, because that has not always been her Department's practice. However, if her case for not rolling out the pathways scheme nationally is that she does not yet know which is the best model, although she has indicated that some evaluation has already taken place, can she tell us when she will back a particular model, with the inference that it will be adopted nationally?

Jane Kennedy: We intend to roll out the next phase of pathways areas this October. That will consist of four or five districts. We will roll out beyond that in the subsequent six months.

Over the next six months, we aim to put in place the framework that works best, but we will continue to test other ideas as we proceed. From talking to staff in the pathways areas, I have no doubt that, even as they work, they continue to think of new ways of engaging with people. The project will evolve as we develop it. I am grateful to have the time to do that. We will reform the whole structure of support. Legislation will be required to do that. The time involved in debating and consulting on the legislation and taking it forward will allow us to continue to test what is the best way of enabling people in this group to return to work.

Mr. Drew: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Jane Kennedy: I shall describe some of the outcomes that we are already getting after I have given way to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Drew: My right hon. Friend is being more than generous.

I take a close interest in those with mental health problems. I work with a group of mental health practitioners; by chance, I am meeting them tomorrow. I am interested in how people who have had mental health problems get back into work, often via the stepping stone of the voluntary sector. It would be good to know that employer perceptions of people with mental health problems are changing, and I think that they are. One would also like to think that the public sector is better than the private sector, but in my experience that is not always the case. Is something going on in the particular projects that have been talked about to examine the needs of those with mental health problems? They are often the most difficult people to get back into work, but they do want to get into work.

Jane Kennedy: I agree. Not only do people who have mental illness in their background often prove to be the hardest to help, but employers sometimes have a high degree of suspicion—if we want to call it that—of such people. Often, they are particularly reluctant to employ them.

In the pathways areas, condition management programmes and the interaction with the health service enable support to be tailored to the circumstances of the individual. I have met people in Blackburn, in the east Lancashire pilot, with the background of a mental health condition.

On resuming—

Jane Kennedy: I talked earlier about the enthusiasm that Jobcentre Plus staff were displaying, the partners involved in pathways areas and the response that we have had as a result. Hon. Members will have seen the five-year strategy. It draws attention to the fact that, in the pathways areas, the improvement in the number of recorded job entries is about double the improvement in other areas. In pathways areas, six times as many people take up further help to get back to work compared with the national average. There is between an 8 and 10 percentage points increase in the rate of people coming off incapacity benefit after four months of their claim compared with non-pilot areas.

To the end of October 2004, we estimate that the pathways pilots have helped more than 9,000 people into work. All those encouraging signs are why we have determined that the pathways project is the way to assist people who are in receipt of benefits to return to work.

On 2 December, the Chancellor announced that the pathways to work scheme would be extended. We have discussed how that will be done to cover about one third of the country. The pathways approach will be available to about 900,000 people on incapacity benefit.

A considerable amount of work is under way, which is beginning to have an important and positive impact. It is important to ensure that we maintain momentum and build on the progress so far. This is the right time to consider change. The proposals set out in our strategy plan are the right starting point to create a better model for people who are at risk of losing their job, or who have difficulty finding one because of ill health or disability.

I reaffirm what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said about the principles that will guide our work. He said that for those with a health condition so severe that a return to work would be very difficult, we will provide real financial security for the long term. For those who can work, we want to provide the right help and support to get back into work, while offering the right rewards for engaging with the labour market.

I hope that I have made it clear through this fairly broad speech that this is not just about reforming incapacity benefit. We need a concerted effort to make changes on a number of fronts if we are to maximise the opportunities for people with disabilities and health conditions not only to stay in work, but to return to it. I will be interested to hear from the hon. Members for Daventry and for Northavon (Mr. Webb) in particular what their alternatives are. Constructive criticism is always welcome, but new ideas will also help us as we take forward this big project. I look forward to hearing the rest of the debate.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): I thank the Minister for introducing the debate and for the tone in which she did so. She sought to de-fang any criticism; there will be a little later on, but it is right that we should have a constructive debate about important issues.

I am also glad that the Government initiated this debate. When they did, I was initially a little puzzled, although matters became clearer yesterday. Of course, I accept the Minister's assertion that the debate was not timed to phase in with the five-year plan announcement, which we shall be pleased to discuss on the Floor of the House.

We debated the Health and Safety Executive in this Room only a couple of weeks ago, and I wondered whether we were going to replay that debate. We might have had the famous speech made by a parliamentarian in the 18th century, who said "Ditto to Mr. Burke", and then sat down. However, this debate goes wider, although there are important linkages. I hope that the Minister will allow me to expand on my thoughts about healthier workplaces, which she did talk about.

If I may, I shall begin with a particular—the rehabilitation issues—and move on to the general. I do not think that inappropriate any more than I think the title of the debate inappropriate, because there is a strong community of interest. Some rehabilitation issues for people with disabilities or medical conditions are equally applicable to persons who are hard to place, and who may have been involved in incidents that mean that they require rehabilitation in some sense. An example would be alcohol abuse, to which the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) already referred.

I would argue strongly—as I always have done on disability issues—that if employers generate an environment that is friendly towards disabled people then, almost ipso facto, it will be a better workplace for everybody who goes there. We should not think of that as being antagonistic, and we should not think that making special provision does not make it necessary to consider wider issues; it should all go together. I do not know whether the Minister has yet seen Ford's Mobility and General Information Centre at Swindon, where people are advised on car modifications and so forth. It is a showpiece site. I went there two or three years ago. It is exemplary, and a very attractive place for anyone to work, not just the 40 per cent. of the work force who are disabled. Those are general points.

If I express a certain enthusiasm for the issue of rehabilitation, it is because I have taken a personal interest in it over a number of years.

Jane Kennedy indicated assent.

Mr. Boswell: The Minister is kind enough to nod, but it is genuinely the case. I have done some work with the British Society of Rehabilitation Medicine. A few years ago, when the Department was beginning to get into the swing of preparing for pathways, I peppered the Minister's predecessors with a healthy number of parliamentary questions about rehabilitation issues, some of them arising from British Society of Rehabilitation Medicine reports. I think that the matter is of general importance.

The moves that the Government have made are desirable in principle, even if we do not necessarily agree with them all in detail. They may certainly be described as being in the right direction. If nothing else, we have established a common understanding that there is a problem, and that it has to be attended to, often in detail. Above all, it must be done with reference to the interests, needs and requirements of the individual, rather than by taking some sort of global approach that will leave us with a solution for the global situation.

In the spirit of the debate, I will quote verbatim from the Secretary of State's statement yesterday, because I agreed with him so much. He said:

> "There is growing medical evidence that for many conditions, such as back pain and depression, working is much healthier than being inactive".—[Official Report, 2 February 2005; Vol. 430, c. 842.]

That is not the voice of some Victorian employer; it is a perfectly reasonable clinical judgment—something that I think we all know more about now. It echoes our own experience. People retreat into hopelessness, and that does no good to them, the economy, the Treasury or anybody. We have to find ways of unlocking their despair without censuring them or playing cheap tricks, and we should provide practical help.

The Minister will have heard the exchanges between the Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) across the Dispatch Boxes yesterday, and I do not think it necessary to reproduce them all here. Of course, I agree with my hon. Friend, and I think it right that Ministers should justify their policies. They need a little justification, and I shall explain why.

The Minister made the point that there had been a welcome increase in employment and a reduction in unemployment. She boasted about that and I do not blame her for doing so. However, it is incumbent on her to ask why, when there had been a big historic increase in the numbers of people on incapacity benefit under the previous Government, the present Government are now apparently complacent about the stasis in those numbers since they have been in power.

Whatever the explanation is—and we do not want to have a general economic debate here—despite the fact that there have been several years of strong employment, the numbers on incapacity benefit have stuck, or slightly increased and so far there is no real sign of a reduction. Perhaps we will begin to see some improvement, but we have not seen it to date.

Jane Kennedy: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the fact that the rate of increase has dropped off remarkably since 1997, that a large number of people have gone into work—partly through the new deal for disabled people and partly because there is more opportunity to do so—and that we have developed pathways and are piloting that approach, already indicates that we have not accepted a degree of stasis around this policy area?

Mr. Boswell: I accept that the Government have done something. However, they have also announced quite a lot, which was the substance of the remarks made by my hon. Friend the Member for Havant yesterday. Not much has got better yet. There have been initiatives, there are now more and we all hope that the Government mean it this time and will carry the current initiative through. If they have collected evidence under pathways, and so forth, and find out what works, I shall be the first to cheer.

First, I want to register a note of reservation about whether there has been an improvement to date. Secondly, in order for there to be a real improvement, the Government and the system generally—although the Government will have to drive, or manage, the process—have to have all their ducks in a row and ensure that all the agencies, rather than some of them, are contributing to dealing with the problem. They have, particularly, to avoid any tendency to perverse counter-incentives, which my hon. Friend mentioned yesterday. I will touch on that again in a moment. That is particularly the case where people may be reluctant to go off benefit because they may feel that any return to it—if their attempts to work prove unsuccessful—may result in their having to come in at a lower rate. That is a serious issue for any Government.

I need to record that the Government are not intending to introduce the system until 2008; the Secretary of State's phrase was that its main elements would be in place by then. We still have quite a long time to wait for the system, let alone the time that is required to evaluate it. Indeed, there was some rather strong briefing in today's press, saying that it would take many years—over a decade and perhaps up to 20 years—before there were significant inroads into the number of people on incapacity benefit. If one takes a conventional target of, say, taking 1 million people off the benefit, which would still leave 1.7 million on it, and if it will really take 20 years, progress will be glacial. If the process goes in one direction and is making progress, I will not object to that, but the rate of progress needs to be looked at and accelerated if possible.

In saying that, I realise that that there are still some real questions to be asked and definitions to be found, which, no doubt, will have to be consulted on. That may be behind the Department's reluctance to rush forward into the new strategy that was touched on yesterday and to which the Minister of State has spoken today.

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

3.35 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Boswell: I was saying to the House that my point was about difficulties that the Department will have with decisions to be made.

One difficulty will be to find a functional distinction between those who are entitled to a rehabilitation benefit and those who receive the higher-rate disability and sickness allowance, because the latter are in a particularly difficult position. We all understand the kind of distinction that the Minister is making. Whether she will succeed in putting such a watertight distinction through remains to be seen.

The second issue is whether or not people—particularly disability interests—will accept such a distinction. There are already signs of a good deal of disquiet about what was announced yesterday, which no doubt she will have to consider in due course.

From that, I pass onto the major constraints on rehabilitation services. I use that term generically, in the widest sense, including not simply medical rehabilitation but also what might be termed social rehabilitation—support for people returning to work and, more generally, the mechanisms for doing that.

The first question, a reasonable one, is whether the rehabilitation services are in place. The answer, I think, is that they are fairly patchy, do not always operate to the same extent and are not always easy for potential clients to be referred to.

Taking a specific area—which is still a significant component of the total, as the Minister will know from the incapacity benefit figures—it has been reported only today that there is, if I may use the word, an acute shortage of NHS facilities for rehabilitation of people who have broken down in work with cardiac or circulatory conditions. That is the sort of difficulty created in establishing the pathway for a return to work.

I will give another example from my own constituency. A number of years ago, in the course of visiting, I was talking to a police officer, who was off work because of an accident in which their cartilage was injured. At that time, although I have no reason to think that that is applicable now, the waiting list for consultation at the general hospital was 72 weeks. Effectively, that was at least two years of highly paid and skilled manpower being denied to the police service while the national health service failed to provide the necessary facilities.

Our wish is to reinforce the Minister in any representations she makes on the provision of facilities to her counterparts at the Department of Health and to the management of the NHS. What would happen to claimants who were prepared to accept a course of rehabilitation but were then unable to access one and, therefore, continued on benefit beyond a certain time? Any risk of a benefit cut for not having accepted rehabilitation owing to matters beyond their control would be objectionable.

My second question is about the interaction of the health service—rehabilitation—with a wider range of social provision. That could, traditionally, be social services, departmental responsibilities or work schemes, which most of us know are sometimes a little difficult to get to and sometimes said to be bureaucratic, but are clearly important. They provide the mechanism at work and the safeguard or assurance to the employer that that will be provided.

A third issue is that of special cases. I am particularly thinking of conditions that may fluctuate—that may relax or remit. The hon. Member for Stroud has rightly reminded the House of a major part of the incapacity benefit problem—mental conditions. A whole range of physical symptoms and mental attitudes and conditions can make it difficult for people to know whether or not they will be confident in returning to work. Special attention may well be needed, even in relation to the benefits system itself.

I turn to the question of the effective management of cases. I was in conversation only a few moments ago with a colleague who has knowledge of the pathways system, who expressed the concern that, if anything, there was a concentration within Jobcentre Plus, rather than an extended use of outsourcing. That reflects what was said in conversations with some of the private sector providers.

The Minister was generous enough to say that in some respects the thinking of my colleagues who specialise in the rehabilitation side now and of myself in wanting to use the private sector might be consistent with her thinking on this matter, but she went on to fall below that comment by suggesting that there was an ideological basis for that. To borrow the Prime Minister's phrase, so far as I am concerned what works is best. That is important. I say to her, not in an ideological way, that there is a good deal of evidence, particularly with regard to people who are severely disabled or hard to place for other reasons, that the services of specialist providers from the private sector—as that is generally interpreted, so that it includes many people from not-for-profit organisations—can be invaluable, and that, in the Minister's terms, they could supplement the work done by the public providers.

From the days when disability was my lead responsibility, I still have a worry about the idea of personal mentors—not, of course, because they do not work hard—or, indeed, of disability employment advisers. Sometimes, it is important to have access to the specialist service that can deal with the particular case. We all need a GP, but we also need to be able to get to the specialist if that is required.

Jane Kennedy: Let me explain one of the things that puzzles us about the hon. Gentleman's "opportunity first" proposals for IB. It is easy to understand the proposal to use entirely the voluntary and private sector, but we do not understand how using those sectors—and, largely, the new deal for disabled people—will achieve his party's objective of having 900,000 people moving into work over a four-year period. What will have to change in the new deal for disabled people to enable the private and voluntary sector to make that difference?

Mr. Boswell: I might refer the Minister to the basic principle that we adopt in this, which is that there should be an encouragement to voluntary and private organisations to help those on incapacity benefit to find work. The essential issue is the nature of the contracts and incentives, and the run-on incentives over a longer period, for securing placement; we might need to debate that on another occasion. From my own work and studies in relation to hard-to-place individuals without disability, I have uncovered a lot of interesting comments and input from experts in this area. Some of that has also been made available to the Minister's Department, and I have no problem with that. Those experts would say that the whole issue inheres in the contract structure.

We will not resolve this matter this afternoon—and, as the Minister has suggested, nor will we resolve the ideological issues contained in it. However, she needs to take a hard look at the pattern of those contracts to ensure that they provide people with the best possible pathway and incentive to place. There is a tension—not a difficulty—that has to be resolved. This might not work if she simply does things on the basis of a gateway assessment by saying to the training or rehabilitation provider or placement person, "This is a hard-to-place person, or a severely disabled person, and it will cost you, so you had better have more money up front". What one has to do is provide a reasonable population of cases from which it is possible to make placements, and for the system to give proper acknowledgment of and remuneration for the placements of those people who turn out to be the hardest to place. That is a long debate to which we shall no doubt wish to return another time.

I have one other point for the Minister on rehabilitation issues, which goes slightly wider. We need to consider whether the benefits system helps or hinders the process. I touched on that in relation to incapacity benefit. One of the better things that the Government did a few years ago was to relax the linking rules, but that is not sufficient to deal with the difficulties of some intermittent conditions in particular. Certainly my experience as an employer, which the Minister knows is in agriculture, has been of many people who are off sick, but not after suffering a serious and disabling accident. They are, however, temporarily unable to work. At some point they may feel that they could work, but they are still on benefit, and formally doing something as simple as getting on to a tractor and seeing whether it is possible to stretch a leg and to work comfortably for a couple of hours without pain is, in itself, a breach of the benefit conditions. That needs consideration.

I used to use an analogy relating to a rather shocking photograph that appeared in the press many years ago. The piece showed just a key and said, "This is the key that controls the nuclear deterrent. It has two positions: the top position is peace, and the quarter turn gives you war." In rather the same way, the Department has traditionally taken the view that someone is either ill and on benefit, or fit to work and working or available to work. That view is being softened, but the transition from one to the other is to be encouraged and, above all, should not be subject to sanctions.

That is what I wanted to say to the House on rehabilitation. On transition, quite a lot of the debate has a wider application to persons who are hard to place, persons who may need other types of rehabilitation and persons who may need help, encouragement or mentoring to get into work. The issue goes wider and relates to people's workplace existence too. For the process to work, we need a public discourse that is alert to the issues and we need all people moving in broadly the same direction.

The first issue is a safe workplace. That relates partly to persons who might have an accident at work. Too many still do, which is always regrettable. Such people might incur a disability as a result, which would put them off work. The issue also relates to persons whose health condition may deteriorate while at work. I have always said on rehabilitation issues that almost the most important thing that employers and, I hope, their public sector support can do is to ensure that people are protected in work and that the necessary adjustments are made—that "aceess to work" or whatever is appropriate cuts in, which need not be at excess cost—rather than simply letting people go sick and disappear from the labour force. That is important.

The wider issue, to which the Minister referred, is the management of sickness absence more generally. I am pleased that she is considering that in relation to the public service. I remember vividly a conversation with my then local chief constable. His police force, like many others, had resource difficulties, partly because of pensions obligations. I talked to him about sickness absence and he said, "We have actively managed that and now have a particularly good record, almost an exemplary record." All employers, in the private and the public sector, should be doing that. It has nothing to do with forcing people to work when they are not fit to do so and with encouraging presenteeism. It is about saying, "Let's find out what the causes of sickness absence are and whether we can take them, as far as possible, out of the system."

With regard to all these issues of workplace safety and attitudes to creating or protecting a healthy work force, there are three categories of employer. Some are exemplary; they are closely involved with all the issues. They are probably in the 3 per cent. that the Minister mentioned, who run their own occupational health scheme. Other employers will be delinquent, and I hold no brief for them, but many employers, including some small and medium enterprises, will be in the middle and it is important to give them the right kind of incentives and encouragement. I welcome the fact that the Health and Safety Executive is anxious to participate in these issues and to advise, as well as admonishing or regulating.

There is an important need throughout industry—public and private sectors—to integrate risk management with the regulatory environment. In some cases, that can be reinforced by market factors; there is a strong business case for a healthy work force. As the Association of British Insurers pointed out in its "making the market work" initiative, it can be helpful to ensure that employers get acknowledgement for the health of their work force and that they do not pick up the tab of the average performer. The management of the workplace must also be considered. Those issues are all related to securing a healthy work force.

Further on in that train of thought is management of the claim, which we must ensure is not spun out or attenuated by a poor claims-handling process, often to the great distress of the claimant. Whenever possible, there must be some understanding of the importance of the mutuality of interest in the mediation process. Then we loop back to the rehabilitation side. It is no secret that many of us looked with interest at the American model of workplace insurance, because it puts the economic incentives in the hands of the insurer, who has the difficult choice of whether to pay out benefit or to provide rehabilitation services. That model does not necessarily translate literally to the United Kingdom context, but it is an example of the blending of regulation and the use of market forces and reputation to try to drive towards a better conclusion.

I have already mentioned the interface between the Minister's Department and the Department of Health in the provision of rehabilitation services, but I want to relate it also to organisation. I used to take what I thought were easy, if not cheap, tricks from the Minister's predecessor by saying, "Ah, isn't it interesting? If you are concerned with vocational rehabilitation, that's your Department, but if it's occupational health, it is the Department of Health." At that time, workplace safety came under the then Department of the Environment; we got two under the same roof, but not three. I do not ask the Minister to magic that little distinction away overnight, and there may be reasons for not doing so, but it is terribly important that in addressing these issues the Minister does so in genuine partnership with the Department of Health, not least because otherwise it will not carry credibility with the private sector.

I would like the Minister to say a bit more about the national framework for vocational rehabilitation and how it will be affected. I would also like her to say something about the integration of activities with the occupational health strategy in the Department of Health, which I accept go wider than the workplace. It is interesting that that Department is still offering NHS Plus as an occupational health service. The Minister's Department, through the Health and Safety Executive, will offer the workplace Health Direct, and I would very much like to know how they will tie up, if only because employers will get confused if they do not understand where to go.

In conclusion, I want to say a word about wider occupational health issues involving the work force as a whole, and to get away from rehabilitation as a detailed issue. As I said in this Room two weeks ago when we debated the Select Committee report on the work of the Health and Safety Executive, it is fair to say that health is now as important as safety. I hope that no one will misinterpret that as a vote against safety, which of course it is not; it is a serious comment on the need to upgrade the importance of occupational health. There are important elements, some of which were identified in that debate, which we all need to bear in mind, particularly in relation to the changing character of the work force.

There are more women in the work force. The Minister will have seen today's interesting Equal Opportunities Commission initiative on women who are pregnant at work. I could and would not condone people being sacked, in defiance of law, for becoming pregnant. It worries me that employers still think that an appropriate thing to do. There is more self-employment, which can create difficulties, more contract employment and there are more migrant workers. The situation is far more complex. The Beveridge model of a man working in a factory environment with large numbers of fellow males in extended employment, from apprenticeship to retirement, has evolved for the better. However, that means that earlier appraisal of problems is more difficult. That is accompanied by a change in the pattern of risk and the kind of occupational issues that arise.

As most farmers know, it is still possible to damage one's back or pull something by lifting too much or badly. We should never forget that manual work still takes place and must be carried out safely. However, many people do not experience such work. They may work in an office and be worried about repetitive strain injury or sick buildings. The fact that the risks have shifted does not mean that they are not significant, and that emerges from the incapacity benefit statistics on the changing nature of the work place, which show that there is as much stress as muscular-skeletal problems, and cardiac problems are not far behind as major causes of sickness in working age.

I say to the Minister firmly that we on these Benches want to use all available resources. The expertise, enthusiasm and resources of the private sector should be used to the maximum effect. It is also important to ensure that both sides of industry – employers and unions – are engaged in an active programme to improve the quality of life in the workplace. The Government must consider their role in leading a partnership model. We will not agree about how that is to be delivered, but I think and hope that we will agree that there is an essential problem of people not working when many would wish to, and of incentives not getting people back to work. There is also a wider underlying problem about whether workplaces are the places we would like to work in.

The problems will be solved neither by anybody grandstanding here, nor solely by government initiative, and certainly not by opposing the inclinations of the private sector. We must show that it is in the best interests of employers as well as workers and taxpayers to ensure that the approach is understood by all parties and that we bring our own thoughts to the debate and reach a better conclusion than we have so far.

3.59 pm

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I am delighted to take part in this debate. I feel a bit lonely at the back here, but I would like to think that the debate is about quality rather than quantity. Some of my colleagues have missed an opportunity. Perhaps the debate should have had a slightly different title, because if we had done a vox pop on what my colleagues thought would happen this afternoon, we might have got some interesting answers.

Although the title may sound nebulous, this is a vital issue, not only because of yesterday's announcement by the Secretary of State, but because it gets to the crux of what I believe is the good part of this Government's programme: getting people back into work and giving them quality of life and hope. More than that, it concerns what most of us think about day in and day out, which is what we do in our place of work, the appropriateness of that place, whether we enjoy going to work, whether it is worth getting up in the morning to go to work and the links to what we do outside work.

I shall come back to that point, but, given your liberal tendencies – not with a big 'l' – Mr. Deputy Speaker, I would like to talk about what I see as rehabilitation, which involves how people live their lives at home and how that affects their ability to go to work.

I make no apology for starting – partly because I received a briefing from the Chartered Society of Physiotherapy, as, no doubt, other hon. Members did, so I shall not read from it – by paying tribute to those who work in that area, whether physiotherapists or occupational therapists, community psychiatric nurses or mental health teams. As I said in an intervention, I am interested in the problems of mental health. Those professionals are trying to do their best, sometimes in difficult circumstances, to give their clients a quality of life and to move on. So often, people with mental health problems get stuck in a rut and find it difficult to move on. Judging from all my experience, apart from those who really are disabled and see no way of overcoming their disability, the vast majority of people genuinely want to improve their quality of life, largely through their ability to earn income. Of course, that starts and ends with whether they are capable of going to work. We must consider this in the round.

As I said, I make no apology for starting with a matter that has not been touched on as much as it might have been. That is understandable: where do we start with this debate? Where people live affects the rest of their lives. I have always been a strong believer in home improvement agencies, and I have been a member of the Stroud Care and Repair Board for more years than I care to remember – certainly for more than the last decade.

I have seen at first hand how small repairs to people's homes allow them to stay at home, which, of course, means that they are much more likely to be able to stay in work. It gives them a quality of life, which, for a cost of a few hundred pounds – sometimes less than that – makes an unimaginable difference. One of the problems is the laborious process of engagement with such schemes and how to gain access to the improvements that we all know are needed.

Whether people are in public sector housing, including housing association stock, have their own property or rent privately, there are some difficult hurdles to overcome, not least getting an occupational therapist to do an inspection.

The hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) was right to talk about how long it can take for somebody with a physical injury to get a physiotherapist. I am talking about people needing adaptations to their property, which is just as important. It is, dare I say it, even more "in your face" and it can have an enormous, depressing impact on people's ability to organise their lives. They can put up with the pain, but not with the fact that their house is completely unsuitable, they live in one room and they cannot do the garden. They gradually draw into themselves – perhaps giving up work, perhaps becoming incapable of getting back to work. I put that on the record because it is important that we consider things that really matter to people. Home accommodation cannot be separated from work accommodation.

I pay [illegible] regard to the trade unions. I have already mentioned the Chartered Society of Physiotherapy, which is a trade union of physiotherapists. I would also like to mention my own union, Unison, and some other manual workers' unions such as the Transport and General Workers Union and the GMB. I pay tribute to the fact that they are very interested in this issue. The Fire Brigades Union has a long track record of having to deal with members who have been injured at work, as a result of their work or because of general wear and tear on their bodies.

That has an acute resonance because of the pensions issue and the fact that, understandably, the Government are considering how to face up to it. We may have some arguments about how they have gone about that so far, but we cannot duck the issue. It relates directly to how and where people work and whether they are able to stay at work.

Since I was elected nearly eight years ago, I have always made a point of saying that the difficulties caused by early retirement are coming home to roost. Sometimes, no doubt, Ministers would prefer that I had not done so. I am sure that they would prefer to be deaf to what I am saying. Sometimes, people take early retirement for positive reasons. It would be nice if we could all take it, but things are going in the other direction. However, people often take early retirement for negative reasons, usually because they are not capable of continuing to do their job or they have been injured or suffered some problem.

As a former teacher, I think that teachers have a certain view of how hard their job is. Looking around, we do not see many teachers reaching the age of 60 in their job because of the arguments that they always advance to me: the stress in the classroom and worsening discipline. I do not agree with that, but I know that teaching is a very stressful job. All those things come together: if people do not value the quality of the job and the workplace—that is directly what this debate is about—they will leave. We have to improve the situation because, quite simply, we need them to do the work. We cannot afford for them to continue to leave in such numbers. More particularly, we need their expertise.

It is a disgrace to the public sector, but also to the private sector, that we have devalued older workers. I very much welcome what we have done on age discrimination, but one of my friends, who is 67, gave me a real flea in the ear at a party meeting on Friday. She said, "It is all well and good, but I am 67 and you have protected me only up to 65. I want to work. Why am I not allowed to? Why is it that when I put my name forward for a job, I get no protection at all?"

I know that on this issue, as with anything, the glass is half full or half empty. That lady feels strongly that it is half empty. We have gone part of the way, but she wants to work and feels that she is being prevented from doing so because she gets no protection. We have to face up to that issue. As much as the general view is that most people want to leave work at the earliest possible opportunity, there may be strange people out there—although my friend is not strange at all—who feel that work is important. My friend does not have a pension to fall back on, so she must find other ways to bolster her income on top of the state pension. That, too, is worth putting on the record.

Stroud being Stroud, it is not one of the pathway areas. However, to be fair to my right hon. Friend the Minister, I would like to give plaudits to Jobcentre Plus for the work that it has already done, particularly on mental health, which I am interested in. It has worked hard to find ways of helping people to make the transition back to the world of work. There are some good examples of that, but I do not have the time to refer to particular cases. The general feeling is that things have got better, but that they still need to get a lot better to make a difference.

That impinges on another aspect to which we should pay due regard—the work of the voluntary sector, which we often take for granted. I always argue the case for compulsory volunteering. Some people laugh at that and some think it is a completely ridiculous notion, but I believe that everyone should be a volunteer. Even if they spend only half an hour a week volunteering, it is good for the soul.

The hon. Members for Daventry and for Northavon (Mr. Webb) will know, because we share the same faith, what we think the role of people is in terms of trying to do things for others. I think that volunteering is important because of what it does to the individual and the way it builds their self-esteem, as well as being fundamental to keeping our society going. Without the work of those volunteers, our society would collapse. It would be interesting to know which would be more damaging—the collapse of statutory employment, leading to mass unemployment on a scale that we have never seen, or the voluntary sector saying, "We are not doing this any more." The role of the voluntary sector in this area is very important.

That is a link back to mental health, and the work that I have done in that area. In that context, I will mention a particular organisation and an individual who has taught me an awful lot. The organisation is Scout Enterprises, which works with people recovering from mental illness, and the person is Chris Gascoyne who, over a long time, has taken me through the case histories of people who have lost jobs on the back of a period of mental ill health, explaining the importance of rebuilding their confidence. That can be done only by arranging for them first to work part-time in the voluntary sector and then gradually reintroducing them to a more formalised setting. There are some wonderful examples of how people have got back into full-time employment, even if they have not gone back to the jobs that they did previously because that would be too difficult.

The role of the Department for Work and Pensions is to be as sensitive as possible in devising a benefit system that gives people incentives, rather than imposing penalties, so that they can take their time. Moreover, there must always be a safety net. The one thing that people with mental health problems or other conditions such as ME—I see that there is a reception next door on that topic—really want to know is that if things do not work out, there is a net that will catch them. If they fall through the net, we all know that that could be it and that they might never get back into the world of work again.

I welcome this important debate. I made three interventions earlier and I shall finish my remarks in relation to what I said in the first of those concerning the relationship with the NHS. The Department for Work and Pensions is doing some exciting work, but that will pay dividends only if we can lock it together with the NHS being more proactive in how it works with people to deal with the matters that the hon. Member for Daventry spoke about.

The NHS must cut waiting lists so that people can get treatment much more quickly, but, in addition, it must rediscover rehabilitation—some of us used to call it convalescence, but the NHS does not seem to like that term any more. People need time to recover, and then help to move back. I gave an example of how that is important in relation to where they live, but I also want to talk about how they get back to work.

The NHS must be better at rehabilitation. It cannot just examine the physical bearing of the individual, but must consider how it can help their mindset. It should also consider the fact that much more investment in occupational health and things allied to it could give people back the confidence that they can achieve the things that they might have achieved but for events outside their control, where things have gone wrong.

I hope that following this debate the Minister will be involved in Cabinet Committee discussions with the NHS and Department of Health Ministers to consider how we can make this situation better. All sorts of Departments could be linked in, but I highlight the NHS because it is the most important nexus. If that were to happen, we could say that we had achieved rehabilitation and healthier workplaces.

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): It is always a pleasure to follow my constituency neighbour, the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew), whose contributions are profoundly humane and thought provoking. They have broadened the scope of what we have been talking about this afternoon. I could not help reflecting that his 67-year-old friend who sees a half-empty glass is being an optimist, because we have not even got age discrimination legislation yet.

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

4.26 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Webb: To resume where I left off in my response to the hon. Member for Stroud—as he is not here to answer me back, I will put this more strongly than I was about to. I simply observe that age discrimination legislation has not even been introduced yet, and when it is it will be very limited in scope. The relevance of that observation is that it relates to how long it takes us to start saying things that we really ought to have said a long time ago.

It would be churlish to say anything other than that the Minister's speech was analytical, calm and fairly non-partisan. However, I sat listening to her and thought, "What can I possibly disagree with in what I have just heard?" Sometimes, when I hear a speech with which I can barely disagree, I wonder—with no disrespect to the Minister—what the point is in a statement of the blindingly obvious. There is a reason for what I say and I will come back to it.

When we make statements such as, "Early intervention is better than late", "If we can stop people getting stuck on benefits by intervening early, that must be better than just leaving them to rot", and "It's better to tackle the causes of incapacity at the workplace rather than let people become incapacitated and pick them up at the end", everyone in this Chamber just assents. It is so obviously true. The question is: why are we asking only now?

It is to praise the Minister—although it may not sound like it—to say that finally such issues are being discussed and something is starting to be done. But why was it not done seven years ago, or indeed 27 years ago? What has changed? I recall a conversation in the early 1990s with a senior official of what was then the Department of Social Security. I was an academic doing research into the growth in the number of people on invalidity benefit, as it was then called. The senior civil servant said to me, "Once they're on it, we just leave them to rot. We don't attempt to rehabilitate them; we just leave them." It is not surprising that the total rose remorselessly, year after year. He had that insight 10 or 12 years ago, yet here we are today, having almost just discovered that we should get to people early, intervene, pick them up when they have just lost their job, and look into workplace health and safety. We have almost just discovered that prevention is better than cure.

Therefore, I suppose that one question for the Minister would be: why has it taken us seven years to discover those self-evident truths? I guess that her argument will be that the new deal, and all of that, started with the unemployed, not the incapacitated. I think that the rhetoric is that one deals with unemployment first and gets it down to, say, 900,000—whether that is full employment I do not know, but down to a much more reasonable level anyway—and then one looks at the harder-to-help people. But is not that the wrong way round? Would not many of the unemployed people have got jobs anyway?

I know that there is a big debate about the new deal and so on. I think that work programmes have a part to play and that they need to be reformed rather than abolished. The Minister will know that practically none of the new deal money went to disabled people. It was massively focused on the unemployed and lone parents. What happened? Disabled incapacitated people got stuck on incapacity benefit, of course, because no one did anything for them.

Why did the Government do things that way round? Why was the vast bulk of the new deal not focused from day one on the incapacitated, who might otherwise get stuck and rot and never work again, rather than on the unemployed? Many of the unemployed, frankly, were fit, well and able. With perhaps limited support or as the economy grew, they might have got jobs anyway.

I will be interested in the Minister's comment on that strategy. Also, why are we only coming to where we are—rolling out the pathways pilot—seven or eight years down the track? Even the pathways pilot, we read, will only be rolled out to a third of the country in a few years' time.

There is a bit of a paradox here. I understand what the Minister says about a pilot—seeing what does and does not work—but she seemed to be saying two things that were inconsistent. She was saying that pathways to work is the best thing since sliced bread and that there were all these good results and so on. However, she was not sure whether pathways to work is good value for money, so the Government are not going to do a nationwide roll-out. Does that mean we think that it is fairly good value for money?

I do not think that holds. To say that pathways to work is being piloted and works in general, but we are not sure which bits work, so two thirds of the country will get nothing, is not credible. Surely, the pilots are showing that, in the round, these measures are beneficial. It seems self-evident that these early interventions and so forth will be, so why not have the nationwide roll-out? Is it capacity? Is that what is going on? If so, I think the House would accept that from the Minister, but that was not her reply. She spoke of a testing period, piloting and all the rest. That is not credible.

The focus of this debate is rehabilitation and healthy workplaces. One of my dilemmas is that a lot of this makes sense for big firms. Occupational health and welfare is, on average, better in big firms. They can probably afford to devote the resources and even have staff who can work full-time on such things, whereas, for the one-man band, the contractor, the self-employed and so forth, they are inevitably a much lower priority.

If we are concerned about occupational welfare, one of my key questions is how does the small firm—small and medium-sized enterprises and so forth—fit in? I think that the Minister's answer to that is a phone line—"Workplace Health Direct". That is great. I have no problem with a phone number to ring. It will be interesting to see in six months' time how many people have phoned, but it is better it is there than not, although I suspect that it is of marginal value.

Beyond that, the good guys are often the ones who ring the helplines. The people who really ought to be doing something—who are sloppy about occupational health, who let their workers work in poor conditions or get bad backs because of poor lighting or computers—do not ring the helplines until something has gone wrong. What is the Government's strategy for making sure that those smaller employers take the proactive approach that all hon. Members want to see?

Presumably, the Health and Safety Executive has to be part of the process—doing inspections, having a statutory role, going in—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Stroud has returned. He can read my words of wisdom in the Official Report tomorrow. I think we pre-empted him.

On the health and safety front, the Government's record does not look so good. The Select Committee on Work and Pensions has made some strong criticisms of the Health and Safety Executive. It flagged up no fewer than five areas of concern, beginning with the total budget, which is down on 1997 in real terms. The performance of the Health and Safety Executive against its 2004 targets is best described as mediocre. There is a lack of progress on the commitments on legislative change that were made in the "Revitalising Health and Safety" document. There is what the Committee calls inadequate coverage of occupational health support, which is what we are talking about today, and inadequate strategies to reverse the threatened decline in consultation with workers by employers on health and safety issues.

That is a whole shopping list of areas where the Select Committee is worried about the performance of the Health and Safety Executive. It is not properly resourced to fulfil the very agenda that the Minister has come up with. What reassurance can the Minister offer that the Health and Safety Executive will be properly resourced to ensure that small firms, not just large ones, buy into the agenda that she mentioned?

It is all very well to say, as the Secretary of State did in a speech in December, that it makes good economic sense to take action such as talking to workers when they have gone off sick for a week rather than not phoning them for a month, so that they are far more likely to return soon and the companies save on sickness payments. It is another statement that is obviously true but, clearly, it frequently does not happen. How will the Government make that happen in the many workplaces where employers are short-sighted, think that they will never face that situation, or have not bought into the proactive agenda and hope that things do not go wrong?

In a sense, we have heard warm words but where is the beef? Where are the enforcement measures for employers who do not see that enlightened self-interest should take them down this track? Where are the teeth to ensure that that happens? If I work for an employer who is not terribly enlightened, what protection do I have if the enforcement body has its funding cut in real terms and there are many other concerns about its activities?

We would all agree that one critical aspect of rehabilitation is part-time work—a stepping stone and some re-engagement with the disciplines and routines of work but at a less demanding level than going straight back into full-time employment. My nagging doubt about the Government's incapacity benefit agenda is that sustained part-time work does not seem to fit. The hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) used the analogy of the nuclear button being off or on. Part-time work on a sustained basis does not seem to fit, but it might be the answer.

I stress the phrase "sustained basis". I think of the example of local authority councillors only because I receive letters from around Britain about it. In the past, they could draw allowances for being councillors. Their health may not have been brilliant, but the one thing that they could do was be a councillor—they had the time and energy to do that. As their allowances were modest and they were not doing that many hours, the old therapeutic earnings rules came into play and they had a sustained existence through that combination.

My understanding is that the therapeutic earnings rules have gone and that the Government's position is that such therapeutic work cannot be done indefinitely. I am open to correction by the Minister, but I think that the current rules say that someone cannot continue to describe what they are doing as having therapeutic value. At some point, the crunch comes: the Government say that the person has proven that they can work week in, week out, albeit for not many hours, and that they should make their mind up—either they are incapacitated or not.

There must be a set of people for whom sustained part-time work, which might be 10 hours a week or variable, is best. If the Government have an all-or-nothing approach, we do not end up with the best situation for those people. I refer back to the Chartered Society of Physiotherapy, which the hon. Member for Stroud mentioned. One concern in its briefing was:

"The CSP is concerned that the emphasis on returning to work as the ultimate goal could be counterproductive".

In other words, if there is an over-obsession with work, by which I think the Government mean full-time work or something approaching it, there could be problems. Interestingly, the Department's own research bears out that personal advisers on incapacity benefit have the same concern. Let me quote a report entitled "Incapacity Benefit Reforms—early findings from qualitative research", in which incapacity benefit personal advisers were asked what concerned them about the new arrangements. Those advisers expressed "worries about encouraging moves into work which could be detrimental to the customers' health condition".

Although I am sure that the Secretary of State was right to say yesterday that the best thing for a bad back is not necessarily lying in bed all day, but doing a bit of work might be—there is a kernel of truth there—I am worried that such a statement of the blindingly obvious might be taken to extremes and that the Government's approach does not allow for the possibility that the answer might be different for different people. Sustained part-time employment, perhaps of variable hours, but typically a fairly small number of hours, might be the long-term answer.

My key point is that the national insurance system does not lend itself to shades of grey—it was never meant to. National insurance was about replacing lost earnings when people lost their job, whether to old age, sickness, or, in the case of widowhood, if their partner lost their job and was no longer an earner. The point of that was that, although the earnings had gone, people knew that they had a national insurance benefit, and when earnings came back—because work was basically synonymous with full-time work—they went off the national insurance benefit and into work. However, the world does not look like that anymore, which is why I am worried that the reformed incapacity benefit that the Government have proposed still does not allow for that.

The basic £50 a week, or whatever it will be, is still an all-or-nothing payment and could not be gradated so that, for example, someone could do eight hours a week at the minimum wage and get £35 or £40, and then perhaps have some partial capacity benefit on top of that, whether £20 or whatever. That would provide a package allowing them to do some work, perhaps over a long period or indefinitely, and draw less, but not nothing, from the taxpayer.

I will not keep repeating that point, but it is the kernel of one of my concerns about the present system and the Government's reforms, which are still modelled around national insurance—and national insurance is still all or nothing.

Jane Kennedy: I am listening carefully to what the hon. Gentleman has to say and I am interested in his probing into our proposals. We have had some brief discussion about the Conservative party's proposals, but will he take this opportunity to let us in on what his party's ideas on this matter might be? There has been a lot of criticism and comment from him on our strategy so far, but the Liberal Democrats have to do slightly better than saying, "We are going to replace it all with something that works better", which is broadly what he has said.

Mr. Webb: That is an unfortunate intervention, because I have, in a sense, already made two specific suggestions, but perhaps the Minister was not listening at the time. I pointed out that the balance of the new deal was massively towards the unemployed, not the disabled. That balance is wrong and needs to be redirected far more towards disabled people, which is far more cost effective, because more money is saved for each person who is moved off incapacity benefit, for example, than for someone who is moved off jobseeker's allowance. Within the total budget, the balance is wrong.

Jane Kennedy: Does it follow, then, that in the event of the hon. Gentleman's party being elected to Government, it would abandon the new deals and replace them with a revamped new deal for disabled people, which is broadly like the Conservatives' proposals?

Mr. Webb: No, it does not remotely mean that. The Conservatives propose scrapping the new deals, whereas we are talking about the same total budget with a different prioritisation. In other words, there will still be the new deal programmes as budgeted by the Government in the forthcoming spending profile. We will match that spending, which is already in the Government's spending plans, but we will reprioritise. We are talking not about scrapping the new deal for the unemployed and spending it all on the disabled but rebalancing.

I think that I am right in saying that disabled people have had less than 5 per cent. of the whole new deal since Labour came to power, but I am open to challenge on that. I hope that the Minister will say why that is so. Why have disabled people been so far at the back of the queue for new deal money, when they were the people who the tailored, individualised support could have done far more to help?

The Minister asked what we would do. I think that she jumped up because I used the phrase "partial capacity benefit". We use that phrase because it summarises another strand of our approach, which is as I just described—not the national insurance benefit, which is all or nothing. That approach recognises that people have partial capacity—capacity to do a certain number of hours, perhaps combined with a lower rate of benefit, but more flexibly than the present all-or-nothing system. That is a second concrete positive suggestion for how the system might work.

The importance of the part-time work issue was highlighted by the Secretary of State in a speech that he made to the Commercial Occupational Health

[Mr. Webb]

Providers Association conference on 1 December—I have to say that I missed it. Paragraph 34 of his speech stated that good practice can involve "a gradual return to work, for example, starting initially with shortened hours; it can involve the employer making adjustments to the working environment—and/or setting up rehabilitation programmes".

I agree. The gradual return to work and the period of part-time employment could be a good thing. My point is that the system does not accommodate that fantastically well. The things that the Secretary of State applauds do not fit very well with the all-or-nothing system, particularly if they are prolonged. I am aware, and I welcome the fact, that some of the pilots and the individual stuff allows greater flexibility. Even in those cases, my understanding is that they are time limited; at some point, there is not exactly the "get on your bike" message, but something akin to it. I am not sure that that will be right for everybody.

I want to touch on a point that I raised in an intervention. The context of this debate is the apparently stubbornly high number of people on incapacity benefit. The 2.7 million figure includes, as the House will know, about 300,000 people on severe disablement allowance. If we ignore them—not because they are not important, but because they are a different category of people—and focus on incapacity benefit, the 2.4 million who are currently on it is pretty much the same number as 10 years ago. It has not fluctuated much in the past 10 years. It tripled under the Conservatives, but since the mid-1990s the number has been flat. What has changed is its composition.

Mr. Boswell: Before the hon. Gentleman leaves that point, and in a sense reverting to a comment made earlier by the Minister, does he not agree that within that relative stability of the past 10 years, even if there has been a reduction in claimant numbers, as the Minister claimed, that has been matched by an expansion of the period in which claimants are claiming? There have been fewer coming on to the benefit, but those who are on it are staying on it longer.

Mr. Webb: I think that, if average durations were rising, other things being equal, the stock would tend to rise. I could not comment on whether the fall in the inflow has offset the rise in the average durations.

The point that the Minister made is right: a large number of people are on incapacity benefit who have been on it for a long time. I do not think that any of us would dispute that. I will use the 2.4 million figure and leave the severe disablement allowance people out of the picture. The composition has changed dramatically. In the mid-1990s, only just over 500,000 were the credits-only people—the people who do not actually get the cash. Now the figure is nearly 1 million, out of the same grand total. That means that the number of people who get cash from incapacity benefit is dropping quite dramatically.

The Minister seeks reassurance on that point, which is interesting. I do not think that the Government have got a clue what is going on, although that is probably rather rude. About two years ago, when I last saw the figures, I asked another Minister from the same Department what was going on with the rise in the numbers of credits-only people. He said, "I haven't a clue". Yet they are now one third of all the incapacity benefit recipients.

I tabled a parliamentary question earlier in the week asking what research the Department has undertaken about those people and whether it will undertake some, because something rather worrying is going on when nearly 1 million people pass the incapacity test, prove they are incapable of work and do not get any money. That is partly because the national insurance rules have been tightened, but mainly because they are not coming from the workplace.

Bizarrely, we are having a debate this afternoon about stopping people flowing from the workplace on to incapacity benefit, which is entirely legitimate—I would not want to be quoted as saying that it is a sideshow—but it is not the biggest problem that we have. That is people coming from spells of non-employment, broadly defined, on to incapacity benefit.

I have not heard anything from the Minister so far. One cannot expect her to know the minutiae of these things—I certainly do not—but at the start of the debate she was under the impression that those people about whom I am talking did not even qualify for the pathways to work assistance. I do not get the sense that the Government have a grand strategy for the fastest-growing group, and that worries me. It would be great if we were to have all the things we have been talking about—the workplaces where people are prevented from falling sick, or where when they fall sick there is quick intervention—and more power to the Government's elbow on that. However, what will happen with the fast-growing group that will continue to grow? I ask that, because I cannot see that a lot is being done for it.

In a sense, that is the broad outline of my concern. There is almost nothing that I disagree with in what the Minister said. One wonders why it took seven years—or 27 years in some regards—to make a start on this agenda. However, having said that, I cannot point to a speech I made 27 years ago where I demanded it, so we all have the benefit of hindsight, and better late than never is my response to what the Government are now doing. However, there are two big gaps in what they are doing. First, there is a failure to recognise that part-time work for a long period might be the best answer. I do not think that even the reformed system addresses that issue. Secondly, if we are worried about people getting stuck on IB—or incapacity more broadly defined—we should address the fact that there is a rapidly growing group about which we know precious little, and about which we appear to be doing even less.

4.51 pm

Jane Kennedy: With the leave of the House, I will reply briefly to this interesting debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) talked about the stress teachers face in the classroom and how that affects the likelihood of their retiring from work early. There is a little known fact that hon. Members may be interested in; the esteemed mother-in-law of the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) was partially responsible for the education of my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies). [Interruption.] Indeed, his political education. I am sure she could give testimony to the stress related to that task.

Mr. Boswell: For the avoidance of doubt, I should say that I was trying to tell the Minister that my mother-in-law was in no sense responsible for the political education of the hon. Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies). I ought to put that on the record.

Jane Kennedy: My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud made a very thoughtful contribution. He rightly pushed back the boundaries of the debate by considering issues around the rehabilitation of people with particularly chronic illness. He also described the experience of his local hospital, where he believed that the health service was withdrawing from important services. I will ask for further details on that. However, I want to respond now to an important point that my hon. Friend made. It relates to the habit of our comrades in our constituency parties of raising particular issues whenever they get the opportunity; there was a lady who raised a concern about not being allowed to work longer. My hon. Friend is correct that we have not yet implemented that measure, but we will do so. The right to request to continue to work beyond retirement age will come into force in about October 2006, so if she had been 18 months younger she might well have been in a position to argue that her employer could sustain her in employment.

I am a little clearer about the comments of the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb), and I will read with interest his comments in Hansard on what he would do in our place. His last point was about the flow on to IB—where the increasing numbers are coming from, and the fact that they are from the group he referred to. He was right about that; we have many different categories of client, and I apologise for my earlier mistake. Let me explain my immediate response to his point. What we are experiencing with our personal advisers should be seen in the context that that this new approach to dealing with benefit customers is still being rolled out; we are still only about just over half of the way through the roll-out of Jobcentre Plus. Therefore, the bringing together of the two services is not yet in full effect in integrated offices throughout the UK. We are only beginning to see some of the effects of this work.

What happens now is completely different to what used to happen in the past. When people present themselves to Jobcentre Plus in the first instance, whether to claim jobseeker's allowance or any other benefit, they undergo a financial assessment and their circumstances are assessed by Jobcentre Plus staff. That is a new departure. Previously, the old Employment Service and the Benefits Agency would simply have responded to an application made by an individual and no check would have been made of their circumstances to assess whether other benefits that they might get, but for which they had not initially applied were appropriate.

We are looking at the circumstances that the hon. Member for Northavon describes, but my sense of what is happening is that as people come in for advice through the jobcentres and Jobcentre Plus, they are being directed, in some cases, towards incapacity benefit as something to which they are entitled by virtue of their circumstances, except that they do not get IB, but the related benefit, even though they have not been in work. There are other factors in play that we are still studying, but we are interested in this matter—we are not unaware and uninterested. There are other trends in the benefits field that are of interest and which we are also studying.

The hon. Member for Northavon made a great play about saying, "If it is all so great, why didn't they start doing it seven years ago?" I have already said that the development of Jobcentre Plus continues and by this time next year we should be approaching the end of its roll-out. It has required a huge investment of resources, not just in the physical infrastructure of the offices but in the support, management and reorganisation of staff. That has been a major task and has taken up a lot of the energy and resources that were available.

The hon. Gentleman is right. When we came into office, our priority was unemployment and dealing with the legacy of the Conservative years, from which we inherited crippling levels of unemployment. We focused rightly on how to enable people to move back into work who could, perhaps, easily be described as the easiest to help. Although the new deal for disabled people was developed relatively quickly, it still helps only about 3 per cent. of the population who are in receipt of these benefits, primarily because it is a voluntary scheme. We have to go through a huge process of re-education with a lot of people who have been told by their doctors that they are incapable of working.

The hon. Gentleman talked about people passing the incapacity test so that they are deemed incapable of work, yet he and I would probably agree that there is a significant proportion of people in receipt of such benefits who could work if they were in receipt of the right support and help. That is why the strategy in which we are engaged and which we have published is the right one.

It is true that we had the principles in place from an early stage. Early intervention was the right principle. However, for the reason that I have just described—broadly, capacity is one reason—we never tested the model that we are now testing in pathways; it has never been done before in a social security context. For the first time, pathways is giving us a unique model that is proving successful in its early days and will provide us with the framework on which we will build further. However, we need to be careful.

My quick response to the intervention by the hon. Member for Daventry on my earlier speech, was that we still need to be careful, evaluate what we are doing and ensure that we get the most effective intervention for the resources that we are investing.

The hon. Member for Northavon questioned me about the workplace health direct pilot. He said that he was not being disparaging. However, the service is not merely a telephone helpline, although it will provide important advice. He might want to consider the experience in Scotland, where that service has been piloted for two years. That pilot is coupled with pilots running in regions, which will test what occupational health support people can be encouraged to develop in the current environment, but we are trying out different ways in different regions and the Health and Safety Executive is taking it forward.

The Scottish example is small in scope, but we will learn valuable lessons from it. Clearly, it must still be a partnership-based approach; it is not a whistleblower's telephone line to report employers for bad practice, but a matter of getting advice about a set of circumstances that can be raised with the employer in a sensible, constructive way that encourages them to behave responsibly and to deal with the risk that is identified.

On the matter of sustained part-time work being best for some people, what we intend as we develop the new strategy is that everyone on IB will be able to do part-time work for periods of 52 weeks as it stands, but people on IB with the greatest health-related barriers to working full-time will, as a result of the changes that were announced in the pre-Budget report, be able to work part-time permanently—the change to the linking rules to which the hon. Gentleman referred earlier. People with advanced progressive conditions or severe mental illness will be acknowledged to be in the categories that he described. I hope that that has clarified the point for the hon. Gentleman.

The hon. Member for Daventry, in a very interesting contribution, described our progress as glacially slow. I think he and I share some frustration on that score, but we must consider how far we have come since 1997. It is important to remember that new claims are down by a third and numbers in the case load have peaked; it is a small fall, but the latest figures suggest a 9,000 fall in the overall numbers. If it is sustained, we will be able to say that we have established a trend. I am looking forward to the next figures with great interest.

The hon. Member for Daventry might also be interested in considering the international situation. In the US, the experience is of a rapidly increasing case load of those who are economically inactive for health reasons. New Zealand, too, has a similar experience. These are complex problems, which have been created over a generation; they will not be resolved easily and we should take pride in the fact that the UK Government are seen as a world leader in this respect. We are in the forefront of Governments who are trying to tackle the problem and we have developed a highly imaginative and innovative way of dealing with it. The hon. Gentleman asked how we would draw the line between the rehabilitation and support allowance and the disability and sickness allowance. Hon. Members will be reassured when I say that much detailed work and consultation will be undertaken on the issue.

In a statement yesterday, the Chairman of the Select Committee requested that the matter be given pre-legislative scrutiny, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will consider that request carefully. However, in general terms, the rehabilitation and support allowance will be for people with less severe impairments that can be managed, with the right support, so that they are not a major long-term obstacle to getting back to work. For example, people with conditions such as lower back and neck pain, angina and depression are likely to receive the benefit.

The disability and sickness allowance will focus more on those with the most severe impairments, where the health problem or disability will form a very significant obstacle for some time. The hon. Gentleman and I can think of the kinds of cases that that will include. We know of many people who still work with severe impairments, so we are not saying that they will not be entitled to work.

Mr. Boswell: I seek the Minister's elucidation on two matters. First, I take it that the distinction between the two allowances will arise from the personal capacity assessment, so it will itself have to be altered to differentiate between them. Secondly—this is a matter of principle—if an action plan is drawn up following a personal capacity assessment and the person is compliant in trying to get back to work, it will send an extremely bad signal if the benefit is scaled down for failure to complete the action plan as a result of circumstances outside the claimant's control—for example, a failure to receive treatment in time.

Jane Kennedy: The hon. Gentleman's second point is entirely valid. The answer to his first point is yes: a personal capacity assessment will still be made. In a sense, the people with whom we will be working will drive this agenda. There are people with severe health impairments who will none the less say, "I still believe that I can work". It is important to say that we are not writing anybody off.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the vocational rehabilitation framework. I shall try briefly to summarise what that is about. In October last year, I launched the framework document, which stresses that the current inconclusive evidence base on vocational rehabilitation should not preclude considering how we can move forward on this issue. The document helps stakeholders who are considering introducing vocational rehabilitation, highlights the key messages in research and allows stakeholders to influence current practice and encourage the development of good practice.

I am sure that hon. Members will agree that there are a large number of Government strategies and initiatives focused on people not in employment. The work to help people with health conditions or impairments retain employment has started only recently. Do not ask me again why it did not start before as it is such a good idea. Clearly, that work is just beginning. Momentum needs to be generated. The framework suggests that the initial efforts flowing from the initiatives should be focused on helping people in employment remain in employment.

We can supply the hon. Member for Daventry with a copy of the framework, which might help him. He talked about the confusion that might arise in the minds of employers about the range of rehabilitation services available; confusion about, for example, competition between the Health and Safety Executive and the Department of Health. He is right. The various teams and agencies involved in providing those services are already being co-ordinated. There is a great deal of interest in the issue across Government because we see benefits flowing, not just for the Exchequer but for the general health of the nation. There will be benefits for employers, too.

I have already said that the linking rules will remain an integral element of the new scheme. If I may say so, I am still not much clearer about the Conservatives' plans on their "opportunity first" programme. We shall continue this debate on other occasions, and I am sure that public interest will remain focused on this issue.

East Coast Rail Franchise

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Jim Murphy.]

9.30 am

Mr. Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): I am grateful to have secured this debate. I see that a number of hon. Members who represent various constituencies along the east coast are present; doubtless they wish to speak about their particular interest in the subject. I shall try to be reasonably succinct, so that they have a chance to take part.

I start by declaring my interest in the subject, not in a formal or financial sense, but as a regular user of the rail services on the east coast main line. I share that interest with many of my constituents, who use the line south to London and north to Aberdeen, Inverness and Glasgow. Like many of those constituents who have recently contacted me by e-mail or letter, I am generally impressed by the quality of service offered by GNER, the current franchise operator. That fact certainly forms part of the background to a debate about the future of the franchise for the east coast main line.

Obviously, as with any operator, things can go wrong from time to time, and my experience of the line has not always been of the highest, but I have generally experienced a good service under the present operator. My starting point is therefore to say that I hope that the Strategic Rail Authority and the Department for Transport, in their respective roles in awarding a new franchise, will allow GNER to continue to operate it. I know that that view is shared by the nearly 50 hon. Members who signed the early-day motion on the subject tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley). It is pretty unusual for MPs to support the continuation of a franchise in such a way. We normally see people demanding that franchises are removed. That is a reflection of the quality of the service provided by GNER.

Mr. Iain Luke (Dundee, East) (Lab): My hon. Friend makes a valid point about the SRA's involvement in awarding the franchise for the east coast main line. Does he accept that, with the SRA's involvement in reducing the strategic value of the line from Edinburgh to Aberdeen, the franchise should be framed so as to ensure that the good service that we seek serves all the communities on the east coast, from Aberdeen, through Dundee, to Edinburgh and the south?

Mr. Lazarowicz: I know that my hon. Friend has been a consistent champion of the rail service north of Edinburgh to Dundee, including the long-distance mainline services. He makes a valid point, and I agree with him.

There has been speculation in the press that, in the process leading to the awarding of a new franchise, the Treasury is trying to extract the maximum return to the taxpayer from whatever arrangements are eventually made. It is clearly the Treasury's job to extract the maximum return for the taxpayer; and one would expect such thinking to be going on in government, but I hope that today's debate will make it clear that it would be unacceptable for the Treasury's interests to override the importance of maintaining a high-quality service on the line. The message that must come out of the debate is that we do not want the quality of the service offered to the customer to be reduced; it would certainly be a seriously retrograde step if the current GNER service were replaced by a poorer service offered by another operator or, indeed, if the existing operator were forced to run a poorer service as a result of the eventual franchise arrangements.

Mr. Luke: My hon. Friend makes a valid point about the integrity of the service. I know that he reads The Scotsman intently because it is produced in his home town, and he will have been upset by a report on 8 October—my birthday—that some of the proposed options include the possibility of longer journey times, unregulated non-core fares and replacement bus services. Many people along the line in the north-east of Scotland will see that as a clear threat to their direct services to London. Does he accept that such things should play no part in the final decision on who gets the franchise?

Mr. Lazarowicz: I certainly accept my hon. Friend's point; indeed, I hope to deal in a second with some of the specific service issues to which he referred.

There is also concern about the possible effect of a change in operator on the passengers who use the existing services. Where there has been a change of operator elsewhere, there have sometimes been difficulties in the changeover period, and there is a worry that the service could be disrupted in the transition to a new operator. That in itself would drive passengers away, and they might not return in the long term, whatever services then prevailed.

There is also concern about the position of the staff who currently work for GNER; the issue has a particular constituency interest for me and for other hon. Members with constituencies along the east coast line. Almost 400 staff, many of whom live in my constituency, are employed in various operations in the Edinburgh area, and they are concerned about what a change of operator will mean for the future of their jobs.

I accept that it is in the nature of a franchising process that the Government have to consider all the proposals made by the various bidders. If another operator suggested a wonderful alternative, it would certainly not be right to rule it out, and any such proposal will no doubt be given proper consideration. However, given what we know of the various options unveiled so far, there is no reason to change the operator on the east coast main line.

The right way forward is to build on the strengths of the existing operator, enhance the services offered to the passengers who use the route at the moment and attract more customers from the airlines and the roads. If we are to ensure effective competition, particularly with air travel, there must be a high-quality service, which is another reason why any moves that would result in a poorer service should be resisted.

[Mr. Lazarowicz]

I want briefly to highlight the improvements that I would like to see on the agenda, particularly to meet my constituents' interests. First, we need to consider the timings for the duration of journeys from Edinburgh to destinations further south. It is technically possible for trains to make the journey to London in four hours, but those of us who have used the service in recent decades notice that journey times have not been reduced; in fact, with one early morning exception, they have actually increased in recent years. That trend must be reversed if we are to provide an attractive alternative, particularly to air services.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would want his constituents to be able to reach Aberdeen as well. However, in terms of journey times, Edinburgh is almost halfway between London and Aberdeen, so it is important that the operator of the east coast franchise recognises that the line goes all the way to Aberdeen, especially when it tries to improve journey times.

Mr. Lazarowicz: Indeed. The franchising process must see how maximum advantage can be gained from the franchise operator working with the Scottish Executive in the exercise of their responsibility for rail infrastructure north of Edinburgh, following additional powers being given to them recently by the Secretary of State for Transport. Journey times, particularly for trains going south from Edinburgh, certainly need to be shorter, but I fully accept the point about services northwards and westwards.

Secondly, there needs to be greater integration between the mainline services and local rail and bus services. Integration is not as good as it could be, and work needs to be done to make the most of proper integrated transport services so that passengers can transfer from mainline express services to local services and make bus connections.

There also needs to be more imaginative use of the timetable to provide links and direct services, not only along the main line from Aberdeen and Edinburgh southwards to London, but to other cities that can be served by the line. Services to Leeds could certainly be improved, and connections to cities such as Nottingham and Sheffield could be better integrated with the mainline services.

Several constituents raised the issue of smoking carriages on the east coast service, which they do not believe to be conducive to their health. As has been pointed out, presumably the possibility of separate legislation in Scotland on smoking in public places will have to be considered, or there will be difficulties when the trains reach a spot 400 yds north of Berwick.

It is essential that the franchise is for a long period, whichever company wins it. We cannot have the sort of two-year extension of the franchise that we had in the previous round, which would clearly create uncertainty for any operator. I understand that a franchise of up to 10 years is suggested. That is the sort of period that should be covered in the current round.

Certain associated improvements to the infrastructure could be linked to any bid. During the previous franchise round, some major upgrades to the network were suggested as part of the bid. Obviously, upgrades to the network or anything else that is done in the right place in the right way would be very attractive to us all, but I would be concerned if part of the price of the final successful bid was to link the franchise to excessively complicated changes to the infrastructure. We have learnt from the experience of the west coast main line, and we should be wary of major improvements to the infrastructure on lines on which services are operating.

It would be far better to return to the agenda the possibility of a north-south high-speed line. That is the way forward for the UK as a whole, and we need to pursue it. We need a 20-year vision for direct high-speed links from London to the north of England and to Scotland—the vision, and the links, that exist elsewhere in Europe. Such a network might make possible a three-hour journey from London to Edinburgh, and needs to be constructed in a way that does not cause disruption to existing services for an extensive period.

I am pleased that the Secretary of State for Transport indicated in a speech last week at a conference that the issue of a north-south high-speed line is back on the agenda. I hope that he will take that idea forward, as such a development is needed if there are to be real alternatives to air travel to Edinburgh and Glasgow, not to mention between Aberdeen, Dundee and London.

If the Treasury is to harvest more return from the new franchise, whichever operator it is granted to, what better way to recycle that extra income in its coffers than to use it to develop the first phases of a north-south high-speed line of the type that I have described?

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): I welcome the debate on this subject, because, as our interventions may have shown, it gives us the chance to get assurances from the Minister that the Government see the east coast main line as one that connects Aberdeen to London, not just Edinburgh to London. There is a long history of concern that the Aberdeen to Edinburgh line is beginning to be seen as a branch line. At times, companies have not helped, especially with their advertising: they have failed to produce correct maps of the services that they provide to the whole of Scotland, and failed to recognise that Inverness services also go to Glasgow. The east coast main line should be seen as one that runs throughout the United Kingdom, not just one that connects Scotland to the rest of the UK.

I echo the comments of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mr. Lazarowicz) about the quality of service to date. Obviously, a franchising process is about competitive bidding and recognising who has made the best bid, but I am pleased that a franchisee's record can now be taken into account. Unusually, there has been a write-in campaign in support of GNER by users of the service—I am sure that other Members will have received letters. When users of the service recognise its quality, that should be taken on board. If someone else says that they can provide a better service, that must be recognised as being important for our constituents, but they must also be seen to deliver.

The east coast main line was a jewel in the crown of British Rail even before privatisation, and the operators had the chance to work with that. As the hon. Gentleman said, when things have gone wrong, there has been support to assist customers with any problems that crop up, and the company has often been able to put things right.

The Campaign for Rail Electrification from Aberdeen to Edinburgh, CREATE, was established by local government and economic development organisations in the north-east of Scotland down to Edinburgh, including Fife and Dundee, because when the electrification of the east coast main line was planned, it was to go only as far as Edinburgh. That rang alarm bells in people's minds about the economy further north, and caused concern that it would create a two-tier service because investment would go into new stock that could use the electrification, and investments in line speed and improvements would go to the electrified route. There was also a practical recognition that it is far easier to carry on electrification with the system up and running than to have a stop-start process. The campaign was established with that in mind.

There has been a lot of professional and technical advice, and history, since the campaign began. Obviously, electrification stopped at Edinburgh. The campaign still exists, and it has stuck to the original issue: preventing Aberdeen from being seen as simply at the end of a branch line from Edinburgh. There are improvements to be made to the line north, so that whoever gets the franchise can provide a better connection from Aberdeen to London. Such improvements will help with people's journeys from north of Edinburgh to London.

Mr. Luke: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that in an earlier debate on the matter—I think it was on 26 June 2002—the Minister who responded made it clear that electrification was no longer an option for the line north of Edinburgh, and that the way forward was for improvements through Fife, north of Dundee and up to Aberdeen, to ensure that the speed that we had hoped for could be reached and that the time of a journey between London and Aberdeen could be cut significantly? Although electrification was a goal of CREATE—I have attended many CREATE meetings—it is no longer on the table.

Sir Robert Smith: As a former member of CREATE, I recognise the transition to a campaign for achievable improvements on the line north of Aberdeen, the point having been established that Aberdeen to London is a mainline service. We want the Minister to say that the Government still recognise that the main line runs all the way to Aberdeen. I hope that that recognition not only exists on a piece of paper, but has practical consequences, so that the line will be managed as a main line north to Aberdeen and the line improvements will be delivered, making it possible for the franchisee to offer an improved service. No matter how good the service is or how much less burdensome the journey, if trains are trundling around on old, inefficient and crowded lines, the competitiveness of the railway will not increase.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith was right, too, to say that we have to be more ambitious in this country if rail is truly to deal with the problems caused by unnecessary air travel. Establishing a new north-south route must be the long-term goal. Incremental improvements south of Edinburgh which disrupt journeys will only drive people away from the railways and will not achieve the substantial achievements that we want.

Rail has a lot to offer. I should also like to hear from the Minister that the franchising process will not disrupt other developments on the line. In my constituency, the reopening of Laurencekirk station is closer than it has been for many years, with the Scottish transport appraisal guidance analysis showing that it is a financially practical proposition. I would like to be reassured that the franchise will not in any way disrupt either the reopening of stations on the route or the proposed Crossrail service in Aberdeen to create a commuter rail link from the north and south of Aberdeen, which would make use of existing infrastructure. Can the Minister also assure us that freight will not become a Cinderella service as the franchise is established?

I reiterate the fundamental point, which is that the east coast main line goes north to Aberdeen and should be managed to deliver services north to Aberdeen, meaning improved speeds, times and infrastructure to make that possible. None of the welcome developments, such as the reopening of Laurencekirk station and the establishment of the Crossrail commuter service for Aberdeen, should be undermined.

Pete Wishart (North Tayside) (SNP): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that with the devolution of railway powers there is a challenge for the Scottish Executive to deliver on the projects that he mentions? We are concerned that the Scottish Executive have not been properly resourced to pursue such projects; we have calculated a £70 million shortfall. I do not know whether he has concerns about that.

Sir Robert Smith: Obviously, the Minister must make it clear that in transferring powers to the Scottish Executive the Government should also transfer the resources that make those powers deliverable.

On a practical level, regardless of resources, I should like also to ensure that nothing in the franchising process undermines projects. The franchise regulations could establish standards for the service which, because of technical specifications, disrupt the ability to reopen stations. I would like some recognition that the reopening of Laurencekirk station is being encouraged and that nothing in the franchise will undermine that encouragement or the development of Crossrail.

9.53 am

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): I start by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mr. Lazarowicz) on securing this important debate. I also thank him and many hon. Members in all parts of the House for supporting my early-day motion urging the Government to award the new franchise to GNER.

I should declare an interest. Like other hon. Members who live along the east coast main line, I am provided by GNER with a car parking pass—mine is for use at York station—which saves the House of Commons authorities a tidy sum in parking charges that I would otherwise claim. That is of course the same concession that GNER's predecessor British Rail provided to MPs along the line.

The east coast mainline service, run by GNER, is without doubt the best railway in the country, but I want it to be better still. My hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Luke) and the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine (Sir Robert Smith) have argued persuasively for improvements to the service north of Edinburgh. I would say to them that GNER has a good track record—the best of any train operating company in the country—for improving services by putting on more trains and improving track layout, not just in Scotland but in England. For instance, it has greatly improved the access and services to Leeds, which is off the main London to Scotland line.

GNER's east coast main line is more than a railway; it is an artery pumping the lifeblood of prosperity into all the regions through which it passes. Yorkshire Forward, my local regional development agency, estimates that the main line contributes some £100 million a year to the region's economy and sustains 11,000 jobs in Yorkshire, mainly in transport and tourism. Of course, a great number of those tourism-related jobs are in my constituency. We receive some 4 million tourists a year, of whom 24 per cent. arrive in York by rail, a number that has been increasing in recent years. However, the economic impact is not just on transport and tourism. The east coast mainline service run by GNER acts as a magnet. It has drawn investment to my constituency from a wide range of businesses—largely high-technology firms in computing and biotechnology—that need quick access to markets and customers in London and the south-east, and at other points on the east coast main line. Next to York station is the York Central site, which is about two thirds of the size of the area within York city walls, York's heart. It is ripe for redevelopment, and it will be developed only because of business brought into the city by the railway line.

Jobs in York, in Yorkshire and elsewhere along the line depend not on the mere existence of the railway but on the provision of a good railway service. I was not in favour of rail privatisation, as the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) will recall, but I am firmly in favour of GNER. It has won me over for a number of reasons. First, it has improved the quality of the service on the east coast main line: it has increased the number of staff on trains and in stations; it has improved on-board catering and train information for passengers; and it has trained its staff, which has contributed to the quality of service. I believe that it is the only railway company in the country that has won Investors in People recognition for the whole of its business not just once but twice.

I back GNER, secondly, because of the reliability of the service and, thirdly, because it has increased the frequency of trains, the number of services that it runs and the number of passengers that it carries. As my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith points out, there are important environmental advantages to drawing traffic off the roads and on to the railways.

Fourthly, GNER has controlled ticket costs better than have some other rail companies; some of the fares that it offers now are lower than those charged by British Rail before privatisation. Its fares have risen overall, but not as fast as those of its key competitors. According to an article in The Independent yesterday, the cost of standard-class single fares on GNER services has risen by 48 per cent. in the past nine years. During the same period, the cost of standard-class single fares has increased by 70 per cent. on First Great Western and by 80 per cent. on Virgin Trains, so GNER has a better record on controlling the costs that face its customers than have its main competitors in this franchise competition.

Fifthly, GNER's industrial relations record is good. It has established partnership agreements with the trade unions that represent its staff. I believe that that is important because it enables GNER to continue to modernise and improve the service to its customers and its working practices to keep the service competitive and profitable. The single most attractive thing about GNER is that it has delivered what it has promised. One cannot say that for all its competitors.

There have been reports in the press in the past week or so that one of the bidders for the franchise, Danish state railways, intends to buy new Japanese trains. Investment in rolling stock is always attractive, but I should remind the Minister that GNER is in the middle of rebuilding its entire fleet of trains. If she has not already ridden on one of the new Mallard trains, I advise her to do so. They provide an absolutely splendid service. The difficulty with the offer to build entirely new trains is that if that were actually fulfilled it would not come into effect for six years at the earliest, and the new Mallard rebuild, which GNER is in the middle of, would stop dead. The new Japanese trains would be shorter and would carry fewer passengers than the Intercity 225 trains. The GNER rebuild is taking place in this country, supporting our rail engineering industry, but the building of Japanese trains would not.

The importance of GNER to my constituency ought to be underlined. When rail privatisation happened, York lost thousands of railway jobs. Since then, we have been clawing our way back. We now have about 3,000 railway jobs in the city, in engineering, design, track maintenance and renewals, as well as train operations. However, the magnet for all those jobs has been GNER's decision to base the headquarters of its operations in York. No competitor for the franchise offers to have its headquarters in York. If any of them were to win the franchise, the 409 GNER headquarters jobs in York would be at risk. Other jobs in the supplier industries, such as in Corus Rail Consultancy, which must employ 300 or 400 civil and mechanical engineers, could also move elsewhere.

If one reads the trade press or talks to businesses or chambers of commerce up and down the line, to the Institute of Directors, which wrote to me recently, or to budget travellers, pensioners or students, one finds that they are all backing GNER. As the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine said, some 20,000 pledges of support to GNER have come from its passengers. Many Members of Parliament from all parties have supported my early-day motion backing GNER's bid.

I accept that GNER has to win the franchise on merit and has to offer the taxpayer value for money. However, the Government must also take into account its track record in providing an improving service. It would be quite perverse if the train operating company that by common consent has performed the best since privatisation were to lose its franchise. It would send entirely the wrong message to other train operating companies: it would say that quality and reliability are not valued and rewarded. It would create a hiatus and economic uncertainty in the regions through which GNER services pass, when continuity and certainty are required. I urge the Government to make an early decision on the franchise and to award a new franchise to GNER.

10.4 am

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mr. Lazarowicz) on securing this debate. It is an important one and has been very informative so far.

I, too, declare an interest in that I regularly travel with GNER on the east coast main line. Like my hon. Friend the Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley), I have a car parking pass card given to me by GNER. I want to say something about my experience of travelling on GNER before focusing on two or three issues relating to the high-return option bid that all potential tenderers have been asked to include in their submission. I also want to discuss the issue mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith, of how returns to the Treasury from the successful franchisee should be invested, as well as talking about direct services between London and Teesside.

My experience has been similar to that of my hon. Friend the Member for City of York. GNER provides an excellent service and generally I have found its staff very helpful and supportive. I hope that the franchise will go back to GNER; I feel strongly about that. I recognise that the case should be based on merit: the company's service to me and my constituents is outstanding and a credit to those who provide it.

Sometimes I have experienced delays or cancellations for one reason or another, but I do not blame GNER. Problems have been more to do with the track, signalling or power supply, so I lay the blame at the doorstep of Railtrack, now Network Rail. That, historically, is the real culprit, not GNER. The rail company is led by an excellent chief executive, and it has gone from strength to strength in all the years that I have been travelling on it.

On the matter of bidding, I want to focus on the high-return option, which is a device to test how a financial return from a franchisee to the Treasury can be maximised. I appreciate that that is seen as a way of securing a rail network with the least possible call on the taxpayer, but there is a danger that the duty will produce bid options that slash costs, and, in doing so, devalue standards. I should be concerned if potential franchisees presented bids that would mean fare rises, or cuts either in train crew or in staff at the stations that they control, such as those in my area of Darlington.

I hope that the franchise will be approached in the spirit of ensuring that we have a high-quality railway, rather than one that is run just to be cheap and cheerful. I agree that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and the Strategic Rail Authority have a duty to examine the high-return option, but I argue that they also have a duty to consider the quality and level of services as well.

As to investment in service, the Minister will recall that the east coast main line is unique in this country, as other hon. Members have said, in that it is the only one not to need a subsidy from the taxpayer. In those circumstances a crucial factor in the franchise process will be the amount of return to the SRA. That raises the issue of where the return will be invested.

The east coast main line has several feeder branch lines such as the one in my constituency, which runs from Saltburn, through Redcar and Middlesbrough, and connects with the main line at Darlington. Unlike the main line, it needs investment and subsidy from the SRA and the taxpayer, but it is a vital link to the main line for the communities that it serves. In that sense it also directly underwrites the profitability of the east coast main line. A logical approach would be to invest the cash returns to the SRA and the Treasury in that line and, indeed, the other, similar, lines that serve the east coast mainline stations and services.

I want to mention services between London and Teesside. Teesside is unique in being probably the biggest conurbation in the UK with no direct rail link to London. There is a population of nearly 500,000 in the area covered by the boroughs of Stockton, Middlesbrough, Hartlepool—I notice that my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Iain Wright) is in the Chamber—Redcar and Cleveland. For decades, those people have had to travel to Darlington to connect with a London service. I do not know what is in the detailed plan submitted to the SRA by the prospective franchisees. However, given the shape of the demands made on them by the bid, I should be very surprised if there were any mention of new links from London to Teesside. Given that, the Minister should examine closely the forthcoming bid for approval from the rail regulator from a new rail company, Grand Central Railway.

Iain Wright (Hartlepool) (Lab): I am grateful to my hon. Friend and fellow Teesside MP for giving way, and I fully support his comments. As the newest Member of the House, my experience is that the rail service from King's Cross to Darlington is extremely effective; the journey can be done in two and a half hours. My only problem is that if I use the rail network, it can take another two and a half hours to go from Darlington to Hartlepool, as I am sure my hon. Friend is aware. I fully endorse his comments. We should be investing in Teesside to ensure that there is a vibrant and effective link between the Tees valley and London. That would enable the commercial potential of the area to be realised.

Dr. Kumar: I hope that the Minister has noted the comments made.

As I was saying, Grand Central Railway has put forward a proposal to run a service from Sunderland to King's Cross. That service would call at Hartlepool, Stockton and Eaglescliffe, which are all in Teesside. I understand that there is also the potential for a further service from Middlesbrough. It is envisaged that the journeys would be made by completely refurbished high-speed diesel trains with a high degree of passenger comfort. The company would also offer remarkably cheap fares, with an option of a Teesside-London return ticket of £50. If approval is given, the company will seek to start operations this December.

Grand Central Railway will probably be what is called an open access operator in that it will make no demand for subsidy from the SRA or payments to it. The financial arrangements would be similar to those that underpin the operations of Hull Trains. As the Minister will be aware, that company has been very successful in providing fast and convenient services to a similarly large conurbation, which, until the company's arrival, had found itself largely isolated from the east coast mainline network.

Since the inception of the service, passenger numbers travelling to London from Hull and its surrounding areas have grown hugely. Crucially, those passengers were not stolen from GNER. The success of Hull Trains shows graphically that the same approach could work for my area in Teesside. It is clear that Grand Central's prospectus offers the easiest opportunity for Teesside to have a dedicated London rail link. The provision of such a link would aid tremendously the regeneration efforts going on in Teesside.

Mr. Lazarowicz: Some Members from north of Edinburgh pointed out that the line runs northwards as well as southwards from that city. Does my hon. Friend agree that the franchise should also address the issue of how better links can be provided for all passengers, from whatever point on the east coast main line they travel, so that they have good connections to important towns and cities near the line?

Given that people read debates such as these for references to car parking passes, I should like to make it clear that, as I am fortunate enough to live within walking distance of my station, I do not have a GNER car parking pass.

Dr. Kumar: I agree with my hon. Friend that links are very important. We have all had bitter experiences. If those concerns could be better addressed, we would all be in favour of that.

I hope that I have put into focus the importance of the Teesside-London railway link. We have thriving universities, university teaching hospitals and emerging state-of-the-art teaching hospitals. Tremendous regeneration programmes are going on in Middlesbrough and Stockton as a result of the Government's efforts. I hope that the Minister takes note of all those things when she makes a decision.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Luke) wants to speak and promises to be very brief, I will call him.

10.15 am

Mr. Iain Luke (Dundee, East) (Lab): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I will be very brief.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mr. Lazarowicz) on securing the debate. He will know that I am passionate about this issue.

Many people have said that the options on offer are rail, car or air. Travelling from my constituency to London by car is a horrendous journey, and although we have an air service, which we value, it is not as frequent as we would like, so obviously rail still forms a major connection to the east coast of Scotland.

I secured two earlier debates on this subject. On 26 June 2002 there was a debate on the electrification of the line north of Edinburgh. On 16 September 2003 we had an Adjournment debate on investment in the east coast line. The awarding of the franchise is a vital issue in the service delivery that all constituents on the east coast deserve and want.

My hon. Friend the Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley), who is very knowledgeable on the issue, made a vital comment about the current deliverer, which has kept its promise. That is reassuring. The touchstone for the successful franchisee must be a commitment to ensuring that the service is not reduced; indeed, I hope that it will be improved.

Some comments have been made about the bidders for the east coast line and the determinants of the franchise; applicants have to put forward what they would call a high-return option. Many people believe that that would include fare rises and the replacement of poorly used services from stations up and down that line by buses. That is a prospect that fills many people, myself included, with horror.

The hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine (Sir Robert Smith) properly outlined the rail travel problems faced by communities in the north-east of Scotland. They can be resolved only by significant investment in the line north of Edinburgh. He, I, and others have pursued that through the Scottish Executive and Ministers here in Westminster. Since the SRA decided for investment purposes to downgrade the line north of Edinburgh, it has been a major battle. However, it is one of the vital issues that must be addressed by the Government and the franchisee to ensure the provision of the services that should exist to serve the north-east of Scotland.

I hope that the Government take on board the need to keep services to the east coast of Scotland at their highest level. Hopefully, the successful bidder will also be committed to that.

Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for allowing me to say those few words. I hope that there will be a successful conclusion to the franchise bid which will serve the people up and down the main line well and give them the service that they deserve.

10.18 am

John Thurso (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mr. Lazarowicz) on securing the debate. It is evident from the many contributions that there is unanimous support for the existing franchise holder.

My hon. Friend the Member for West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine (Sir Robert Smith) made the case for ensuring that in considering the franchise we do not forget, as often happens, that Scotland does not end at Edinburgh but goes on to Aberdeen, Inverness and north to the top of Scotland. I read with great interest the comments made by the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Luke) in an earlier Westminster Hall debate.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) would very much like to have been here today, but, unfortunately he is a member of the Liaison Committee, which is meeting this morning, and is therefore unable to be with us.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I, too, am a member of that Committee.

John Thurso: I hope that you will have a moment to get there before too long, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

My right hon. Friend is a regular user of the service from his constituency, and he has impressed on me the massive local support for GNER. That is rare; it is hard to think of a rail franchise or service that has enjoyed such support from its users. Exceptions might include Chiltern Railways or the Gatwick Express. It is an important point, and it must be taken into consideration. The early-day motion tabled by the hon. Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley) is evidence that it has support not only from the public and passengers but from Members. I am unsure whether there has ever been an early-day motion in support of a franchise holder before, so that is rather special.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed has intimated to me the considerable concern, particularly in the north-east but also in other areas served by the line, that the result of the current franchise letting will be a downgrading of the service, an increase in fares and a much worse service for the passengers. There are two key issues. The first is the franchise system and how it is applied with regard to this franchise. The second, customer satisfaction and the need to ensure that the product delivered to the customer is of value and quality, too often gets forgotten when we debate the railways.

Let me start by setting out some of the things that GNER has achieved, because it might be considered a role model for other franchisees. Its first achievement is financial. It began with a Government subsidy of £62 million a year. Not only has that been reduced to zero, but I understand that over the last three years it has paid some £78 million back to the Government, and last year that sum was about £22.5 million or £25 million. The SRA's own survey reports that 85 per cent. of passengers are happy with the service, which is the highest satisfaction rate for any long-distance operator.

One of the things that impressed me most was that GNER has made investments of £100 million in rebuilding trains, improving car parks, modernising stations and improving information for passengers. Too often the money that the passengers pay becomes profit or goes in rebates to the Government, and not much comes back in investment. A company that has invested is to be commended. That, possibly allied to the fact that there are some 22 per cent. more services, is why the passenger numbers have increased by 32 per cent.

Another fact struck me. Many people say that GNER has a wonderful restaurant car, but it is simply a service for business men at the front end and takes no account of the ordinary traveller. However, GNER has standard-class tickets available that are cheaper than the standard off-peak fares that used to be offered by the BR Apex ticket. This is a provider that understands that a high-class service can be operated at one end of a vehicle and a cost-efficient or cheaper option at the other end.

All in all, a great deal to do with this franchise is to be commended. If GNER can persuade the hon. Member for City of York to move from being against privatisation in principle to being a supporter of its securing the franchise, that is evidence of the good work that it has done. That is recognised by the petition and the early-day motion.

I turn to the franchising system. We have just finished our consideration of the Railways Bill. In Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh) and I tabled an amendment nicknamed "the GNER amendment". That was slightly unkind because it was designed specifically not to help GNER, but to place an obligation on the new franchise system whereby passenger satisfaction and the quality of service delivered by an existing franchise holder must be taken into account when awarding a new franchise. Surprisingly and sadly, the Government chose not to accept the amendment, but I hope that, when they consider how the new system will work, such an important ingredient will be taken into account.

Part of our problem is that, at the moment, the franchising system is in limbo because we are in the dog days of the SRA. It knows that it will go soon, but the new system is not yet set up and running in the Department, so we are betwixt and between. A franchising system must clearly be about competition; otherwise there is no point in it. If all we had to do to achieve a new franchise was to deliver a good service, and that was automatically achieved, the system would not be working. It must be about competition not only for a particular franchise, but between different franchises.

We then come to the matter of determining value, not cost. It is important to make known the difference between the cost of something and its value. As someone who has spent his life in the hospitality industry, I know that it is always easy to cut costs. We can slash the marketing budget or, the most common method, cut the training budget. Services can be reduced. In the case under discussion, a few people could be removed from stations and from the trains themselves. There comes a moment when however low the costs and however high the corresponding possibility of reducing fares or, as is more likely, giving more money to the Treasury, we will have destroyed the product that delivered the revenue in the first place. The Government or the SRA must therefore be careful; they must understand the difference between cost and value. They should not give in to the short-term desire to receive the maximum return, but know that nursing a customer base is about value and the long term.

One of the hon. Gentleman who spoke mentioned the wider value not only to the travelling public, but to the economy itself, especially tourism. I declare an interest in that I am still the president of the Tourism Society. When there are good transport links, the value of tourism increases considerably; academic data support that. I do not know whether other hon. Members with regular involvement in transport matters received the same e-mail as I did from a gentleman in America a few days ago. He said that he had tried everything to find out how our railways worked and how he could book a train ticket. He said that the telephones were not answered and the website was down; and if someone somewhere did not answer his call he would go to France. I sent him an e-mail to ask what trains he wanted and say that I would do my best for him, but I have not received an answer.

Mr. Luke: He is in Paris.

John Thurso: Probably.

The franchising system must acknowledge value and customer satisfaction. As for competition, one of the other bidders runs the west coast franchise. If one company runs both the west coast and the east cost lines, competition will clearly be reduced. The customer service that GNER produces comes from its Investors in People qualification. It is the only rail company in such a position and surely it must be congratulated on that.

At our conference last year, my party committed itself in principle to the north-south high-speed rail link. That will mean that many of the options that are currently open for a six-track railway or a bypass will conflict with that, an important point that the Secretary of State has now come round to understanding and which should be taken into account.

A powerful case has been made for GNER, not simply because it is the existing franchisee, but because of all that it has delivered for the customer. It is time that the customer was put front and centre in dealing with the railways, and I hope that the Minister and her team will respond to that.

10.30 am

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): Some hon. Members have declared an interest in this debate and they were right to do so, but I am certain that none of them would say anything other than what they truly believed in just because of a train pass. I am not sure whether I need to join those hon. Members; I think that I was issued with a GNER parking pass and I am also fairly certain that I have lost it, so I declare an unknown-whereabouts interest.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. On that basis, I suppose that I had better declare an interest as well, but I do not use my pass very much.

Mr. Knight: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I join other hon. Members in congratulating the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mr. Lazarowicz) on securing this important debate, and I congratulate all hon. Members who have taken part or intervened.

The east coast rail franchise has been one of the biggest success stories of railway privatisation, and I join all hon. Members who have taken part in the debate in paying tribute to the way that GNER has operated the route. Even some of its critics have conceded that it provides a pretty good service. Today we are witnessing a unique occasion, because I cannot remember any other debate either here or in the main Chamber in which Members of all parties with little or nothing in common have spoken with one voice in praising a rail operating company.

GNER has proved that the railways can operate successfully. It has combined the provision of a customer-focused, reliable and efficient service with profitability, as the hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso) said. In the past three years it has contributed £78.2 million in revenue to the Government and turned a £61.6 million subsidy in its first year into £22.5 million of premium payments back to the Government in 2003–04, which, as the GNER press office is only too happy to tell us, represents the largest swing from subsidy to premium payments of any UK train operator since the railways were privatised. The fact that nearly 50 Members of the House from all parties signed early-day motion 536, which has been referred to, speaks for itself.

Many people feel that there is a case for saying that in some circumstances there should be automatic franchise renewal for the most successful train operating companies. The Government should reflect on that, particularly where there is overwhelming public support and the train operator concerned has exceeded all expectations.

A number of hon. Members referred to the SRA. The east coast main line is, perhaps, one of the last franchises to be re-awarded by the SRA. The abolition of the SRA is one of the few parts of the Railways Bill with which my party agrees, because over the four or so years that it has existed it has demonstrated itself to be rather a waste of time and money. When the SRA took over, the Office of Passenger Rail Franchising cost £13 million and employed 187 people. The SRA costs £102 million and employs 454 people. The cost and the number of people that it uses have grown and it has become less and less effective, so we are delighted to see it go.

I am also delighted to see the SRA go because it has not, in the main, improved services. It has failed to give the railways adequate leadership and direction. Indeed, the reason the Government have given for getting rid of it is that they want to see more strategic leadership in someone else's hands. We welcome the fact that they have at last come round to the official Opposition's way of thinking on this issue.

One difficulty for our railways is that franchisees lack the confidence to invest. How will the confidence of operating companies be improved, however, if power is merely passed upwards to the Secretary of State?

The refranchising process is certainly causing concern among passenger groups and communities served by the route. The leader of Edinburgh city council, Councillor Donald Anderson, has raised concerns that the new franchise may lead to a reduction in services. He said recently:

"Although the SRA has argued that the new East Coast Mainline franchise will maintain the number of trains between Edinburgh and London as operated at the start of the last franchise in 1996, our calculations indicate otherwise. The new franchise will reduce service levels during Monday to Friday to 18 trains per day."

I hope that the Minister will be able to reassure the people of Edinburgh, and indeed Aberdeen and the other communities served by the east coast main line, that their services will not be reduced, but actually improved.

I also have concerns about journey times, a point touched on by the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine (Sir Robert Smith). If the Government are serious about wanting people to travel to places in the north by rail, rather than by air or road, journey times must be as short as possible. Before the Hatfield disaster, the fastest service from King's Cross to Edinburgh was, I think, three hours and 50 minutes. Under the new franchise, it appears that the average journey time will be significantly longer, at four hours and 42 minutes. For those who travel on business, that makes a big difference, and I hope that the Minister can tell us what the Government intend to do to bring journey times back down to pre-Hatfield levels.

For the railways to be successful, the train operating companies need to be encouraged to invest more in their routes. It is common business sense that they will do that only if they are confident that their investment is commercially justified. The best way to ensure that is to offer longer franchises. Graham Morton of the CBI agrees. Recently, he said:

"Franchises have been more successful where the operating company has had the scope to be entrepreneurial—Chiltern is probably the best example—and the franchise is sufficiently long for a reasonable payback on investment."

He has expressed concern that when the SRA's powers are transferred to the Department for Transport, the Government may not give companies enough freedom. He rightly questions whether the Department possesses the skills to design and deliver future franchises.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith expressed his support for longer franchises, and I am pleased that he is joining the ranks of the Conservative party, if only on this narrow issue. Longer franchises will mean that the best train operating companies receive steady and predictable revenues.

It is important to rid the network of political interference so that it can run itself without facing constant changes, as it has done since 1997; for example, the train operating companies should be given greater freedom over timetabling so that they can run extra services if they believe that there is demand. The network also needs investment directed at driving passenger growth where it is most needed, with an industry structure that is most able to respond to customer demand.

Hon. Members may be aware of the submission that the Rail Passengers Council made to the SRA when the authority published the invitation to tender for the franchise. Chief among the council's concerns was the poor quality of the stations on the line. The Conservative party has recently made a commitment to improve and develop railway stations so that more of them meet customer expectations. I hope that the Minister will respond on this issue, because passengers are increasingly concerned about the poor facilities, particularly at some stations. Will passengers' concerns in that regard be taken into consideration when franchises are awarded? What extra effort will the Government make to ensure that our railway stations are improved?

It will not have escaped the Minister's attention that the east coast main line passes through the constituencies of some of the most influential Labour Members. I know that some very influential Members are here today, but the line passes also through the constituencies of the right hon. Members for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) and for Tyneside, North (Mr. Byers). I hope that they are not going to exert a sub rosa influence on the awarding of the franchise. It should be completely free of any behind-the-scenes party political interference. It would be wrong for the franchise to be awarded to a company because the head of that company liked to be seen hob-nobbing with new Labour Ministers. If the voice of the public carries any weight, as it should, the firm view, as expressed throughout this debate, is that GNER should be re-awarded the franchise.

This is an important debate. The line is vital to the economy, not only for much of the north of England but for Scotland. Whichever bidder takes over the franchise—I am not aware of any reason why the present incumbent should not continue—I hope that the line continues to provide a high standard of service for passengers and to show others that our railways can operate in a way that is financially successful. We all look forward to hearing what the Minister has to say.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I suppose that I should point out that the east coast line goes through my constituency.

10.41 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Charlotte Atkins): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mr. Lazarowicz) on securing this debate and for providing us with the opportunity to discuss the east coast rail franchise. It has been an excellent debate, with hon. Members drawing on their own experiences of GNER and the east coast main line, as well as those of their constituents.

I start with a quick word on the north-south high-speed line. The Government want to draw on the useful work already done by the Strategic Rail Authority, and particularly to consider international experience. We are looking at the case for investing in high-speed lines, as compared with upgrading existing lines. That is something important for the future.

The east coast franchise provides fast, high-quality services that link London with Yorkshire, the north-east of England and Scotland. The competition for the new franchise is progressing well, and the SRA will announce the future operator in the spring. Hon. Members will appreciate that I cannot comment on the content of individual bids, but I can outline the objectives of the refranchising process and the specification on which bids for the east coast franchise were based.

First, however, I must comment on the tremendous support that has been expressed for the incumbent operator retaining the franchise—by hon. Members today and by the many passengers who have lobbied the Department for Transport and the SRA. It is appreciated that, in the main, passengers are satisfied with the present standard of service on the east coast route. However, the competition to refranchise the services will not jeopardise standards. On the contrary, by its nature it should spur improvements.

Sir Robert Smith: The Minister must recognise that passengers are satisfied with the standards of the operator which are within its control, but they are quite concerned about the infrastructure that the operator has to use, and about the importance of improving it.

Charlotte Atkins: I appreciate that, which is why the Government have invested hugely in the infrastructure, and why we are investing in the rail industry to the tune of about £73 million a week.

I am delighted that hon. Members expressed not only their confidence in GNER but their real ambitions for future improvements to the east coast main line. It is essential that the franchise is operated by the company offering the very best service to the public, within the parameters of the franchise. We therefore have a duty to put the inter-city east coast franchise out to tender. To do otherwise would remove the competitive pressure that helps to determine which company is best suited to providing services on the east coast main line. Competitive tendering is also necessary to ensure best value for taxpayers' money in the operation of the franchise.

Four parties have submitted bids for the east coast franchise. They are GNER; DSB, a consortium of Danish railways and EWS Railway; First London, Scottish and North-East Railways; and a consortium of Stagecoach Group plc and Virgin Group Investments Ltd. These parties have been chosen having pre-qualified under the SRA's set procedure. Bids for the operation of the franchise will be judged not only on price, but on commitments to performance, improving train and crew reliability, and operational viability. Contracts will also include clearly defined penalties should operators fail to fulfil their commitments. Each company's bid will be evaluated on its merits, and we will award the franchise to the bidder whom we feel best meets the criteria.

I should add that the new franchising system will take into account the relevant past performance of the company. That is part of the pre-qualification process. The franchise is being let in line with the franchising policy announced by the SRA in November 2002. That aims to deliver four broad objectives: to provide a safe and more reliable service of consistently high quality for the benefit of the passengers; to provide clarity of service specification so that the industry partners work together for passengers; to deliver a value-for-money service for passengers and taxpayers; and to secure accountable, viable operators who are passionate about delivering their service. I assure hon. Members that the franchising process will not disrupt other developments on the line.

The model has passenger interests at its heart. The selection process is far more robust than in the past. We will focus in particular on how bidders deliver against their promises. Costs will be scrutinised, and franchise agreements will not be entered into unless the SRA is certain that the bid is viable.

The specification for the east coast franchise has been drawn up following consultation with statutory and non-statutory consultees. It protects services to Aberdeen and provides for a term of seven years, with a three-year extension if performance is consistent with reassured by that potential 10-year term, which he mentioned earlier. It provides a clear specification, including timetables, against which the bidders have been asked to base their proposals. To this end, base specification for the franchise sets out some clearly defined goals: to ensure that services continue to be operated safely; to demonstrate passion about the delivery of commitments; and to improve significantly the punctuality and reliability of services over the whole route. On journey times, the franchise includes a base case timetable, but the operator can add extra services and stops, so the journey time will largely be down to the successful bidder. Other goals are to provide services that are significantly more affordable to taxpayers and passengers alike by improving productivity and efficiency, or through innovation in operational or managerial practices; to improve integration with other modes of transport and other services; and to ensure the quality of the station and on-train environment, including improved accessibility.

The high-return option is designed to obtain ideas from experienced train operators about ways of improving returns from the franchise. It is not simply about cutting standards, but includes other options that would generate increased income by attracting more passengers to what will be a better service.

John Thurso: Does the Minister accept that one of the great successes of GNER has been the very high-class business class that it provides, with its restaurant car? That has had the effect of taking passengers, particularly from Newcastle, away from air travel and on to the railways, a modal shift that is to be welcomed. Will that continue to be taken into account?

Charlotte Atkins: Certainly, competition with air is a vital part of the whole process. Shifting passengers from air to rail will tap into a completely new market and improve take-up of the service.

The Strategic Rail Authority will pay particular attention to proposals aimed at the affordable improvement of station, rolling stock and customer service standards. The successful bidder will have to possess the financial strength and innovative capability to improve existing operations and to make the route one of Europe's leading railways. In developing their proposals, the bidders have been encouraged to consult local stakeholders directly and to provide a summary of the consultation and a statement of how stakeholders' opinions have been taken into account.

Improving the punctuality and reliability of services will be a key feature of the new franchise. The SRA intends overall performance to reach 90 per cent. by the end of 2009. Furthermore, the franchise should be performing consistently in excess of 90 per cent. by the end of 2012. The bidders for the franchise are required to include a performance model that indicates how those targets will be achieved.

A base service specification will also be incorporated in the new franchise. The franchisee will be required to operate the existing timetable from the commencement

Mr. Lazarowicz: The Minister has rightly pointed out that the specification includes a base service, but if an operator suggests improvements to the base service, will that be taken into account in the franchising process?

Charlotte Atkins: Certainly, it is important to consider what the bidder can bring to the overall service when deciding whether that operator will be successful. After a bid succeeds, several timetable alterations are assumed, which are aimed at enhancing performance and improving the match of capacity and demand.

Bidders were free to suggest enhancements to the base timetable which they believed deliverable and desirable. They were also asked to set out how they will plan services and resources to minimise overcrowding on platforms and on trains. A strong emphasis has been placed on service quality. The successful franchisee is expected to provide a service quality appropriate for long-distance rail travel. The franchise will include a series of key performance indicators that will incentivise the delivery of consistent standards for information provision, ticket retailing and customer service.

The successful franchisee is expected to provide stations with an accessible, welcoming and comfortable environment that offers passenger information and amenities appropriate for long-distance passengers, including luggage assistance. As hon. Members have said, stations should also facilitate easy interchange with the services of other train operators and other modes of transport. The bidders were also required to provide proposals for rolling stock which set new standards of performance, liability and presentation. As a minimum, the rolling stock fleet must be able to provide seating capacity equivalent to, or in excess of, that of the current fleet. It must also operate at up to 125 mph and have a better reliability rate.

Infrastructure enhancements are being made outside the scope of the franchise. To date, no business case has been made for electrification beyond Edinburgh, but the franchise operator is required to consider improvements to the entire route.

Mr. Luke: The Minister makes the point that, as yet, no business case has been made for electrification north of Edinburgh. Will the successor to the SRA undertake to ensure that we can have a proper debate about whether the service will be worth while?

Charlotte Atkins: Electrification is continually being considered, but its advantages over other innovations are not as great as they were. That issue is, however, constantly kept under review.

The SRA is sponsoring the delivery of the new double track chord at Allington, scheduled for completion by the end of the year, which will help to improve the performance of the line. Other infrastructure enhancements are being considered through the east coast strategy that is being developed by the SRA. The strategy is currently under review, awaiting the outcomes of the rail White Paper. The document will also have to be reviewed following the selection of the successful applicant for the new inter-city east coast franchise to ensure that it is consistent with the detail of the successful bid.

In conclusion, I hope that I have provided some assurance that the refranchising process is a positive one aimed at building on and improving the current service. The east coast main line is a vital route for the millions of passengers that it carries each year. Those passengers can look forward to a reliable and high-quality service for many years to come.

Health Services (Hartlepool)

11 am

Iain Wright (Hartlepool) (Lab): I am delighted to have secured this Adjournment debate. I see the future of health in Hartlepool alongside the town's economy fulfilling its potential and the putting in place of measures to eradicate crime and antisocial behaviour from our streets as the main improvements that I hope to achieve as the town's MP.

Although the debate is about the future of health services in Hartlepool, I should like to spend a few moments outlining the broad historical trends in health in the town. I am a huge believer in the concept that we do not know where we are going unless we know where we are coming from. Hartlepool suffers greatly from its legacy as a centre for heavy manufacturing industry and from decades of economic decline. Industries such as the steelworks and the docks have left their mark with diseases such as asbestosis and respiratory illness. We as a town have suffered from decades of economic decline as the traditional industries have died. Unemployment has savaged the local population, which is only now beginning to recover.

Although the past decade has brought improvements in Hartlepool's economy, we are starting our renaissance from a very low base. Car ownership, a key barometer of economic prosperity, is low—40 per cent. of households in the town do not own a car, compared to 27 per cent. nationally. That should have, as I will show, a real bearing on where health services in the town are located. Despite recent improvements, we still have to contend with the health consequences of years of economic decline, poverty and social exclusion. This legacy means that Hartlepool people suffer more ill health and disability and higher death rates from cancer, heart disease and respiratory illness, and live shorter lives than people in most other parts of the country.

The facts are stark: I received these figures only yesterday, in response to a written parliamentary question. Life expectancy for Hartlepool men is 73.4 years, against a national figure of 75.9 years, while Hartlepool women are expected to live 78.4 years, against a national average of 80.5 years. We also lead unhealthy lives. Forty per cent. of people in the town smoke, and we have more than the national average number of cases of obesity caused by poor diet and excessive drinking.

The national health service is, arguably, the Labour party's greatest creation, and it has undoubtedly improved the health of people in Hartlepool. However, it is not improving as fast as that of people in other parts of the country, and health inequalities within the town remain profound. Half the people live in wards that are in the 5 per cent. most health deprived in the country. Stranton ward is 51st out of some 8,400 wards in the country for health deprivation and disability, while Elwick ward, the most affluent ward in the town, is still in the top 3,000 for poor health.

We should also take into account demographic changes. The population of the town is ageing: the number of people aged over 75 is expected to increase by 25 per cent. in the next 15 years. That is aggravated by a sharp fall in the birth rate in Hartlepool. The number of births has dropped by almost a fifth in a decade, which has exacerbated the decline that was particularly pronounced between the late 1970s and early 1980s.

This is the challenge for those who shape the future of health services in Hartlepool: a legacy of industrial decline and associated poverty; unhealthy lifestyles; high incidence of ill health; pronounced health inequalities; an ageing population and low birth rates, all of which result in profound pressure on health resources.

Our health has not been helped by a chronic lack of investment for decades in primary health care in Hartlepool. The unwillingness or reluctance of successive Governments to invest in this crucial first call when somebody is ill or in the prevention of illness has led to an undeveloped primary care sector, which has to contend with the most difficult problems. The possibility of attracting more money elsewhere, and the generally poor quality of surgery buildings has meant that we suffer from an acute shortage of general practitioners. Hartlepool is in the bottom 10 areas of the country for numbers of GPs—we need about 12 more to reach the national average, and a similar increase in the number of community nurses. Meanwhile, GPs' average list size is 2,100, the highest in any PCT area in County Durham and the Tees valley.

The problem exacerbates itself. High patient numbers lead to extra work and more stress for GPs, which accelerates their wish to retire early or to leave the town. An estate audit in the town found that five of the 17 GP premises in Hartlepool are in poor condition, with only six meeting the criterion for satisfactory. There is an acute shortage of space in those surgeries, and that hinders their development and potential to offer a wider range of services. Most do not comply with the requirements of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995.

The acute shortage of community doctors over the years has led to an over-reliance on the local hospital. Hospitalisation rates far exceed the national average, and the hospital's accident and emergency service is stretched to its very limits as people use accident and emergency because they cannot get access to a local GP or community nurse. The number of accident and emergency attendances at Hartlepool hospital has increased by more than 9 per cent. in the past year alone.

I have painted a dark picture, and I am not exaggerating. However, amid the gloom, there is real success. This Government have recognised the health problems caused by deprivation and invested heavily in the NHS. Funding year on year in cash terms for the NHS in Hartlepool since 1997 has been close to 10 per cent. The Government's commitment to providing health services as locally as possible strengthens the case that primary care in Hartlepool needs to be developed.

Despite the massive resources invested in our health service by this Government, there is a strong case to say that we in Hartlepool remain underfunded. The primary care trust has a shortfall of some £2 million a year from its targeted allocation; the NHS trust has a projected deficit of some £6.5 million to overcome. I am grateful to this Government, and sincerely believe that no other Administration would have invested so heavily. However, I am in Parliament to stand up for the people of Hartlepool, and I believe that the Government need to provide substantial additional funding to both primary and acute care to tackle the decades of neglect in Hartlepool. Health professionals would not squander this money; there has been real success in recent years, as I shall mention shortly. Just think what could be achieved with appropriate funding.

Foremost among the successes are the achievements of the local hospital. For the third year in succession, the North Tees and Hartlepool NHS Trust has been given a three-star rating. That means that over a long period, it has consistently been one of the best performing trusts. Only 12 trusts in the country have received that accolade for three years.

The University hospital of Hartlepool has been named among the top 40 hospitals in the country, and its clean-hospitals policy has meant that, unlike hospitals in other parts of the country, it does not suffer from accusations of being unclean or of suffering from germs. In fact, it is among the top 10 cleanest hospitals in the country. The "general", as it is known locally, is genuinely thought of with pride and affection in the town.

I know from personal experience what a marvellous asset it is. All my four children were born there. My eldest son's life was saved there when he was treated quickly for meningitis, and my youngest—only two months old at the time—was admitted last Boxing day, suffering from pneumonia and bronchiolitis. All that success is due to the tremendous commitment of staff of all grades at the hospital, which is ably led by Bryan Hanson, the trust's chairman. Their loyalty and commitment to health care for the town is arguably unchallenged throughout the entire country. That is why I think it understandable that the proposals led by the strategic health authority to downgrade or close the hospital have led to concern and alarm in the town.

A dedicated campaign to save the hospital has been organised by John Bloom. John stood against me in the by-election, and I disagree with many of his policies. However, I do not doubt his sincerity and integrity on this matter. He, and others such as Peter Wolfe, have put this issue on the agenda and have not hijacked it, as others did, for short-term political gain.

Let me make my position absolutely clear: I am adamantly opposed to the closure or downgrading of the hospital. In my vision for future health care for Hartlepool, I see the hospital as the major site for acute services between Sunderland and Middlesbrough. I see the hospital going from strength to strength and improving its capacity to provide all the services it provides today such as accident and emergency services, general medicine, surgery and neurology, orthopaedics, rheumatology, obstetrics, gynaecology and paediatrics.

I have been greatly reassured by comments from the Secretary of State for Health and the Prime Minister that the hospital will be improved, not downgraded, and I see Professor Sir Ara Darzi's review as an opportunity to ensure that Hartlepool can realise its potential as a major health hub between the River Wear and the River Tees.

I do not believe that the co-location of the Hartlepool and North Tees hospitals on to a greenfield site between the two towns will be conducive to effective health care. That would go against the Government's policy of ensuring that health care should be as local as possible, and would hinder the effective recovery of patients.

As I mentioned earlier, my son Billy was ill during Christmas, and my wife and I took turns to stay with him. He was visited by his grandparents and by other relatives. We are fortunate that we have a car. Further anguish could have been caused to us, over and above the fact that our two-month-old son was seriously ill, had we relied on public transport to an out-of-town hospital over Christmas, while ensuring that our other three children were being appropriately cared for. As I said earlier, car ownership is low in Hartlepool. The ease with which family and friends can visit has an important bearing on the recovery of a patient. That ease can be achieved only by having the hospital firmly secured in the town.

It is madness that where a town has an underdeveloped and relatively under-resourced primary care sector and a subsequent over-reliance on the three-star acute hospital, some senior bureaucrats wish to remove or to limit what the hospital does, against the wishes of the people. That is akin to a person having one healthy, muscular leg and the other one in plaster, and opting to amputate the healthy leg before the other one has healed—the person would soon fall over.

That is not so say that I want the hospital, and everything that it does to be preserved in aspic—never to change. Clinical improvements mean that procedures that previously required a major operation and recuperation in hospital for many weeks can be done as day surgery. Developments such as triage in accident and emergency treatment have meant that more people are seen more quickly and with suitable prioritisation. I want that trend to continue, so that fewer people stay in hospital and that they do so for shorter periods and recuperate in the familiar, comfortable surroundings of their homes. That will mean that a faster turnover of patients can take place at the hospital, which will help to produce shorter waiting lists and greater capacity for acute care.

I also want to mention the successes of Hartlepool primary care trust, because its objectives are a major vehicle with which to achieve my vision for health care in the future. It was formed only in 2001 and had initial managerial difficulties, but it has come a long way in a short period to reverse the lack of investment in primary care over the decades. The chairman, Professor Gerald Wistow, and the chief executive, Angela Hawkes, are putting in place the vision where people are treated as locally as possible, ill health is tackled and, as far as is possible, prevented, and state-of-the-art health buildings are located in all our estates and neighbourhoods.

The success of the PCT in a few years of existence is astonishing. In terms of smoking cessation, Hartlepool PCT's clinics have helped to produce a doubling in the number of successful quitters. Thanks to the PCT and its work in implementing its teenage pregnancy strategy, Hartlepool has enjoyed the biggest decrease in the under-18s conception rate in the north-east. Work is progressing to bring more GPs to the town, often from the international doctor market. Crucially, the PCT is investing, through the development of local improvement finance trust schemes, in new medical buildings in the heart of our estates in Owton, Rossmere, the town centre and on the headland.

[Iain Wright]

Those schemes are the foundation of the future of health in Hartlepool: 21st century neighbourhood health centres on each estate providing high-quality primary care and health advice to the local population, undertaking minor surgical procedures and being the first point of call for urgent cases, thereby relieving the pressure on the local hospital. For example, people in Owton go to their neighbourhood health centre for treatment rather than the accident and emergency department of the local hospital.

I am a passionate believer in the Government's policy of ensuring that health care is as local as possible. Given our historical health legacy, the PCT, in conjunction with the local strategic partnership, which I chair, understands Hartlepool's needs and is able to commission services to meet them. That is why I find it odd, and somewhat against Government thinking, that the local strategic health authority is pushing PCTs in its area to commit quickly to strategic commissioning, where commissioning for all Tees valley PCTs will be pooled under a Middlesbrough PCT. I am all for making savings and efficiencies through joint procurement of services, but there is a massive difference between procurement and commissioning. I cannot understand what possible benefit the people of Hartlepool will receive from allowing decisions about their health to be taken in Middlesbrough as opposed to in their own town.

One of the true success stories in Hartlepool in recent years has been the ability of different organisations to put aside institutional jealousy and place the needs of Hartlepool residents first. We are lucky in that the geographical boundaries of the PCT are coterminous with those of the local authority. More important is the desire to work together to improve the town's health. Joint commissioning has taken place, with joint appointments such as that of Peter Price as director of public health. Pooled budgets between the council and the PCT are already in place and, from next April, those organisations will jointly commission children's and older people's services.

That is the future of health care in Hartlepool: teams of doctors, nurses, social workers and home carers from a variety of agencies sharing information and using the same systems and procedures to tailor health care to residents' individual needs and requirements. It seems a shame that years of painful negotiation and hard work to secure partnership by those local agencies could be threatened by a blunt diktat issued on Christmas eve by the strategic health authority.

I want the partnering approach to be extended throughout the health network in Hartlepool. I want Housing Hartlepool to be part of that network to ensure that housing does not contribute to health problems. I want schools to teach children the benefits of healthy eating and I want supermarkets in the town to play a role in promoting fruit and vegetables and the benefits of a balanced diet.

In this demanding age, a one-size-fits-all approach is wrong, particularly for health care. The agencies in the town need suitable flexibility, and shared systems and procedures, to enable them to offer a personalised service as close to the home of the person concerned as possible, with the minimum of duplication from organisation to organisation.

The future of health services in Hartlepool is the realisation of our town's vision of care; it is services that are as local as possible, with an emphasis on a service to patients based on their individual needs; it is a multi-agency approach with a massively sophisticated health network; it is an adequately funded primary care sector, in conjunction with a responsive and fully funded acute sector, which allows community based health to be at the centre of the health service in Hartlepool while freeing the acute trust to undertake its valuable role. Only by realising that vision will we truly reverse decades of ill health in Hartlepool.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Miss Melanie Johnson): It is with pleasure that I respond to my hon. Friend's debate and congratulate him on securing it; I know that the subject is a matter of huge importance to him and his constituents.

I want to say a few words in response to his remarks about public health. Although I shall not say a lot on those topics, because I need to focus on the specific issues that my hon. Friend raised about hospitals and primary care trusts, that should not suggest—and I can tell that this goes for him too—that we give a low priority to public health, prevention and the Government agenda, which makes health care, and health itself, a top priority.

I concur with my hon. Friend's remarks about the importance of tackling health inequalities and obesity, and about the need to avoid over-reliance on hospital services by securing good services in a community setting. I am, in addition, pleased to congratulate the PCT and others involved on the drop in smoking brought about through the quitting smoking services, as well as on the teenage pregnancy figures that he mentioned. All those things are terribly important and we need to tackle them if we are to crack the issue of health care and health in the longer term.

To deal with some of the more specific issues, Hartlepool PCT, as my hon. Friend acknowledged, has received large allocations of £93.6 million in 2003-04, £102.5 million in 2004-05 and £112 million in 2005-06. Those amount to a cash increase of £26 million, or 30 per cent. over three years. That compares closely to the overall national average. It is slightly less, but by only a small amount—the figure is 30.27 per cent. compared to the national figure of 30.83 per cent.

The next round of allocations will be announced imminently, and I am sure that my hon. Friend will take a keen interest in that. That is in the context of record increases throughout the country, which means that there has been a big cash injection to enable many of the issues that he raised to be addressed.

I turn to the Tees service review and then the work of the PCT. To respond to my hon. Friend's point about where decisions are made, at the end of the day 75 per cent. or more of the money is received by the PCT. It is up to the PCT to commission locally the services that it feels are most appropriate for the people of Hartlepool. In that setting, responsibility has also been given to the strategic health authorities for running the NHS and running health in their areas, alongside the PCTs. In that context, my hon. Friend will remember the remarks that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health made last summer:

> "Hartlepool will still have a full and proper hospital service after the review has taken place."—[Official Report, 8 June 2004; Vol. 422, c. 312.]

I should like to assure my hon. Friend that there is no going back on that commitment.

In looking at how the services are developed for the future, the Department and all the strategic health authorities have a responsibility to ensure that the NHS not only provides high-quality care today, but will be able to provide it in 10 years' time. The service is not static; developments occur all the time, and possibilities for new treatments and new ways of doing things evolve, which is to the benefit of patients. We must ensure that our health service generally, and in Hartlepool specifically, continues to evolve in such a way that, as patients, we all get the best service possible.

The current review of services in the area north of the Tees is designed to ensure that. There are three elements to any possible change. First, primary care is the key to the future of the NHS, as I said. It is now possible to provide a wider range of care, including minor surgery, X-ray and other tests. I note my hon. Friend's remarks about high-quality facilities in all the communities around Hartlepool and the importance of providing services away from acute hospitals, which I have seen elsewhere and which are more convenient and often much more effective in a community setting.

The reason for the change is that providing services in primary care makes services more local for local people, who will be able to receive treatment and care in local surgeries and other facilities close to their homes. There are a number of benefits to that. I note my hon. Friend's remarks about car ownership levels and the importance of travelling. The changes can mean a lot less travelling and less pressure on the hospitals, and therefore shorter waiting times for those who genuinely need a hospital service that cannot be provided in a community setting. In line with recent announcements, it is also important that the care of those with long-term conditions be managed closer to home too. There will be better prevention of ill health by targeting people at risk, which is an aspiration that he and I share.

The second element is the need for all emergency services to work together more effectively. At present, there is often confusion about the best thing to do. People end up in an accident and emergency department just because they know that it is there and that it is open, but it may not be the best place for them in all circumstances. The right service may be advice from NHS Direct, or out-of-hours service in primary care or a minor injuries clinic. People need rapid access to the emergency service best able to meet their need. In that connection, I am pleased to report that the out-of-hours service in the Tees valley area has been operating smoothly since April 2004.

The third element is ensuring that local hospitals are strong and modern, and can give the best possible services available to all people north and south of the Tees. I acknowledge that change is always uncomfortable to contemplate and not always popular. People sometimes like to keep things as they are, which is most true of well loved local services such as local hospitals. It is absolutely understandable that the Hartlepool "save the hospital" petition was signed by some 30,000 people.

The job of the SHA—working with all its partners in health and social care—is to look ahead and put forward changes that will save tomorrow's hospitals by making sensible changes today. The hospital services have been changing for some time and they are still changing. As I have already said, some services that used to be provided in a hospital can now be provided in primary care. Other services need to be provided in fewer places so that specialist staff and facilities can be available to provide the best possible care. Some examples of such services are those for cancer treatment, emergency surgery and the most serious accidents. I am not talking about average attendance at accident and emergency, but really serious road traffic accidents and other dramatic accidents.

The decisions to create strong, modern hospitals have already been taken in other parts of County Durham and the Tees valley area. For instance, people living south of the Tees are already served by the James Cook university hospital, which opened in 2003. The purpose of the Tees review is to establish arrangements in the area north of the Tees that will provide the best and most sustainable services for the 21st century. The Department of Health invited Professor Sir Ara Darzi to work with the SHA on the review to ensure the highest quality outcome. The professor was asked to consider how the fullest possible range of services can be maintained at Hartlepool hospital in light of the work that has already been undertaken during the Tees services review and the wider context of the proposed provision of primary and secondary care services, both north and south of the Tees.

Two additional areas were identified relatively recently as needing examination, which is why we have agreed to look at the work of the Hambleton and Richmondshire PCT and the South Tees hospital trust in relation to the Friarage hospital, and consider the impact of the centralisation of specialist services at, and the capacity of, the James Cook university hospital on other hospitals in the area.

The original time scales were not realistic, so the review has been extended and it must be allowed to be carried out thoroughly and should report when it is ready. It is important that we provide people with safe, sustainable services that are local, where that is possible. I know that my hon. Friend will share that ambition. The local health service, with the assistance of Professor Darzi's review, is looking at how best we can do that. The professor is visiting Teesside in March and I understand that my hon. Friend is likely to meet him again then. Professor Darzi is likely to submit his final report in the following months and, as he is still reviewing the situation, I am sure that hon. Members will understand that I cannot make any commitments that pre-empt the outcome of the work that he is doing.

In the remaining minutes, may I turn to GP recruiting and the work that has been done on that? The good news is that, in September 2001, there were 49 GPs in the PCT area and the latest figure is 52, which is a 6 per cent. increase. I am aware that there are still seven vacancies and the PCT has employed eight salaried GPs to provide capacity where it has not been possible to attract principal GPs to practices. The PCT has been working with the strategic health authority to develop the international recruitment of GPs. Under the national initiatives, new GPs in Hartlepool will receive the higher rate golden hello payment, which can be up to £12,000. The PCT is also looking to develop modern primary care centres providing access to integrated health and social care teams, including all the specialist workers that my hon. Friend mentioned. It is also planning to use a range of other primary care skills to help deliver that. In addition, the PCT has recruited two GPs from Spain and one from Austria.

Nationally, there are more GPs in the NHS than ever before, which reflects the Government's record investment in primary care and commitment to expanding the GP workforce. In June 2004, there were 31,215 GPs working for the NHS, which is an increase of 11.3 per cent. since October 1997. There are a range of initiatives to secure ongoing, positive developments in that direction.

We know that people are concerned about health in Hartlepool and I reassure my hon. Friend that the Department of Health is, too. The strategic health authority and the local NHS organisations are also concerned. That is why so much has been invested in health and why we will keep on investing in health in Hartlepool, which we want to be modern and sustainable for the future.

National Health Service

2 pm

Dr. Richard Taylor (Wyre Forest) (Ind): It is an enormous privilege to have secured this debate, and I am delighted to see the Minister in his place. He will know from my dealings with him that I have no hesitation in supporting the Government when they are right and no hesitation in telling them when they have got something wrong.

I welcome the tremendous sums that the Government are putting into the health service and many of the reforms that they are introducing to ensure that that money has an impact. Those reforms include better services for cancer patients and cardiac surgery, the instituting of overview and scrutiny committees, the National Institute for Clinical Excellence and the Healthcare Commission, and the publication of "Keeping the NHS Local", which I welcome. However, I have no hesitation in saying where some of the proposals have gone wrong.

Today, I shall give my views as an ex-NHS consultant and one who is acutely aware of the patient's voice. Indeed, now that I am an MP, I am hearing the patient's voice as much as I did when I was a practising doctor. First, however, it is necessary to give a short history lesson to those who have not been around the NHS for as long as I have.

During the campaign that brought me into the House, I had to endure several nicknames. I was called a militant activist, as well as King Canute, although that is actually a great compliment, because King Canute was essentially a humble chap; he did not believe that he could prevent the sea from coming in, and sought to demonstrate that he could not do so. I was also called a medical dinosaur, and at the risk of justifying that title, I want to take hon. Members back a few years.

Right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House have implied that the choice initiative will give people choice for the first time. In his speech to the New Local Government Network, the Secretary of State said:

> "And for the first time, meaningful choice in the NHS is becoming a reality".

That is just not right. Before the period from the late 1980s to 1990, when the internal market came in, patients had absolute choice over where they were referred, and doctors had absolute choice over where to refer them. I always remember treating a patient with an extremely difficult muscular condition. At the time, the expert in muscle diseases—he is now a member of the House of Lords—worked in Newcastle upon Tyne, which was rather a long way from Kidderminster. Yet, I was able to get that lady to see that expert in Newcastle without any problem, either with contracts or red tape. So, that sort of choice is not new, although, unfortunately, the internal market put an end to it.

My views are reinforced by those of another chap who probably would not mind being called a medical dinosaur. Dr. Peter Fisher, the president of the National Health Service Consultants Association, writing in Hospital Doctor this week, says that in the > "days of carefree simplicity (pre-1990), the relationship between GP and consultant was a straightforward one, untrammelled by concern over contracts."

I would add that the relationship between the patient and the GP was also untrammelled by concerns over contracts, in whatever sense one uses the word "contract". Dr. Fisher asks the crucial question:

"Where is the evidence that this"—

the choice initiative—

"is value for money or what patients want?"

What does the patient really want? As we all know, patients are very aware of cleanliness in hospitals and the risks of methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus aureus. They desperately want clean hospitals and local hospital services—I know that as well as anybody—and for them to be well resourced. They are prepared to travel if there are long waits, particularly for elective treatment. It is unlikely that anybody ever has real choice on emergency admissions in any case, because they are taken to the nearest available place that can cope with them. The choice for patients would be to have that local service as close as is possible.

In this week's British Medical Journal there are references to a MORI poll that showed that 25 per cent. of people would be willing to travel anywhere in the United Kingdom for treatment by the NHS when there were long waits locally. The snag is that the survey was talking only about people with means of transport—people with their own cars.

To try to get a glimpse of what ordinary people want by way of choice, I turn to the letters page in The Guardian yesterday. A writer from Preston, who I checked is not a doctor and is not in the medical directory, describes choice as "the most absurd and obvious red herring . . . used in political debate . . . Surely what everyone should have access to is a universal health service that is equally good in all areas."

On the same page there was a medical opinion, with which I rather naturally tend to agree. A doctor wrote:

"Before we can start talking about choice, we should work on meeting some basic standards—high and rigorously applied".

There was an article in The Independent on Sunday written by the noble Lord Haskins, who used to be an adviser to the Prime Minister. He describes his own illness and his reasons for first choosing private health care, but later moving to the NHS when the service he needed was available on it. He pointed out that he had the ability to choose and that choice helped him a great deal.

I wish that Lord Haskins was still an adviser to the Prime Minister because he wrote:

"The person who is best placed to exercise choice on behalf of the patient is the GP, who, when practicable, does that at present. There is a strong case for strengthening the GP-patient relationship".

He condemned the Government's

"new, flawed consumerist policies for public health".

Lord Haskins wisely suggests that the Government

"should concentrate on what it has been doing successfully in the past few years—providing more staff, and better technology and improved facilities which are available to everyone, without undue delay."

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): The hon. Gentleman makes the serious point that choice will, in many circumstances, effectively be one that is taken on the advice of the GP. Is it not the case that more than two thirds of patients, including elderly people and those with mental health problems, will find themselves at an information disadvantage and will be unable to make an intelligent choice?

Dr. Taylor: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. I shall return to that point towards the end of my speech; he has obviously been reading the study showing that 65 per cent. of people do not have the advantage of choice.

I turn to the limitations on choice in the existing system. First, targets are centrally imposed; in the past, those targets had to be met in order to decide on star ratings. Such central diktats take away local choice, but that is in direct competition with the Government's laudable aim of devolution. Overemphasising targets is leading to problems for patients and reducing their choice. I shall give two examples—one general, and one local.

The general example is of NHS treatment centres. The centres were designed with a large capacity because it was recognised that separating emergency and routine work would offer hospitals better control of waiting lists and help to fulfil the aim of delivering routine care more rapidly. Probably for the right motives, the Government arranged huge contracts with treatment centres in the independent sector; the problem is that those contracts have to be fulfilled before patients can be allowed real choice about where to go, and people are worried that they will not improve quality. Primary care trusts are under pressure to use the independent centres; they thus have relatively limited resources available for use on the NHS treatment centres. I am sure that the Minister is aware of worries about the independent sector treatment centres—worries about standards of care, loss of training on routine matters for junior NHS staff, follow-up and the treatment of complications.

The local example shows how choice has been taken away by overemphasising the targets for cardiac surgery. Because the major centre for cardiac surgery in Birmingham could not meet the targets, the local strategic health authority ruled in its wisdom that patients from my part of the world, from the Wyre forest and south Worcestershire, should go to Coventry cardiac surgical centre rather than Birmingham. That would be all right if patients were given the choice of going either 50 miles or 20 miles. I can honestly say that both probably provide services of an equally good standard, but that ruling has been interpreted in such a way that patients and the local cardiologists are left with no choice.

I have to declare an interest; I know of that problem because a good friend of mine is involved. The distance to Coventry by the most convenient route is 51 miles, and to the Queen Elizabeth hospital in Birmingham it is 18 miles. In emergencies, the ambulance journey for my friend was 51 miles of agony. The only ambulance that could take his heart machinery was an old ambulance with archaic springing, and he had to lie upon an unsprung canvas stretcher. That is one example of choice being taken away from both clinicians and patients.

I turn to a second limitation on choice, the availability of services. The Health Committee has recently reported on allergies, palliative care and sexual health. Those reports all show limitations in the services provided—understandably so—but those limitations also reduce patients' choice. Even the choice of whether to die at home, which many people would like to be able to make, is limited by the amount of support available.

Another local issue is maternity care. The Health Committee produced a report in 2002–03 on "Choice in Maternity Services". The services that should be available are, obviously, home birth services, midwife-led birth centres, and a consultant unit. A recommendation in the report was that "given that pregnant women are not able to travel long journeys to give birth, if midwife led units are not available local choice is severely constrained."

The Government response accepted that, but rather hid behind devolution, stating:

"It is for local service developers to design services to meet the needs of their local population taking fully into account their views."

My feeling is that the Government will hide behind devolution when it suits, but impose targets that may cut across those local priorities.

Our birth centre was rightly closed after some unexplained and totally unacceptable baby deaths. The inquiry that looked into it exposed faults in that stand-alone birth centre that dated back to the loss of the acute district general hospital that previously supported it. Despite questions of safety at the time, the health service managers did not put the safety measures into place, with the consequences that have ensued. Stand-alone birth centres are safe and viable with the right protocols, as is demonstrated in "Keeping the NHS Local", which I have mentioned before.

Another factor that limits choice is the availability of staff. The Government are to be commended for their efforts to increase staff, and their success in some other fields of activity, but there are still huge gaps. I shall give two local examples. In the county of Worcestershire there is only one specialist available for a particular complicated but relatively commonly needed procedure. That specialist was called away on jury duty. Doctors used to be exempt from jury duty and I have no brief to recommend that for doctors as a group, but where a service depends on a single high-powered specialist it does not seem right that he or she should be called away to jury duty. There can be no choice in that case, because there will be no service.

Similarly, in my area we have only one specialist for essential biopsies of the prostate. When that specialist is off sick there is no service. That instance resulted purely from lack of co-operation and lack of a true partnership across the county, which I believe has been sorted out.

The last factor that I want to mention as limiting choice is another that I lay at the door of the Government; it involves magnetic resonance imaging scanners. There is spare capacity in MRI scanners in the NHS, but the Government have signed a huge contract with a private supplier and therefore the choice of the GP to use the local NHS scanner is eroded, as is the choice of the patient. The motive is bulk buying for cheapness, and that is certainly a consideration. I tabled a written question to try to find out what the savings would be, but, surprise, surprise, the answer that came back stated:

"The exact costs of the scanning and reporting procedure is a matter of commercial confidence."—[Official Report, House of Commons, 13 January 2005; Vol. 429, c. 611W.]

David Taylor: Does the hon. Gentleman agree with the chairman of the council of the British Medical Association, who was recently quoted as saying that the planks of the current reforms—patient choice, the inclusion of patient providers and the delayed system of payment by results—were in chaos and causing real difficulty for several acute hospitals?

Dr. Taylor: Payment by results has not yet been introduced, and I am not going to talk about it because it is something for the future, but it does carry immense threats to viability.

The fact that MRI scans are being contracted out to the private sector in large numbers again points to the Government's lack of awareness of some aspects of what goes on in the real world. MRI scan reporting is not as simple as reporting a pathology blood test. It is always an opinion, and it cannot be a one-way process. There must be input from the clinician, and he or she needs to know the radiologist to know to what extent they can rely on the report. Discussion often helps. Throughout my professional life, one of the most useful aspects of my ward rounds were visits to the X-ray department with juniors to meet the radiologist and discuss the scans. Obtaining a balanced view and a correct opinion were of immense benefit, to say nothing of the teaching opportunities.

I fear that the wholesale use of private sector MRI scanners is a false economy. It certainly removes choice. There are reports that University hospital, Lewisham has stopped referring patients to the private scanner services because of inaccurate reports and delays in reporting.

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon) (LD): I am listening carefully to what the hon. Gentleman is saying. Does he know the name of the private company supplying the MRI scanners, and whether it has any connection with the Government, who have contracted it in secret for a figure that we do not know because it is shrouded by commercial confidentiality? [Interruption.] I see that the Minister is sensitive about the subject.

Dr. Taylor: The name of the firm—Alliance Medical—is well known, but I do not know of any connections with the Government.

Much has been written recently about the low uptake of the choose-and-book system, about the doubts over what the necessary integrated IT system will achieve, and about GPs' doubts that they will have the time to operate it. I hope that the Minister will understand that I am trying to be helpful when I say that it is pretty impracticable to give people a choice of four to five providers. The GP is, and must be, the one who decides where a patient should be referred to. That is one of the crucial aspects of the GP-patient relationship.

I referred earlier to the King's Fund and Bristol university study, which was published in the British Medical Journal. The study showed that 92 per cent. of the population have two hospitals within 60 minutes' travel time. Other members of the Health Committee and I saw a demonstration of this really complicated choose-and-book system at the Department of Health. It reminded me of an intensive care unit monitoring system that I demonstrated to the public before the local hospital's league of friends bought it some 20 years ago. The model worked beautifully, but it did not work when we put it into the ICU and we had to sue the provider to get the money back. What we need instead is a simple system that would be readily available.

With two clicks of his computer keyboard or mouse, a GP could easily pull up on a single screen, updated every day, the specialty at the two hospitals within an hour's journey, the consultants in the field in which he was interested and the waiting times for those consultants. He could decide with the patient, which is his job, which of those the patient would like to go to. The appointment could then be made not by the GP, which takes time, but by the receptionist outside.

I move on to the way forward, because I am desperately trying not only to be critical. I cannot say that it is a real ambition because I do not think that I will ever become Secretary of State for Health, but if I were I would be tempted to investigate ways to abolish the market. People might say that that was going back years and it would not work, but, as I will not get into that position, at least it is unlikely that I will have the chance to suggest that. So, on to practical steps.

First, we need to recognise that virtually all clinical staff, nurses and doctors in the health service are absolutely dedicated to the NHS and to its patients and that there are some extremely good managers. If the managers are responsive to the people who work for them and to the patient groups who now have a voice, the health service could improve tremendously without the Government's interference. When we produced the Health Committee report on foundation trusts, we were staggered to find a list of major governmental reorganisations of the health service since 1982. Between 1982 and 2003, there have been 18 major reorganisations. We should leave the competent, capable, dedicated staff and their managers a bit of freedom to get on with things.

Secondly, I would remove targets. I welcome the Healthcare Commission's approach to assessing hospitals on standards to aspire to rather than on actual targets. I hope that they will continue to work for real ways of measuring health outcomes. Thirdly, I would sort out the potential conflict between the implementation of NICE guidance and of national service frameworks and local priorities.

Last week there were some dramatic headlines in the papers. On 3 February, The Times headline read "Patient power may close failing hospitals". What was meant by failing? To my mind, it meant failing financially rather than clinically, largely because patients are not allowed to choose the hospital that they would like. The money is channelled away by Government pressure on PCTs so that some of the work is done in the private sector. Contracts with the private sector have to be taken up.

On the same day, the headline in The Independent said that the Secretary of State was "ready to close NHS hospitals that prove unpopular." The Guardian had a similar headline, but reported comments from a Department of Heath spokesman that were very revealing. The spokesman said that the Secretary of State's "warning that hospitals might close referred to non-emergency treatment."

To me, that betrayed a fatal lack of understanding of the situation in the NHS by the Department of Health. If we take away entirely non-emergency treatment from an acute hospital, that hospital system will collapse. We can separate NHS elective care into treatment centres as long as they are integrated with the acute hospital, as a result of which the orthopaedic surgeons are kept in place. However, if we close down emergency services and lose them entirely, the hospital will not be viable.

I want the Department of Health to go out into the real world and talk to practising GPs, hospital doctors, managers at the coal face and patients' representatives. At present, there are some effective patient forums and patient organisations, such as HealthLink, which has carried out a study into the aspect of choice. I want the Department to talk to people with mental health problems, with long-term conditions, the elderly and the vulnerable because they are pretty much excluded from that choice, to which reference has already been made.

David Taylor: A moment or two ago, the hon. Gentleman was careful to distinguish between the concepts of clinical failure and financial failure. Does he agree that the real risk of the Gadarene rush into market mechanisms and therefore into the hands of the private sector could leave the NHS facing the fact that financial failure and clinical failure will be seen to be interchangeable and indistinguishable by the Government?

Dr. Taylor: That is exactly what the headlines in the newspapers are doing: confusing one thing with the other. It is a real risk.

Was there really a threatened revolt by chief executives at strategic health authorities against the second wave of independent sector treatment centres last autumn? Choice is certainly a laudable aim in the long term, but it is not the correct, immediate aim. To repeat the words of Dr. Peter Fisher in the leader of Hospital Doctor:

"where is the evidence that patient choice will deliver better health care?"

Patients want local hospitals that are clean and well resourced. The Government have actually put in the money to achieve that, if clinical staff, managers and patients' representatives were allowed to direct the money to where it is most needed, according to local priorities. If patients are to be given real choice, in the words of Dostoevsky, "What man wants is simply independent choice".

2.33 pm

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon) (LD): It is a pleasure to take part in the debate. It reminds me of old times when I was on the Front Bench. There is a Liberal Democrat Opposition day debate and other activities in the House today, so I kindly offered to help out on the Front Bench. I am pleased to see the Minister looking as cheerful as ever—yes, no smile.

[Dr. Evan Harris]

We should thank the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor) for obtaining the debate and giving us the chance to discuss many of the most topical issues in health care. He carried out a wide-ranging survey of some health care issues and placed particular emphasis on choice. I agreed with much of what he said, especially the need for all of us, across party, to identify how to ensure that there are mechanisms that give more choice, or give more control, as I prefer to describe it, to the patient that will improve quality, access and equity. Those are our three most important aims.

Choice or control is best viewed as a means to the end of obtaining a more equitable, higher quality, and more accessible health care system, with access leading to fairness and quality, too. There is too much rhetoric about choice and some of the mechanisms that are designed to demonstrate that the Government are seeking to maximise choice undermine the other end points of fairness, quality and improved access, particularly for the sickest patients who ought to have the fastest access. There is also a significant opportunity in setting up mechanisms that can be seen to raise the profile of choice as an end in itself, rather than as a means to an end. The hon. Gentleman spoke about choose and book, which is one of those expensive and time consuming mechanisms that have yet to demonstrate any advantage in terms of access, quality and fairness.

I do not believe that the Government are opposed to recognising that the key issues are improved access, a fairer health care system and a fairer burden of ill health—if that is the right term—and ensuring that there is good quality, but they are distracted by an obsession with trying to outflank the Conservative party to the right in respect of worshipping the mantra of choice. I should like to give a few examples of where their promotion of choice as an end in itself is damaging to what really needs to happen and to what we can say, given that we are in Westminster Hall and still some distance from an election, are ideals shared by all parties in terms of trying to obtain those three outcomes.

It is probably wise to start with choose and book, because that focuses the question on the opportunity cost. We should not be too critical of the NHS programme for IT. Clearly, there is scepticism about Government IT programmes, but if scepticism prevented us from doing things, we would never make any progress. The head of the IT project made it clear that he was aware of the record of failure on delivering big IT projects and was keen to ensure that the programme about which we are talking delivered the hardware and software. I recognise that big steps have been made. The flip side to that, which is perhaps inevitable, is that there has not been as much engagement with the health care professionals—not just doctors and GPs—that there might otherwise have been. That conscious decision was taken by the head of the NHS IT programme, because he thought that it was most important to get credibility by delivery, but it is not easy to say in retrospect whether that was wise, given that there is now a big need to engage with the medical profession.

The NHS programme for IT is seeking to do things as rapidly as possible in a catch-up way. The Minister will recognise that the remarks that I am making on this matter are not designed to be over-critical. However, the problem with choose and book is that GPs do not understand why the Government chose the numbers in terms of the range of choices, regardless of whether there was a question of access, or whether it was appropriate to provide choice.

I spoke to a GP in Bristol recently who could not understand why the other choice for cardiac care for his patients was in Winchester. It is not realistic that patients in Bristol will want to go to Winchester, especially those with the greatest health needs who will find it most difficult to operate that choice. Such people want to be near their families and treated near their homes. That GP was also of the view that there was a significant time requirement to use choose and book, which meant that he could not see as many patients as he needed and wanted to see and who needed seeing. He thought that the Government had not costed properly—had not even started to cost—the time impact of forcing people to use such a system in the surgery and were hoping that they would engage with it.

Clearly, there will be slowness during the pilot phase, if the system is to be piloted. I shall rephrase that; "pilot" implies that there will be an evaluation and a reconsideration. Do the Government think that, when people are proficient and the system is fully online, there will be a time cost? How will that be factored into GP work loads? The Government have done a huge amount to try to address concerns about GP work loads with the GP contract. It would be a pity to lose what has been reasonably successful, as far as these things go, in giving GPs the recognition that they wanted of their time-pressure issues. It would be a pity if the good will that emerged from that were put at risk by the imposition of a system that took a lot of time.

I should like to probe the Government on whether within this choice arrangement they will still provide the freedom of choice that GPs, and through them their patients, have for referral to a consultant or specialist of their choosing. I was interested in the hon. Gentleman's remarks on that issue. He was explaining that when he worked in the health service prior to the internal market—that was a little before I started working there—there was effectively freedom to refer to any specialist in the country through the GP. That was lost during round one of the internal market, which was introduced by the Conservatives in the late 1980s. The question is whether that still applies now. Will GPs and patients be able, outside of contracts, to go to consultants of their choice? It is worth exploring how the Government's new tariff-based system and payment by results affects how we judge whether there is an internal market at the moment. It is fair to say that the Government have created an internal market, and a better, more effective one than the Conservatives did, for reasons that are clear.

Under the Government's system, money will follow individual patients; that is the way it is set up. Under the Conservatives' system, whether by design or because of a problem with the system, patients followed contracts and there was very little in the way of incentives to get extra patients; the incentive was not to lose the contract. However, it is difficult to take huge contracts away from a hospital without that hospital going bust. We were rightly critical of the old internal market, and I do not understand why the Government refuse to call what they are doing a better, more effective market version of the Conservatives' internal market, a version in which the money—I have heard Ministers use the expression—will follow patients as hospitals try to attract extra work.

That must be a good thing for people who see the health service in that way. I am not sure that that is how I would like to see the health service in its entirety, but one can recognise that a system in which good work and attracting more patients gets more resources is an effective market. I cannot understand why the Government are not proud of the fact that they have improved on what the Conservatives tried to do. With practice-based commissioning, there has clearly been a return to GP fundholding, which the Government were proud to say they had abolished, even though they made large multifunds when they created primary care groups.

I ask whether there will still be patient choice because in my Oxfordshire constituency we have been told that the mechanisms for choice, in reference to the large contract that has been awarded to an independent-sector treatment centre for cataract operations, will be called managed choice. I do not know whether that will be managed choice, massaged choice or pretend choice, but the patient referrals will go to a central PCT-run hub and be allocated to the treatment centre without the patients or their GPs having any say-so in the default situation. Patients will not be asked, "For your cataract operation, do you want to go to a car park near you in the next three months, or to the Oxford eye hospital?", but will be allocated to one or the other—most likely the treatment centre. I cannot understand how the Government dare to define that as choice, but I can understand why they are doing it.

The reason, as the hon. Gentleman said, is that those private sector treatment centres, and perhaps even the NHS ones, have an agreed amount of work sent their way. No money will follow the patient, but the Government have set up huge contracts, five years in advance, when the money has already gone, at exactly the same time as saying that they want the money to follow the patients. It is possible that no patients will be referred to the centres, but the centres will still be paid. They have to find the patients to follow the money.

I do not see how that gets over the problems of the Conservatives' flawed internal market, which the Government are rightly keen to criticise, for that and other reasons. I would therefore like the Minister to explain how he sees five-year contracts in advance of guaranteed work going to those treatment centres when he says that the issue is about the money following the patient and rewarding units for attracting more patients, rather than giving them a huge dollop at the outset.

I think that the Minister recognises that GPs do not have much faith in some treatment centres, particularly where there is a good-quality NHS service. I would be the first to accept that, in my area, not all the NHS services are good. However, there have not been complaints about either the quality of the service offered on the NHS for cataracts or failing to meet the three-month maximum waiting time target by the end of last year, flawed though that target is, as the NHS has indeed met it.

It is hard to understand why the system was imposed in the way that it was—it certainly was not a choice for the local population. In order to get the PCTs to sign the legal agreement, the Government had to guarantee that they would fund through the SHA the extra costs involved in patients not going to the private provider and sticking with the high-quality, easily accessible and fair service offered by the Oxford eye hospital.

The hon. Gentleman hit on another issue, which is that quality is not just about the here and now. We must find ways to ensure quality for the future. One of the key questions is how the Government see training being provided in independent treatment centres, which is done, I guess, to pass muster with the district auditor or the National Audit Office, at a rock-bottom rate. The centres cream off the easiest cases and do not have to do any training. Everyone knows that training slows down the process. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will recognise that from having medical students to train who slowed him down, even though they were probably not as bad as I was.

Dr. Richard Taylor: The hon. Gentleman makes a valid point. As more and more surgery is done at a day case level and in treatment centres, the integration of treatment centres with the acute hospital is vital, otherwise juniors will not receive the training that they need for the work in day-case centres that they will do when they become consultants.

Dr. Harris: That is quite right. Independent providers in my area now say that they are renegotiating and increasing their prices, now that they do not have the contract, to take trainees. It is certainly important that trainees are trained, but we are talking about a rush job, where the long-term situation was not considered. If the Minister can correct me on that, I will be interested to hear his comments. If he persuades me, I will revise my views, but I am describing what I have heard from people involved in training on the ground.

The rush to the private sector also seems reckless as to the unintended consequences. For example, I understand that a system called evercare has been introduced to the community system, again in the Avon area, which has involved the provision of community matrons. The system is operating on a pilot basis, although I understand that it has been rolled out before evaluation and that is not a pilot to me, but an early starter. Under evercare, a private health care company called UnitedHealthcare—perhaps the hon. Gentleman is aware of the company—will employ community matrons to assess patients, in particular regular attenders at hospital with more than two recent admissions, to see whether there is a way of keeping them at home. That is a laudable aim, but two negative points can be made. First, there is no evidence that it is cost-effective. That is why evaluation of these schemes is so important; Britain is not California for all sorts of reasons, even if the Minister wishes it was. Secondly, GPs say that all their H and G grade district nurses have been stripped out of the system in order to fill these posts funded by the NHS through this contract with a private company. Is that a sensible use of resources, and are the Government taking account of that?

[Dr. Harris]

These are genuine issues and questions to do with choice, and we come back to the fundamental question of what choice is for. If it is for improved quality, better access and fairness, it seems reasonable to try to use choice as a means of increasing access where there is a problem to do with waiting times or access to treatments—in isolated areas, for example. I have no ideological objection to choice being used in that way. However, in order to try to realise the mantra of patient choice in the NHS, the Government too often take control away from patients and GPs, and pick areas where there are not as large access or fairness problems as in some other areas. Even if one accepts that the Government's motives are right, it seems that they are operating the system in a way that enables them to say, "We are maximising choice, and we do not really care about evaluating how that has been achieved."

We need to be a little more rational and sophisticated in how we use choice to increase the control patients have over their treatment. We must recognise that that is not simply about a choice of hospitals. If it is about a choice of treatment, that is integral to the doctor-patient relationship; doctors have a duty to explain the treatment choices to patients. If the Government are saying that that is a problem at present because doctors are not giving patients an adequate choice of different treatments, they should say so. If they think that time is a factor, they should provide adequate time and space for clinicians. However, I do not think that the Government are saying that. They are using a geographical choice as a proxy for talking about a choice that already exists—the choice that patients and their doctors make together about what is the best treatment, regardless of where it takes place. There are far too many mixed messages on choice, and that confuses the issue.

In the run-up to the election, I would like the Government to talk more about fairness and quality, and to ditch some of the rhetoric around targets and choice. That often simply stigmatises parts of the NHS—often those parts with the highest work load or, because of the way the cake is divided, inadequate resources. Morale is already low in those areas, and it is driven lower by criticism on the basis that they are not meeting some of these central targets.

I hope we get some answers on what the Government's real position is on this, and I thank the hon. Gentleman for taking us through some of the situations that concern him in this important area of health care.

2.53 pm

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor) on securing a debate on this subject. I think that I can say on a non-partisan basis that it is a pity that we have not been better supported by our Back Benchers on this occasion. This is a crucial issue and I am sure that it will form a central element of what the parties talk about in the run-up to the general election.

I will be a little more charitable than the hon. Gentleman has been because, broadly speaking, the choice agenda is the official Opposition's agenda. It is our agenda because we believe it to be right in principle, and because we feel that, mechanistically, choice will drive up quality. On both counts, we support the general thrust of the Government in promoting choice in the national health service.

The hon. Gentleman, no doubt unintentionally, revealed in some of his remarks what one might call the patrician strand of NHS doctoring. I say that with the greatest respect, and I hope that he will not take offence. However, people now expect to be more closely involved in the decisions relating to their medical care and are, perhaps, less willing than they once were to be directed by "the system". The choice agenda is all to do with encouraging the patient empowerment that, going by his contribution, concerns the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris).

Mr. Harry Cayton has said, very eloquently, that patient choice is no gimmick. It changes people's lives, gives them control and improves the responsiveness of the NHS. With those words, I could rest my case and sit down. However, I shall not do that because I should like to ask the Minister about some aspects of choice. I agree with Mr. Cayton's sentiments; they are put extremely well in very few words. Choice drives up standards and responsiveness. I commend the Social Market Foundation report of September 2004, "Choice: the evidence", which poses a number of questions. Let me paraphrase three of them. It asks whether, when it has been offered, choice has been taken up—the answer is yes, but a support package is required in order for that choice, where offered, to be taken up; it asks whether the population that takes up the choice is socio-economically skewed, and it concludes that it is not; and it asks whether choice has helped to improve quality and efficiency and, crucially, answers yes.

The report bears close scrutiny, and I am probably doing it a gross injustice by summarising it. However, that is, essentially, what it says. It does not ask—I think that it should have done—whether health care professionals feel threatened by choice. The answer to that is probably yes. I would also say that the Government have not helped matters by, until recently, choosing to ignore health care professionals in going forward with the cornerstone of choice, the national programme for IT in the NHS. I shall deal with that in a few moments. I entirely endorse the comments that have been made about choice not being just between hospitals. It is between treatments and between specialists. As the MP for a rural constituency, I would say that people would, in effect, be choosing between, at most, two hospitals. However, they would also be choosing from a raft of specialists and, I hope, from different forms of treatment. For rural areas, the choice agenda will mean a great deal more than choices between hospitals. It will mean choices between specialists and between different sorts of treatment.

Mental health has been mentioned, but only once, in passing. That is a great pity. If I were to pick out an area of health care in which I felt that choice could be particularly useful, it would be mental health. Empowerment and choice are therapeutic. Lack of choice and lack of control are anti-therapeutic for many patients. That is probably why those who concern themselves with mental health issues, as well as patients, respond positively to the Government's choice agenda, and agree that it is right for the official Opposition to have at the heart of their agenda the notion of choice.

I encourage the Minister to say a little more about mental health in the context of choice. I say that in all candour. It has not been spoken of enough, and it should be. I fear that the right hon. Gentleman and his right hon. and hon. Friends do not appreciate that the NHS means considerably more than elective surgery. He might wish to take the opportunity to say a few words about how he thinks that his choice agenda will help those with mental health problems. I should also be grateful if he would clarify where we are with choose and book. Last month, the National Audit Office reported that only 63 patients had used it, although more than 200,000 had been expected to do so. Is the Secretary of State's expectation of 100 per cent. usage by the end of the year as ambitious as his plans for NHS dentistry were? Clearly, those have collapsed, with the result that my constituents have considerably less choice than they had eight years ago.

Will the Minister share some of the difficulties that the national programme for IT in the NHS is experiencing? We know that there are a great deal of problems, but, sadly, we have to learn about most of them from the redoubtable Computer Weekly, which has done a good job in keeping us up to date, despite the Government's attempts to bar its reporters from briefings. Why has it proved necessary, at this late stage, to throw bucket-loads of cash at primary care trusts in an attempt to bring GPs online and on message?

Last week, in a written answer to a question put by my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley), the Minister said:

"On 19 January 2005, my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State, announced a £95 million incentive scheme to recognise and reward the key role that PCTs will need to play in engaging primary care stakeholders and encouraging and supporting general practitioners to use choose and book." —[Official Report, House of Commons, 2 February 2005; Vol. 430, c. 995W.]

That seems sinister. How does the Minister anticipate that PCTs will use the £300,000 per trust to bend GPs to his will? We understand that NPfIT will deliver two things: the vestigial national spine, and choose and book, yet each choice booking so far has cost £52,000. The Minister should know that GPs are thoroughly fed up at having invested in kit and training that they are now told will be redundant. Crossing their palms with silver at this late stage is a poor substitute for carrying them along from the start. The slow and clumsy choose and book is becoming something of a laughing stock among GPs. The Minister is fighting a rearguard action.

Will the Minister clarify the Secretary of State's announcement last week that his choice agenda will cause some hospitals to close? I am sure that he will be keen to do that. The press are full of speculation, and a great deal of confusion has been caused. I have my own thoughts on what the Secretary of State meant, but it would be extremely useful if the Minister clarified those remarks so that we are left in no doubt as to what he meant.

The NHS Confederation points out that patients may well vote with their feet, but from specific departments and on elective procedures only. That is right. As others have pointed out, if elective hip surgery goes, trauma will quickly follow, which will, in turn, be followed by accident and emergency; that would spell doom for an acute hospital. What has not been pointed out as much is that critical mass is needed in an acute hospital for training and accreditation. If one little bit of that is lost, the whole edifice is lost. Insufficient thought has been given to that. Indeed, there is no evidence that any thought has been given to it in any Minister's utterance that I have heard. Perhaps the Minister can correct me.

I have no doubt that patients will vote with their feet. By and large, that will be a wake-up call to hospitals. I suspect that that is what the Secretary of State should have said—and that it would rarely result in the closure of an institution. Surely to goodness that is what he meant.

There has been mention of the way in which money follows patients, or patients follow money. I share some of the concerns raised, for example that the targets set by the Government to bring down waiting lists have resulted in contractual arrangements that will end up hampering rather than improving patient choice. Labour has set a target that 10 per cent. of operations should be carried out by independent treatment centres. That target is arbitrary, distorts patient choice and prevents NHS hospitals from attracting patients on a level playing field. Again, it would be useful to have the Minister's comments on that.

James Johnson of the British Medical Association is not a great fan of independent treatment centres. He claims that they are destabilising the entire hospital system. He blames the inability of the NHS to withstand surplus capacity, and claims that it is leading to a failure in plurality of provision. I shall press the Minister separately on that issue, but if he voices his thoughts at this stage, we might avoid correspondence of the protracted sort that we are currently having on NPfIT.

I finish, Mr. Deputy Chairman, with a few quick questions, and I would be grateful if the Minister could address them. NHS trusts are facing substantial deficits because of the sheer number of demands placed on them by the Government. Given his recent remarks about closure, would the Secretary of State consider hospitals in those trusts to be failing? Many of them are clinically excellent, and I offer the example of my very own Royal United hospital, Bath.

References to the choice agenda readily fall from the Ministers' lips, but that agenda is not appreciated by a sizeable portion of their own party, including ex-Health Secretaries. How will the Secretary of State deal with such people? That is not really any of my business; I am just interested to know.

Finally, the Government's idea of choice is restricted to a list of four or five hospitals, chosen by PCTs. Why will they not give that choice directly to patients and their GPs? Why is it restricted to bricks and mortar, and not extended to individual specialists and options for the range of treatment?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. John McWilliam): I might be a lot of things, but a Deputy Chairman I am not.

3.6 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Hutton): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor) on allowing us to have this important debate about choice and what it means. I congratulate all hon. Members who have made a contribution, because they have all raised perfectly fair and reasonable points.

As I listened to the debate, I was struck by the fact that, with one or two exceptions, most comments were confined to the issue of choice over routine operations or elective procedures. In recent years, the Government have rightly taken an important step forward on the issue by giving patients more choice over routine operations, and I shall obviously want to speak extensively about that.

However, the concept of patient choice goes much wider than simply access to routine operations. One should remember that 90 per cent. of all patient journeys in the NHS begin and end in a GP's surgery and that, fortunately, only a small minority of NHS patients need the services of a surgeon or specialist in an acute set-up. When we talk about choice, therefore, it is important that we try not to confine ourselves to the choice of hospitals, and the Government have certainly done that. Hospitals are only the tip of the iceberg, and we need a concept that goes beyond simply providing more choice about operations.

For example, it is important for primary care patients to have more choice, and we can deal with the issue in several ways. NHS Direct has been an important additional service for NHS patients; it is widely used, it is making a significant difference and it is saving patients' lives. Of course, there are people who criticise it, and I understand that. Most NHS services are criticised at the beginning for a variety of reasons: people do not like them and are not familiar with them. However, NHS Direct has proven its worth day after day because of the outstanding work that the nurses do in providing medical advice to patients who ring up. As we approach the elections—I am sure that we are all looking forward to them—we shall all want to look carefully at what the parties are saying about the future of NHS Direct. The hon. Member for Westbury (Dr. Murrison) said, quite fairly, that he had some questions for me, and we shall be asking him and his parliamentary colleagues about some of these issues.

On primary care, the walk-in centres have proved to be very useful. My daughter recently used one, and I have nothing but praise and tributes for the staff who run them, because they do a very good job. We shall shortly be expanding walk-in centres into new territory. There will be several GP-led commuter walk-in centres at some of England's largest transport hubs, bringing our services closer to where patients are. Commuters, in particular, are bound to experience serious issues in trying to access the services of their family doctor, because many of them get up early and come home late, and most of the surgeries will, sadly, be shut by the time they return home. So, we have to find a better way of taking our services to where the patients are, and commuter walk-in centres will be one way of doing that.

Another area in which we need greater choice is patient access to medication, and that could be at several different levels. For example, there is the issue of getting repeat prescriptions. By common consent, the process has been far too bureaucratic, and we have found some important ways through that bureaucracy. Improvements could, for example, also mean access to medications over the counter, on which we are making progress. We are the only country in the European Union in which patients obtain access to some of the new anti-cholesterol drugs, the so-called statin group, over the counter. That, too, is important. The Minister of State, Department of Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton), has been making progress with proposals for freeing up some of the restrictions on the location of new pharmacies.

Those are two important spheres of activity in which a flourishing debate about choice is needed, and there are others that hon. Members have raised today. One of those is maternity services, which the hon. Member for Wyre Forest raised in connection with his constituency, and another is mental health, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Westbury.

I agree that mental health is an area in which it is important for us to take a critical look at ways of expanding patient choice. The hon. Gentleman will probably know that the National Institute for Mental Health in England is considering, with patient organisations and groups, ways of expanding patient choice in mental health. Certainly, patients have been telling us that they want a greater range of choices about the services to which they gain access during times of illness and recovery. That is right and proper and I understand that the Department will, later in the year, publish a mental health discussion document on how we implement choice in local communities. I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House will look forward to that publication.

The focus of our discussion today has been choice over routine operations, and it has been quite an interesting debate. I am sorry that my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) is not here, because I received a strong sense from him that he was not an advocate of patient choice or any of the reforms that the Labour Government have implemented, even though they were all in our manifesto. However, that is a debate for another occasion.

The hon. Member for Wyre Forest began his remarks by describing a golden age in the NHS. There are only one or two people who can ever remember things happening in the manner of such descriptions; it has certainly not been my experience in 50 years of using the NHS that there was ever a golden age when I could see my GP and be bundled off on a train to see a specialist in Cheltenham, Birmingham, Manchester or somewhere else. On the occasions when I have needed to see a specialist I do not remember being given any choice.

The hon. Gentleman finished his remarks by saying that we should not be attending to that matter now—that there were other things to get on with and that choice was a longer-term aspiration rather than a short-term priority. I take issue with him about that fundamentally; he is wrong to say that we must make a choice between developing minimum standards and the higher-quality care that he argues—and I agree—is essential, and providing greater patient choice. I consider the latter an equal priority. To think that we can achieve only one, at the expense of the other, is to make a false dichotomy.

The hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris) made a characteristic good cop-bad cop speech, but seemed, on balance, to be in favour of choice, although I think that he wanted to reserve his position on the matter as far as possible. I do not have the energy today to make any cheap, below-the-belt remarks about the Liberal Democrats. However, it is striking that although one would expect that party, of all the political parties on the British political scene, to be in favour of choice, the hon. Gentleman has, in much of health policy, allowed it to be captured by a group of vested interests who are not in favour of reform at all. In the House of Commons in particular there has been a series of flip-flops from the Liberal Democrats about whether they are in favour of or against treatment centres, payment by results, or choice. There will come a time when they have to make up their mind about where they stand on the issues.

Dr. Murrison: I do not want to make cheap political points either, but does the Minister recall the famous remarks of the hon. Member for Cheadle (Mrs. Calton) in which she appeared to condemn foundation hospitals in this place while praising them to the skies in her constituency?

Mr. Hutton: I do remember that. It was one of the high points of the Committee on which we were engaged, but it was very much in line with most of the rest of her comments at the time.

Dr. Evan Harris: I am used to the Minister attacking me in my presence or absence, but when it comes to attacking my hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle (Mrs. Calton) in her absence, I should explain, if only to the hon. Member for Westbury (Dr. Murrison), that the problem that faces him and us in this place—it is the same in local government with the private finance initiative—is that you can disagree with the policy nationally, but once it goes through the House and is the only game in town locally, there is the question of whether you support your local community or local council in seeking to achieve the best for people locally, even through the perverted scheme that has been imposed by the Government. That is simply realistic. The hon. Gentleman can live in an ideological bubble rather than in the real world, and can imagine that there is no Labour Government doing these things, but practical politicians must recognise that Government policy imposes choices on us.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. When the hon. Gentleman says "you", he means me and no one else. I ask him not to get me involved.

Mr. Hutton: I do not want to be involved either, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Both hon. Gentlemen should conduct their exchange properly outside the Chamber.

The hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon made several observations about some of the reforms. At one point, he described practice-based commissioning as GP fundholding. It is certainly not that for three essential reasons: no price negotiation is involved in practice-based commissioning because we have a single national tariff; no additional bureaucracy or transactional costs are associated with it, because the primary care trusts will be responsible for the contracting process; and, most importantly, practices that take on the responsibility of practice-based commissioning will not have the additional top-up resources that GP fundholding had. GP fundholding was a genuine two-tier system in which some practices gained at the expense of others. No one will do that under practice-based commissioning. To set the record straight on practice-based commissioning, the Government committed themselves to it back in 1998, under the wise leadership of my right hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), in our very first White Paper.

On the subject of community matrons, UnitedHealthcare does not employ any community nurses; they are all employed by the national health service. The hon. Gentleman also referred to suggestions on how we should conduct our general election campaign, but I am sure that he will not want me to take any of them up.

We talked extensively about the ideology of choice. For me, choice is not so much an ideology as the right thing to do in principle, so I agree with the hon. Member for Westbury on that point. Many of us may have been struck by the words of Terence Leahy, who spoke at last weekend's debate, which was sponsored by The Guardian, on the future of public services. He said:

> "The ability to make a choice gives you power in your life. They may be small choices but they can add up to a sense of control and purpose. People draw tremendous self-esteem from being asked to choose—from being trusted."

That is absolutely right, and puts the essential argument very effectively for choice in the public services. Choice puts patients in the driving seat, and it requires providers to respond to the preferences of patients or public services users. It can also help to drive up quality and equity in access as well as the overall efficiency of the service. Those are very important objectives for the Labour Government. We do believe that choice can support equity in access and outcomes, and not destabilise them. I shall return to that point in a moment.

A point that may have escaped the hon. Members who expressed their concerns about choice is that we know that it is what patients want. Many right hon. and hon. Members often say that patients do not want choice, but the best way of finding out whether patients want choice is to ask them. That is precisely what we have done, but the hon. Members for Wyre Forest and for Oxford, West and Abingdon seem to have no recollection of the two years of experience of the coronary heart disease pilot on choice, the London pilot on choice and the work that we have done in the area of cataracts.

The number of patients who exercised the right to move to a different provider was very high. The figures are available on the record, so I shall not go into them today. We know from MORI poll surveys, the work of the Picker institute and many other respectable, bona fide organisations that patients want choice. Why should they not want choice? It is a defining characteristic of citizenship in a modern society. We have often characterised choice in this place as the ability to elect the Government. Well, fine. That is obviously a crucial plank of an effective democracy.

[Mr. Hutton]

However, matters go much wider and deeper than that. In every other sphere of our life, we, as informed consumers and citizens, expect to be provided with choice. Why therefore, when it comes to the public services, is there a desperate poverty of ambition that leads us to say, "No, we cannot have choice. It is too complicated. The patients will be confused. The services might be destabilised. Let us do what we have done for 50 years and tell people where to go to get their treatment."

As a social democrat—someone who believes in the value of public services—I do not accept that we can possibly build and sustain support in this country for public services if we believe that we must direct patients to certain types of providers, give them no choice about what they can receive and give them no control over what happens to them. We must challenge that system and giving patients choice does precisely that.

Another matter has been completely missing from the debate. We have talked about choice as though it were something new in health care in the United Kingdom. It is not. Leaving aside the argument about whether it has been in the NHS before, we know that, since the beginning of the NHS, some patients have had choice and they are the people who can afford to go private. Yet, here we are—a group of Members of Parliament who claim to support the public services and the NHS—saying that there should not be choice in the public sector, but that it is all right to have choice if people can afford to have better-quality care or faster treatment in the private sector. It is impossible to imagine anything less equitable than tolerating that gulf in which personal wealth determines personal health. That is completely unacceptable. I say without hesitation that it is right in principle and right in practice for us to look at how we can extend choice to the national health service.

Choice should not be confined to the few who have money. That is how things used to be. It should in future be extended to those who have need. That is a powerful message of reform. If we leave aside the argument about choice—there is an argument to be had about whether it is a good or a bad thing—we must understand choice in the operational sense.

What are the crucial elements in the debate about extending choice in the national health service? There are three essential pillars to expanding choice. First and most obviously, additional investment must be put into the health service because the second crucial element is extended capacity, so that we can allow real contestabililty between providers and give patients the real option of going elsewhere if their local provider cannot accommodate their requirements. Finally, as the hon. Member for Westbury drew attention to, we must give powerful, effective and timely information to patients and clinicians so that they can make informed choices about precisely where to go to receive treatment.

It is important that the three essential pillars of capacity, information and investment are all in place and lined up to support choice, which is why I take issue with the proposals of the hon. Gentleman and the Conservative party that we can have unlimited choice by the end of the year. We cannot do that because the necessary capacity will not be in place to make those choices effective. We could do that if we wanted to extend waiting times. I do not think that that is quite what the hon. Gentleman had in mind, but there is no short cut. We need capacity to exercise unlimited choice and the capacity will not be there if we want waiting times to be kept to a minimum.

The other problem with the hon. Gentleman's policies is investment. I do not want to argue about the James report and associated aspects. There will be a time and a place for that during the next few weeks. However, one aspect of the hon. Gentleman's policies is inescapable: if he wants to take £1.2 billion away from the NHS and use it as a subsidy for patients who can afford private medical treatment and want to go outside the NHS commissioning arrangements with the private sector so that they are willing to pay any price for operations in the private sector, that would take £4 million a year from every primary care trust in the country to use as an effective subsidy for private medical insurance. It would be the equivalent of taking £20 million from NHS patients in the hon. Gentleman's constituency to subsidise the cost of private operations for the rich. It is impossible to imagine how capacity plans, which are essential to allowing choice for the NHS—in other words, for the many—are to be met if money is taken away to subsidise the private medical insurance schemes of the well-off. That is a subject for future debate, and I look forward to it, but the hon. Gentleman has not a cat in hell's chance of winning it.

I looked at the Conservative party's website today—I look at it whenever I want to cheer myself up—and it shows the party's five priorities for the NHS. Strangely, there is not a single mention of the patient's passport. I wonder why. It is the Tory health policy that dare not speak its name. However, others are prepared to do it for them. We will certainly be talking about the patient's passport and how it comprehensively undermines the Tory party's bogus rhetoric on its commitment to the national health service.

Dr. Murrison: That was great rhetoric from the Minister. I look at the Labour party website, if only to see the latest iteration of the various posters. It is fascinating, and it seems to change daily.

I take the Minister back a couple of moments to choose and book. Does he share the view of the National Audit Office that, to use his words, there is not a cat in hell's chance of choose and book being up and running by the end of this year, as previously envisaged by the Secretary of State?

Mr. Hutton: That certainly was not the view of the National Audit Office, but I shall speak about the NAO report and choose and book in a moment.

Capacity, information and investment are the three essential pillars needed to construct a policy of choice for routine operations for NHS patients. They would all be compromised by the hon. Gentleman's proposals.

A number of essential operational mechanisms are also important. One is payment by results, which we have discussed extensively today. To those who follow the history of such things, it is interesting to discover, as I did recently, that back in 1950s Aneurin Bevan advocated payment by results as the right way to fund the NHS. It has taken us 55 years to get round to doing it. We shall start this year for routine operations and elective procedures. It is the right place to start, because that is when choice in the context that we have been using the word today is most likely to have an impact.

We have only touched the surface of the matter today, but choice needs to be supported. The hon. Member for Wyre Forest was right to raise the risk of overcapacity in the NHS. Incidentally, it is equally likely that all the extra capacity in the NHS will be used, which will pose a threat to NHS budgets. There are two risks—overcapacity and the overuse of capacity. That is why it is essential that we have effective practice-based commissioning alongside payment by results as an effective way for GPs in primary care to influence how resources are used.

Secondly, we need to use IT to the best of our ability to support patient choice. The choices that we are talking about are incapable of being properly activated or used unless GPs and patients have access to waiting times data, clinical quality data and so on. That is the information database that choose and book will eventually support.

Dr. Evan Harris: I did not mention my concern that choice has to be informed. Does the Minister think that the quality of data on outcomes available now is adequate—it is reproduced by Dr. Foster in his league tables of death rates, without patient stratification—or does he regret the fact that some of the better units and the better surgeons are often at the bottom because they treat sicker patients? Is that good information, or is it worthless?

Mr. Hutton: It confirms how difficult it is to portray the information sensibly. We have a large amount of data in the NHS. Every day, we collect information by the barrel load—about the clinical outcomes for surgical teams, surgeons and hospitals. It is often difficult to balance that raw data with the point rightly made by the hon. Gentleman. He referred earlier to concerns about access to specialist care; it is certainly true that in some of our specialist hospitals, which is where the more complex work inevitably tends to gravitate, surgeons often have to deal with the hardest cases. It is therefore not unreasonable to assume, on a like-for-like basis compared with surgeons doing less complex work, that their outcomes might look poorer. That would be a travesty of the real facts. That is why we are continuing to work with many medical organisations—the Society of Cardiothoracic Surgeons, for example, has led the way and I am grateful for what it has done—to enable us to present the information in a sensible, patient-friendly way.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Time is up. I hope that hon. Members will forgive me, but I have to suspend the sitting for one minute.

Sitting suspended.

Frenchay Hospital

3.31 pm

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): To some extent, I sympathise with the Minister. I notice that she responded to another half hour Adjournment debate earlier on health services in Hartlepool. She has to be an authority on all these matters. However, as she was brought up in south Gloucestershire for at least part of her childhood—I think that I am right in saying that—Frenchay hospital will be if not of greater interest then at least of considerable interest to her.

Frenchay hospital faces D-day on 14 March. On that day, the chairs and chief executives of the four primary care trusts serving Bristol, south Gloucestershire and north Somerset will gather, as will those of the two acute hospital trusts. Between them, they will decide where to go with the Bristol health services plan and, in particular, they will decide whether there will be a major acute hospital on the Frenchay site or on the Southmead site, perhaps with a community hospital on both sites.

In preparation for the debate, I rang the chief executive of North Bristol NHS Trust last night and asked her what I could say about the stage that the trust's decision making had reached. She said that no decision had been made, that the trust board would meet later in the month and that it would have a special meeting at which the decision would be made. I respect what she told me, but the worst kept secret in Bristol and south Gloucestershire is that North Bristol NHS Trust wants to site the acute hospital at Southmead rather than at Frenchay.

Thousands of my constituents and those of other hon. Members who represent south Gloucestershire are concerned that Frenchay hospital, a centre of excellence with a proud history, may be about to be "downgraded", to use the jargon. I will not say that it will be closed, because in the most likely scenario there will still be a community hospital on that site. However, it looks as though 24-hour accident and emergency and specialist advanced acute services will go.

I stress that it is not a question of the people of south Gloucestershire against the people of Bristol, because not only is North Bristol NHS Trust deciding what it wants to be its major site, but the Greater Bristol health community—to use those awful phrases—is deciding about provision over the whole area and has already decided that the Bristol Royal infirmary is a given. It is not a question of choosing between Frenchay or Southmead, but a matter of having the BRI plus one other.

The concerns of the people of south Gloucestershire will not be adequately addressed if the answer to the question of where the two major acute hospitals would be is that both would be in Bristol and none in south Gloucestershire, when the needs of the people of Bristol will be properly met by a high-quality acute hospital in the centre of Bristol. The needs of the people of south Gloucestershire would be properly met by a high-quality acute hospital in south Gloucestershire on the Frenchay site.

Although I disagree profoundly with the trust board and chief executive about their preference against the Frenchay site, I offer them some sympathy. The new chief executive has inherited a very large deficit, is in the process of trying to recover the organisation from a very messy financial situation and is dealing with payment by results, which is difficult for a relatively high-cost trust. It feels almost like permanent revolution in the health service so, to some extent, I sympathise with the pressures that the trust board and chief executive face.

Mr. Roger Berry (Kingswood) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman knows that I agree that Frenchay should be the site of the new so-called super-hospital serving south Gloucestershire and north Bristol. However, does he accept the view of clinicians in the Bristol area, which is that it is right to concentrate specialist acute services on fewer major hospital sites, while community services are expanded at the same time?

Mr. Webb: The hon. Gentleman, who is my constituency neighbour, will be trying later to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. He makes an important point: the advice from clinicians is that the three major acute sites within the Greater Bristol and south Gloucestershire areas are proving difficult to sustain. One symptom of that has been the pulling back of the 24-hour accident and emergency service at Southmead; operating three full-time 24-hour accident and emergency sites with proper back-up was proving unsustainable. Although I am not convinced that the wider public fully accept that argument, it is clear that we are getting that message from the clinicians.

I accept that many of these decisions are devolved to some extent. However, the money comes from central Government, the process will be signed up by central Government and central Government certainly has an interest in the consultation process.

The background to D-day on 14 March is an almost endless round of engagements, public consultations, public meetings and so on. The public do not necessarily discern the difference between an engagement and a consultation, but they are different from each other, and have happened at different points in time. Last month, the Bristol health services plan published a consultation report on the help-us-to-decide process, running to no fewer than 153 pages. One could not say that there had not been a lot of public debate. However, interestingly and rather startlingly, I read in the report that just 351 written replies had been received. I have to say that that number is pathetic for a big local political issue.

Public meetings were held that were attended by a total of 1,600 people, so the report is based on fewer than 2,000 responses. As those in the Chamber will know, just over a year ago, I delivered my own survey to every household in my constituency, to which I obtained more than 8,000 replies. It worries me that there were just 350 or so written replies to the Bristol health services plan consultation. On the basis of the 8,000 replies that I received, I have some authority to say what my constituents think. Very clearly, although they welcome the promise of additional community facilities, they do not think that that should be the quid pro quo for losing Frenchay; they are not in two minds about that.

What is the answer to the following question? I am thinking of people in the outer reaches of my constituency, Chipping Sodbury and the Cotswold villages beyond. If serious and acute accident and emergency services are to go from Frenchay, how long would it take an ambulance in the rush hour to get from Hawkesbury Upton to Southmead? I am not convinced that the times are credible, although they would be if the ambulance were going to Frenchay. However, the people of Southmead, who obviously and understandably want an emergency unit near them, will still be far more accessible to the Bristol Royal infirmary. If we want to cover the whole area with high-quality accident and emergency access, I am not convinced that two in Bristol and none in south Gloucestershire is the answer.

The primary care trust of south Gloucestershire did its own survey. Professional pollsters rang more than 650 people in south Gloucestershire, Bristol and north Somerset. What was astonishing was not that the people of south Gloucestershire overwhelmingly wanted Frenchay—I could have told the trust that for nothing; perhaps I shall take a cut next time—but that, on balance, the people of Bristol whom it rang wanted Frenchay as well, even though Southmead is in Bristol and Frenchay is not. This issue is not about Bristol against south Gloucestershire, but about how we can serve the needs of the whole area with what looks like being two acute hospitals, one of which is in Bristol in the middle. That is the question. Only the people of north Somerset marginally backed Southmead over Frenchay, although I assume that most of them would go into the centre of Bristol anyway so they would probably not care a huge amount.

In researching this debate, I came across something that shocked me. The North Bristol NHS Trust population projection is that by 2020, which is only seven years into the life of the new hospital, the Bristol population of pensioners, who are the people who will mainly demand access to the services, will rise by 2.5 per cent. and the south Gloucestershire population of pensioners will rise by 50 per cent. In terms of the provision of acute, high-tech, full accident and emergency services, how can it possibly make sense to shut south Gloucestershire's only hospital when the vast majority of the growth in population pressures will be in south Gloucestershire?

People advance many other arguments for the Frenchay site. The heliport is mentioned. It is not used often, but it is used. I do not know how people who need to be helicoptered in would cope with getting to Southmead, but I do not think that that would be practical. Many people feel that the environment of the Frenchay campus is more pleasant than Southmead. I should say that my children were born at Southmead and that my wife used to work there, so this is not about being anti-Southmead. I am simply saying that if there needs to be a major acute site to complement the BRI, there is much going for Frenchay.

The accident and emergency department at Frenchay is currently being upgraded, because the Southmead department is being used less. How many millions of pounds is that costing, and is it just for a few years before it gets shut again? What is going on there?

The North Bristol NHS Trust assumes that it will get permission to build thousands of houses at Frenchay; it will need to do that to make the sums add up. Will it get that permission? Bizarrely, it has merely taken a figure from the district auditor, but the council has not yet said for sure that the trust will get permission to build those houses. If that is what is needed to make the sums add up, and then the council comes back and says, "Well, actually, no, you can only build half that number," will the decision have to be revisited? Should that not have been sorted out before the decision was taken, rather than afterwards?

A second facet of this issue is the capacity of the new hospital, wherever it is. North Bristol NHS Trust, which covers Frenchay and Southmead, is struggling to cope. In 2002–03, 460 operations were cancelled; in 2003–04, more than 400 were cancelled; and, in the first half of this year, there have been nearly 400 cancellations. Since then, the Norwalk virus has hit both sites, and has caused considerable problems. They are stretched to the limit. I am sure that all hon. Members receive letters about operations being cancelled. I received one recently, in which a lady wrote that her husband's operation was cancelled ostensibly because a space was needed for an urgent case, but she subsequently discovered that the real reason was a shortage of beds. She said that the consultants and theatres were free, but there were no beds.

I am concerned about what the capacity is now, but the grand plan for this acute hospital is not for more beds, but for fewer beds. The argument is that the demographics mean that another 100 beds would be needed, which seems low, but that length-of-stay improvements—getting people out quicker—will save 336 beds. If that can be delivered without prejudicing patient experiences, it sounds great. However, premising new hospital build on the assumption of such vast improvements greatly worries me, because what happens if they are not delivered? Therefore, I wonder whether this is credible.

I will keep my remarks brief, as I want to leave a moment for my constituency neighbour, the hon. Member for Kingswood (Mr. Berry), to try to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. People will lose faith in these consultation processes if they express overwhelming opinions and are ignored. The report of the Bristol health services plan consultation for January 2005 stated that the views of the public, staff and other stakeholders count and will be taken into account. The people of south Gloucestershire have spoken loud and clear. If they are not listened to, that will make a sham of the entire consultation process. I hope that the Minister is able to ensure that they are listened to.

3.44 pm

Mr. Roger Berry (Kingswood) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I ask the hon. Gentleman to confirm that he has been given permission to contribute to the debate?

Mr. Berry: Yes, but I shall be extremely brief.

My constituents in Kingswood use all three of the acute hospitals in the Bristol area. They use Frenchay, which is the closest, and they also use Southmead and the BRI. The reason for that is that none of those hospitals covers the full range of acute services. Unfortunately, some of my constituents occasionally start at the BRI, then go to Southmead and end up at Frenchay.

There is a powerful clinical argument for reducing the number of acute hospitals in Bristol. The hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb)—I almost called him my hon. Friend, and he is a friend—made that point. Far too much money has gone into buildings, and not enough has gone into direct provision of health care. I support that part of the Bristol health services plan that is committed to moving to two specialist acute hospitals with improved community facilities. I am completely unhappy about the Cossham proposal, but this is not the time to talk about that.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the consultation exercise and the expressions of public opinion. The polling evidence suggests that 74 per cent. of people support the principle of having two acute hospitals in the area and improved community facilities. So three quarters of people support that principle, which means that one of the existing acute hospitals will become a community hospital and that we will be left with two acute hospitals.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman that a majority of people have expressed support for Frenchay. I will say no more than I support strongly the arguments for Frenchay that he has expressed, but the last thing that I want is inaction on this plan. We must make progress, and the basic principle that was put forward in the Bristol health services plan in relation to acute hospitals is absolutely right. I am glad that all three hon. Members in the Chamber with a direct interest in this matter agree on that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I used live in Stoke Bishop and work in Shirehampton, so I am not totally bemused by this debate.

3.46 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Miss Melanie Johnson): I was brought up in south Avon for about 10 years, so I am certainly not bemused by it.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) on securing this debate on the future of Frenchay hospital. I have listened to and appreciated the comments he has made today and I know how important the issue is to him and to my hon. Friends the Members for Kingswood (Mr. Berry) and for Bristol, North-West (Dr. Naysmith), who are both present. I had the opportunity to respond on this issue in March 2004 in an earlier debate. I should like briefly to pay tribute to all the staff in the local health economy, and I am sure hon. Members who are committed to the improvement of the NHS will join me in that.

Some important questions are raised by this debate and they will, no doubt, be raised by the consultation exercise. There are also some important issues for the local communities to address. We need to look at what we are doing for the future and think about how the services can best be configured to meet the health needs of the population – not just now, but in future, too. That is difficult. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman agrees and that we all recognise that hospital and community services need to change if they are to continue to fulfil patients' needs and improve access. Services cannot remain static for ever; they need to be responsive to needs, and if they remain static they do not serve the future needs of the population, which means patients. Let us be clear that we are talking about patients and the services that they receive.

This Government are committed to investment. There has been a large-scale investment in the South Gloucestershire primary care trust area, increasing from 6.6 per cent. to 7.2 per cent. between 2002–03 and 2005–06. That is a real-terms cash increase, leading to some £50 million extra going into the health economy. We also believe in modernising things and personalising the offering of services by getting closer to patients. However, we also need to consider how the specialist services are delivered, because that is important. It is worthwhile saying that for some services people want to go only to a specialised centre. If someone were the victim of a terrible road traffic accident, for example, they would want to go to a place where all the specialised work could be done.

I shall talk about local issues in a moment, and Frenchay hospital in particular, but we need to acknowledge the pressures and the fact that we have to increase the capacity and raise clinical standards, and that we need this radical re-examination. As I said when we debated the matter in March last year, the quality of the building stock at both the hospitals in north Bristol—Frenchay and Southmead—needs to be addressed. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree with that.

There are two major hospitals, both with accident and emergency services, plus the Bristol Royal infirmary in the centre of Bristol. Those hospitals are between four and seven miles apart. I do not want to enter into the debate about distances, because that is something for the local health economy to weigh up, but even going from Hawkesbury Upton to Frenchay is quite a long stretch, if my memory serves me right. The distances for people in rural areas are always going to be further and the truth is that these hospitals are clustered in the Bristol area, as I am sure the hon. Gentleman agrees. The services are duplicated and fragmented across the two sites in the north Bristol trust and across Bristol as a whole. That hampers clinical excellence and hinders close working with primary and social care services. There is a debate to be had about what the hon. Gentleman did not mention, which is how we get services closer to people. Not all those services will be provided through hospitals; indeed, some are better provided not in a hospital, but more locally.

The current situation means that there are difficulties, some of which the hon. Gentleman has mentioned, in complying with national standards for clinical services, particularly for emergency patients. I was interested to hear the remarks that my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood made about patients being transferred, even for A and E, between the sites, including children, cancer patients, cardiac patients and those requiring specialist care.

I trust that all hon. Members present agree that the status quo cannot remain and that more needs to be done. We have an opportunity to improve services, not spoil them. That way, the health and community services in the area can move forward into the 21st century, as we go to hospital only when we need to, rather than automatically in many instances, and the system is less focused on hospitals than in the past.

I realise that some of those in the public debate, including patients, have not caught up with some of the changes where they have occurred. I know that from talking to people where a service that was previously provided in a district general hospital is now provided in a community setting. I saw an instance of that on a visit to Luton not very long ago. People are enormously welcoming of the fact that they now have a service for which they previously had to cross town, to go to the Luton and Dunstable hospital, but which is now provided in a walk-in centre in their neighbourhoods.

Those are the sorts of things that offer scope for modernisation and change. Biggest is not always best. We need to recognise that patients want more, not fewer, local services. We need to focus on redesign, not only relocation. We are talking about a complex series of changes that can and do improve services for the patients. That is the only reason for the change: to get a better offering.

Of course, centralising some services in larger hospitals works, but equally it is not always the answer, which depends on the service. The NHS needs to make innovative changes to open up access and widen patient choice. It needs to be able to deliver the care that patients need throughout communities when they need it. That opens up new roles and duties for staff and more options for change being discussed with patients.

I noted the hon. Gentleman's remarks about the consultation with patients. I also note that he was not a formal respondee, unlike a number of hon. Members in the area, but he obviously conducted the survey. I also note that six different options are still being considered, so it is not the case that there is one simple preferred model or even a couple of preferred models. Rather, a range of options is being considered.

As I mentioned, our policy is for PCTs to make such decisions with the local NHS trust and the strategic health authority. They must decide the NHS locally. I happen to be blessed with a limited amount of historical knowledge about the area in question. That is unusual, as Ministers do not always know and certainly Whitehall and Westminster are not where decisions about the configuration of such matters are best taken.

Mr. Webb: The Minister is very gracious to give way. I quite agree that the decision should be made locally. The Minister talked about patient choice, but does she not understand why, if large amounts of public money are spent on consultation and the patients in south Gloucestershire loudly shout one thing but the outcome is entirely different, they should be rather embittered and feel that they were never going to be listened to in the first place?

Miss Johnson: If people are shouting for particular answers, as it were, not everybody is going to get what they want. There is bound to be an answer whereby some people are not satisfied with the outcome initially. Whether they would be dissatisfied with it in the longer term is another matter. I am sure that those who close to Frenchay are supporting Frenchay and those who are close to Southmead are supporting Southmead. That might mean that people in Filton are keener to go into Southmead and those in Yate or Thornbury are keen to support Frenchay. Obviously, those who are closer to the hospitals will want to support them in particular, and will feel a close identity with them.

We need to step beyond that. That is why local knowledge and expertise is drawn in. The primary decision making is not at the centre, because it is not appropriate for Ministers to decide on the direction of travel in relation to how services should be configured, for the reasons I mentioned. We have made that very clear. It is right that the local NHS should do it. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will continue to work with the local NHS to build a better future for residents in his area.

Whatever decisions are reached locally after full and public consultation will have been made after much consideration and open debate. The fact that a large number of members of the public have engaged in the formal consultation and in the hon. Gentleman's consultation indicates that people are alive to the issues, they are engaged with them and they want to have the debate.

We do not always do ourselves the best service by simply making it an argument about individual sites, rather than considering the broad needs of the population and how responses to them are best configured. We do not always necessarily take the argument about the advantages of more community provision to people as powerfully as we might. Where I have seen that delivered on the ground, it has brought huge improvements. Patients are probably its strongest advocates. No matter who advocated it in the first place, patients are strong advocates when it happens on the ground.

I hope hon. Members appreciate that it would not be appropriate for me to comment further on this case; there is to be a local process and I could pre-empt any future ministerial decision that might be necessary. I would like to assure hon. Members that the Department and Ministers will continue to work with the local NHS to review the progress of the local economy and to ensure that the difficulties that are faced continue to be managed.

I want to emphasise that this is an opportunity for positive change. It is a time of huge investment in services. There are major advantages for everybody in the Bristol area in getting this right. There is a major opportunity for better hospital and community sectors to emerge from the process and for securing the services for the future.

Mr. Webb: I would not want the Minister to think that it is simply a case of saying, "I want the local hospital because it is nearest to me." Obviously, as she says, everyone will say that. I have tried to bring to the debate the demographic pressures on south Gloucestershire, to which she has not responded, and the complementarity with the one that has to be in Bristol anyway. Are those not substantive arguments and not merely a case of, "I would like it in my back garden, please"?

Miss Johnson: Those arguments have been made and are being heard in the debate that is going on locally in the local health economy. I am sure that they are being registered. I am sure that there are other arguments, which the hon. Gentleman has not mentioned, that might cut in other directions. As I said, where change is being argued for, there will seldom be a result that everyone is happy with. However, we are clear about why this needs to happen and I think hon. Members are clear about the advantages of its proceeding.

All of those involved in the local decision making and in the consultation need to work together to ensure that the outcome for patients in Bristol is an NHS that is fit for the 21st century. It must be geared up to respond to all the improvements and changes that the NHS is already experiencing. We will see more of them in the years to come. That will lead to improved health care outcomes for all patients and their families.

BBC Charter Renewal

3.59 pm

Mr. Iain Luke (Dundee, East) (Lab): I rise to raise some extremely important issues, both on a personal note and on behalf of constituents who have contacted me and many other MPs following the controversial screening of "Jerry Springer—The Opera" on BBC 2 on Saturday 8 January. For me, the issue is programming and standards at the BBC. We should debate the matter now, prior to publication of the Government's Green Paper, which will set the context for the next, and most important, stage of the renewal of the BBC charter later this year. I do not want to knock the BBC or to compromise its integrity, but I wish to put on record concerns that have been expressed by my constituents, and by other people around the country, who have been offended or upset by BBC2 management's decision to allow that programme to be televised.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): Accepting that the hon. Gentleman will probably give specific examples, can I raise at this early stage a principle on which I should be grateful for his perspective? Surely the BBC, as a public service broadcaster, has a duty to challenge—at least occasionally—what has traditionally been broadcast on television, especially given that nobody was forced to watch the Jerry Springer programme. Would he accept the school of thought that holds that such challenging programming is useful, not least because it prompts the kind of debate that we are having?

Mr. Luke: I understand the hon. Gentleman's concerns, but we must address the issue. Everybody who watches television pays a licence fee, and those who have been upset have as much right to have their views aired in Parliament as those who are not offended. I am raising the matter for debate because the Green Paper, which will be available next month, will set the context for the debate, and the issues will come into sharper focus as that debate progresses.

Those who have contacted me have a simple point: given that we are all licence payers, should not the views of the majority, common good taste and religious beliefs be considered when decisions are taken to screen such a show? Following the screening, on 13 January, I put a question to the Leader of the House, asking him to make the standard of programming at the BBC part of the charter renewal programme. His response was dismissive. He indicated that it was solely a matter for the BBC and that Ministers should not be interested or involved in the content of programmes. That response disappointed me. It also disappointed my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor), who, in a subsequent question that day, asked an additional question about further debate or discussion of the matter.

Let me say straight away that I am a strong supporter of public sector broadcasting, and an active member of the all-party BBC group. Last night, we attended a reception held by BBC Northern Ireland. I am also a member of the Select Committee on Northern Ireland Affairs. I am very interested in the variety of attitudes to programming that can be found across the United Kingdom. I continue to believe that licence fees are the best way of funding the BBC.

It would be wrong, indeed dishonest, of me not to indicate that the screening of the show has raised doubts in my mind, and in the minds of constituents who have contacted me. They have raised the point, which was reiterated by my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire, that they hope that it is not a trend under a new chairman of adopting the lowest common approach to improving ratings. I raise the issue in that context, in the belief that parliamentarians have a responsibility to make their views known, especially on issues as important as public service broadcasting at the time of the 10-year charter renewal of the BBC.

I hope that, in responding to the debate, the Minister—whose responsibility is for sport rather than for the media—will make clear the Government's commitment to ensuring that standards at the BBC are maintained and not debased. In tandem with the debate, I have written to the controller of BBC2, Mr Roly Keating, making clear the views of all who have contacted me. They strongly object to their licence fees being used to give airtime to a programme that mocks their strongly held religious beliefs and is seen by many as an affront to good taste. In the letter, I also make the point that "as a public service broadcasting organisation, more attention and respect should be shown to these strongly held views, especially when the Corporation and BBC2 as in this instance take such divisive decisions that offend so many."

The issue rumbles on. It is the subject of numerous official complaints—the largest number ever: something like 40,000—and a court action.

I felt strongly enough to write in those terms, because I believe that the BBC got it badly wrong and blemished its aims to "inform, educate and entertain" and "to serve everyone and enrich people's lives"

and

"to be the most creative, trusted organisation in the world".

That is why we must take time, as we progress through this year of charter renewal, to reflect on how those laudable aims can be safeguarded and promoted.

I believe that those points were acknowledged by Mr. Grade, the BBC's chairman, when he addressed a media conference in Oxford on 20 January. He highlighted the problems that I have raised today and pointed out that one of licence fee payers' strongest concerns is whether their money is being well spent. The response that I have had on this matter shows that many feel that it is not being well spent and that the BBC's core principles would be met by greatly increasing accountability to licence fee payers. In that context, unhappiness would be more strongly dealt with by a greater increase in accountability.

In his speech, Mr. Grade outlined the core principles —

"effective stewardship of public money; greatly increased accountability to licence fee payers; much sharper clarity of roles"— and balanced them against the need to retain editorial independence, which he says is a "non-negotiable" commodity. That puts the BBC board of governors in the highly sensitive position of having the ultimate say on what is acceptable and fit to be screened, whatever the licence fee payer feels. Such arbitrary decisions should be considered more closely. There should be more discussion on that in the Green Paper and, perhaps, more criteria against which the BBC should operate its programming.

The real litmus test that should be applied when taking screening decisions are those set out in the December report of the Select Committee on Culture, Media and Sport, "A Public BBC". At page 48, paragraph 197, it states that the BBC's annual report should "include a clear statement of what it needs to do to fulfil its public service remit, providing added value compared to other broadcasters."

That theme was developed by the BBC in its contribution to the charter renewal process debate, which is entitled, "Building public value", which was published in June, in which it defines its key role as aiming to "maximise public value" to broadcasting, and voices its hopes that that will become the touchstone for all its services and activities. My constituents' view would be that "Jerry Springer—The Opera" fails to fulfil either of those criteria: it neither provides added value in comparison to other broadcasters, nor maximises public values.

I agree with the recommendations in the Select Committee report, which looks forward to the charter renewal process. Recommendation 37 is that the improvement of accountability will be a crucial test for the Department for Culture, Media and Sport in its detailed proposals for its prospective Green Paper. It may also be a vital question for the future of public service broadcasting and the BBC's monopoly over the licence fee.

As I said, I was yesterday at the presentation of research put on by BBC Northern Ireland. It contains an article by Raymond Snoddy, the media editor of The Times, in which he sets out his perspective:

"Over the next two years the main debate will centre on how big the BBC should be in future and how much money it should receive from the licence fee. It is, however, extremely unlikely that the present funding mechanism will survive in exactly its present form."

If the BBC decides to promote such programmes more regularly, more and more people will question the need for monopoly of the licence fee by the BBC.

I have made it clear that I do not support that argument. The BBC should be funded solely by the licence fee, but it is an issue that must be addressed. We have talked about the goals of the BBC, about an inclusive attitude towards the programmes that it produces and about being creative and trusted. We must remember that if such programmes continue to be screened, the trusted and valued position that the BBC has in our society may be questioned.

As I was reading through the publication, I came across a small quotation on the back page—a final statement by BBC Northern Ireland about how it sees the role of the BBC. It is a small extract from one of Philip Larkin's poems:

"Reaching for the world, as our lives do,
As all lives do, reaching that we may give
The best of what we are and hold as true:
Always it is by bridges that we live."

If we are reaching the best of what we are, many people would think that "Jerry Springer—The Opera" perhaps did not reach that ideal.

I shall be glad to hear what the Minister has to say. I am not here to knock the BBC; I am very supportive of it. However, there is a need for a debate on this particular issue.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD) rose—

Mr. Roger Gale (In the Chair): Order. The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) has indicated a wish to speak. He cannot do so without the permission of the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Luke).

Mr. Luke: I am happy to give that permission.

4.13 pm

Lembit Öpik: I apologise to the hon. Gentleman and to the Minister for not giving notice, and I am grateful for their willingness to let me speak.

I wanted to make a few observations that require no response today. It would be inappropriate for me to ask that much under the circumstances. I am one of those people who has taken a great interest in the transmission of "Jerry Springer—The Opera", of which I admit I watched only a part. The hon. Gentleman has eloquently and clearly described the concern of many thousands of people. My perspective is in line with my view about public service broadcasting and the BBC itself. I agree that many people found the opera offensive, and others felt it inappropriate for the BBC to broadcast something of that nature. I take a different view. First, it is indeed appropriate for the BBC sometimes to push the envelope of what is broadcast. If it had not, I am not clear about who would have taken the initiative.

Secondly, it is important to allow the BBC what the hon. Gentleman alluded to: editorial freedom to make judgments about what is and is not acceptable for broadcast. One must be careful about binding decisions to the criterion of taste. If the programme had caused harm, or incited racial hatred or something of that nature, there would have been a powerful case to prevent its transmission. In my view, the broadcast did not do that.

Thirdly, even accepting and respecting the hon. Gentleman's sincere concerns—I look forward to hearing the Minister's response to them—we must be careful to protect the freedom and liberty of the BBC to make such editorial judgments on its own initiative. One could argue that people fiercely opposed to religion may find some religious programming offensive, but it would be unreasonable to use that as a basis to ban such broadcasts.

This is an important consideration. To the BBC's credit, its broadcasting of the programme has caused us to revisit the extent to which the BBC should be at liberty to broadcast such programmes. I support its right to broadcast such items as long as it does so with deep consideration of the potential consequences. I look forward to hearing the Minister's perspective on this valid and important subject.

4.15 pm

The Minister for Sport and Tourism (Mr. Richard Caborn): May I first congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Luke) on securing this debate and on the objective and fair way that he presented a case that he passionately believes in and which represents the views of many of his constituents? I also congratulate him on the way that he defended the BBC, even though he might disagree with it over this particular show. The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) had a different opinion and put forward his case well.

The debate comes at an opportune time. As my hon. Friend said, we will shortly be publishing the Green Paper on the review of the BBC's royal charter. It will be the result of an extensive round of public and industry consultation. More than ever before, licence fee payers have had a say in the review of the BBC's charter and in the future of the corporation—the keystone of public service broadcasting in this country. The review process has been conducted openly and has benefited from our transparent and constructive relationship with the BBC. The Green Paper is not the end of the story. We want to hear what the public and industry will have to say about the issues raised in it, and there will be opportunities for wider debate, including in both Houses of Parliament.

Since the start of the charter review process, we have been guided by three key objectives, which I hope will reassure my hon. Friend that we consider the interests of licence fee payers to be the absolute top priority. Those objectives are: a strong BBC committed to the highest quality programming and independent of Government and commercial pressures; a BBC with an unprecedented clarity of purpose; and a genuine sense that the BBC is owned by and accountable to the people who pay for it.

Our research has shown that the BBC is not only trusted, but much loved by the general public, who consider it to be the cornerstone of public service broadcasting. The BBC should be stable and strong, but flexible enough to adapt to the post-digital switchover world. It should continue to be the main player in public service broadcasting, but it must also face competition. The Burns panel showed that there is no credible alternative to the licence fee immediately available to us, but we will keep that under review.

All those demands place a considerable burden on the BBC's system of governance and regulation, and it is clear that the old structure is not adequate for the demands of a rapidly changing broadcasting environment. Indeed, I agree with the Secretary of State that the present system is unsustainable. For that reason, we welcome the recent publication of the final advice of the independent panel led by Terry Burns, which emphasises the importance of the separation of the governors' oversight and delivery functions. We also welcome the BBC's moves to reform governance from within, and its commitment to a more transparent, accountable and open system.

Our task is to take the advice, along with the many public and industry opinions offered during consultation, and to ensure that, by the end of the charter review process, we have a governance system that is founded unequivocally in the public interest. That system will be based on the principles set out by the Secretary of State, building on the work done by Lord Burns.

The BBC should consider a number of points. The system should be appropriate for an organisation built on creativity, and it should protect the independence of the BBC from Government but not from the licence-fee-paying shareholders. It should be genuinely open, transparent and objective, ensure appropriate accountability for public money, command public confidence and involve the public adequately in decision making, and provide adequate protection for those outside the corporation who might be affected by the BBC's activity—principally, although not exclusively, its private sector competitors.

In conducting assessments of impact, the BBC should use criteria that would allow direct comparisons with the rest of the broadcasting market. It should be clear about the distinction between governance and regulation, and include arrangements that would support both. It should be clear about the respective roles of the executive and non-executive, and embody such clarity in ways of working. It should incorporate effective mechanisms for audit and complaint handling and be flexible enough to adapt to change in the wider broadcasting market. I suppose one could put that down to future-proofing.

I assure my hon. Friend that the Green Paper will cover other issues that directly affect licence fee payers. In many cases, those issues were raised in the consultation and through our research as areas where the public would like the BBC to improve its performance. The first issue is spreading the benefits of the licence fee more fairly across the United Kingdom. I have no doubt that my hon. Friend will agree with that, coming, as he does, from one of the more northern parts of the UK. I do, as far as Yorkshire is concerned. Another issue is the provision of a structure to ensure that licence fee payers get maximum value for money, and to improve the BBC's ability to achieve high benchmarks in the service that it provides and ensure distinctiveness and innovation.

Securing appropriate programme standards is a key part of the achievement of the high benchmarks that I mentioned in the BBC service. That brings me inevitably to the argument over the screening of "Jerry Springer—the Opera", in which I know my hon. Friend is particularly interested. The reaction from some viewers to the programme, which was broadcast on 8 January, highlighted the importance of a robust and transparent BBC system to ensure that programme standards are upheld. The Government believe that the system should sit within a framework that protects free speech and freedom of artistic expression.

My hon. Friend may be aware that the Government received several complaints about the programme, many suggesting varying types of censorship. My response to those complaints is the same as that of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport and, indeed, my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Arts. Some people have been offended by the programme, but that is what happens when we have free speech. I, and the Department collectively, believe that it is better to have free speech than to try to legislate against offending people.

The broadcasting organisations that regulate broadcasting are responsible for programme content. The Office of Communications, the Welsh fourth channel authority, S4C, and the governors of the BBC all have regulatory roles and are independent of Government. In addition, the BBC's governing instrument, the royal charter and the agreement, place broad obligations on the corporation, including some on programme content and standards.

Within that framework, the details of decisions on programme content and scheduling are matters entirely for the BBC, reflecting its editorial independence. As I have already said, the Government are committed to securing a strong BBC, independent of Government. I think that I have also shown that we believe it to be important that the BBC should be aware of the concerns of its viewers and listeners. It is the responsibility of the BBC governors to ensure that the corporation meets its obligations in the charter and agreements of 1996. Anyone who does not agree with the governors about programme standards can write to Michael Grade, its chairman. Licence fee payers can also complain to Ofcom on matters of taste and decency. I therefore assure my hon. Friend that the complaints procedure, and the mechanisms for upholding programme standards, will be considered as part of the charter review.

As I have said, the Green Paper will be published soon. We welcome as much feedback as possible. This has so far been the most constructive charter review ever conducted, and we shall ensure that that continues.

[MR. FRANK COOK in the Chair]

Nottingham East Midlands Airport

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Gilliam Merron.]

9.30 am

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Frank Cook): Before we start, I think it advisable to tell the Chamber that I am required today to apply a new ruling on procedure. We are debating today a local, rather than national, issue, although I am sure that national aspects to it will be mentioned. None the less, many Members will want to speak. The new ruling on such occasions is that the two Opposition spokesmen will have only five minutes each towards the end of the debate, leaving the Minister with 10 minutes. That will allow more Members with a local interest to make a contribution.

I understand that, at present, probably 10 Members will seek to catch my eye. I therefore ask all right hon. and hon. Members who seek to contribute to the debate to bear in mind the number of their colleagues who will be waiting to speak, not only in the contributions that they make, but in the interventions that they accept and the responses that they make.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): I begin by thanking you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for chairing this morning's debate; I also ask you to pass on my thanks to the Speaker for granting it.

You were correct, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in saying that we are debating a matter of great local concern. However, it is local not only to north-west Leicestershire, where Nottingham East Midlands airport is situated; I am delighted to see the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) here today. It is also a matter of huge regional concern, and not only to those who represent Leicestershire seats. I see to my left my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell). The hon. Member for Loughborough (Mr. Reed) is present in the Chamber; but I also see other Members who have a regional interest; the hon. Members for Derby, North (Mr. Laxton), for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) and for Broxtowe (Dr. Palmer).

I am pleased also to see the former leader of Manchester council, the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Stringer). You may not know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that Nottingham East Midlands airport is owned by the Manchester Airport company, a company that is owned by 10 or so local government authorities from Manchester and Greater Manchester. Needless to say, I am delighted also that the new Aviation Minister is here. Although she has not yet had the opportunity to visit Nottingham East Midlands airport, she had the benefit, when opening the Rearsby bypass, of learning at first hand what the people of east Leicestershire think of the current state of affairs and of the proposals to expand the number of flights in and out of East Midlands airport.

My right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) is a former east midlands Member of Parliament and a Leicestershire resident, so he knows at first-hand about some of the issues that will be raised today. He is also the shadow Minister for Aviation, and I am delighted that he is present. We are also blessed with the presence of the hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso). He has a more distant relationship with the east midlands but, on his weekly flights between Westminster and his constituency, he will have flown over our part of the country. Nevertheless, he is welcome, and I hope that he has an opportunity to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if only briefly.

I want to open up for discussion the subject of accountability. The three organisations that need to be held accountable to the people of Leicestershire, and particularly to my constituents, are the Department for Transport, the Civil Aviation Authority and the airport company. I suggest that the Department for Transport has been careless, to say the least, and recklessly disregardful of the interests of the people of Leicestershire and of my constituency in Harborough, in so far as it has a policy for expanding East Midlands airport.

I accept that the matter of East Midlands airport will have come across the desk of the present Minister and previous Ministers over the past few years. The Department for Transport produced a White Paper, "The Future of Air Transport" in December 2003 which, in part, dealt with East Midlands airport. At paragraph 9.23, it stated:

"East Midlands Airport has seen passenger traffic virtually double in 2002–2003, with two 'no-frills' carriers developing significant bases at the airport. It is now handling around 4.5mppa. Forecasts suggest that by 2030 it could attract between 12mppa and 14mppa."

The White Paper goes on to say that the airport

"is also the third largest freight airport in the UK, and is the leading UK airport for freight carried in all-cargo aircraft. It is the main centre of operations in the UK for two of the four major global express freight operators, and an important regional base for another. Forecasts indicate that East Midlands Airport could be handling as much as 2.5 million tonnes of freight a year, possibly more, by 2030."

The White Paper also says that the airport

"is situated away from the main centres of population, and a relatively small number of people live in the 57dBA noise contour. However, the projected growth of the airport would increase the size of the contour to include over 10,000 people. Moreover, the nature of the air-cargo operations means that many flights are at night, when background noise levels are lower. There is likely to be a large increase in the number of flights at night; our consultation document forecast that there could be over 60,000"

the Government's figure—

"cargo flights a year by 2030, and a substantial proportion of these are likely to be in the late evening or the night . . . The airport owners foresee a need for a second runway at the airport around 2020, regardless of decisions about runways at other airports. They project that there will be a shortage of runway capacity during late evening hours, when the last inbound passenger flights overlap with the peak period of arrivals by cargo aircraft. However, this assessment is based on higher estimates of traffic during these critical hours than we currently forecast at the airport, which impacts on the economic benefits of a second runway."

Dr. Nick Palmer (Broxtowe) (Lab): I am grateful to the hon. and learned Gentleman for giving way and apologise for the fact that I cannot stay for the entire debate. It is probably true that, at present, the airport impacts on relatively limited population areas, but that will change with the proposed new flight paths. In my constituency and others, significantly more people will be affected by them.

Mr. Garnier: The hon. Gentleman is right. I shall deal in a moment with evidence that a larger proportion of the population, certainly in our county of Leicestershire, will be affected by the new flight paths. Moreover, the numbers and frequency of aircraft coming in and out of East Midlands airport will continue not only to affect those who are currently badly affected, which might include the hon. Gentleman's constituents, but to aggravate or produce a far worse situation for my constituents and those of my neighbours.

We must bear in mind that my constituency is between 20 and 50 miles from the airport. The Government have concentrated their thinking on those who live within a close area around the airport. They have, in my submission, failed to understand that the aircraft that take off from the airport and come into the airport will damage the quality of life, not only of those who live in the vicinity, but those who live, work and try to sleep further away from the airport. The two new flight paths that the airport wants introduced and which the CAA gave permission to be introduced last July will cause massive environmental and pollution damage to areas well beyond the current official noise pollution area. People do not have to live within a mile of the airport to be affected by aircraft noise, or within five miles of it to be affected by aviation fuel pollution. I wish to speak, and seek accountability, on behalf of people who live well away from the airport but still within the region of it. The hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire will speak with great eloquence and force on behalf of his people.

The key to my argument against the Government is their failure to appreciate the needs of those who live that bit further away from the airport. The key to what we need and the protection we seek is to be provided by a remedy, which has existed since 1982, thanks to the Civil Aviation Act of that year. Under section 79, the Secretary of State has power to order the designation of an airport. So far, only three airports are designated under the Act; Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted. In 1982, they did not generate as much night flight traffic as NEMA—Nottingham East Midlands airport—does now.

NEMA is the acronym by which the airport is known. However, I say in parenthesis, as it were, that should people be concerned that a Leicestershire Member of Parliament is arguing about an airport named "Nottingham", Nottingham East Midlands airport is wholly within Leicestershire. My council tax payers pay for the policing of that airport. My local transport infrastructure is paid for by Leicestershire county council, in so far as that is the highways authority.

It is called Nottingham East Midlands airport, and so be it. I will not delay the debate by worrying about that. Its postal address is in Derby. Already, one can see that this is a confused picture, but it is clear that the airport is generating a great deal of public concern. Neither the Department for Transport nor the airport company is fully on board in understanding the public responsibilities that they have to the victims of the airport, and the CAA is not either.

That is not to say that the airport should not exist and that it does not bring economic benefits to the country as a whole, or even to the locality. Clearly, there are people who live in north-west Leicestershire, Loughborough, Charnwood and the city of Leicester who have jobs at the airport. The economic benefits of the airport are primarily for the wider economic benefit of the country; the freight-forwarding world and the wider economy. The economic and other disbenefits affect the people of Leicestershire. There is an imbalance of benefit and disbenefit. My constituents suffer the disbenefits without achieving the benefits.

Mr. Mark Todd (South Derbyshire) (Lab): The hon. and learned Gentleman touched on designation. I wonder whether he could answer a point that I have often raised. The various operators and the airport have operated within legitimate planning consents granted by North West Leicestershire district council—

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): And others.

Mr. Todd: And others, as my hon. Friend says. Should designation control activities move to a level below that operated by the existing operators at the airport, presumably they would seek compensation for interference in an entirely legal—as it is now—activity.

Mr. Garnier: I do not want to make a flippant point, but this Government have not had a good record in providing compensation for those whose legitimate activities have been banned. At the moment there is an imbalance of power and no equality between those who wish noise and air pollution to be controlled and restricted, and those who are doing the polluting. The Environmental Audit Committee—

Mr. Todd: That is not an answer.

Mr. Garnier: I have not yet finished.

Yesterday, the Environmental Audit Committee, under the chairmanship of my hon. Friend the Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth), issued a very strong report; the Government and the hon. Member for South Derbyshire may care to read it.

Designation is the best idea that I can come up with that would provide the protection required by my constituents and those of my neighbours. At the minute, the only control over noise and air pollution is the powers of North West Leicestershire district council as a planning authority, and it cannot be suggested that that council has the same economic power as the airport company. I have made the point before, but I shall make it again; I very much suspect that the annual turnover of the shop in East Midlands airport is better and bigger than the revenue budget of North West Leicestershire district council.

My own two local authorities—Oadby and Wigston borough council and Harborough district council—have revenue budgets of about £7 million a year. I do not think that North West Leicestershire district council's budget is more than £3 million or so more. Local authorities of that size simply do not have the financial or economic—still less political—clout to deal with the issue. More importantly, a planning authority can deal only with what is on the ground; it can control only the development of the buildings and the tarmac. It has no say on the amount of aeroplanes that fly above it; it has no say over the numbers of aeroplanes that chuck noise and filth from the back of their engines. Nor does the county council, whose government area includes the whole of East Midlands airport's real estate, have any say on such matters. It was not even consulted when the new flight paths were advertised and suggested about a year ago.

Furthermore, I am not convinced that the voluntary agreement that NEMA has perfectly properly entered into—its 10-point plan—is enforceable in any way that my constituents would recognise. It is monitored by a thing called the independent consultative committee. As I understand it, and the Minister will correct me if I have it wrong, the chairman of that committee is paid a salary—although not a huge one—by the airport. I fully understand that it is possible to be independent and yet to receive a salary from the very person that one is supposed to be monitoring; it is intellectually possible to achieve that. However, it is difficult to overcome the perception that there may be an absence of independence if one happens to be the paid, salaried employee—even on a part-time basis—of the very organisation that one is trying to monitor.

The independent consultative committee does not include anybody from Leicestershire county council, the biggest local government authority and the nearest economic force of any size to the airport company. I see that the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) has joined us. As I understand it, although Leicester city council has a far bigger revenue budget than those of the district councils in my constituency and that of the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire, its budget cannot come anywhere near the economic might of the organisation that I am discussing.

I want to see designation under the Civil Aviation Act, and I want to see that now. I want the Minister and her Secretary of State actively to engage their minds on the issue and come to understand what it is like to live in Leicestershire with a large, growing airport, whose specialisation is the movement of goods in and out at night; between the hours of 11 pm and 6 or 7 in the morning. You may not know this, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but the figures for 2003 demonstrate that there are more night flights in and out of East Midlands airport than at Stansted, Gatwick or Heathrow. Those airports were designated in 1982 or 1983, but ours has not been.

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): I hope that the hon. and learned Gentleman will come to the point that I wanted to raise. What does he expect from designation? As he knows, I live under the flight path, so I declare an interest. It is fine to campaign for designation, but does he want a full night-time ban as a consequence? As part of an informed debate, we need to know exactly what we mean by designating the airport.

Mr. Garnier: The hon. Gentleman knows full well that I am not asking for a total ban, which would be unrealistic and plain silly. The airport has a right to exist and to thrive, but it must do so only when it does so politely—I say that deliberately—and lives in harmony with its neighbours. The good neighbour principle applies not only to the law of negligence, but to the everyday work of any big business.

Let us suppose that East Midlands airport was a factory, making valuable goods that benefited the nation, including my constituents and those of the hon. Member for Loughborough, but the manufacturing process required it to chuck volumes of pollution into the skies through its chimneys. Would the hon. Gentleman and I expect that nothing should be done to control the pollution? No. Would we expect that factory to be allowed to continue to pollute the atmosphere, whether in the form of noise, toxic gases or any other antisocial pollution, without some control? No.

Would the hon. Member for Loughborough expect North West Leicestershire district council, a tiny financial organisation, to be able, on its own, to monitor and control that pollution? Would he expect an independent consultative committee, composed of people paid by that factory, to keep an eye on its 10-point plan? No, he would not. I ask him a simple question; why should not it be the same for an airport, especially one that already has twice the number of night flights that Gatwick has, twice the number at Heathrow and more than twice the number at Stansted?

I am delighted to have received the Minister's thoughtful and polite answers in correspondence, but she merely repeated the arguments advanced by her predecessors; the Minister of State, Department for Transport, the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. McNulty) and the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, the hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Mr. Jamieson). They also wrote to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), who supports my case, saying that local matters of this sort must be decided locally. I hope that I have exposed the futility and unreality of that argument.

As a Conservative Member of Parliament, I support the free movement of capital. I want a strong private sector and vibrant industry. I want my constituents to be able to travel abroad and I want this country's import and export system, by ship and by air, to work. I say that it is not reasonable to rely on North West Leicestershire district council's planning powers to control the growing leviathan.

So much for the Government. The Minister is also present to answer for the Civil Aviation Authority, but what is it? No one really knows. Is it a quango or a private company that is partly owned by the Government? Its nearest equivalent is the BBC. It is not part of the Government; it is funded by the "licence fees" of those who use the airspace. Its board and members are, to a large extent, peopled by those who come from the air industry, which is fair enough as they know what they are talking about. They know what is going on in the air, but they do not know what is going on in my constituency. They do not know what it is like to live in a village in rural Leicestershire and to have aeroplanes flying over their houses at night; all night, as the number of night flights will increase. They do not know what it is like to live in a part of the country where the ambient noise at night is more or less nil.

A group of which I am a supporter, ELVAA—East Leicestershire Villages Against Airspace—and its sister organisation, DEMAND—Demand East Midlands Airport is Now Designated—have used consultants to investigate the noise levels. The noise levels in my constituency and in the constituency where I live are very low indeed at night.

When a large freight aircraft is flown over these rural villages at night, the graph shoots up. The noise, Mr. Deputy Speaker, is the equivalent of someone using a vacuum cleaner by your ear as you sleep in your bedroom. I do not know what you get up to in your bedroom at night, but I dare say the prospect of having an aircraft flying over your head when you have been used to more or less total quiet would not amuse you. But it seems to pass by the people at East Midlands airport, the CAA and the Ministers at the Department for Transport. "Bad luck," they say. "This is called burden-sharing. Those who live in and around the airport have had to put up with the noise of the aircraft coming in and out over the last few years. Now it is your turn."

It is an argument, but not a very attractive one and it is made all the less attractive when it is said that fewer people will be affected. The county council has done the analysis and says that 60 per cent. more acreage of Leicestershire and approximately 20 to 30 per cent more people will be affected by the two new flight paths in and out of NEMA. So when the Government, the CAA and NEMA say, "This is a wonderful idea. We are going to damage the lives of fewer people, not more" they are, on the analysis carried out by the county council, wrong.

I would rather that the arguments were put forward on the basis of the truth than something short of that. Far be it from me to suggest that they are deliberately not telling the truth; I merely say that the facts suggest otherwise. It is inevitable that my constituents and those of my neighbours will be adversely affected. They are naturally and properly concerned that East Midlands airport, the CAA and the Department for Transport are running roughshod over their rights and interests.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): I was trying to see how the hon. and learned Gentleman would apply the principle of Donahue v. Stevenson to the operation of East Midlands airport. He raised the issue of neighbours and residents. Would he be surprised to know that although East Midlands airport held a consultation in Evington in my constituency, which borders on his, few people knew about that meeting and few attended until I had written to everybody? One of the problems with the consultation exercise is that people have not been consulted properly.

Mr. Garnier: The hon. Gentleman is perfectly right. Whereas two years ago East Midlands airport's attitude towards his constituents and mine was appalling, it is better now. The slope that it has to climb in order to get public acceptance of its case is so steep that I fear it will never recover or gain the reputation for good neighbourliness and for proper consultation that it should have had and it should have tried to have before it set out on this operation.

Since the bad old days of last year there have been roadshows in his constituency, in mine and in others. There have been meetings at the office of the previous Minister with officials from NEMA and affected Members of Parliament. There has been a display in the presence of directors of the airport company in a Committee Room here in the House. I fully accept that the airport is now, at last, trying to do its best to come across as a more friendly neighbour. But why does it not produce maps showing the full extent of the proposed flight paths, both incoming and outgoing, which come straight over the hon. Gentleman's constituency and mine? Why does it not, unless pushed and pushed and pushed, provide us with the raw data that we need? Why do the airport, the CAA and the Department for Transport not insist on that? Why are they reluctant unless made to do it? Why do they not behave with great candour and with frankness? It is much easier to deal with a person who tells the truth voluntarily than to have to extract the facts and information, like pulling teeth.

Because of that, everything that those organisations now say is filtered through the sieve of disbelief that my constituents and I, and no doubt the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) and his constituents, feel. That is a pity, because I dare say that there is a case to be made for NEMA and for the Department for Transport's inaction. But we are not hearing it, and when we do hear it, we find it extremely difficult to believe. That is not my fault, but I think that the hon. Gentleman and I know whose fault it is. It is up to those organisations to understand that we, our constituents and our constituency neighbours are not just displaying a nimby attitude.

This is a matter of national, regional and intimate local importance that the Government are failing to address, which the CAA, with all its imperfections and abilities, is failing to understand and which East Midlands airport—wilfully, I suggest—is being slow to comprehend.

I am acutely conscious that I have had the lion's share of the debate, but there is a host of other things that I should like to say that are critical of the Government, the CAA and National Air Traffic Services (En Route) Ltd or NERL. That is another strange body about which we know little and should know more and which should be accountable to us through this Chamber and the main Chamber of the House of Commons.

I should like to say much more about the quality control or noise control arrangements that East Midlands airport implements or does not implement. For example, in the last quarter of 2004, only one aircraft was fined for noise abuse, even though, as I understand it, there were about 170,000 air movements in and out of the airport either last year or the year before. Is it surprising that my constituents, and I on behalf of my constituents, are deeply sceptical that we will get justice from the Department for Transport, the CAA and NEMA, not least because all three organisations are wholly unaccountable to the people of Harborough, Oadby and Wigston and wider Leicestershire?

On that note, I urge the Minister to come back with concrete proposals to bring NEMA under some form of democratic control, and I urge all other right hon. and hon. Members present to try to understand the genuine concerns of the people of my part of Leicestershire, because those concerns will not go away until the issues are properly and adequately addressed by the three organisations that I have cited.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: To add to the comments that I made when opening the debate, 36 minutes of uncommitted time remain, and six right hon. and hon. Members are seeking to catch my eye. I ask them to bear in mind the advice that I gave earlier.

10.4 am

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): I congratulate my county colleague, the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier), on obtaining the debate and introducing an outline of the topic in such a detailed, comprehensive and exhaustive fashion. Although the keen interest in East Midlands airport of other Leicestershire MPs here today has come some years later than I would have liked, it is nevertheless most welcome.

Understandably, many local organisations and people have long been happy to experience the airport's undoubted social and economic benefits. Low-cost holiday flights and 8,000 jobs certainly contribute to the regional standard of living, but what about the quality of life for communities around the airport and the people who live under its flight paths? They also have needs, rights and views.

For too long, successive Governments have failed adequately to recognise the scale of unaddressed local problems. The voice of local villages has too often been drowned out by the noisy and powerful aviation lobby. Concern has turned to protest as night noise from the heavens has made East Midlands airport the neighbour from hell. Those of us who have been trying to hold the environmental fort for a decade or more welcome the recent reinforcements from the parliamentary cavalry in the east and the south of the county; they have not arrived a moment too soon.

At East Midlands airport, there are more than 80,000 aircraft movements per annum, of which more than 50,000 are scheduled air transport movements—ATMs—of passengers and freight. Approximately 17,000 of those take place at night, in the eight hours after 11 pm. That astonishing figure is set to quadruple by 2030.

In the past, expansion at the airport has been approved by central or local government, with no specific controls being applied to flying activities. There is no lack of ideas about what an enforceable framework for the airport should contain if it is to ameliorate some of the environmental downsides. Four years ago, independent consultant Rupert Taylor—no relation—published a noise review after North West Leicestershire district council asked him to recommend appropriate controls. He suggested a minimum reasonable framework, with seven constraints, but I shall mention just three; banning night movements by aircraft with high noise levels, limiting the annual number of night aircraft movements and a night noise quota.

To local campaigners, and indeed the district council, that framework, including the four measures that I have not mentioned, seemed to be a reasonable compromise, which struck a balance between the needs of the various parties; the stakeholders, in new Labour parlance. In 2002, however, the Secretary of State refused to apply those controls as part of a request by the district council that the airport be designated under the Civil Aviation Act 1982. At the same time, the airport suggested a voluntary package of measures to control night-time noise, which the Secretary of State accepted. The district council and residents groups regarded that package as inadequate and did not agree to it. However, let us move on a year or so.

In December 2003, in the White Paper "The Future of Air Transport", the Government supported the growth of night freight flights at East Midlands airport, but stated: "However this"—the expansion of air freight operations—

> "would need to be accompanied by stringent controls on night noise in particular and increasingly generous noise insulation and other mitigation measures. These measures should build on those applying currently."

The White Paper failed to quantify the possible increase in night flights, to define any acceptable level for night-time community noise, to estimate how many people may be affected or to suggest specific noise control or mitigation measures.

Now that the Secretary of State has rejected the workable, moderate and reasonable operational and environmental controls proposed by the district council, we have been left with the voluntary measures suggested by East Midlands airport to control night-time noise, which are regarded locally as cosmetic and unchallenging. Those voluntary measures include no safeguards as regards future increases in night-time noise. In 2003, the night noise contour was estimated at 8.3 sq km, and there is a proposal to allow the night noise contour and night noise to double by 2011. It is no longer sufficient for the airport to follow other airports in implementing night-time controls or to rely on established industry standards, which have often been established for daytime noise.

If the Minister resists our call for airport designation, I will still urge her to use her powers and her influence with the airport considerably to toughen the present voluntary framework and to put it on a proper, enforceable footing. The first item in the voluntary code is to encourage the operation of aircraft during the day, instead of the night, but that is weak and inadequate. As Melbourne Civic Society—it is not in north-west Leicestershire, but I commend its work—and others have recommended, East Midlands airport must ensure that the minimum number of aircraft operate at night. It is wholly unacceptable for the airport to continue to allow flights at night for any reason and by any aircraft. There should be clear criteria to govern allowable reasons for night flights and they should be incorporated in the airport master plan.

The definition of the quietest aircraft type should be based on absolute noise levels and should allow only the quietest aircraft on the quota count scale; that is, only

[David Taylor]

QC/0.5 and exempt. The Secretary of State has established that criterion for the daytime operation of a proposed new runway at Birmingham airport, but there is no justification for a more lax criterion to be applied to night-time operations at East Midlands airport.

I could cover ways of strengthening the other eight objectives of the East Midlands airport voluntary code, but others wish to speak and I can write to the Minister in more detail. All I say in closing is that local communities and those who represent them will not walk quietly away from the issue. Our clamour will eventually match and outdo that of the powerful aviation and airports industry, even though the Manchester Airport Group may be advertising today in The Guardian for someone who can schmooze parliamentarians.

We want the industry to succeed; it is important socially and economically that it does so. However, the lack of environmental controls means that the industry is flying straight into trouble. It should recognise that, as should the Government. We must respond to the requests for help from airport communities. I hope that when the Minister winds up, she will bring fresh ministerial thinking to the topic, as it is long overdue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Twenty-nine minutes remain, with five Members bidding.

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood) (Con): I shall try to keep to the implied quota that your mathematics offers me, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I want to focus my remarks exclusively on designation. I am not against the development of NEMA and I am not against air travel, either by passengers or by air freight. However, the core issue is that the Government—this is not a party issue, because the previous Government pursued the same policy—have, in effect if not in law, made a planning decision that East Midlands airport should be allowed to develop as both a passenger airport, which does not mark it out from other airports around the country, and a specialist centre for air freight, with the implied emphasis on night flying.

What is the business purpose of air freight? It is to get next-day delivery of urgent commodities elsewhere in the world, which implies a disproportionate stress on night flying, as compared with the air passenger business. I support designation because I see it as balancing the Government's planning decision, which has been taken in favour of developing air freight, with implied night flying, at NEMA.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier), whom I congratulate on securing this debate, quoted from the White Paper on airports. Paragraph 9.28 of the White Paper encapsulates my argument:

"we consider that the projected expansion of air freight operations at East Midlands should be permitted."

If that is not an expression of a planning opinion, I do not know what it is. The paragraph continues:

"However, this would need to be accompanied by stringent controls on night noise in particular and increasingly generous noise insulation and other mitigation measures."

I entirely agree with that line. However, when Ministers are asked whether they will designate the airport, to give the powers to act on the expressed opinion about the implications of developing night flying, they remind me somewhat of Pontius Pilate. Their response is to say that the issue ought to be dealt with by voluntarism, by the local planning authority or by someone else; anyone other than the Minister who made the decision to impose the noise constraints that are the subject of the discussion.

My pitch to the Minister is not to stand back from East Midlands airport, and certainly not to obstruct the development of air transport, which is an important part of a modern economy. Politicians make themselves look stupid when they appear to disapprove of something that the rest of the world regards as normal and probably desirable. Of course, the transport of air passengers and air freight has to be allowed to develop, but as my hon. and learned Friend said, that must happen within the principles of good neighbourliness.

In the context of a local planning decision, we regard it as entirely normal that the planning authority should make a decision about what is allowed to go ahead and, if necessary, impose conditions to make that planning decision as acceptable as possible to the surrounding community. The Government are making the fundamental planning decision on the development of East Midlands airport as a freight hub, but they are not engaging in the planning decisions that are intrinsic to the decision that they have made. The Government have made half a decision, but have not been prepared to face up to the consequences of the other half.

My argument is simple. I support the development of NEMA. I am not against the Government making the decisions— those are properly taken by Government, not the local planning authority—but I encourage them to take the whole decision, not just half of it.

Mr. Mark Todd (South Derbyshire) (Lab): I have two declarations of interest. First, I live under the flight path of East Midlands airport, and a lot closer to it than some of the hon. Members who have contributed. Secondly, I have spoken on this subject at considerable length and although I will not repeat the points I made, one of my speeches on the air freight sector led to the Industry in Parliament Trust allowing me to spend some time with an air freight operator, one of which operates out of East Midlands airport.

We should put into context the argument over designation. We have had some useful historical analyses of what has happened and heard that, for whatever reason, East Midlands airport has been given planning consent for its growth, with various operators being given planning consent to carry on their activities, which are dependent on night flights. For reasons that are not entirely clear, no proper conditions were imposed on any of those activities at the time. The Government are being asked to act as goalkeeper in the designation and say, "Well, someone's missed the ball several times in this exercise. Let's try to save it and put matters on to a better footing."

It is not surprising that the Government are saying, "Hold on, there is a bill to be attached to this activity, because if designation is to be meaningful"—the speeches to date have not suggested quite what that meaning is—"presumably it will imply constraints on planning consents that were previously thought to be exercisable without those constraints." If I were one of the companies involved, I would want to pursue that point with some vigour and associate costs to it. That is why I have always said that although designation would be nice, it is unrealistic and I cannot see the Government buying the argument.

The alternative is to focus on the mechanism that has been touched on in the White Paper, which said that we should have stringent controls on the operations of the airport. How are we to arrive at that? The Government have so far suggested that the airport, like others, should produce a master plan for its growth. I would firmly criticise the Government and, to some extent, take some of the points made by the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), because they have not explained the meaning of a master plan and how it is to deliver the sort of things that are being discussed when we refer to the words "stringent controls". What do they mean? How will they apply in law and how will they be used by those who may enforce those controls?

So far, that has not been set out. I have read the template for the master plan and although it is a useful, interesting document, it does not tell us about its substance and meaning in planning or enforcement terms. The Minister could help us all by setting out more clearly what a master plan means and what it will do.

I should like the master plan to contain a mechanism for moving towards chapter 4 compliance for all aircraft operating at night. DHL, one of the major operators at the airport, has recently modernised its fleet, which has made some impact on the complaints my constituents send to me. However, it is still the case that people are disturbed by night flights; I received a complaint about that yesterday from a person in the village where I live, and the aircraft was a DHL aircraft. There is a long way to go on that.

It is possible to narrow the flight paths. Modern aircraft can fly tighter tracks than those indicated by the airport, and we should try to make sure that they do so, because that might take them away from some of the population centres that are currently being disturbed.

We need a review mechanism of the voluntary code that is currently in place; that point has been taken up by others and was given ministerial endorsement, but what has not been addressed is how we say that that set of controls is now inadequate. We should have a mechanism that addresses the fact that, at a certain point, the growth should trigger a review of that set of controls and an acceptance that they are not adequate for the current purpose. I have attempted to get a response on that from previous Ministers, and I put it to this Minister now.

My next point is about a noise growth matrix, or a noise quota, as my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) said. We need some mechanism that deals with the question of those who ask, "Look, if you're going to increase freight traffic through the night, how will that then link to the noise that that generates? You should get a score for that so that there is an amount that you are allowed to have."

We also need a surface transport plan for that airport. If it grows at the rate that is being discussed, its current means of delivery both in and out—remembering that it is a freight airport—is wholly inadequate and needs rethinking.

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton) (Con): First, I thank my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) for securing this debate. We are all grateful to him for that, and those of us who work closely with him know that he has worked the hardest of all of us on this issue. The voters of Harborough will appreciate his efforts, as do local organisations such as East Leicestershire Villages Against Airspace, or ELVAA. Although Mr. Charlish, the main organiser of ELVAA, is based in my constituency, I know that he has worked very closely with my hon. and learned Friend.

The basic fact is that none of us is against the airport as such. We are not against the business benefits. However, we are against its uncontrolled and unrestrained expansion, given that it has no proper planning process at present. There seems to be no planning control beyond the buildings that go on the ground, and what we need is an understanding of what is happening in the air. In the absence of that, it appears that the only credible solution to this problem is designation; it is essentially the old chant of, "What do we want? Designation. When do we want it? Now." We do want it now.

Most of the relevant arguments have been covered, so I will focus on two allied and tangential points. The first of them is about the information that we are currently able to get on the state and pattern of existing flights, and the second is about policing. I look to the Minister for a constructive and helpful response today, because we were promised one before.

At present, if one of our constituents is woken up at 4 o'clock in the morning, they want to know where the plane was going. Was it going to or from NEMA, or was it unrelated to any flight patterns associated with NEMA? A former Transport Minister assured us that the facts would be given to us if ever we were to seek them. That has not happened. Let me explain what currently happens. If a constituent is disturbed, he will contact NEMA, whose normal response is, "Not me, guv." Then there will be an attempt to get some definite information about radar or flight patterns or flight schedules, and if NEMA says that the plane was not its, usually any inquiry will hit a brick wall. If we go to the Civil Aviation Authority, it will say it is not really its responsibility, and we are then referred to the National Air Traffic Services, which I think is based in a business park in Fareham or somewhere. It tells us that it only keeps radar records for a month, which is not very helpful when it takes five weeks to reply.

Therefore, we as Members of Parliament face enormous difficulty in establishing the basic facts about what is actually happening now. If a constituent is disturbed, is NEMA to blame or not? Where are the flights coming from and going to? My plea to the Minister is, if I dare use the word again, to designate a specific civil servant who can be a focal point for genuine and proper inquiries, who knows the system and who can give us genuine and proper factual answers. At the moment, in trying to find out the basic facts, we are getting the runaround. We do not like it, it is getting very annoying, and it needs a simple administrative solution.

Secondly, because NEMA is a growing airport, the police bill is growing with it. As my hon. and learned Friend explained, although the name suggests that it is a Nottingham airport, it is in fact a Leicestershire airport that also serves Derbyshire. It is something of a hydra-headed hybrid airport, serving the entire east midlands. Someone who sits on the Leicestershire police authority wrote to me saying that even after Home Office funding to cover anti-terrorist work, it still faces a bill of between £500,000 and £750,000 a year to police the airport. That figure is growing for reasons that we all understand. He also said that although his police authority has tried to get Nottinghamshire and Derbyshire police authorities to share the cost, they have not shown much interest. That is hardly surprising, but it places a disproportionate, unreasonable and growing bill on a hard-pressed police authority in Leicestershire.

So I have two specific points. The first is about finding out what is going on. There is a suspicion that aircraft personnel have a measure of discretion in the route that they take, and may choose to put their flight path over rural areas. At the moment, everyone thinks that NEMA is to blame, but let us have the facts. Secondly, designation would mean that the entire police bill would be covered on a national basis, as it should be for such an enormous airport as NEMA, rather than by one poor county where the airport happens to be based.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Thirteen unallocated minutes remain and there are two competitors.

Mr. Bob Laxton (Derby, North) (Lab): First, I do not have any comments to make about a particular local interest or complaint. The only interest I have is that I live probably as close as my hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) to the airport. It is approximately five miles away from where I live in the south of the city, and I have been disturbed on occasions by night flights at the airport. However, I am not under any political pressure from my constituents. I receive a small number of complaints from constituents living in the north-east of the city, and I am well aware that my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Margaret Beckett) receives a considerable number of complaints from her constituents living in south-west Derby.

However, although I do not have any specific complaints, I do not support the case that has been made for designation of the airport, and let me explain why. The hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) used the phrase, "That is not to say that NEMA does not bring economic benefits to the area." That is a gross understatement. There are huge economic benefits, not only for Derby, Leicester and Nottingham, but for the east midlands as well as the regional and national economy.

If right hon. and hon. Members have not already done so, they may find it an illuminating experience to visit Royal Mail's night-time operation out of NEMA. They may find it even more illuminating to visit DHL's huge complex at the airport, where they will get a good idea of the amount of small, high-value parcel traffic passing through that operation. Everything from parts coming in from around the world for cars that have broken down, to body parts—attached or unattached—and body fluids have passed through its operation. It is fascinating to see; anyone who visited DHL would be astounded by the level of activity. That activity is a job-creator and a regional economic regenerator, and will continue to grow as the airport grows.

As I said, I have some personal sympathy with the calls for the airport to be a better neighbour than it has been hitherto. There are clear signs that it wants to be a better neighbour. The hon. and learned Member for Harborough said that his local authority was not consulted. That is true, but the airport realised that and chose not to introduce the new flight path arrangements, although it could have. Instead, it recognised its omission and sought wider and further consultation, I welcome that.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire spoke about DHL's relatively modern, new generation aircraft, which should be welcomed. There are, sometimes, particularly noisy flights out of the airport in the early hours. It is claimed that they may be generated by Rolls-Royce in Derby using noisy Antonov aircraft to haul huge engines out of East Midlands airport. I do not know how accurate that is, but there are, occasionally, exceptionally heavy and noisy aircraft leaving and arriving at the airport.

I say to right hon. and hon. Members, especially those who have not yet had the impact of aircraft noise fall too heavily across their constituencies, that those who use the sort of language used by the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan)—phrases such as, "We want it now"—are, perhaps, squealing before they have been stuck. It will be interesting to see whether the new flight path arrangements are introduced after the consultation process. Frankly, I hope that they are, and that noise levels will be minimised because of the continuing arrival patterns. That should make a sizeable difference to the impact of noise on constituencies around the east midlands. I welcome the CAA's decision to redesignate flight paths over less-populated areas for safety, noise impact and environmental reasons.

To sum up, people should not complain too loudly or too long. Let us see what the new flight path arrangements are like; how they operate and whether they are much better, as I believe that they will be. Let us continue the dialogue with the airport, which has, at long last, decided that it wants to be a far better neighbour than it has been.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Six unallocated minutes remain.

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): This has been a useful debate, and I, too, congratulate the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) on securing it. My hon. Friends the Members for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) and for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) and I have spoken in similar debates in this Chamber a few times in the past few years; I hope that the Minister's speech today is not exactly the same as those we have heard in the past.

One reason that I intervened on the hon. and learned Member for Harborough on the issue of designation is that we all seem to know what people are opposed to, but have little idea of what is an acceptable level of activity. I do not know what level of night flights coming out of East Midlands airport is acceptable and I represent constituents who oppose night flights, but accept that there is a case for them and for the air freight industry at the airport. Today, I hope to tease out what level of activity—if we were talking about designation—would be acceptable for all our constituents in Leicestershire who are affected.

I share some of the concerns expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire, including the concern about how we make progress. One of my fears about designation is that it is held up as a panacea for all our ills; as if we achieve all that we want if we achieve designation.

In the meantime, I have constantly proposed a three-point plan. Indeed, I mentioned it again in the House in response to the White Paper. The 10-year strategy—the master plan—is absolutely vital, because unless we really know what the growth of the airport could be, the impact on the Loughborough constituency, on south Derbyshire, on north-west Leicestershire and on other parts of Leicestershire will be phenomenal. The figures in the White Paper are quite frightening; the hon. and learned Gentleman mentioned 60,000 night flights a year. The number of passengers has already grown from 2 million to 4.5 million in only three years. The impact will be enormous if that growth continues at its current rate, so the 10-year master plan is exactly what local people are willing to accept. It is vital for the Government to take account of our view of the potential growth of the airport in their 10-year plan and so ensure the democratic accountability that was rightly talked about. We are part of the process, and a new extension, growth in passenger numbers and the introduction of low-cost flight companies at the airport should not come about by stealth.

The White Paper talks about the projected expansion needing "to be accompanied by stringent controls on night noise in particular and increasingly generous noise insulation and other mitigation measures."

Again and again, I, and others, have consistently asked in the House and in other places exactly what those stringent noise controls are, because without them the master plan is a meaningless exercise and we are simply keeping the current arrangements and adding a few extra bits. We need to reassure our constituents, and those of us who live under the flight paths need to be reassured that we know exactly what we are talking about. It is a nice phrase, but we need to know the details, which I hope the Minister will give us.

We quite rightly talked about the inadequacy of expecting North West Leicestershire council to be the monitoring body and the independent consultation body, and about the need to replace it. We need a proper, local body with teeth that can monitor the activities of NEMA and work on behalf of the Government and Members who represent the county and elsewhere in the region. Exactly how will that body be constituted, and does the Minister have any plans to strengthen the existing consultation? If all that fails, designation remains the final hurdle to surmount. Again, however, what do we mean by designation? I hoped that we would hear more today about what people expected.

With regard to those of us who already suffer night flights, when did we find them acceptable and when did they tip over into becoming unacceptable? We need an open and honest debate. The current number of night flights might already be too much for those who are most directly affected. Environmental measures such as the new chapter 4 aircraft might mitigate some, but not all, of the impact.

I ask that my three-point plan be considered and that we have an honest and open debate about what we want, because East Midlands airport does provide an enormous number of jobs and great economic benefit to each of us in many different ways.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire mentioned the surface transport plan. My constituency suffers particularly from east-west traffic going through the villages of Wymeswold and Burton and all the way down the A6, the A46 and across, or traffic getting on to the M1 and going south. It is sometimes too much. A lot of freight tries to cut across country and go through the smaller villages in the Wolds. I asked the county council to carry out an impact assessment of that traffic, and it agreed to do so as part of the local transport plan. We need to ensure that we keep on top of that, because it is a big issue for constituents who benefit from the airport but also suffer the environmental impact on the ground as well as in the air.

I hope that the Minister will adopt a realistic and robust approach to the East Midlands airport. My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire and I have found its representatives to be most helpful in our discussions with them over the years, but we still hit the barrier mentioned at the start of the debate; accountability is still an issue. We hope that there will be the opportunity to strengthen the existing proposal as part of the White Paper and to make sufficient progress to ensure that the environmental impacts of that necessary airport are minimised.

John Thurso (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross) (LD): I congratulate the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) on securing the debate. It is clear from listening to hon. Members' contributions that there is considerable concern about the matter, which is also an important local issue, on both sides of the House.

In his opening remarks, the hon. and learned Gentleman mentioned the name of the airport, which I have visited only once, about 15 years ago. I was given a lift by a friend in a small private aeroplane after a wedding, at which I was a guest. At that time, I was general manager of the Cliveden hotel, which I set up, and I was able to get back to the hotel in time to welcome the bride and groom, who had driven down the M1.

I did some research for the debate and found an article from the Derby Evening Telegraph of 20 January, which stated that it had asked 20 airports if they flew to Nottingham, and only three immediately replied yes. The other 17, when asked if they flew to East Midlands were able to say that, yes, they flew there. There is clearly some confusion about the name.

[John Thurso]

Hon. Members have put a very powerful local case extremely well, and I will leave it to the Minister to answer. I want to make some general points. The first, implicit in the debate, is the tension between those who benefit from the facility—this applies not only to airports but to many other infrastructuré and economic endeavours—but are unaffected by the disbenefits, and those who suffer from the disbenefits because they are the hosts, and live near by. It is a critical point and it applies to aviation at any airport.

The industry would argue that everyone has a right to fly and that people have an almost unfettered freedom to fly wherever they want, whenever they want, but that that is not the case. There are two kinds of freedom: the freedom to do things and the freedom to be protected from the adverse effects of whatever other people have the freedom to do. There should be a balance between the rights of those who want to do things, and the rights of those who need to be protected from them. It has to be done with constraint and consideration; the good neighbourliness to which the hon. and learned Gentleman referred. In devising a wider aviation policy, it is important to face up to that fact and accept that we must consider both sides of the issue.

My second point is about aviation policy in general. In the past decade, there has been a phenomenal growth in passengers, largely due to the expansion of low-cost airlines, but also for other reasons. What is not often referred to is the equally impressive growth in air freight. It now accounts for 30 per cent. by value of freight imports into this country, although by weight the figure is much smaller; less than 10 per cent. The problem is that we do not consider the true cost of aviation, especially in environmental terms. Aviation needs to address that problem so that it has a fair playing field compared with other modes of travel.

I would like aviation internationally to be brought within the limits of the Kyoto convention. In this country, air passenger duty singles out passengers, but there is no similar levy on freight planes. I would like a move from air passenger duty to an aeroplane tax that would also cover freight planes, and to externalise some of the costs of aviation so that there is a proper balance between its benefits and disbenefits.

A powerful case has been made for designation, although I am not entirely certain that it is the right remedy. Perhaps it might be better to do it through the master plan. However, I leave it to the Minister to answer that case.

10.45 am

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): I congratulate my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) not only on securing this important debate but on waging a tireless campaign on this issue on behalf of his constituents. He knows that I am well aware of the strong level of feeling not only among his constituents, but among those of other right hon. and hon. Members in the vicinity of the airport, and even wider across Leicestershire, Nottinghamshire and parts of Derbyshire.

As the Chamber is aware, the Government produced a White Paper setting out their policies last year. Sadly, that aviation White Paper led to court challenges and has left uncertainty hanging over many people's lives. In my view, the Government's policy has failed to live up to its own billing. There are two problems with the White Paper. First, it fudges some key issues and therefore causes blight around airports as legal battles are fought. Secondly, there is little sign of the joined-up thinking that we have always been promised, either between the Department for Transport's aviation policy and the rest of its responsibilities, or between it and other Government Departments.

There have been a few references today to the name of East Midlands airport. The hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso) referred to a report in the Derby Evening Telegraph in January this year. I have to say to him that this debate has been going on for about 30 years. I remember that when I was a Leicester city councillor, the airport was spending tens of thousands of pounds on consultants' fees to decide on what to change its name to. I wish that it had spent as much time on consulting residents about how it goes about its activities as it has on consulting about changing its name for three decades. As all hon. Members here know, the airport is expanding very quickly; the White Paper itself forecast—

David Taylor: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Knight: I have only a couple of minutes left, and the hon. Gentleman had a fair crack of the whip earlier. It is not as if he has not been called to speak.

The White Paper forecast that the airport could attract between 12 million and 14 million passengers a year by 2030. However, in addition to that, the airport is one of the country's major hubs for freight, and is the leading UK airport for freight carried by all-cargo aircraft. The White Paper also forecast that the airport could be handling as much as 2.5 million tonnes of freight a year, possibly more than that by 2030.

The White Paper reveals that Ministers do not seem to appreciate the scale of the problem in the region. It states that Nottingham East Midlands airport is situated away from the main centres of population and, as such,

"a relatively small number of people live within the 57 dBA noise contour."

However, the projected growth of the airport would increase the size of the contour to include more than 10,000 residents; more importantly, many thousands more live on the cusp of that noise contour. The nature of air cargo operations means that many flights take place at night, when, of course, background noise levels are much lower. So this is bad news for residents in Leicestershire, Nottinghamshire and Derbyshire.

The Government's own consultation document forecast that there could be more than 60,000 cargo flights a year by 2030, and a substantial proportion of those would be late in the evening or at night. It is clear that this large expansion will continue to have serious consequences on those living under the flight routes. The issue of noise raises two questions; first, compensation, and secondly, what measures can be taken to minimise noise levels. The aviation White Paper states that the Government expect airports and acoustic insulation to those who are in an intermediate noise region. Will the Minister say whether those compensation rules will apply to those who live under the flight paths at Nottingham East Midlands airport? We believe that the current scope and level of compensation for noise blight is inadequate to compensate for the serious problems that will be suffered by those who live under the flight paths of aircraft flying at night. What discussions has the Minister had with Nottingham East Midlands airport about improving the level of compensation? If the answer is none, she really should go to the airport and meet the airport operators.

"to offer households subject to high levels of noise . . . assistance with the costs of relocating"

I believe that the people of the east midlands deserve clarity and openness and, where their peace and quiet is going to be shattered, adequate compensation. Does the Minister not accept that our present laws do not give local authorities the power to deal with the sort of problems that we have heard about today, and therefore that there is only one conclusion; we need to see some action from the Minister.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I should like to register my appreciation at the splendid manner in which all present responded to the application of the new ruling; they did so with alacrity and good humour. I call the Minister to respond.

10.50 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Charlotte Atkins): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am grateful to the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) for choosing to debate this important subject. He has raised many concerns, concerns that I have also seen expressed in letters from the hon. and learned Gentleman and other hon. Members here today.

Passenger traffic at Nottingham East Midlands airport has increased dramatically since its adoption as a base by a number of no-frills carriers; annual growth averaged almost 15 per cent. in the five years to 2003. There are signs that that growth is now slowing; in 2004, the airport handled some 4.3 million passengers, which was up 2.9 per cent. on the previous year. Scheduled services now operate to 25 destinations, on a balanced mix of leisure and business routes.

That expansion is in line with the Government's policy of encouraging growth at regional airports. It has a number of benefits, which include supporting the growth of the local and regional economy; relieving congestion at more over-crowded airports, especially those in the south-east; reducing the need for long surface journeys to airports; and giving passengers greater choice.

NEMA's strategic importance, however, arises from its freight operations. It handled some 227,000 tonnes of air freight in 2003, second only to Heathrow. Almost all of that was carried by dedicated freighter aircraft, making it the most important United Kingdom airport for that type of traffic. In the same year, it also handled more than 10,000 tonnes of mail.

NEMA is well suited to such a role. Its central location and its proximity to the M1 enables it to serve much of the UK, and it possesses an adequate runway length and sufficient space for the development of cargo handling facilities. That has served to attract the express freight carriers, and NEMA has become the most important regional hub for DHL and UPS. The vast international networks operated by such carriers offer enormous benefits in connectivity for businesses in the east midlands and beyond, and they offer rapid access to global markets.

Mr. Garnier: We are delighted hear a sort of "Down Your Way" tour of the airport's charms, but we want the Minister to deal with the issues that were raised in the debate. I wonder whether she will stop reading out publicity material for the airport and get on and deal with the issues that concern us.

Charlotte Atkins: I would have expected those hon. Members who represent the Conservative party to have recognised the benefits of a regional airport of NEMA's significance. It is interesting that they are very much against red tape and the Government taking commercial decisions; but when it comes to NEMA, it seems that they want the Government to take responsibility for the whole business.

The midlands consultation document on the future development of air transport, which preceded the White Paper, looked at the option of a second, wide-spaced runway at NEMA. The White Paper did not support that option; on the evidence available, we concluded that the economic case for a second runway had not been made. We shall, however, review the case for a second runway should the growth of NEMA prove to be more rapid than our forecasts suggest.

Although hon. Members have denied it, the airport is situated away from the main centres of population, and a relatively small number of people live within the 57dBA noise contour, which is the commonly accepted standard for the onset of "significant community annoyance". The populations around Gatwick or Stansted, for example, are much larger. Some 2,500 people in the existing development of NEMA live within the 57dBA contour. That is expected to grow to 11,700 in 2030. The comparable figures for Luton are 8,000 in the present development and 19,000 by 2030. NEMA is not on a par with the three designated airports in the south-east.

While the White Paper supports the expansion of both passenger and freight operations at NEMA, it is not a licence for the uncontrolled expansion of operations. It states that the expansion on night operations must be accompanied by stringent controls on night noise and increasingly generous noise insulation and other mitigation measures. I have no definition of stringency or stringent controls. We will obviously look to the airport operator to provide an indication of its transport and traffic forecasts and proposals and also its mitigation measures. That is the context in which the airport operates.

Many Members have asked about designation. Like my predecessors, I have written many letters on this issue. Although I appreciate the strong feelings expressed by hon. Members and their constituents, the situation has not changed. As the Minister of State, Department for Transport, my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. McNulty), made clear, both at the forum that many hon. Members attended and subsequently, the Government's position is that local and regional airports should find solutions for what are local and regional problems.

Mr. Duncan: It is quite clear that the Labour party's policy is to oppose the designation of this airport. May I ask the Minister in the time remaining to address my specific point about monitoring existing flights with a clear focus of attention so that we can get the actual facts, without being given the runaround?

Charlotte Atkins: I am happy to take up the issue that the hon. Gentleman raised. If he is having problems finding out what flight has overflown a constituent, I am happy to look at that. NEMA flights have a noise and track-keeping system. It should be possible to say whether it is a NEMA flight. The hon. Gentleman spoke of his problems with the CAA coming back to him within the period when it was possible to say whether a flight was from a particular direction. He mentioned the problem of having only a month's radar checks. I am happy to take that back and have a look at it, but clearly NEMA should be able to tell the hon. Gentleman whether it was one of its flights. Whether he believes it or not is another matter.

There are well-established procedures for bringing forward airspace change proposals and they are subject to directions and guidance to the CAA from the Secretary of State. These are designed to ensure that proposals are brought to the attention of affected parties; that they are properly assessed and that environmental impacts are mitigated as much as possible; and that changes are only made where it is clear, after consultation, that an overall environmental benefit will accrue. That is the existing procedure that has to be used. There is no reason why NEMA should not also go down that path.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Ambulance Trust Mergers

11 am

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): I thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for allowing me the opportunity to discuss the merger of the Gloucestershire ambulance trust with Wiltshire and Avon ambulance trusts. It is causing great anxiety in Gloucestershire and I am grateful to the Minister for being here to reply to the debate, as I am for the support of my near neighbour and good colleague, my hon. Friend the Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson).

I shall set the scene. Gloucestershire ambulance trust has a two-star rating and some of its innovative measures are among the best in the country. Yet, it has been proposed to merge the trust with two failing adjoining ambulance trusts: those of Avon and of Wiltshire. If people doubt that fact, they have only to look at the response time figures provided by the NHS. In the most recent year for which figures are available, Gloucestershire is consistently in the 94 to 95 per cent. range in response to category A and category B calls, whereas Wiltshire has only a 84.9 per cent. response time and the figure for Avon is a disastrous 66.4 per cent.

So why ruin one of the most innovative ambulance trusts in the country and merge it with two failing trusts? The inevitable result of such action will be a fall in service for the people of Gloucestershire. They pay their taxes and they are entitled, at one of the most vulnerable points in their life, to service. If someone is lying beside the road, dying from a motor accident, or is in his home with liver failure or a suspected heart attack, the one thing that that person wants is a quick ambulance response. The merger will inevitably slow down that response and many people think that it is a prelude to replacing ambulances with cars driven by one paramedic. One paramedic in a car responding to an emergency cannot perform the same service as an entire ambulance team.

It is abundantly clear to me that the proposal is massively unpopular with the people of Gloucestershire. As I have said, the service currently enjoys a two-star rating and those working for it see no advantage whatever in being combined with the Avon and Wiltshire services, which have been classified as "failing" by the Government. Under the misdirection of the Government, the Avon, Gloucestershire and Wiltshire strategic health authority is seemingly willing to denigrate the Gloucestershire ambulance service and place the Wiltshire ambulance service under Bristol control, all for the measly aim of saving money. The SHA has had a miserable record. Its deficit of £100 million is one of the biggest in the country. It has had no fewer than three chief executives in the short time that it has been in existence, yet the Government, having formed that SHA, now want to do the same with our ambulance trusts. Even the chief executive of the SHA told a newspaper that the proposed ambulance merger is about "reducing overheads".

We must not be taken in by such silken tones. The damage to the ambulance services in the south-west will be not only qualitative but financial. The record of the Government in wasting public resources by reorganisation is well proven. I say to the Minister in good faith that each reorganisation costs a great deal of money and usually results in a worse service for us—the public, the taxpayers who pay for that service.

While desperately trying to cut monetary corners, the SHA will in fact be sacrificing millions of pounds' worth of investment. The huge financial commitment to the Devizes call centre and to the brand new Quedgeley call centre, which was delivered at a cost to Gloucestershire council tax payers of some £6.5 million and which is about to be stripped of its fire service role because the Government want to regionalise fire services, is to be wantonly abandoned and those call centres are to be left as empty testimonies to the Government's disregard for the public purse. I understand that there is a 30-year break clause in the agreement at Quedgeley, so perhaps the Minister can tell us how much it will cost the ambulance service to break that agreement.

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend on raising this important matter. He will be aware—perhaps he will come to this—that we face a similar problem with regard to the fire and rescue service. I am sure that he will tell us how new the building at Quedgeley is, because what we are discussing represents an enormous waste of money.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My hon. Friend raises a good point. We have been to the tri-service centre and seen it working. We have seen the superb telephone operation that the people of Gloucestershire now have. The close co-operation between the three services—police, fire and ambulance—is benefiting the people of Gloucestershire. The Government's initiative was a good one, but they are about to tear it up, even though it has been going for only 18 months. That is ridiculous. What a waste of £6.5 million of public money to tear it all up, take the fire service away and regionalise it, and now propose to take the ambulance service away. My hon. Friend is exactly right.

The painfully apparent lack of any firm business case from the SHA for the merger has rightly led the Gloucestershire county council health overview and scrutiny committee to call for an impact assessment to be carried out urgently, before the plan is rushed through with little regard for the consequences. At the very least, the Minister should satisfy himself with a robust business case that the plan makes sense. He owes it to the people of Gloucestershire to demonstrate that they will receive a better service as a result of the merger. If they will not, why take away a service that works?

The SHA was content to turn to Adrian Lucas, of the Scottish ambulance service, who is no doubt a very able man, but who surely has little experience of the particular local circumstances and conditions that the Gloucestershire ambulance service faces. His answer was that emergency calls from Gloucestershire should be answered from Bath or Chippenham, but how can an emergency call being answered from Bath or Chippenham help my constituents or even those of my hon. Friend in the most rural areas of the north Cotswolds? I do not think that the Minister has any idea, and I invite him to come and look for himself. Some of my constituents live 30 miles from the nearest district general hospital. If they do not have a proper ambulance service when they need it, they will die. There is no question about that. We must be sure that the merger will work; otherwise, we are putting people's lives at risk. I say that to the Minister in the starkest possible terms.

Regardless of how technically advanced the variety of global positioning systems may be in modern ambulances, modern technology cannot replace the knowledge of local drivers. They know the conditions and the traffic variations. That is particularly important in the Cotswolds in summer, when the roads in a place such as Bourton-on-the-Water are chock-a-block. A local ambulance driver will know how to get round the jams, but someone from Bristol, Avon or wherever else will not have that local knowledge.

One can envisage what might occur. I shall give the Minister an example. During the last Christmas break, a single telephone fault crippled the local GP out-of-hours service and, in an instant, threw an extra burden on to the ambulance service. The very thought of a similar fault occurring in a joint services call centre that might be responsible for some 2.2 million people and of all its possible consequences is awful.

Moreover, it seems that the reduction in call centre capabilities is being quietly mirrored by a reduction in the resources awarded to our hard-working ambulance crews, even to the degree that the SHA is taking away ambulances and replacing them with cars. The threat to replace ambulances in rural areas with meagre car response units—essentially, a paramedic and a first-aid kit, rather than the panoply of medical services and expertise that arrives when a fully equipped ambulance pulls up—is testimony to how little attention is being paid to the essential needs of patients in Gloucestershire. It is self-evident that one paramedic cannot provide as good a service as a trained team of ambulance men.

I turn to some of the innovative measures that the Gloucestershire ambulance trust is pioneering. It is one of the country's leaders in some of the new treatments. For example, in pre-hospital thrombolysis treatment, modern IT enables the electronic kit to be attached to somebody's body and the information to be transmitted to a specialist sitting in a hospital, who can then see exactly what phase the heart is in and administer the drug at precisely the right time. That saves lives. Not only does it save lives, but it is an example of how people might be kept out of hospital, thereby saving the NHS even more money. An efficient ambulance can treat people on the spot. They do not necessarily have to go to hospital; it might be more suitable for them to go into a nursing home, or even to stay in their own home with proper treatment from an occupational nurse.

Running down the ambulance service makes no sense. Apart from the pre-hospital thrombolysis initiative, the Gloucestershire ambulance service is one of the most innovative in the country in forming partnerships with other first-responder groups, such as the fire brigade. Indeed, the protocol with the St. John Ambulance brigade was so good that that brigade is now using it nationally. The Gloucestershire ambulance service has been awarded 120 auto-external defibrilators. That was the second largest award by the British Heart Foundation, and it went to one of the smallest ambulance trusts. The Gloucestershire ambulance trust is one of the most innovative trusts, and it provides one of the best services in the country, yet the Government want to merge it with two failing ambulance trusts. What on earth sense can that make?

[Mr. Clifton-Brown]

As my hon. Friend the Member for Tewkesbury knows, those who work for the ambulance service in Gloucestershire are very proud of it; they are proud to see it performing so well. If the merger goes ahead, and they see the quality of the service that they are able to offer falling, they will leave and go to the private sector, and that will have a knock-on effect.

The ambulance service can be the bridge between people and the NHS, and it can help to keep people out of hospital. However, even these peerless ambulance staff cannot be expected to provide a faultless service if they are not given the tools that they need to do the job. The tragic accident involving Mr. and Mrs. Jones and Ms Moran late last month that resulted in one fatality shows the price that will inevitably be paid when ambulances are not properly supplied in a timely fashion, but one must also look at the success stories, such as that of Mrs. Stevenson and her son Zak. They were given the highest level of care and attention by the ambulance crew and connected staff when little Zak began to experience breathing problems and had to be rushed to hospital in the most dire winter conditions, which made some roads impassable. It was primarily due to the Gloucestershire ambulance crew's local knowledge of alternative routes that Zak reached hospital in good time and was successfully treated and allowed to make a full recovery. Such local knowledge would simply not be available under the proposed merger; ambulances could be manned by paramedics from many miles away who have little first-hand knowledge of their immediate environment of a maze of twisting country lanes.

The Conservative party has stood up for the interests of local people against a burgeoning and blind, centrally led bureaucracy. Local Conservatives, under Councillor Barry Dare, called for a motion urging the strategic health authority to carry out a proper consultation before adopting the merger plans. The need for such a consultation and the blatant risks of not listening to the concerns of local people and ambulance crews were so apparent that Councillor Dare's motion received cross-party support.

Unabashed by their total humiliation in the north-east referendum that threatened to abolish the county of Northumberland, this Government, aided by the Liberals, are determined to pursue their unpopular European-style regional agenda and abolish our county services by stealth. As my hon. Friend emphasised, we have seen that they want to regionalise our fire service. Now the ambulance service is to be merged with failing neighbouring ambulance trusts. Similar plans for our police cannot be far behind.

I have something to say to the Minister: my constituents, my hon. Friend's constituents and the people of Gloucestershire pay their taxes to this Government in ever increasing amounts. They get a very good service at present. If it deteriorates, I will hold the Government to account.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): I congratulate the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) on securing the debate and on his interest in his ambulance service. Equally, I congratulate the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) and my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew), who are present today.

I must say to the hon. Member for Cotswold that that was the first time that I have heard a Eurosceptic argument imposed on a discussion on ambulance services. I counsel him, in the interests of his constituents, not to over-egg his argument by suggesting that decisions have been made and that firm proposals are on the table when that is absolutely not the case.

The hon. Gentleman talked about his Conservative colleague on the county council putting down a motion calling for a thorough consultation. The only thing that is currently on the table is a proposal to consult on the matter. It is ridiculous to suggest that that has come about because a Conservative county councillor has decided to make party politics out of the issue. The SHA's proposal is to consult—nothing else, at this stage. I will ensure that his comments are seen as part of that consultation.

Mr. Clifton-Brown rose

Dr. Ladyman: Let me make some points first. The hon. Gentleman had 15 minutes and turned what could have been a constructive debate about the future of his ambulance service into a party political diatribe. So, I think that I am entitled to make some progress before I give way to him.

The staff of the national health service in the hon. Gentleman's county and elsewhere are working extremely hard to provide better services for everybody; that includes those who must make difficult management decisions about the structures of such services. They want to engage in constructive dialogue with local populations about how best to achieve that. It does not help anybody if attempts to have such a dialogue are undermined by people saying that decisions have already been made, when, palpably, they have not.

Before I discuss the local ambulance service, I should say something about the national ambulance service, because the hon. Gentleman accused us of certain strategies which do not exist and have not been implemented. We recognise that the ambulance service provides the first point of access to health care for a wide variety of patients. It is the most important contact for more than 5 million 999 callers every year.

Far from running down the ambulance service nationally, the Government are committed to it. On top of its base funding, we have put in £50 million since 1999—providing £21 million for additional front-line ambulance staff. Money has been provided for purchasing vehicles; £3.4 million has gone to enabling services to equip front-line ambulance vehicles with state-of-the-art satellite navigation; and £10 million has been provided to purchase ambulance equipment for heart patients.

This Government are not trying to run down the ambulance service; we are committed to it. That is why we set a standard that at least 75 per cent. of 999 calls from patients with immediate life-threatening conditions should have an ambulance respond within eight minutes. In 2001, less than 71 per cent. of those calls were responded to within eight minutes, but during the past year performance against that standard has exceeded 75 per cent. Now, 98 per cent. of patients are overwhelmingly satisfied with the care that they receive from their ambulance service.

That sort of commitment and those sorts of targets apply equally to the hon. Gentleman's constituents as to mine. Just because somebody lives in a rural area does not mean that the Government's target of reaching them within a particular time is any less of a commitment than elsewhere. Indeed, it is necessary to recognise the issues of rurality and deal with them appropriately, to ensure that we meet the targets.

A demonstrable improvement in patient care is being achieved. In many areas of the country, including the hon. Gentleman's, innovative work and attempts to modernise are taking place. For example, there are now 400 emergency care practitioners treating patients at the scene, which avoids people having to go to accident and emergency unnecessarily. I am sure that in his calmer moments the hon. Gentleman would like to congratulate all those people on their contributions rather than launching into an attack on their motivation, which is what came across to me from his comments.

Although progress has been made, we can do even better. That is why we appointed Peter Bradley to lead a strategic review of ambulance service delivery. It will consider how to make longer-term improvements in areas such as ambulance service staff education and training, clinical indicators and outcome measures. It is also expected to resolve issues such as how best to clarify clock start/stop times to ensure the transparent and consistent measurement of response times.

The hon. Gentleman raised the issue of local services. As he said, Avon, Gloucestershire and Wiltshire strategic health authority has three ambulance services: the Avon Ambulance Service NHS Trust, the Gloucestershire Ambulance Service NHS Trust and the Wiltshire Ambulance Service NHS Trust. Gloucestershire and Wiltshire are two of the smallest ambulance trusts in England. The management of such local ambulance services is a matter for the local health economy—not for me or other Ministers sitting in Whitehall. For exactly the reasons that the hon. Gentleman gave, I have no knowledge or experience whatever of conditions in the Cotswolds. I cannot possibly know what conditions are like in his constituency; I have enough to do making sure that I understand conditions in my own constituency. That is why it is important to allow decisions to be made by local people who know about the traffic in the summer in Cotswolds villages and about the conditions on local roads, and who understand the issues of rurality. It is not for me, the Government or the Secretary of the State to impose any model on the hon. Gentleman's local ambulance service; it is for the people charged with responsibility for those services in his area to make the decisions.

It is right and appropriate for strategic health authorities and commissioners to examine the provision of ambulance services in their area and to consider whether the current arrangements could be improved to benefit patients and staff, reduce duplication and improve efficiency. That is what is happening now. In April 2004, the Avon, Gloucestershire and Wiltshire strategic health authority embarked on a project to consider how emergency services in Wiltshire could be better shaped to meet the demands of the future. Many factors will have prompted the authority to initiate that project, including rising demand for ambulance services and the fact that ambulance performance was identified in the Department's annual review with the authority as an issue that needed to be addressed.

Although the project initially focused primarily on Wiltshire, it also provided an opportunity to address the future role of services in Avon, Gloucestershire and Wiltshire as a whole. Two clear stages governed the development of the work. First, there was the need to develop and agree a service framework that enabled ambulance services to make a more effective contribution to unscheduled care. For example, the project considered how staff in new roles, such as the emergency care practitioners whom I mentioned earlier, could be best utilised. That is particularly important for rural communities such as those in Avon, Gloucestershire and Wiltshire. ECPs have the skills to treat patients at the scene of an accident, which can help to avoid the need to travel to A and E. Secondly, there was the need to consider the best organisational arrangements in which to implement the service framework.

Once a rationale for the review had been established, three options emerged: the creation of an integrated management team across the three organisations, a merger into a single organisation and the status quo. The current situation is that Avon, Gloucestershire and Wiltshire strategic health authority has decided to commission an independent organisation to undertake a detailed benefits analysis and risk assessment of those options. The recommendations of that analysis should be presented to a steering group of chairs and chief executives from the three trusts and their lead commissioners, together with the SHA. That is exactly the business plan that the hon. Gentleman asked me to ensure would exist before any decisions were made.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: The Minister's last comment was very helpful. To ensure that we get something useful out of the debate, will he assure us that the people of Gloucestershire will be given every opportunity to contribute to that study, that they will have plenty of time to do so and that the study will genuinely take their views into account? The Minister has given the impression that the failure of the Wiltshire and Avon ambulance trusts is all that this is about, and that is exactly the fear of the people of Gloucestershire, who get such a good service at the moment.

Dr. Ladyman: I have steadfastly tried to avoid saying that that is the primary reason for the review. It is my belief that the SHA sees potential benefits to considering the three organisations together. Each of the three organisations and everyone throughout the area, including the people of Gloucestershire, will benefit, and the perceived problem of underperformance in Wiltshire will also be dealt with. I promise the hon. Gentleman that his constituents will be included in the consultation. It is clear from having talked to the SHA and having studied the matter since realising that the hon. Gentleman had secured this debate that the SHA intends to have a wide-ranging and thorough consultation with everyone before any decisions are taken.

[Dr. Ladyman]

I stress again that this is an objective exercise. There are no hidden agendas or predetermined outcomes. Nothing in the process should worry the hon. Gentleman, his constituents or any other hon. Member in the Chamber. Indeed, there is much for them to gain. Since 1974, mergers and reorganisations have reduced ambulance services from about 100 to 31 trusts, and there is a general trend towards fewer, larger ambulance trusts. For example, Shropshire merged with the West Midlands ambulance service, and three ambulance trusts merged to form Tees, East and North Yorkshire Ambulance Trust. There are significant gains to be made for each ambulance service as a result. The potential benefits for the hon. Gentleman's constituents are there to be seen, and it is foolish to close our eyes to the possibility of those benefits.

Mr. Laurence Robertson: The Minister is talking about other ambulance trusts that have merged, but in an answer to my parliamentary question, the Minister of State, Department of Health, the hon. Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton), said:

"We are not aware of any other SHAs and their constituent organisations formally considering this issue."—[Official Report, House of Commons, 31 January 2005; Vol. 430 c. 741W.]

I am confused.

Dr. Ladyman: I am referring to ambulance trusts that have already decided formally to review their structures and to merge. I confess that I do not recollect that question offhand—unfortunately, I do not remember every question that I sign—but I shall be happy to answer it if the hon. Gentleman writes to me with his query. Faster response times, reduced bureaucracy and other such issues are all potential gains for all the constituents of all the Members in the Chamber today.

NHS bodies have an absolutely clear duty to consult on these matters. The Government and the Secretary of State make that clear. We do not want to be put in the position of taking any decisions at the centre about mergers or reconfiguration. We want those matters to be sorted out locally by local people.

I know that the hon. Member for Cotswold is not the only Member interested in this issue. the hon. Member for Tewkesbury has asked parliamentary questions about it, and my hon. Friends the Members for Stroud, for Forest of Dean (Diana Organ) and for Gloucester (Mr. Dhanda) have already met my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton), who leads on ambulances issues for the Government. They have already expressed their concerns, so all Members who represent the area have started to engage in the process. It is very important that all Members do so.

It is also very important that the hon. Member for Cotswold ensures that the opinion of every one of his constituents is listened to. I fully support him in that, and I am happy to meet him and to discuss the matter in the Chamber as necessary so long as he understands that, at the end of the day, the decision is for local people, not me. I want local people to produce the best strategy for themselves and to decide how best to improve services throughout the area and not only in one part of it. That will ensure that he and all his constituents are satisfied that there will be gains for them and for others in the area from any decision that is eventually taken. The status quo is still an option, as is rationalising the management organisation rather than an outright merger of the three trusts. However, we can ensure that constituents' views are taken into account only if we all engage constructively in the debate.

I conclude by thanking the hon. Gentleman once again for securing the debate, but I ask him not to give the impression that decisions have been taken when clearly they have not. These are matters for local people to engage in.

Mr. Hilton Dawson (Lancaster and Wyre) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to initiate the debate. I know, because of the hon. Members present, that it will be a high-quality debate. It is a shame that so far there are not more Members present to take part in it.

I regard it as a gross failure by us all that this debate is needed. It is an indictment of this country that it leads the wealthy, developed, powerful nations in the number of children who are in prison. There are about 2,500 children in young offenders' institutions now, perhaps 200 others in secure training centres and 200 in local authority secure children's homes. I do not have a problem with local authority secure children's homes; they work to the standards laid down by the Children Act 1989 and they are inspected by the Commission for Social Care Inspection according to the principles of that Act.

The huge problem with local authority secure children's homes is that places in them are being lost at an extraordinary rate. Some 71 places—almost a quarter—in local authority secure care have gone since 2000, when the Youth Justice Board took over responsibility for the commissioning of places in what is termed the secure estate. That is especially lamentable when we consider the most shameful disgrace of all, the most appalling fact about custody for young people and children: in the past eight years—since I have been a Member of Parliament and since this Government have been in power, carrying out superb reforms to the lives of so many children—16 children have died in prison, at a time when 71 places in local authority secure care have been lost.

I am not aware that any child has ever died in local authority secure accommodation. I have worked in several of those places and I know that they have contained, looked after and managed young people with horrendous records of offending; young people who have committed the gravest crimes that anyone could commit, and they have kept them safe. Their expertise and skill are being lost; many good people who formerly worked in those institutions lament the passing of those establishments and of the old community homes with education, which also did a good job for young people. I particularly lament, and recognise, that the passing of so much good quality care no doubt has something to do with the extraordinary increase in the number of children in prison. It has doubled in the past 10 years.

I return to the most appalling fact—the 16 deaths. I am aware that I cannot speak about all those cases today; some are sub judice. However, hon. Members in this Room are well-informed, and people read the newspapers and know a lot about the circumstances. I was with my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State only two weeks ago at the scene of the latest tragedy, which I deeply regret was in my constituency. I regard these 16 deaths as unnecessary, avoidable and appalling, and I am sure that we all agree with that.

During this debate, I am sure that somebody will reflect on how difficult the issues are, and how complicated the subject is. We can make it difficult and complicated if we wish to, but we can also make it quite simple. It is about basic principles and sheer bloody-minded political will. Perhaps the attendance today reflects the fact that people are sometimes nervous about the issue of young offending, particularly when approaching a general election. People are clearly and rightly concerned about crime in this country, so there is not much sympathy among the general public for young offenders. However, I have appeared many times on the national media trying to draw attention to what we are to discuss this afternoon, and my e-mail inbox is roughly divided 50:50 between those who think that it is outrageous for a Member to be standing up for young people in prison, and those who are very encouraging that someone is doing so. These are controversial issues, but they are vital matters of life and death, and, frankly, politicians should be prepared to take a lead.

We are talking this afternoon about the principles and political will that anyone should display if they aspire to govern this country well. I am not going to fight the next general election, but hon. Members around the Room, from three parties, will do so. They will be out on the stump, and will have to confront the issues that we are discussing. I hope that we can all agree that it is unthinkable and intolerable that a child should ever die in the custody of the state. It should surely be one of the state's greatest duties, when anyone—let alone a child—is committed to its custody that they are kept safe. There is a remarkable and regrettable lack of public debate, or even public information, when a child dies in custody. I cannot imagine what would happen to social workers if a child died in a children's home. We know what happens to social workers in cases in the community, where children die at the hands of parents or carers, but it seems that there is little concern about children who have committed offences who die in our prisons.

I suppose that such people are not children at all; we insulate ourselves from the fact that they are children. Anyone under 18, of course, is a child, but we insulate ourselves from that fact by referring to them as "juveniles" or "offenders", and the prisons where they live as the "secure estate". The Government properly and gloriously tell us that every child matters, but perhaps juvenile offenders do not; in fact, we know that they do not. The Children Act 1989 states:

> "When a court determines any question with respect to . . . the upbringing of a child"— for example, where that child will live, for however long—

> "the child's welfare shall be the court's paramount consideration."

That does not, however, apply to a child older than 10 who expresses his or her abuse, neglect, disturbance, illness, lack of parental guidance, inadequate education, learning difficulties, naivety, immaturity, or poor choice of friends through the commission of a criminal offence. As is regularly stated by the Government and the Youth Justice Board, the principal aim of the youth justice system is to prevent offending by young people. Having regard to a child's welfare is a secondary aim of the system.

It is good that those in charge of custodial institutions have been brought within the remit of the Children Act 2004. Under section 11, they are bound by a duty to safeguard and promote the well-being of children in their custody, but that duty does not apply to those who sentence children to custody, or to those on the Youth Justice Board who decide where in the secure estate children should be placed. Such crucial decisions are often taken on the spur of the moment, with a degree of surprise; they often need to be taken quickly, perhaps at the end of a long day in court, having had little opportunity to weigh up the particular needs of a child, who may be hundreds of miles away from home, who is wondering where he or she is going.

As I said, the overarching principal aim of the youth justice system is to prevent offending by young people. That is the first note of humour that I have introduced to the debate. However, the offending rates are lamentable. Home Office figures show that in 2001, 70.4 per cent. of children who received a custodial sentence reoffended within 12 months. In 2002, that figure marginally improved to 68.3 per cent. Those are the most recent figures, but even if the situation carries on improving it would be a fair bet that about two thirds of the 2,500 or so children who are currently in prison will have reoffended by this time next year.

Prison does not work. Let no one accuse me, or anyone else who agrees that there should be no children in prison, of being soft on crime. Prison is a generator of crime, and confirms young people, and adults, in a criminal identity. It introduces young people to others who are more criminal and to the means to carry out further criminal offences of which they were not aware. It is lamentable, under a Government who have been so good for children, that children can be publicly identified and have their pictures all over the front pages of local newspapers, so that their families, friends, neighbours and everyone in their communities can identify and label them for a long time.

Matthew Green (Ludlow) (LD): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the situation is often worse than that? When children leave jail after serving a short sentence, their status is often raised among their peers. Naming and shaming young people in the newspapers gives them status among other young people and raises the possibility of their behaviour being copied by other youngsters.

Mr. Dawson: I agree. The hon. Gentleman makes a fair point: some young people misguidedly relish their appearances on the front page. Some look to the day when an antisocial behaviour order will be imposed on them. The introduction of such legislation and such a means of dealing with young people shows a complete misunderstanding of their psychology.

As much as anyone, I have seen the way in which crime and the fear of crime can blight people's lives and wreck communities, and I want an effective response to crime. Just as much as anyone in Parliament—perhaps more than many others—I am committed to tackling crime and antisocial behaviour. However, to tackle the offending and offensive behaviour of young people effectively, we must deal with all the factors underpinning that behaviour. We must understand that we are dealing with human beings at a stage at which they can grow and mature through their difficulties, and we must recognise that the way in which we treat them can make their behaviour far worse, compound their problems and put them in danger.

I advocate a much longer period of intervention for many young people than they receive in prison. In large part, I would support such intervention taking place in the community, integrated with all the other systems of support for every other child in the community. I am certainly not averse to children being looked after in the care system for much longer than they serve under a detention and training order. I am in favour of young people who are a danger to the community being looked after for much longer in a local authority secure children's home than they would serve in a young offenders' institution. It is essential that we address some of the very serious issues underlying criminal and antisocial behaviour, many of which are long-standing. Many issues relate to abuse and neglect over years, and it will take years of work, therapy, support and consistency to help young people through those issues.

Prisons complain to me that they do not have the young people long enough to enable them to do decent work. There are good people in prisons who tell me that some young people there are experiencing the positive influences of people for the first time in their lives, albeit within the horrendous confines of a prison institution, but that they are not there long enough. Programmes are not long enough and not developed enough.

None of the work needs to take place within the confines of a prison, however. The philosopher Foucault said that prison is dangerous when it is not useless. It is a horrible place to put a child. I thought that on my most recent visit to Lancaster Farms. Ironically, that is probably the best young offenders' institution in the country, but I thought, "What a horrible place for a child", when I looked around at the walls, the wire, the uniforms, the keys and the disgusting little cells with their huge locked doors. We owe young people far more and should do far better by them than that.

We also owe the public much more than useless rhetoric about the fact that prison somehow works, or a lot of stuff about the amelioration of conditions in prisons. I know that more money is being spent on prisons, that education authorities now work there and that primary care trusts are going to be much more involved; and I know that, following the Munby judgment, there will be more child protection and more advocacy for young people in prisons. However, we should compare the average annual cost of a place in a young offenders' institution with that of one in a local authority secure children's home. The former is £50,800 and the latter—where children are looked after properly—is £185,780. If we are to lock children up, we should be prepared to pay the proper cost. We should pay for appropriate ratios of staff to children. With three to six staff serving 40 to 60 very needy children in prison, compared with one to six staff for two to eight very needy children in local authority secure care, it is obvious where they will be better cared for, even before we consider the rules and regulations, the inspection regime and the fact that local authority children's homes are required to be child-centred in ways that young offenders' institutions cannot be.

The Government have been good for children, and I take my hat off to my hon. Friend the Minister, who is an excellent Minister. So why does it need an organisation such as the Howard League on Penal Reform to take the Government to judicial review to establish the principle that the Children Act applies to children in prison, in order for them to have child protection workers and children's advocates? Why on earth does that same excellent organisation have to establish its own independent inquiry under Lord Carlile into the use of physical restraint, solitary confinement and strip-searching of children? Those are outrageous things to do to children.

The chief inspector of prisons recently said that there are a number of areas in which prison service orders are simply inappropriate for children, and do not reflect child protection principles. However, the Youth Justice Board has an aspirational strategy, whatever that is—every Saturday evening, I aspire to win the national lottery, but I have not managed it yet—which is supposed to cover constraint, confinement and strip-searching. Why do we need an independent organisation to search out what is going on in the institutions of state? What have the Government done to respond to the 11,500 cases of physical restraint of children in three secure training centres in five years; to the 200 injuries to children in 11 months resulting from restraint in prisons; and to the ghastly fact that one young man died while being restrained in a secure training centre last April?

Why does another fine organisation, Inquest, have to campaign for the public inquiry into sentencing policy that was recommended to the Home Secretary by the coroner at the inquest into the appalling death of 16-year-old Joseph Scholes? Joseph Scholes died nine days into a two-year sentence for stealing a mobile phone. A victim of sexual abuse, a disturbed, self-harming child—he slashed his face just before his appearance in court—he was in prison, in virtual isolation, and in a bizarre form of canvas-strip clothing, until he hanged himself. Why can we not have a public inquiry into sentencing policy and the death of Joseph Scholes? We need an inquiry to tell us all what is going on in young offenders' institutions.

Why is there so little support for the bereaved families of Joseph Scholes and the two other young people who recently died in secure training centres? One of them was a young man aged 14 who, last August, became the most horrifying statistic of all: the youngest person in modern penal history to die in a prison in this country. Why are there delays of up to two years in holding inquests? Why is there no central monitoring of inquests and recommendations? Where is the effective attempt to learn the lessons from all these tragedies?

I have been to my local young offenders' institution, Lancaster Farms, on many occasions, and, sadly, I have made two visits already this year. The first was routine. Members of the Prison Officers Association backed up their pension claim by telling me that they were involved in 10 or 12 violent incidents between children every day. That makes Lancaster Farms a dangerous place for children to be. I have been involved for a long time in inspecting places where difficult young people have been looked after, and that sort of bullying would simply not have been countenanced.

Later on that first visit, the governor and staff introduced me to the case—again, my hon. Friend the Minister has responded promptly to it—of a mentally ill, hallucinating and possibly psychotic child who had been refusing food. No one thought that he should be there—not the governor, the staff or anyone who was looking after him, and certainly not members of his family, who were visiting. Later that day, the staff gave me more examples of children who they thought should not be there, because the offences that they committed were nowhere near serious enough to merit a custodial sentence.

On my second visit this year, I met young people in the prison's hospital wing, who were there for various reasons: they were suffering from mental illness, their offending was such that they were thought to be at risk from other young people in the prison, they were victims of bullying or they were simply afraid.

The Prison Reform Trust tells us that 90 per cent. of young people in prison have a recognisable mental disorder and that 10 per cent. suffer from a severe psychotic illness. The 10 per cent. figure is interesting, because the Youth Justice Board tells us that it is seeking to reduce the population of children in prison by 10 per cent. over the next two years. That is a paltry ambition, although I am not even sure that the board will be able to achieve it, given the increasing number of children in prison who have breached antisocial behaviour orders. Given the rate at which children are dying, there will have been four more deaths in that two-year time scale.

Frankly, I am critical of the Youth Justice Board. It is the body that placed 3,337 children who were officially recognised as vulnerable in Prison Service custody in 2003–04, even though 24 per cent. of children in custody report being assaulted and one third report feeling unsafe, according to the inspector of prisons. It is the body that glosses over so many issues. Its recent consultation document on its strategy for the secure estate describes child deaths as "serious incidents". It selectively quotes the Children's Rights Alliance for England to say that it has made miraculous improvements in the Prison Service without giving us the next sentence, which says that a number of institutions "were so bad—were guilty of such gross violations of human rights—that even when improved they still fall short of adequate."

The Youth Justice Board estimates that there are 200 to 300 people whose needs it cannot meet, who today could be in just as much despair as the young people who died. There could be another death in the prison system today, such is the need, scarcity of resource and ineffectual nature of the establishments in getting to grips with some of the most troubled and disturbed young people in the land. We need to do much better, and we should have the principle and guts to face the situation.

All we need to do is take the lead from the magnificent children's policy that the Government are supposed to be developing and from the UN convention on the rights of the child, from which lamentably the Government have secured an opt-out in respect of children in prison. Let us treat all needy children as children. Let us have regard to what other countries do. Let us look at what we tried to do in this country in 1969, for goodness' sake. If we believe that every child matters, we should have the guts and principles to raise the age of criminal responsibility way above the age of 10 to 16. We should ensure that any child over 16 sentenced to custody for offences that endanger the public—some young people do need to be removed from our society—goes to secure care rather than a prison and to somewhere run according to the principles of the Children Act.

[Mr. Dawson]

What we have in this country—and the reason that I am leaving this place—is a fantastic opportunity to transform children's services and the lives of all children. We are faced with the prospect of leaving thousands of children outside those services and in the inadequacies of the prison system. If we raised the age of criminal responsibility, it would ensure that all the new agencies and integrated services would have to respond at length and with real skill to all the neglected, abused, needy, challenging, difficult, ill, naïve and immature young people who cause society problems. They would have to respond to them in terms of those services, the children's needs and the Children Act, not criminal justice legislation.

Using all the resources that we have at our disposal and all the children's legislation, young people could be managed, via Sure Start, extended schools and the range of integrated community resources coming on stream. Excellent workers—people in the youth offending teams, youth inclusion programmes, and intensive supervision and surveillance programmes, and workers in young offenders' institutions who genuinely want to work with children—could be brought out of those institutions and better trained to work with children in the community and the care system. They could work with children in local authority secure care, but do so according to Children Act principles and having been trained properly. They could work with children across the gamut of health, education and social care policy, bringing integrated services together and locating their work largely in the communities from which they come.

That solution applies to many countries and could have applied in this country for the past 30-odd years. It would address offending far more effectively than we do via the current system. It would also address the needs of children as effectively as possible and would help them to grow to maturity—growing up is the best antidote to youth offending—in their own communities but away from the negative influences of a prison culture. It would also keep children safe. I commend that approach to all hon. Members. If we have the principles, we need the political will to carry something like that through. If it were put properly to the people of this country, it would command an enormous amount of support.

Matthew Green (Ludlow) (LD): The hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson) made a powerful and passionate speech, which comes as no surprise to those of us who are aware of his role as one of the few champions in the House of young people. It is a great shame that he has decided to stand down, because that will mean that there is one less of us who think that young people receive far too negative a press. There are those of us who think that that issue should be addressed in a more positive light.

I am surprised that more hon. Members are not present because this is an area where the Government cannot be proud. The Government have been subject to criticism by the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child, in reports by Her Majesty's inspectorate of prisons, and most recently by the Joint Committee on Human Rights.

How can it be that in the United Kingdom there are currently 2,665 young people in prison, yet in Italy there is none? How is it that the Italians can manage the system so differently from us? Are the young people in Italy all angels? If that is the reason, we must be breeding an awful group of young people. Of course that is not the reason; it is the way in which they are treated.

Most other European countries have, at most, a few dozen young people—perhaps the severest of cases—in custody. Yet we lead the way in Europe in the number of young people that we lock up. The UK cannot be proud of that record.

We heard from the hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre about the number of deaths in custody. I do not want to cover again that ground, about which he spoke so well. However, I would like to speak about the incidence of self-harm among young people in custody. We know, from the Government's own figures, that in 2001–03 there were 414 incidents of self-harm by young people. That is a far higher rate of self-harm than among adults in prison, and is a sign of the underlying problems.

It is also clear that when those young people are put into segregation, the rate increases further. Over a five-year period—1999 to 2004—117 incidents of self-harm occurred in segregation. That includes attempted suicide, which is classed as self-harm. The number of deaths in prison could have been substantially higher if some of those suicide attempts had been successful. The figures are appalling, and the fact that the last young person to die was only 14 is a shocking indictment of the country's attitude to young people in prison.

One of my concerns is that—perhaps to placate the mass media or, in some cases, the public's perception—the Government and the Conservative party seem to be trying to outbid each other on who can sound the toughest about how many people should be locked up. It is a matter of shame that politics should compete on that territory; the Government and the Opposition should see fit to argue that keeping large numbers of young people in prison is nothing to be proud of in the 21st century.

Of even more concern is the fact that prison does not work for young people. The social exclusion unit published a report in 2002 called "Reducing Reoffending by Ex-Prisoners". It found that 84 per cent. of juveniles released from prison in 1997 were reconvicted within two years. Prison cannot be working if the reconviction rate is 84 per cent. For those aged 14 to 21, the reconviction rate was 80 per cent. Of those who served a short sentence of less than 12 months, which is typical for young people, 92 per cent. were reconvicted within two years.

Short sentences do not work; they do not give people time to work with the prisoners. Young persons in prison for less than 12 months are not likely to have their behaviour addressed before being released, and they are likely to be reconvicted. Those are exactly the people for whom we need to find different routes, different ways of dealing with them—perhaps in ways suggested by the hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre.

One of the problems with young offenders' institutions is that, because they are few in number and located in different parts of the country, offenders are often a long way from their families. One of the things that helps to prevent reconviction is for young people to stay connected with their families and the local environment. It is all about making sure that they feel that they have something positive to come out to.

Her Majesty's inspectorate of prisons reported on juveniles in custody in April 2004. It was found that only 30 per cent. of boys and 23 per cent. of girls in custody said that it was easy for their families to visit. They were held too far from their homes, and contact with their families was not easy. Contact with the family must be one of the more important things for young people. The Government's approach to locking up young people is making it more difficult to keep such links.

Some disturbing figures are given in various Government reports. The social exclusion unit found that of those locked up, 25 per cent. of males suffered violence at home; and 85 per cent. of them exhibited signs of personality disorder. Those people need treatment and help. Yet they are often locked up in an environment where they receive no help. Not only are we failing young people; we are failing society, because those young people come out with their behaviour unchanged and their ways unaltered. As a result, they are far more likely to be criminals. That is a problem not only for the individual; it is a problem for society.

The staffing ratio in young offenders' institutions averages between three staff to 40 young offenders and six to 60. It is the lowest staff-client ratio of any child placement of any kind in any sector. It is no surprise that we are failing those children if they are being put in places where they have the least chance of being helped, yet that seems to be the preferred route.

Under section 98 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, if the youth offending team deems 15 or 16-year-old males to be too vulnerable for prison placement, the courts may direct them to be held in remand in a local authority secure unit or a secure training centre. The problem with that is that the order can be made only if placements are available on the day on which the remand decision is taken. The availability of placements in secure accommodation is the critical factor, regardless of the vulnerability assessment. The randomness of the availability of places cannot be in the best interests of the individual or society and cannot be the best way of placing these children. That is why some children who have been assessed as vulnerable continue to be sent to young offenders' institutions.

The Government should consider expanding that sector as an alternative to young offenders' institutions, even as a first step and simply to meet the needs of the assessments which the Crime and Disorder Act has allowed to be taken into account. They have set up a system that should help, but the lack of places is helping to create the problem. They have opened the door to a solution, but they have not created the resource that will provide the answer and produce the end result.

I support the call for a public inquiry into the death of Joseph Scholes, not only because his death was sad and tragic, but because it might open the way for the country as a whole to realise that the situation in this country is scandalous and that other countries deal with youth remand better than we do. We need to learn from other countries and to find a way of solving this problem. The Labour Government cannot be proud of these figures. I am sure that they would criticise them if they were in Opposition.

I am sure that the Minister wants to reduce the number of young people in prison. If he does want to reduce them, he should examine the experience of other countries and find ways of expanding the number of secure children's homes and secure training centres run by local authorities, as they are a substantial improvement on young offenders' institutions. They offer a way forward, but this issue does not appear to be a priority for the Government.

2.47 pm

Mr. Humfrey Malins (Woking) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson) on securing the debate and on the thoughtful and constructive way in which he has always approached these issues. I sense today, and I am sure the Minister will agree, that the debate is not party political but is being conducted by parliamentarians with an interest in the subject, and I hope that they can say something constructive.

I am also grateful to the hon. Member for Ludlow (Matthew Green) for his well chosen words. I declare an interest in that I am a former stipendiary magistrate, I sit as a district judge, and I am a recorder of the Crown court, so I am involved with juveniles in my very part-time professional life, which I hope will not become full time before long.

There is no particular theme to what I want to say today, but I have several observations to make which I hope will be a constructive contribution to the debate on young persons in custody. How does one deal with them? Here is a passing thought, which was echoed in an earlier comment: where it is essential for young people to be in custody, it is my experience and that of many other district judges that nothing can be achieved by a short sentence. There is little point in putting someone behind bars for four, five, six or seven weeks, because nothing is achieved. If one has to put young people in custody, there is a strong argument for a sentence of sufficient length to enable something useful to be done.

The problem has been illustrated already: there are vast numbers of young people in custody. A couple of months ago there were more than 10,000 under 21-year-olds in prison in England and Wales and, as has been said, 2,500 under 18-year-olds in custody. The striking thing is that certain features are common to an extremely high percentage of the under 18-year-olds. A huge percentage have low literacy and numeracy levels, have a history of being in care or social services or have some form of personality disorder or psychotic illness. A huge percentage, therefore, come from a background that is hardly likely to encourage a secure and stable life.

Young people today also face some problems that I do not think you and I, Mr. Deputy Speaker, faced when we were young. They are the twin problems of drink and drugs, which drive so many people to crime and therefore into custody. Young people are no exception. It is a sorry state of affairs that in today's community binge drinking is not limited to those of a greater age, but is prevalent among both 18 and 19-year-olds and, regularly, 15 and 16-year-olds, who get fake ID cards and believe that it is sensible to behave like mad people on drink. That leads to crime. Many youngsters who commit crime and go into custody have been fuelled by drink, which is much more readily available nowadays.

[Mr. Humfrey Malins]

As for drugs, I might not even have heard of heroin or crack cocaine when I was 17—in fact, I cannot remember. Certainly the prevalence of drugs and the easy access to the killer drugs, which turn youngsters into criminals, did not exist 20 or 30 years ago. Youngsters are growing up in a much more difficult society, where much less is set in concrete than was the case 20 or 30 years ago.

I want to make a couple of points about sentencing and what works with youngsters. I am not a fan of the drug treatment and testing order, under which youngsters on drugs are told by the court that they are on the order for six months, which means that they have to return to the court every month and that they will be tested from time to time, to see how they are getting on. The results are mixed. Imagine if there were such a thing as a smoking treatment and testing order, whereby one was told to go away and stop smoking, and be tested now and again. My point is that the drug treatment and testing order lacks the element of compulsion that could make it work.

On the other hand, when I was considering the literally dozens of available sentences for young people, I came across one that has, over the past year or so, been—I do not like the term—"rolled out". I am referring to the intensive supervision and surveillance programme, which is one of the orders that a court can serve a young person.

Such orders at least get to grips with the young person, usually a prolific young offender, who for 12 months will be under the supervision of the probation service. During that time there will be intensive work on education and training, family support, skills and restorative justice. The young person will try positively to change offending behaviour. Help will be given with accommodation and drug treatment problems. There will be a minimum of five hours of educational activities each week day, even for youngsters who have truanted from school, and evening and weekend contact with a relevant worker. There is a huge emphasis on jobs, and a continuing emphasis on contact, through tracking, policing and tagging. Such orders are intensive and work extremely well—not all do, and the courts struggle hard.

I shall move off sideways because something has occurred to me. I went to a judicial sentencing seminar the other day, and we had to pass sentence according to the following set of facts. Three boys aged 12, 12 and 11 go up to another boy in the playground and say, "Give me £1 or we'll thump you." Later in the day, they go up to another boy and say, "Give me your drink or we'll hit you." The astonishing thing is that that was a judicial sentencing exercise in which the charge was robbery. I thought it strange that we were dealing with 12-year-olds behaving as 12-year-olds always have, and they were going through the court system and I had to think of a sentence. What is going on in the school and at home when someone cannot get a grip of 12-year-olds and say, "Come on, let's do better"? That was just a passing thought, and is a sad reflection on 2005.

I shall now discuss a couple of things that work. We are not talking about party policy today; I am of the view that nobody should be in custody unless there is no alternative. Terrific emphasis should be placed on young people and problems at an early age to try to keep them out of custody. I went to the young offenders' institution and remand centre at Feltham a couple of years ago and heard an astonishing story. "What are you doing here?" I said to somebody. "I was driving while disqualified for the third time." "Any other convictions?" "No, I just drive while disqualified." "Why do you drive while disqualified? What's the problem?" I asked. "Well", he said, "I can't pass the written and theory tests because I can't read and I can't write. But I'm a damn good driver and I've never done anything else wrong in my life." "Well how are you getting on with reading and writing now?" "Not at all well, nothing's happening." One despairs.

The Minister will have heard of Trailblazers, which is a good scheme originating from Feltham for one-to-one mentoring. Youngsters in the last few months of their sentence at Feltham are visited by mentors. If you were my mentor, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you would be there twice a week seeing me for a couple of hours and continually thereafter, telling me about life, meeting me two or three times a week and helping me to get a job. The mentors might have a criminal background themselves, which is all the more reason why they will be useful in that respect. Trailblazers at Feltham is committed to improving the lives of young offenders and has some extraordinarily good statistical rates for lack of reconvictions.

What about custody? A young friend of mine, Tom Rogan, was at St. John's school in Leatherhead. Older children at that school had almost a mentoring relationship with younger and similar aged people in the Leatherhead area with problems. Some of them had attention deficit disorder, some had domestic problems and others turned to crime. They used to talk to them to try to find out what was going on and whether they could help. Tom said that they all thought, as 17 and 18-year-olds, that there was a place for custody, and I agree that there is. The point was made earlier that some young offenders glory in going to prison, but on the other hand, as Tom said, incarceration takes the cool out of crime. He went on to say that they were convinced, as 17 and 18-year-olds, that what those young people from disadvantaged backgrounds lacked were the skills to make their own way in the community, family support, training, education and confidence. They felt that there was much more work to do on that.

Finally, I want to refer to a new programme, which I think is called the intensive fostering programme. The Home Office will know about the scheme, which is to be used instead of custody. Effectively, there is a supervision order to the youth offending team requiring the offender to reside for one year with a professional carer. In cases where the family background of the young person is absolutely chaotic and dismal, there may be a requirement to live with professional fosterers, who have to be very decent and good families to give the love and care to a youngster who is going off the rails that they have so sadly missed in the past. I do not intend to sound soppy when I say that love, care, discipline, a good education and a secure background are extremely important. If we are to get more youngsters out of custody and get them off the conveyor belt to crime, as my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) said on one occasion, that is the way that we must move.

Those are a few passing thoughts. They come from someone who does not talk party politically today and who recognises the problems in the system. I believe that drink and drugs are greatly involved in some of today's problems. Many more drug rehabilitation places are necessary.

Mr. Dawson: The hon. Gentleman speaks from huge experience as a judge and stipendiary magistrate. He has expressed his support for all the positive programmes that have been introduced. However, there is no reason why any of them could not be carried on with young people within the care system, as an attachment to supervision orders in care proceedings. There is surely no reason why any of these measures have to be taken with young people who have been through the criminal justice system.

Mr. Malins: The hon. Gentleman is right. One of the problems with all these courses is funding. Many are extremely expensive. Many of these courses exist outside the criminal justice system, but they are linked with it in many ways. I suspect that our successors will be sitting here in 30 years asking what on earth can be done about young people and crime and the large numbers in custody. This is one area of policy where there are serious contributions to be made from men and women of good will in every political party. We all share the same objective: more young people with constructive and good lives and fewer, if possible, in custody.

3.3 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Paul Goggins): It has been excellent debate. We have heard three superb speeches from the hon. Members for Woking (Mr. Malins) and for Ludlow (Matthew Green) and from my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson). I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this important debate. It is a difficult subject, but I, as the Minister, do not shy away from it. I am glad to have the opportunity to discuss it with him and other colleagues.

My hon. Friend has, as usual, spoken with great passion, understanding and experience. His experience goes back beyond 1997, when he entered this House, to his former professional career. In some ways I was pleased that there were fewer speeches than there might have been this afternoon as it gave him a superb opportunity to lay out in full his beliefs and views on the issue. I am sure that in years to come when people ask what he stood for here, we can point them in the direction of his speech today. It summed up everything. My hon. Friend was candid enough to admit that of the letters in his postbag, half support his views and the other half oppose them. But that does not deter him from trying to strike the right balance. Nor does it deter me, even though we may strike it in a slightly different position.

We have been grappling with two basic questions. First, is custody ever an appropriate response to offending by young people? Secondly, if it can be justified, how can we make a positive intervention in a young person's life that can help them to turn away from offending? On the first question I want to make the Government's view absolutely clear: custody should only be used as a last resort. The vast majority of young people who get into trouble can be steered away from offending without the need for custody. Indeed, we have given statutory backing to that requirement in the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 and the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000.

The statistics show that by and large those who go into custody have committed a serious offence for which there is no realistic alternative sentence, pose a danger to the public or are persistent offenders for whom other options have not worked.

Every year, about 190,000 young people get into trouble with the police. About half are dealt with outside the court system by means of reprimands or final warnings, and most of them stay out of trouble after such intervention. Of those who go to court and are convicted, the overwhelming majority get either a low-level disposal or a community sentence, such as action plan orders, supervision orders, or community rehabilitation orders. Only about 4 per cent. go into custody each year, and they are mostly young people who have failed to respond to non-custodial sentences.

Reference has been made to antisocial behaviour, but young people are not sent to custody for one-off acts of antisocial behaviour. Reprehensible as they are and urgently though they need to be dealt with, we are talking about young people committing serious crimes or having a long-standing record of repeat serious offending.

Mr. Dawson: There is a serious, new but growing problem of young people being sentenced to custody because they are in breach of antisocial behaviour orders. They are often young people without substantial criminal records, but we have opened up a new avenue for custody.

Paul Goggins: My hon. Friend raises what I know has been an issue of public debate, and because of that and my responsibilities, I have carefully examined the figures. The numbers of young people going into custody due to a breach of an antisocial behaviour order are very small. People are served with ASBOs not for dropping litter in the street, for example, but for very serious behaviour that can destroy the lives of individuals and families. It is a serious matter, although I reassure my hon. Friend that the numbers are small.

When a young person is sent into custody, it is important that it is not seen as a stand-alone initiative. If we have learned nothing else, it is that periods of custody must be followed with intensive supervision in the community. The hon. Member for Woking quoted the example of Trailblazers, and was quite right: part of that ongoing supervision and support is often provided by mentors who can provide the personal support to young people that is often necessary to sustain the change that we all want to see.

Matthew Green: The Minister is arguing that young people who end up in custody are often repeat offenders whose behaviour other systems have failed to address. However, 84 per cent. of young offenders who go to prison reoffend within two years. They are being sent into a system that is almost guaranteed to fail them as well.

Paul Goggins: I know that the hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friend both raised the issue of reoffending rates, and I share their concern about the high levels of reoffending. I am determined to do everything that we can to reduce those levels, although they indicate that individuals going into custody are young people who are already showing an embedded pattern of crime in their behaviour, which regrettably often recurs after their release from prison. We must, at the very least, reduce the rate and seriousness of reoffending. I assure the House that the Government will do everything possible, working in partnership with the Youth Justice Board, to do that.

In everything that I am saying, I do not wish for one minute to appear complacent about the current situation; nobody should be, and we intend to do more. The hon. Member for Woking mentioned the intensive supervision and surveillance programme, which combines challenging, purposeful activity with intensive surveillance, and can include electronic tagging. From a standing start in July 2001 to the end of November last year, there were 1,346 young people on ISSP schemes. Those young people would otherwise have run a serious risk of being in custody, but we can sustain them in the community under that intensive supervision.

Mr. Malins: If I did not say so earlier, let me tell the Minister that the district judges' bench was not happy about these orders in the early days, but the more time goes by, the more it believes that they are beginning to work and could be a success.

Paul Goggins: That is very encouraging. We have had other feedback from sentencers and professionals in the field to support that view. That is why the draft youth justice Bill, which was announced in the Queen's Speech, will contain proposals for further measures. These will include an intensive supervision and surveillance order, turning the packaged support that we have been discussing into a substantial provision, which the courts will be able to use as a clear alternative to a custodial sentence. We will also be making the statutory criteria for custodial sentences tighter still.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned intensive fostering, and that is also something that we want to see develop. Clearly, if a young person has been deprived of decent, normal relationships, that may in some way be behind their offending behaviour. If we can get them that experience of family life and put them back on track, that will send a sensible and positive message.

I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman was rather critical of the drug testing and treatment order. It is true that there were relatively high levels of reoffending in the early pilots, although, again, those who were subject to DTTOs were high-level offenders and chaotic drug users. The evidence is that if we can get people through these programmes, many of them will stop committing offences. Reporting back to sentencers is an important aspect of the order; it is an additional responsibility for sentencers, but my experience is that offenders who know that they must go back and have their progress reported directly to sentencers have an added incentive. Indeed, those who go back to the sentencer, having managed to stay off drugs and free from crime—this would apply to young people, too—get a massive boost when the sentencer can, for once, say something positive about them, rather than repeat the usual negative message. However, we shall no doubt return to the issue in due course.

We have discussed the state of the juvenile secure estate and the regimes for young people who are placed in custody. I acknowledge that criticisms of it have been made here and elsewhere, and there is certainly scope for improvement; I do not deny that for a second. However, it is worth spelling out some of the improvements that have been made in provision for under-18s over recent years.

Until 2000, there was no separate secure estate for under-18s. In that year, we took the major step of giving the Youth Justice Board responsibility for purchasing and commissioning juvenile secure places. We saw that as a key step in raising standards and improving the conditions in which juveniles are kept. We have invested heavily in improving custodial provision. In 2003–04—the last year for which we have audited accounts—the Youth Justice Board spent £225 million on the secure estate, which was a 20 per cent. increase over 2000–01.

That investment has clearly brought results. The Youth Justice Board has established an entirely separate juvenile estate for boys, and I am delighted to be able to confirm that it has achieved the goal of removing all 15 and 16-year-old girls from Prison Service accommodation. It has also set up a national system for placing offenders, and it is worth saying that boys under 15 and all girls under 17 are held in secure training centres or local authority secure children's homes. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster and Wyre feels strongly about the number of local authority secure children's home places that are available, and it is true that the number of such places has fallen in recent years from 297 to 235. At the same time, however, we have developed the secure training centre places, which were not there in the past. Between them, those two areas of provision now offer accommodation and supervision for the younger boys and for most of the girls who come into the custodial system. They provide 509 places, considerably more than there used to be.

Mr. Dawson: I did not say much about secure training centres. However, would the Minister confirm that in their staffing ratios, the quality of life that they offer and the training of the staff whom they employ, they do not meet the standards and principles of residential care for children?

Paul Goggins: I can see that there are differences. However, I think that some of the differences that appear to my hon. Friend to be negative are positive. Secure training centres offer greater scope for education, more space, and more opportunity to do certain activities and, by and large—from what I have seen—they are safe and do constructive work with young people. It is sometimes argued that we developed them because they are cheap. They are a little—not much—cheaper than local authority secure children's homes. The average annual cost of a place in a secure children's home is about £185,000, and one in a secure training centre is £164,000. They are not cheap; they are expensive, and we are right to make that investment. I take extremely seriously the safety of children in secure training centres.

Mr. Dawson: I accept that my hon. Friend takes the safety of children in secure training centres extremely seriously. However, there have recently been two deaths in such centres, one during an incident of restraint. I gave some statistics about the thousands of times in which restraint has been used in secure training centres. What has the Home Office done to investigate the methods of restraint used by staff in those establishments?

Paul Goggins: If my hon. Friend will forgive me, I will come to that a little later. I hope that he will allow me to conclude the part of my speech that emphasises the improvements that we have made in provision for young people in custody. The increase in educational funding has been substantial, and a young person in custody now has an average of 24 hours' education and training every week. Some might think that that is not remarkable; that that should be our standard. I agree. However, it was not achieved in the past, and we are achieving it now. That is wholly positive.

Of course, hon. Members are right to press for further improvements. I am sure that more needs to be done, and we should all consider what might be possible. However, it is also fair to acknowledge the improvement in standards. My hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster and Wyre pointed out that a rather partial quotation from the Children's Rights Alliance was used in the recent the Youth Justice Board publication. None the less, it acknowledged that improvement had occurred, as did the Audit Commission, which regards our youth justice system as a massive improvement over what there was before.

A matter of particular concern to my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster and Wyre, and to hon. Members of all parties, is the serious and pressing issue of suicide and self-harm. The recent death of Gareth Price at Lancaster Farms YOI, like all deaths in custody, was a terrible tragedy, and I send my deepest sympathy to Gareth's family, and to the staff at Lancaster Farms. My hon. Friend mentioned earlier that he and I went together to Lancaster Farms just a few days ago and met the member of staff who tried to save that young boy's life. We should never forget the efforts that staff make, and the care that they show the vulnerable young people in our custodial system. I pay tribute to them for that, and am grateful that my hon. Friend has joined me in doing so.

We take such deaths extremely seriously. First, there is a police investigation whenever there is a death in custody. That is quite right because, depending on the circumstances, there might be grounds for a prosecution. Certainly, there is a need for a report to the coroner. Of course, the coroner carries out an inquest into all deaths that occur in custody. There is also the chapter 8 review, using the Department of Health guidelines, which is conducted by the local authority for the area in which the young person resided ordinarily. As the prisons and probation ombudsman has been given the responsibility for investigating all deaths in custody, including, now, those of juveniles, there is also the investigation that he carries out with support from the Youth Justice Board. So a rigorous and comprehensive view is taken of any death in custody, and rightly so.

Shortly—before the end of February, I hope—the Home Office will be able to respond to the Joint Committee on Human Rights, which published before Christmas an extensive and important report on deaths in custody. I hope that the House will see from our response that we take these issues seriously.

Mr. Dawson: Will my hon. Friend tell me why the Home Office turned down the recommendation from the coroner at the Joseph Scholes inquest that there should be a public inquiry? I know that he has taken a great deal of action in this regard, but surely there is a good case for a public inquiry.

Paul Goggins: The case for a public inquiry has been put by hon. Members. The coroner who conducted the inquest into Joseph Scholes's death wrote to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary to urge him to consider a public inquiry, and we considered the arguments for such an inquiry very seriously. It was of great concern to us to ensure that we responded to the concerns that the coroner expressed, which were in three areas. First, he was concerned about the sentencing issues to which Joseph's case gave rise, particularly as regards sentencing for robbery. It seemed to us that it was appropriate to refer that matter to the Sentencing Guidelines Council, which will draw up sentencing guidelines in respect of robbery. We want the council to consider carefully the case of Joseph Scholes as it draws up its guidance.

Secondly, a number of operational issues arose from Joseph's case. We asked David Lambert, a former assistant chief inspector for the social services inspectorate, to undertake a review of all the operational issues and to report back to the Home Office his findings. I anticipate that his report will be with me very soon. We shall certainly want to learn from any operational issues that he deals with and makes recommendations on in his report.

The third strand of concern relates to the provision of custodial places. As the Youth Justice Board is conducting a review of the secure estate—my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster and Wyre referred to the document that it published—it was timely that we asked the board to incorporate questions about Joseph Scholes's case in its consideration. My hon. Friend and others will note from the document that that is one of the specific requirements that I have placed on the Youth Justice Board as it carries out its review.

We have sought to break down the concerns into those three strands and to deal with them urgently, so that we can learn from Joseph's tragic death. We let Joseph Scholes down terribly, and there is no hiding from that. We have to learn from his case. The fact that we do not agree that a public inquiry is needed should not lead anyone to think that we do not regard this as a most serious matter, but we are seeking to develop responses as quickly and comprehensively as possible in the way that I have outlined, rather than through a public inquiry.

Matthew Green: The Minister has mentioned in relation to two of the concerns that he has outlined that there will be reports. Will he reassure the House that those reports will be published in full, with all relevant details? One reason for the demand for a public inquiry is the concern that somehow the system will sweep this matter under the carpet. It would go some way towards meeting people's concerns if all the reports were published in full as a result.

Paul Goggins: On reports by the prisons and probation ombudsman, which do not apply to the case of Joseph Scholes because he did not have the responsibility at the time, there are sometimes difficulties in publishing reports in full because of personal details. However, in relation to the three issues that I have outlined, it will, I hope, be apparent from the Sentencing Guidelines Council report that the case of Joseph Scholes has been taken into account. Any recommendations made by David Lambert will be made public, and I see no problem in publishing all of his report. Subject to further clarification, I can give the Chamber that assurance.

It is apparent in the Youth Justice Board's document that it is taking account of the case of Joseph Scholes in its review, and I am sure that we will look to its eventual proposal, following the consultation period, to see that it has taken account of that tragic case in its future plans. I am a firm believer in transparency in most things, and certainly in this area, and I assure the hon. Gentleman that we will seek to make it plain what lessons have been learned and how recommendations will be put into effect.

New policies and practices have been introduced by the Prison Service and the Youth Justice Board since 2001. They include counselling, support groups, specialised psychological interventions and measures to improve general health. It is worth emphasising that from April almost all prisons will have their health services commissioned by the local primary care trust. In other words, the national health service will take over all health provision in our prisons, and in most of them that will be from this April. That is leading to substantial new investment in health, and it will inevitably lead to improvements in the quality and standards of health care that is provided. That is a wholly good thing.

We now have in place suicide prevention co-ordinators in all our establishments, and the Youth Justice Board has funded dedicated juvenile outreach teams. Further measures are being put in place, and more action is planned to improve regimes. We are putting in place first-night and reception facilities, better systems for recognising vulnerability, child protection training, mental health nursing, counselling and peer support. We also want to minimise the use of segregation.

It is important to remember that young people in custody often have very serious problems that form a major part of the background to their offending—for example, family histories or a history of substance misuse. Looking after and safeguarding such damaged young people will never be an easy task. Identifying which young people are most at risk is critical, and although a significant number of young people in custody are assessed as vulnerable, many can be safely accommodated in a juvenile young offender institution with the right help. Others who are more vulnerable may be better placed in a secure training centre or local authority children's home.

Hon. Members—and my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster and Wyre in particular—raised concerns about the use of restraint, especially since the death of Gareth Myatt in Rainsbrook secure training centre in April last year. Investigations and inquiries into Gareth's death are still in progress, so I am not in a position to say much about the particular circumstances of the case. However, I can confirm that the Youth Justice Board is reviewing the safety of restraint techniques in secure training centres and considering how better behaviour management practices could help to minimise the need for restraint. It is vital that all establishments are safe for young people.

In November, the Youth Justice Board issued a consultation document, "Strategy for the Secure Estate for Juveniles", which has been mentioned several times. It sets out in detail some of the achievements that I have referred to, explains the assumptions and principles underlying the board's approach to custody, and outlines plans for the period 2005–06 to 2007–08. The consultation period ends on 28 February. I shall refer the Hansard report of this debate to that review—it is important that our views are known—and I assure the Chamber that we will continue to ensure that wherever young people are kept in custodial care, that is done as safely as possible.

Classroom Discipline

3.30 pm

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): I am grateful for having secured this important and timely debate on classroom discipline, and in advance I thank the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills, my hon. Friend the Member for Halton (Derek Twigg), for taking the time to respond. He will know that our right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Skills made a speech at the Secondary Heads Association conference in Blackpool on 1 February, in which she set out proposals to improve classroom behaviour. In her closing statement, she said:

"I have set out today my approach to this vital issue. Now I want to hear from you."

So as we build on the emergent tradition in this excellent facility of Westminster Hall, I offer the Minister some thoughts, which I am sure he will take away and build on.

I have already been asked why a Welsh Member of Parliament should sally forth on an issue that has been devolved to Wales. There are two reasons. First, to define me or any of my Welsh colleagues as purely Welsh MPs is to miss the fact that we are also Members of the British Parliament. Proud as I am of being Welsh and of representing the fine constituency of Ogmore in south Wales, I have a role to play in all legislation and policy that passes through this House, so I boldly set foot on such territory.

Secondly, and perhaps more importantly, the issue of classroom discipline reads across geopolitical boundaries in the United Kingdom, as our educational systems in Wales and England have developed together over a long period and still have fundamentally similar approaches. So a discussion in Westminster Hall has reverberations in the debating Chamber at Cardiff bay. Every parent and teacher in London, Llanelli, Bridgend or Birmingham has concerns about classroom behaviour.

At the outset, it is important to note that although the tabloids will rage about this issue, our classrooms are not in anarchy. However, the Ofsted report shows that 10 per cent. of secondary schools have unsatisfactory levels of behaviour. We should deplore that, but we should strongly applaud the seven in 10 schools whose pupils' behaviour is deemed good or better, and we should encourage the two in 10 schools that are deemed satisfactory to build on their success and to improve.

Hon. Members must be concerned that one in 10 schools have unsatisfactory standards of pupil behaviour. We must ask where those schools are located. What are their catchments? I am willing to hazard a guess that a disproportionate number are in communities that face the greatest social, cultural and economic challenges. The Minister might want to correct my assumption, but it is a pretty wise guess. If I am correct, there is an added imperative to tackle disruptive behaviour, because the children, teachers, head teachers, governors and parents whom we are failing in the most challenging communities will be the ones whom we most want to help.

The Government have singly pioneered the cause of social inclusion. Year after year and in so many ways, we have proved that we are bold enough to offer radical solutions to creating people's life opportunities. We have acknowledged that the debate has changed. We have put that on record and changed the debate, so that everyone now acknowledges that a good education in early years through to secondary school is of paramount importance to improving life chances. However, that good education can be marred by classroom indiscipline, and the life chances of any child thus diminished.

Just as we have come to recognise the corrosive effect of low-level antisocial behaviour in our communities, there has been recognition, at least in the Labour party, of the destructive power of low-level indiscipline in our classrooms. What might have been termed "having an attitude" a few years ago can be seen in many ways, such as arriving late to class—I warn anyone who might wander in late to this debate that that will be an indication of their classroom tendencies. There is chatting while the teacher talks, of which Mr. Deputy Speaker might also take notice; leaving the school grounds without authority; answering back; abusive language; and annoying and distracting other pupils.

Those might seem minor and relatively unimportant issues on their own—some might say that they are hardly worth bothering about—but they are highly important, as they systematically undermine teachers and support staff; and they destroy the classroom experience for the majority of pupils, who want to learn, and for the majority of parents, who want to see their children benefit from the school experience. We do not want every pupil to be the teacher's pet presenting a shiny new apple every day. However, if some children are themselves the bad apples, the whole barrel can rot from within.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State recently argued for zero tolerance of classroom indiscipline. That caused some controversy: the phrase "zero tolerance" caused some to go into a spin. The zero tolerance approach to education in the United States was pioneered in response to acts of violence that often involved firearms and knives, but can we really apply zero tolerance to low-level misbehaviour of the sort that I have described?

Critics argue that the concept of zero tolerance in the classroom is singularly unhelpful. It suggests punishments for minor infringements of behaviour that are far too severe. It implies a draconian approach to classroom discipline. It smacks of a clampdown. It treats all offences equally severely, and it does not recognise different levels of indiscipline. Importantly, it does not recognise that solutions should be tailored to the individual needs of the child. Yet I strongly believe that the concept and language of zero tolerance have a significant role to play—and it does not have to be to the exclusion of other complementary approaches.

Saying that all types of classroom misbehaviour, no matter how severe or minor, are not to be tolerated and will be dealt with is not incompatible with saying that the response to different types of misbehaviour will differ in scale and complexity. Zero tolerance and a flexible, tailor-made response to each pupil's needs are not incompatible.

That approach could and should build on the good work already being done in the best local education authority areas and among the best schools, which share good practice. Solutions to misbehaviour should involve flexible discipline plans, formulated with the help of teachers, parents and pupils. They should involve excellent in-school, on-site support, to avoid the possibility of exclusion. We know too well the slippery slope that leads from school exclusion to a more fundamental social exclusion, and on to criminality. It is far too obvious to be ignored. Not taking steps to avoid exclusion also has costs. We should encourage schools to work together to develop active, engaged pupil referral units—units that work intensively with schools to re-engage the pupils with mainstream education.

All of those approaches are essential; and without them, talk of zero tolerance is meaningless. With them, however, zero tolerance takes on a new life. It sends out the clear message that we are on the side of teachers and of children. We should have zero tolerance not only of violence and abuse in the classroom but of low-level indiscipline by the few, which can disrupt the class and destroy the learning experience for others.

The message of zero tolerance signals that the Government believe that authority should be invested in the teachers, that classroom discipline is with the teachers, and that we trust the teachers to carry out that important role. The political signal is crucial but, as stated, it has to be backed by a parallel policy of co-ordinated, flexible support for the child and sometimes for the parents, to ensure that exclusion is avoided whenever possible.

Let us be clear, however, that exclusions have a role. We cannot do as Opposition spokesmen suggest and take away review panels and exclusions. Just as head teachers must have the backing of politicians to exclude pupils as a last resort to protect their staff, other children and the learning experience and ethos of the school, so should the child and the parents have the fundamental right to challenge the decision of a schoolteacher and a board of governors to exclude. In that way, on the rare occasions—and they are rare occasions—when the decision to exclude is questionable, it can be challenged and overturned if necessary.

Currently, the Opposition parties claim that the exclusions policy is in disarray owing to successful challenges. They would argue that every successful challenge diminishes the authority of the teacher, the head teacher and the governors, and also diminishes the culture of discipline in the school. If I were a teacher, and a pupil of mine were to argue that in an essay entitled, "The standards in our schools and the youth of today", my response would be to summon that individual to my office, order them to do extra homework and more research, and tell their parents those dreaded words, "Could do better."

In fact, as the Opposition know full well, only one in 50 appeals against exclusions is successful. Putting on my maths teacher hat, that means that 98 per cent. of exclusion decisions are deemed valid and appropriate. That is not an exclusions policy in chaos. Exclusions have a vital role to play. Would any MP seriously tell the parents in their constituency that, when their darling son or daughter is threatened with exclusion, there is no recourse to appeal, and that that is only natural justice? I hope not, but I suspect that over the next few months my hopes are likely to be dashed.

Zero tolerance is a message not only for children and teachers but for parents. I know the implications of that all too well. I have three boys in primary school; they will grow up into teenagers and, if they are anything like me, heaven help us. I have triple the potential for disciplinary slip-ups as time goes on, especially when they get into comprehensive school and discover girls and parties. I therefore do not say what I am about to say lightly, but it needs to be said. Parents must take responsibility for the education of their own children as much as teachers do—in fact more so. By their own words and actions, parents can either reinforce or tear down the school's approach to discipline.

One day, in a school in my constituency—a school that has a very good track record on discipline and behaviour—I watched in amazement as a parent charged into the reception area while I was waiting for a meeting, towing behind him quite roughly a clearly distraught child who was in tears. The child was embarrassed and humiliated. He watched his father launching a tirade of abuse against the school secretary—abuse that would not have been out of place after the 9 o'clock watershed. He issued threats and accusations over a relatively minor issue that could easily have been sorted out. A teacher then came out to deal with him, and again I was amazed at the abuse and vitriol that he hurled at teaching staff in a public place.

I can understand a parent who comes to school with valid concerns and raises them—we try to encourage that—or someone who argues on behalf of their child with the teachers or the head teacher. However, what message would a child witnessing such an exchange take away about the authority of the school and the status of the teachers and school staff? What strategies did that child learn about how to tackle issues? He might himself want to challenge the teacher at some point, having learned that the appropriate way was to shout and harangue—not to listen, but to hurl abuse and invective, and not to show respect, but to denigrate those who should have some authority within the school. That is why I am adamant that, as well as the soft approaches of support for children and parents, and the harder measures to deal with children, such as exclusion, there must be similar packages to deal with parents.

We face a mixture of challenges. Some parents do not have the appropriate skills to parent effectively, and they do not know how to instil discipline in their own children or how to set boundaries for them. Such parents can and should be offered support and active intervention to help them to develop those skills. We should make much more use of parenting programmes. I know that the Government are committed to that. Parenting programmes are a classic example of something for which we are accused of being a nanny state and intervening, but they work very well, helping parents to turn around their approach to their children and to parenting.

Such softer support mechanisms have to be reinforced with firmer measures. They should include sanctions and penalties. It is no good pretending that support measures, coupled with the good will of the school and agencies, will be sufficient to convince every parent of the need for discipline and of the role that they have to play. I applaud the Government's commitment to further the use of stronger measures. Those have to include, as a last resort, parenting orders administered through the courts and penalty notices for truancy. There has to be more willingness to use those measures.

It is right that teachers demand of the Government and politicians at all levels that we put appropriate mechanisms in place to assist with classroom discipline, and that we put ourselves firmly on the side of teachers and children. We must support teachers and give them the message that we trust them to get on with using the measures, flexibly and with autonomy, to meet the needs in their schools. However, zero tolerance is an important message in setting that agenda and the benchmark of the type of discipline that we expect.

We have a right to expect that those approaches should be used. Schools and local education authorities should be allowed flexibility and autonomy but they should not be allowed to leave any appropriate tool unused in the toolbox. The adage that a bad workman blames his tools could be rephrased as a bad workman is bad because he does not use the proper tools at the appropriate time. We can innovate; we have seen it already in schools across England and Wales. There is the yellow card system, for example, and the idea that boundaries for behaviour are clearly set for children. It is not a simple knee-jerk reaction, with one penalty fitting all. There is a warning system that shows that children are stepping over the line.

Crucially, while we talk about zero tolerance, we must recognise that children face different challenges. Some have emotional needs; they need help and support. Some are not getting the parental support that they need. Some, quite frankly, do not know what the boundaries of acceptable behaviour are. All of those approaches have to be available in that toolbox and used.

How do we make progress? Further support for teachers in the classroom is undoubtedly necessary, as is support on school sites, so that children are not excluded too readily and we can try to turn the situation around and keep them within mainstream education. Learning support units, which the Government are pushing strongly, are to be welcomed. They need to be used more frequently in more local education authority areas. Schools should be encouraged to exclude where appropriate as a last resort, and backing should be given to head teachers and governors to do so. There is good practice in pupil referral units in England, as there is in Wales, but it is not consistent. We need to push much harder to ensure that, if local education authorities are not developing the resources and expertise, schools work together as consortiums to try to do so. Parental support and parental penalties are also important.

This approach needs some holistic thinking, using all the measures available. The Government and politicians should be unafraid to say not only that bringing weaponry into school and the physical abuse of teachers will not be tolerated, but that boundaries will be set for low-level misbehaviour in class. That will undoubtedly improve the life chances of the children concerned. Correspondingly, if we fail to do that and if schools fail to play their part, they will fail the children in their charge.

I look forward to the Minister's response. This issue is of fundamental importance, and should be considered as such by the Labour Government, who have been so good at tackling social inclusion issues. If we get things right, especially from a grass-roots level, with schools and LEAs consistently taking part, we will deliver a major service, particularly to our most disadvantaged communities, whose schools face the greatest challenges.

3.50 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Derek Twigg): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies) on securing this important debate on what is a crucial area of education. He expressed well his concern, interest and knowledge of the subject.

We take behaviour in schools seriously, and we are the first Government to do so. We have invested a great deal of money in improving behaviour, because we believe that every child has the right to the best possible education, to enjoy learning in a positive environment, to achieve, and to make the best of their life. That applies to every child, not just a few.

Everyone thinks that they know what to do about behaviour, and a lot of ill-informed comments are made and simplistic solutions suggested. Many suggest that most children are disorderly, even out of control, and that behaviour is getting worse all the time. That simply is not true. Ofsted tells us that more than 90 per cent. of behaviour in secondary schools is just satisfactory or better. Schools are often the most secure and stable environment in the communities that they serve.

We know that there is a long way to go. So far, we have taken a two-pronged approach to the issue. First, we have addressed the most challenging areas through the behaviour improvement programme—involving about 1,500 schools that face serious behaviour challenges—through which we provide intensive support in the form of extra learning mentors, learning support units, behaviour and education support teams, and police in schools. The programme will be extended to a further 500 schools later this month.

As my hon. Friend said, there are issues of social disadvantage in relation to behaviour, but that should not be an excuse. Many schools are achieving against serious odds. Brinkburn school draws most of its 920 pupils—one third of whom are entitled to free school meals—from surrounding housing estates in an area of high unemployment and deprivation. It is part of the excellence in cities initiative and the behaviour improvement programme, and has suffered the usual range of behaviour-related problems, which led to a high rate of exclusion. However, the latest Ofsted inspection rated the behaviour of pupils at Brinkburn school as "very good". It stated:

"Relationships are very good and collaboration is a strong feature of the school".

It went on to say:

"Enthusiasm for the school by the majority of pupils is very high."

Improvements in behaviour are reflected in the reduced number of exclusions. In 1998–99, a total of 178 pupils had fixed-term exclusions and 11 were permanently excluded. Those figures have steadily fallen. In 2003–04, 108 pupils had fixed-term exclusions and three were permanently excluded. In the current year, so far only nine pupils have had fixed-term exclusions and only one has been permanently excluded. Those figures effectively represent half-yearly results and put the school on course to far exceed the BIP targets for the year, which are 70 fixed-term and three permanent exclusions.

The professionals, who are the real experts, tell us that their top priority is to continue the support to end low-level classroom disruption, to which my hon. Friend referred. Therefore, the second part of our strategy is to provide all secondary schools with training, materials and extra expert support to tackle the behaviour issues that schools identify as their top priorities. Schools can deal with the great majority of behaviour problems through good teaching, and good behaviour policies and procedures. We are giving them the tools to do so and to improve things.

As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said last week, there are things that we just cannot tolerate: we cannot let pupils arrive at classes with the wrong attitude; we do not want pupils whose thoughts are elsewhere when they should be on their lessons; and we cannot accept such pupils disrupting teaching by annoying their classmates. Every pupil and teacher has the right to expect a safe, secure and orderly classroom, so that teaching and learning can flourish.

My hon. Friend talked about zero tolerance. I am talking about a zero tolerance policy under which any incident and any level of bad behaviour is dealt with promptly and appropriately. Zero tolerance is about creating a climate in a school where everyone—pupils and staff—shows respect for each other and for each other's work. That does not mean excluding more pupils. Schools that involve parents and the whole school community in creating their behaviour policy are less likely to have to exclude pupils. Zero tolerance means zero tolerance of the behaviours that disrupt pupils' learning, not of pupils themselves. That is why my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced the additional things that we will do.

The great majority of schools are effective in this respect; they have agreed a clear behaviour policy, which is respected and supported by the whole school community and developed with parental and pupil involvement. For secondary schools where Ofsted finds behaviour unsatisfactory, we are working with local authorities to ensure that schools develop plans to improve the situation as a matter of urgency, and to ensure that specialist help for improving behaviour is channelled to those schools straight away.

It is not a job just for schools; we must all offer our full support to head teachers, who are striving to promote good behaviour. It is imperative that parents support the school's behaviour policy and do not automatically assume that when their child is punished he or she must be in the right and the school in the wrong. Above all, it means parents taking responsibility for their children's behaviour.

It is not easy for some parents to manage their children's behaviour and there is help and support available to help parents to do that more effectively. Schools and local authorities are being encouraged to engage with parents and to guide them towards sources of help when their children persistently misbehave in school, using home-school agreements and, in cases of exclusion, the parenting contracts that we have introduced. When parents are unwilling to engage, it is right that we take action to ensure that they do so, through parenting orders administered by the courts.

We want every secondary school to have access to a wide range of high-quality support in and out of school. In the classroom, most teachers can manage most forms of poor behaviour and, as I said, we have done a great deal to help to develop those skills, through our key stage 3 behaviour and attendance materials, for example.

Huw Irranca-Davies: Will the Minister on behalf of the Secretary of State undertake to ensure that discussions take place with the Welsh Assembly, so that best practice can be disseminated on both sides of Offa's Dyke—not so that in Wales they follow what we are doing, but so that we can learn from each other's experience?

Derek Twigg: My hon. Friend knows that we are keen to promote best practice, and I shall come to why that is important.

Some children need more; for those at risk of exclusion, support needs to be available within the school but outside the classroom. Schools should have access to approaches such as learning support units, learning mentors and behaviour support teams, which have shown their value in helping young people with challenging behaviour and those at risk of exclusion. The support systems within schools have a vital role in helping head teachers to promote good behaviour, but sometimes they are not enough. We continue to support the right of head teachers to exclude children from school when they need to.

It has been suggested that the existence of appeals panels undermines the rights of heads to exclude; that is nonsense. Exclusion appeals panels provide a safety net for parents and, crucially, keep exclusion decisions out of court and avoid all the extra stress and bureaucracy that that would cause. Less than 2 per cent. of head teachers' decisions on exclusion are overturned by appeals panels ordering the reinstatement of the excluded pupil.

We want to provide quality education for every child, even those who have been excluded. We need a high quality of out-of-school provision that continues their education and deals with their behaviour issues. As part of the local authority-led reviews, local authorities and schools are looking at the adequacy of provision for excluded pupils provided in pupil referral units, for example, or by voluntary organisations. We expect groups of schools increasingly to act as the commissioner for such provisions, purchasing them from local authorities or from the voluntary sector. By exercising their collective buying power, groups of schools will be able to use customer pressure to drive up the quality of provision outside schools and for challenging pupils.

The aim for excluded pupils is that they can eventually return to the classroom when their behavioural problems have been addressed. We remain convinced that schools collectively taking responsibility for such pupils is the right thing to do. It is completely unfair when weaker schools, which are unpopular and have spare places, are required to take all the hard-to-place pupils in an area, which makes it even more difficult for them to bring about the improvements that they need to make. It is also unfair if vulnerable children, such as looked-after children, are denied access to better schools—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We come now to the final debate this afternoon.

Jeremy Bamber

Mr. Andrew Hunter (Basingstoke) (DUP): At 7.35 on the morning of 7 August 1985, officers of the Essex constabulary forcibly entered White House farm, Tolleshunt D'Arcy, Essex. After a search of half an hour, they had found five bodies; those of Neville Bamber, his wife, June, their adopted 28-year-old daughter, Sheila Cafell, and her twin six-year-old sons. At approximately 3.15 that morning, the Bambers' 24-year-old adopted son, Jeremy, who lived in a neighbouring village, had called the local police informing them that he had heard from his father saying that his sister, Sheila, had gone crazy and had a gun. Jeremy Bamber met the police at the farm at about 3.40 am. The police initially believed that Sheila, who had a history of mental illness, had committed four murders before shooting herself, but members of the extended Bamber family soon started trying to convince the police that Jeremy was responsible. In due course, he was arrested, charged and convicted.

The trial was unusual. The judge ruled that only Sheila or Jeremy could have committed the murders. Consequently, a major thrust of the prosecution case was to demonstrate that Sheila could not have been responsible and that Jeremy was therefore guilty. It was a near-run thing; the jury convicted Bamber on a 10:2 majority vote. If just one of 10 jurors had wavered, Bamber would have walked away a free man. Instead, he has been incarcerated for 19 years, consistently protesting his innocence. Subsequent developments, particularly during the past 12 months, have given rise to grave concern that Bamber's conviction may be another of the great miscarriages of justice, to be bracketed with the Bridgewater Three, the Birmingham Six, the Guildford Four and others.

With the Bamber case, the key issue has been, and remains, the non-disclosure of evidence to the defence. Early in 2004, Bamber's new defence team looked at the evidence again, and exhibit 29 caught their attention in particular. It was a document listing some radio messages from the scene of the crime. The defence wondered whether it might be the first page of a longer document rather than a complete document in itself, so they sought clarification. Essex constabulary was adamant that exhibit 29 was a whole document and had been available to the defence for the trial. Unconvinced, Bamber's defence team took the matter to court in March 2004. It was successful, and the police produced the entire document. Exhibit 29, it transpired, was not a single-page document, and Bamber's solicitors received by fax a 24-page summary of radio communications. They then took the unusual step of writing to both the trial judge and the chief prosecution counsel, inquiring if either had known at the time of the trial of the existence of the lengthier log of radio messages. Both replied that they had not.

On receiving the 24 pages, the defence immediately noticed that the first two pages had not only been re-written on different paper from the rest, but had been edited. A comparison with police witness statements revealed that several key radio messages that were made had been left out. Why? The defence therefore asked for the original document so that it could be sent for electrostatic document analysis testing, but Essex constabulary refused. The request has been repeated many times, and on each occasion the constabulary has refused.

The disclosure of the radio message log was not the only dramatic development last March. Bamber's defence had requested only one document. However, perhaps inadvertently, the police also provided evidence that had not been requested—pages from a contemporaneous telephone log and from a contemporaneous incident report. The defence had not known that either existed. It was immediately apparent that the two logs and the incident report that the police had withheld contained details that were entirely inconsistent with the case put by the prosecution at Bamber's trial. I will give just two examples; others might be used by Bamber's defence on another occasion.

First, at 5.25 am, officers in police car call sign Charlie-Alpha 7—the same officers who had met Bamber at White House farm and spent much of the time with him—relayed a message from the tactical firearms team to incident headquarters. The firearms team was in conversation with a person inside the farm. If the police were in conversation with somebody inside the farm at 5.25 am, the case against Bamber collapses. He could not have murdered everybody in the farmhouse before 3 am if at 5.25 am the police were talking to one of his supposed victims. If, on the other hand, the police were in conversation with a third party inside the farmhouse, the judge's ruling that either Jeremy or Sheila and nobody else could have committed the crimes is blatantly wrong. However, neither trial judge nor prosecution or defence had any opportunity to evaluate the 5.25 am entry, because the police had withheld it.

Secondly, four entries in the logs and incident report flatly contradict the prosecution's account that Neville Bamber's body was found downstairs in the kitchen and the other four bodies upstairs. An entry in the radio message log, which the police withheld for nearly 19 years, reads:

"0737: one dead male and one dead female in kitchen".

The telephone message log, which the police withheld for nearly 19 years, records:

"0738: one dead male and one dead female found on entry", and at 7.40 am, the incident log, again withheld by the police for nearly 19 years, records a message from a Detective Inspector "IR"—we know only his initials—which. said:

"Police entered premises. One male dead, one female dead".

We know from their witness statements that at 7.40 am the police had not yet gone upstairs and searched the back of the house, where the other bodies were found. Finally, after they had eventually searched that part of the house and finished their task, they reported:

"House now thoroughly searched by firearms team. Now confirmed a further 3 bodies found".

So, almost immediately on entering the farmhouse, the police had found two bodies downstairs in the kitchen, and later three more bodies had been found upstairs. Most emphatically, that is not what the prosecution said during the trial.

The defence team believes that it probably now knows what happened. It believes that the body of Sheila Cafell, which the police insist that they found upstairs, had first been seen downstairs in the kitchen. Of course, dead bodies do not move. The proposition that Sheila Cafell was still alive when the police thought that she was dead in the kitchen might be dismissed as entirely fanciful if there were not supporting photographic evidence—photographic evidence that was not disclosed until 2001. Unfortunately, Bamber's previous defence did not recognise its significance before his 2002 appeal.

Before the trial in 1986, Bamber's defence had access to a large bundle of scene of crime photographs, which included photographs of the dead bodies. In the cases of June and Neville Bamber, rigor mortis is evident, as is skin discoloration, and the blood is congealed. The defence wrongly assumed that the first bundle contained all the photographs that had been taken. Before the 2002 appeal, however, the defence team was shown another, smaller bundle of 80 to 100 photographs that had previously been withheld.

At Bamber's trial, the prosecution argued that if Sheila had committed the murders and then killed herself, she would have trodden in blood as she moved about the house; but no trace of blood was found on her feet. Interestingly, no photographic evidence was produced at the trial to support that assertion. Curiously, the first bundle of photographs contained no pictures of Sheila's feet. That is not so with the second bundle of photographs, which were withheld. In that bundle were photographs, which were not available at the time of the trial, clearly showing blood on Sheila's feet.

The withheld second bundle contains even more dramatic evidence. There are several photographs of Sheila—there is no rigor mortis, the skin is not discoloured and the blood from her wounds has not yet congealed. Bamber's defence team have shown those photographs to leading pathologists. Independently, they have concluded that Sheila could not have died much more than one and a half hours before the photographs were taken. However, the police photographer did not arrive until a little after 9 o'clock. According to the pathologists, therefore, Sheila died at about the time the police entered White House farm, and Bamber could not have murdered her.

The points that I have made—I could make many others if we had more time—give rise to grave concern about Bamber's conviction. Their common theme is the non-disclosure of evidence by the police. Nearly 16 years after the White House farm murders, the defence first saw the second bundle of photographs. After nearly 19 years, the defence team discovered that there was a full radio log, a telephone log and an incident report, of which it had previously been unaware. It is the understatement of all understatements to say that such non-disclosure is deeply worrying. Even worse, it is still going on.

Bamber's defence team has repeatedly asked for access to the following: first, the notebooks and other papers of Inspector Jones, who headed the initial investigation and firmly believed in Bamber's innocence; secondly, the findings of the coroner who inquired into Inspector Jones's sudden death, which have never been made public; thirdly, the audio recordings of all telephone and radio messages from White House farm; fourthly, the audio recordings describing the scene of the crime; fifthly, the video recordings of the scene of the crime; and sixthly, the original radio and telephone messages log and incident report. All are still being withheld from the defence. On every occasion on which the defence team has asked for them, Essex constabulary has refused to provide them. I put it directly to the Minister—and ask her to respond—that that is surely an intolerable state of affairs.

In December I tabled a written question asking the Home Secretary to instruct Essex constabulary to give Mr. Bamber's solicitors all audio tapes relating to events at White House farm. The Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety replied:

"The disclosure of information held by Essex Constabulary is a matter for the Chief Officer of the force".

Unfortunately, the chief constable has made his position clear: he will not co-operate. One wonders why not. The Minister also stated in her reply:

"If the information requested is available under the access provisions of the Data Protection Act 1998 or the Freedom of Information Act, then Mr. Bamber may have his own rights to gain access to such information under this legislation."—[Official Report, House of Commons, 21 December 2004; Vol. 428, c. 1556W.]

Those possible rights have been explored, but appear not to exist. It is now time for the Home Office to take matters seriously, and consider carefully not only the few points that I have made, but the whole Bamber affair. In particular, it should look at the issue of non-disclosure and the behaviour and attitude of Essex constabulary. It is also time for the Criminal Cases Review Commission to expedite matters so that the case of Mr. Jeremy Bamber is not left in judicial limbo. Such action is necessary to avoid perpetuating what a growing number of people fear may be one of the greatest miscarriages of justice of our times.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Fiona Mactaggart): I thank the hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) and congratulate him on securing this debate on the important and, in many ways, sensational case of Jeremy Bamber, who is currently serving a life sentence for the murder of his adopted parents and sister and her twin sons.

The hon. Gentleman has stated that he believes that the Home Office should look closely at the Bamber affair, and in particular at the issue of non-disclosure and the behaviour and attitude of Essex constabulary. I shall begin by saying that, on previous occasions, the Home Office has looked closely at the Bamber affair, as have the constabulary and the City of London police, following a complaint by Mr. Bamber to the Police Complaints Authority under the previous system. Its 14-month study did not uphold Mr. Bamber's complaint. Since then, there have been reforms to the Police Complaints Authority, and I do not know whether Mr. Bamber has made a further complaint to the new Independent Police Complaints Commission. Perhaps, however, it would help if I explained the recent handling of requests to review cases such as Mr. Bamber's, because that is relevant to the points raised by the hon. Gentleman.

The 1993 royal commission on criminal justice recommended that the responsibility for re-opening cases of suspected miscarriages of justice should be "removed from the Home Secretary, and transferred to a body independent of Government."

Parliament agreed with that when it passed the Criminal Appeal Act 1995, setting up the Criminal Cases Review Commission. Accordingly, the Home Secretary's powers to consider alleged miscarriages of justice ended on 31 March 1997, and were replaced by new powers vested in an independent body, the CCRC. It has the power to review and supervise investigations into possible miscarriages of justice in England, Wales and Northern Ireland; to approve the appointment of investigating officers; to gain access—I emphasise this—to documents and other material that may be relevant to its investigations; and to refer any cases when there is a real possibility that the conviction or sentence will not be upheld to the appropriate court, which will treat the referral as a new appeal.

The Home Secretary is answerable to Parliament for the work of the commission, but as it is operationally independent, he cannot intervene in its determination of a particular case. That being so, in many ways, it is not within the Home Secretary's remit to examine Mr. Bamber's case. I recognise that the hon. Gentleman is asking not for a general re-examination of the case, but for a particular investigation of the role of Essex constabulary. Further allegations of non-disclosure by the Essex constabulary are a matter for the CCRC, rather than for the Home Office, because non-disclosure can be a ground for the CCRC to refer a case back to the Court of Appeal. The commission referred Mr. Bamber's case to the Court of Appeal in 2001, following an earlier investigation, but those grounds were not based on non-disclosure. Mr. Bamber's solicitor added a number of non-disclosure arguments at the appeal hearing, although they were dismissed by the full court.

I understand that the commission has recently been asked to investigate the new allegations, and I can confirm that under section 17 of the Criminal Appeal Act it has the power to gain access to documents and any other material that may be relevant to its investigations. I have been told that there are something like 4 million items of material in this case, so there is a large range of matters that the commission needs to investigate. If it has not already done so as part of its earlier review of the case, which resulted in the unsuccessful appeal in 2002, it may, if it believes it appropriate, obtain the material to which the hon. Gentleman has referred.

It would be inappropriate for the Home Secretary to become involved in this or any other alleged wrongful conviction. The safety of the conviction is a matter for the courts rather than the Home Secretary. Accusations about the Essex police are a matter for the chief constable of the force or the new Independent Police Complaints Commission. There is an important public policy reason why both the Criminal Cases Review Commission and the Independent Police Complaints Commission are independent of the Home Office: to create public confidence in those authorities.

Mr. Bamber is of course aware of the Criminal Cases Review Commission's remit, as his second appeal in October 2002 followed its reviewing his case and referring it back to the Court of Appeal on 23 March 2001. In that case, the Court of Appeal did not find that there were sufficient grounds for finding the conviction to be unsafe. In its judgment, the court went so far as to say:

"It should be understood that it is not the function of this court to decide whether or not the jury was right in reaching its verdicts. That is a task that is wholly impossible in virtually every case because this court does not have the advantage of hearing and seeing the witnesses give evidence, and deciding which of the witnesses are trying to tell the truth and which of those who are trying to do so are accurate in their recollection. Our system trusts the judgment of a group of 12 ordinary people to make such assessments and it is not for the Court of Appeal to try to interfere with their assessment unless the verdicts are manifestly wrong, or something has gone wrong in the process leading up to or at trial so as to deprive the jury of a fair opportunity to make their assessment of the case, or unless fresh evidence has emerged that the jury never had an opportunity to consider.

We have found no evidence of anything that occurred which might unfairly have affected the fairness of the trial. We do not believe that the fresh evidence that has been placed before us would have had any significant impact upon the jury's conclusions if it had been available at trial. Finally the jury's verdicts were, in our judgment, ones that they were plainly entitled to reach on the evidence. We should perhaps add in fairness to the jury that the deeper we have delved into the available evidence the more likely it has seemed to us that the jury were right, but our views do not matter in this regard, it is the views of the jury that are paramount."

It is open to anyone to re-apply to the Criminal Cases Review Commission if they can present an argument or evidence not raised in previous court hearings or demonstrate that the case would, exceptionally, otherwise merit a reference back to the Court of Appeal. I am informed that Mr. Bamber's solicitor reapplied to the commission in March 2004. I understand that the commission reached a provisional decision but that his solicitor has since provided further material that will take time to investigate. I am confident that the commission is dealing with the further application both fairly and thoroughly.

It is neither in my remit nor in that of the Home Secretary to consider the said to be newly discovered police logs or any other new evidence that may have been made available to the commission. However, the commission can ask for that material and assess whether it demonstrates that the concern expressed by the hon. Gentleman that there has not been a fair trial is sufficient to merit re-referring the case to the Court of Appeal.

I believe that it is at best premature to discuss a call for a further inquiry into the suggested withholding of information by the Essex constabulary. At the second appeal, the court found no evidence to support Mr. Bamber's allegations of serious wrongdoing, including deliberate non-disclosure, by the police; nor did the results of the internal inquiry and the 14-month investigation of Mr. Bamber's complaints by the City of London police confirm that there was any justification to Mr. Bamber's allegations.

I understand that there is no current recorded complaint to the new Independent Police Complaints Commission. If there is a complaint that the police are deliberately withholding material, that is the proper authority to deal with the matter. Only if a third appeal contradicted the earlier findings of the re-referral and of the previous court might it be reasonable to consider whether an inquiry was needed into how the matter had come to that pass.

Before us is a concern that evidence has not properly been made available to the body that is rightly charged with judging it. There is an independent body, which is sifting through that evidence and which has the powers, given to it by Parliament, to call for that evidence if it believes that it is in any way relevant to the case for a re-hearing by the Court of Appeal. It is doing that job. I urge the hon. Gentleman to depend on that process. The Criminal Cases Review Commission has been pretty efficient at dealing with the matters before it.

Mr. Hunter: Is not the point that the CCRC may be evaluating submissions from Mr. Bamber's solicitor and has the power to request evidence, but the defence does not? The defence's submission to the CCRC is the weaker, because it does not have access, or powers to gain access, to the evidence that the police are allegedly denying it.

Fiona Mactaggart: The hon. Gentleman points out that these are allegations. The record of the CCRC in its independent role is good. It has referred a number of cases back to court. I do not have the figures before me, but I think that, to date, there have been more than 60 cases in which the judgments of previous courts have been overturned as a result of its work. The CCRC is not anybody's patsy. It has the power to require the material. It is the mechanism that has the power to ensure reconsideration if a case merits reconsideration. We have established a powerful independent way to deal with miscarriages of justice. If the concern is that there has in this case been a miscarriage of justice, that body must have the opportunity to do its job and to ensure that that matter is dealt with effectively.

Obesity

[Relevant documents: Department of Health White Paper, Choosing Health: Making healthy choices easier (Cm 6374); and Obesity, third report from the Health Committee, Session 2003–04, HC 23, and the Government's response thereto (Cm 6438).]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Miss Melanie Johnson.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Nicholas Winterton): I ask the robust Chairman of the Health Committee, the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe), to open our proceedings.

2.30 pm

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield) (Lab): Thank you for that build-up, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I want to express my gratitude and that of the Health Committee for the opportunity to debate the report, which was produced some time ago; there have been many developments since. I also want to apologise for the length of my speech; a good deal of mischief occurred in connection with the publication of our report, and I want to deal with the relevant matters in detail. I appreciate, too, that there is likely to be a Division in the House in less than 50 minutes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I can be of assistance. I understand that a further Division in the main Chamber will take place at 2.45 pm.

Mr. Hinchliffe: I begin with the usual thanks to a range of individuals who were involved in the inquiry. First, I thank everyone who submitted written evidence or gave oral evidence to the Committee; that was helpful and much appreciated. The Committee also appreciated the efforts of those who arranged our visits during the inquiry and contributed to our discussions. I record particular thanks to our specialist advisers for the inquiry, Dr. Laurel Edmunds, Professor Ken Fox, Professor Gerard Hastings, Professor Phil James and Professor Tim Lang. They gave the Committee excellent support and advice.

I want to thank the Clerk's Department scrutiny unit, too, for its analysis of the economic costs of obesity. The unit's support for the Committee and its thorough work are much appreciated; it is a relatively new development and its work is helpful in our deliberations.

I also thank the excellent Health Committee staff; we are well served by a tremendous group of individuals who provide us with excellent back-up. I want to make particular mention of Dr. John Benger, who, at the time of the inquiry, was the Clerk to the Committee but has since moved to another post in the House. I am particularly grateful for his support on the inquiry and on many others over several years. I know that my colleagues on the Committee want me to pass on their good wishes for his career.

The Committee's report inadvertently confused the responsibilities of the Advertising Standards Authority and the Independent Television Commission. The reference in paragraph 111 to the ASA's approval of an advertising campaign for Wotsits should have been a reference to the ITC's approval. The ITC has now been subsumed into Ofcom, and I have written to the ASA about the matter on the Committee's behalf.

Shortly after publication of the Health Committee report on obesity in May the sketch writer of The Guardian described me as the "less than svelte Chairman of the Commons Health Committee".

As svelte is not a word commonly used in the west riding of Yorkshire, I sought advice about its meaning from my constituency secretary, who is multilingual, having been born in Belgium. She advised me that svelte is a term commonly used to describe the waistlines of French women. I took some comfort from that.

The Daily Mail sketch writer subsequently described me as "a chip butty man", and matters took a marked turn for the worse towards the end of last year when the sketch writer for The Times described me as "the human equivalent of the Gruffalo", on account of being

"gruff, hairy and 16 stone".

For one or two members of the Health Committee, our lengthy obesity inquiry was a challenging and painful journey. One member, who is here today, lost the best part of 2 stone and described the process as life-changing. For the tubbies on the Committee, perhaps the only crumb of comfort from that traumatic journey was the ability to measure our body mass index and to proclaim that none of us was obese—well, not quite.

The fact that some of us are horizontally challenged was one factor that led to the Committee's decision to conduct an inquiry. There was also the overall concern that, until quite recently, the public health agenda has to some extent been confined to the political back burner, with what some would describe as side-show events—such as foundation trusts and choice directives—taking centre stage. In the past couple of years, the apparent message from a cross-party perspective has been that the modernisation and refinement of our curative acute hospital sector is the way forward in health, rather than returning to a preventive approach rooted in a radical and vigorous public health policy.

The fact that politicians are usually happier in the comfort zone of hospital sector activity might have led to most of us failing to notice the gradual development of what the chief medical officer described not long ago as the "health time bomb" of obesity. Although the health of the nation targets in 1992 were for fewer than 6 per cent. of men and 8 per cent. of women to be obese by 2005, Department of Health evidence to our inquiry showed that, by 2002, just under 23 per cent. of men and 25 per cent. of women were obese.

Dr. Howard Stoate (Dartford) (Lab): It is fair to say—and it is certainly the belief of a friend of mine, David Haslam, who chairs the National Obesity Forum—that the obesity time bomb has already gone off. We are now waiting for subsequent bombs: a huge explosion in diabetes and heart disease, and the lives of many sufferers of obesity being shortened by up to nine years. That is of great concern to us all.

Mr. Hinchliffe: My hon. Friend is absolutely right, and I shall return to that point in a moment. I pay tribute to the work that he does in the House on a range of health issues. We have a joke that he is the chairman of the all-party group on all-party groups because he is involved in so many, dealing with some very important issues. I wish that he was back on the Health Committee, because he was an excellent member of it.

In addition to the figures that I just quoted, the Department of Health's evidence to our inquiry showed that by 2002, some 43 per cent. of men and 33 per cent. of women were overweight. The same evidence from the 2002 health survey for England showed that one in 20 boys and one in 15 girls were obese, and that one in five boys and one in four girls were overweight or obese. Witnesses to our inquiry said that current trends suggest that about one third of adults will be obese by 2020. If the rapid acceleration of childhood obesity in the past decade is taken into account, the prevalence of obesity in children is predicted to be more than 50 per cent. by 2020.

At least two—probably three—Members present can articulate better than I can the health risks of obesity; indeed, that might form part of certain contributions today. I do not intend to expand on the detailed evidence to the Committee on the various factors that contribute to an average reduction in life expectancy of nine years, but I will underline the Health Committee's estimates of the economic costs, which are worthy of consideration.

With the help of the Clerk's Department scrutiny unit, we established that the direct cost of treating obesity in England in 2002 was between £46 million and £49 million. The cost of treating the consequences of obesity was between £945 million and £1,075 million. The indirect costs of obesity were £1 billion to £1.1 billion for premature mortality, and £1.3 billion to £1.45 billion for sickness absence. The total estimated cost of obesity in 2002 was between £3.3 billion and £3.7 billion. Our report cautions that that should still be regarded as an underestimate.

Our report noted that the analyses were of the 20 per cent. of the population who were already obese. It states:

> "If in crude terms the costs of being overweight are on average only half of those of being obese then, with more than twice as many overweight as obese men and women, these costs would double. This would yield an overall cost estimate for overweight and obesity of £6.6–7.4 billion per year."

Regardless of the health implications for the individual, the economic consequences of the obesity epidemic are frankly staggering. Some have argued that they pose a direct threat to the future viability of our entire health care system.

Against that background—and in view of the seriousness and importance of our key messages—it was a matter of great regret that the comprehensive analysis of causes and solutions that our report offers was narrowed down in some sections of the media to a controversy over our reference to the evidence received from Dr. Sheila McKenzie, the consultant responsible for an obesity service for children at Royal London hospital. Our report faithfully and accurately records her written evidence when it states:

> "Despite only being in existence for three years, her service had an eleven-month waiting list. Over the last two years, she had witnessed a child of three dying from heart failure where extreme obesity was a contributory factor. Four of the children in the care of her unit were being managed at home with non-invasive ventilatory assistance for sleep apnoea: as she put it, 'in other words, they are choking on their own fat.'"

I want to deal in some detail with the circumstances that led to one sentence of Dr. McKenzie's evidence—concerning the three-year-old girl—being taken out of context and being used by certain vested interests to attack me, other members of the Committee and our staff and advisers, and to rubbish our overall conclusions. In making these remarks, I have no desire whatever to add to the distress already caused to the family of that child, but I believe that they ought to be aware of exactly who has used their daughter's sad circumstances and for what purpose.

I want to go back to events surrounding the date of publication of our report. Members of the Committee will recall that it was due to be published on 27 May last year. On 25 May, at about 10 pm, I was telephoned by a journalist from the BBC Radio 4 "Today" programme, who informed me that he had obtained a draft copy of the report and that his programme intended to run it as the lead item the following morning. My strong appeals for him to respect the embargo fell on deaf ears, and I obviously refused his invitation to participate in the programme the next day. However, on 27 May—the date of the report's publication—I made clear my views on the "Today" programme's total disregard for our embargo to the interviewer, Mr. John Humphrys.

During the following week, I was again interviewed by Mr. Humphrys to answer allegations, made in a "Today" programme report, to the effect that the Health Committee had been wrong to refer to the case of the three-year-old, who had allegedly died from a genetic disorder and not from heart failure where extreme obesity was a contributory factor, as we had been told by Dr. McKenzie.

Interestingly, less than an hour after that interview was broadcast, I was telephoned at the Commons by a prominent journalist from the "Today" programme who had detailed knowledge of the background to that morning's story. He wanted me to know that he strongly wished to dissociate himself from the story. At his request, I am not referring to him by name, but I did share his identity in confidence with other members of the Committee at its next meeting.

Anyone who has been around the House long enough will be aware that "Today" programme stories are frequently picked up by other media outlets, and this one ran—

2.45 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

2.55 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Hinchliffe: I was saying that anyone who has been around this place long enough is aware that the "Today" programme's stories are frequently picked up by other media outlets. The story that we are discussing was run by numerous other radio and TV programmes and newspapers—in several instances uncritically. I believed then what I believe now: I was right to state that while I regretted any distress to the girl's family, the Committee had faithfully recorded the evidence that was given. Perhaps my mistake was not to reveal publicly until now the fact that the "Today" programme item was not even believed by one of its journalists, who was privy to the background detail of the story.

I do not have time today to refer to many of the newspaper articles that followed on from the "Today" programme piece, but some are worthy of particular note. The Daily Mail, on 10 June, described me as a liar and said:

"The surest sign that a New Labour politician is in trouble is when he blames the media."

I am not sure which is more inaccurate—calling me new Labour or calling me a liar.

It is particularly worth noting that that piece, like those in other, more respected papers such as The Independent, states that the Committee claimed the three-year-old "had died of obesity". We did not claim that. We referred to Dr. McKenzie's written evidence, which stated that the girl died from heart failure, where extreme obesity was a contributory factor.

The following weekend, on 13 June, The Mail on Sunday ran a lengthy article on our report. It was written by Tom Sanders, who apparently is a professor of nutrition and dietetics at the university of London and head of the research division of nutritional sciences at King's college, London. He is the central figure of this affair and I understand that he was a key source for the "Today" programme story. His article accuses the Committee of "the deliberate use of a dead child to spark sensationalist tabloid headlines".

To suggest, as Mr. Sanders does, that we made deliberate use of the girl to obtain publicity for the report is utterly disgraceful. Such was the media interest throughout the inquiry that our concern for much of the time was how to avoid press coverage of our deliberations. At one point, we had a formal inquiry on leaks to the press from the Committee. Significantly, the Committee's media release accompanying the publication of the report made absolutely no mention of this girl's case and, as I recall, neither did my introductory statement at our press conference.

Mr. Sanders went on to write that the girl

"died of a rare genetic condition rather than bad parenting, lack of exercise and the promotion of junk food, as the All-Party Committee, chaired by Labour Backbencher David Hinchliffe seemed to imply".

We implied nothing of the sort; we made no comment on the case. He said that we "had failed to get to the nub of what is really a pretty simple solution: be more active and eat less".

That left me with the opinion that his copy of our report must have had several pages missing; we covered that point in great detail.

Surprisingly, on 19 June the British Medical Journal carried a similar piece by Mr. Sanders in which he also implied that the overall direction of our report was somehow influenced by the pharmaceutical industry. His critique of our report in The Mail on Sunday article and in the piece for the BBC website is incredibly unfair and flawed. It has no evidence to substantiate the claim that the Committee had been "covertly duped by the drug companies".

When a member of the Committee staff telephoned Mr. Sanders to ask what his evidence was to support that wild assertion, he stated that the International Obesity Task Force, of which one of our advisers, Professor Phil James, is chair, receives some funding from drug companies. Mr. Sanders seems to have entirely ignored the fact that the Committee's recommendations on drug treatments for obesity are very cautious and occupy only a tiny proportion of the report.

Bearing in mind the fact that, by then, the Health Committee had already determined that the influence of the pharmaceutical industry would be the subject of its next major inquiry, I imagine that the drug companies were as surprised and bemused as we were by that assertion.

Mr. Sanders' general analysis that the Committee focused too much on food and not enough on passive activity levels is absolute nonsense: they are given equal prominence. The fact that he disputes our scepticism about the reliability of food survey data suggesting reductions in calorie intake shows how far removed he is from the scientific consensus.

Given that Mr. Sanders obviously felt strongly about our deliberations, and certainly knew about the inquiry, why did he fail to submit any evidence? Having failed to make any submission, why was he then so determined to rubbish and undermine our report in various ways? In his article in The Mail on Sunday, he is particularly critical of the advice obtained by the Committee in the inquiry, implying that its members had almost been led by the nose in the wrong direction.

It is a great pity that Mr. Sanders nowhere refers in his various published criticisms of me, the Committee, its advisers and our report to his real reasons for being so vigorous in his attacks. First, I am confident that part of his motivation was professional pique at not having been re-employed by the Committee as an adviser, coupled with a personal animus against other advisers, especially Professor Tim Lang, whom he attacks in one of his pieces. Secondly, and more importantly, Tom Sanders acts as an adviser and consultant to the food industry, and was obviously wheeled out to do a hatchet job on its behalf. It is a great pity that the journalists and media outlets who peddled his line did not take the trouble to check on his pecuniary interests first.

I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for dealing with this matter at such length, but in nearly eight years of chairing the Health Committee I have never experienced such a deplorable attempt to undermine our work and integrity.

I turn to the Government's response to the report, as it is appropriate to comment on how long it took them to respond. Obviously, the Committee was well aware that, following the publication of our report, discussions on the public health White Paper would result in some delay to the usual two-month response time, but it was some considerable time after the November publication of the White Paper that we finally received the specific response to the report.

[Mr. Hinchliffe]

Having said that, I welcome the fact that the Government have listened to several of our key concerns. Colleagues will recall that at paragraph 181 of the report the Committee recommends that the Government should not only concentrate on informing choice, but "make healthier choices easier". That key tenet of the Committee's report was used by the Government as a subtitle to its White Paper, "Choosing Health: Making healthier choices easier".

The Government response acknowledges that the Committee's report was central to their White Paper, which identifies the reduction of obesity as one of their six priority areas. Important recommendations accepted by the Government include a cross-Government campaign to raise awareness of obesity; a review of the marketing and promotion of food, with the possibility of introducing tighter legislation if voluntary agreements do not work; and—one that I strongly welcome—the introduction of a standardised food labelling system.

We, across the Committee, welcome the Government's commitment to improving food labels and to introducing a simple coding system, which, as is noted in the new public health White Paper, would be promoted by the UK as a European Union scheme during its presidency. The excellent work already undertaken by the Food Standards Agency on nutritional profiling and the need for a simple "traffic light" system of labelling are to be commended and are in keeping with our recommendations.

Will the Minister assure us that the public interest in and demand for a simple traffic light scheme with integrated messages on the nutritional profile of all packaged foods will be the basis for action, even if, as now, major sections of the food and drink industry attempt to block or refute the validity and usefulness of that approach?

Having referred to Tom Sanders' tactics, I should mention something that I know is going on. It is important that the Minister is at least aware of it, and it should perhaps be addressed. Inside sources—people of credibility in the food industry—have told me of concerns that elements in the industry plan to target Mr. Jonathan Back over this issue. He was the FSA's originator of the profiling work, but he has now transferred to DG Sanco. I understand that elements in the food industry have decided to negate his work and to denigrate him personally as a key part of their strategy to have labelling fudged and to allow any old health claim to be accepted under the labelling scheme.

The one thing that I have learned from the inquiry is that there are lots of interested parties—lots of people with a lot of money—and some tactics have been underhand. I hope that the Minister will look into concerns about that, because we—I am genuinely speaking on behalf of the Committee—want the Government to be able to proceed in the way we discussed in the report.

Mr. Colin Challen (Morley and Rothwell) (Lab): The Committee's recommendations on food labelling are quite positive, but does my hon. Friend agree that there should be no loss of information and that existing information should be made clearer, not replaced by the traffic light system?

Mr. Hinchliffe: I certainly agree. The Committee's concern was that the size of the labels—never mind their complexity—makes them virtually useless to those of us who are middle aged and who cannot find their glasses halfway round the supermarket.

We need to address the fact that most people do not have the same detailed knowledge as my hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Rothwell (Mr. Challen) and one or two others, which allows them to understand the significance of the various components. It is quite possible for there to be a traffic light system, as well as more detailed information for those who want it, and many companies would accept that approach. The current arrangements, however, are meaningless.

The approach that we saw in Finland was accepted by the food industry and the consumer, and it appeared to work. I know that the Government are aware of what other countries have done. I hope that we can take account of the concerns that I mentioned about the tactics that will be employed against such an arrangement. I also hope that the Government make progress, and I genuinely commend the fact that they have gone along with this idea.

The Government have also made recommendations to ensure that efforts to reduce obesity are reinforced across the Government. That is a key point in our report, and we mention a Cabinet-level public health committee and health impact assessments of relevant policies, including non-health interventions. I warmly welcome the Department's acceptance of the broad thrust of our recommendations, as well as its acceptance of the idea that each primary care trust area will need a specialist obesity service.

The issue of childhood obesity was particularly important for the Committee, and we are pleased that the Government are carrying out a review of school meal standards. Indeed, I believe that the Department for Education and Skills has made an announcement on the issue. We warmly welcome that, because the issue is most important.

However, I must express some disappointment that the Government have not accepted our recommendation to increase the amount of physical activity that children do at school from two hours a week to three. We felt that our recommendation was very modest, and I hope that the Government will look at the initiative that is under way in the Brent area of London, which tries to ensure that children have an hour of activity of some sort or another at the end of every day. I warmly commend that scheme; it is a brave effort. The Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North (Mr. Gardiner), has been heavily involved in pioneering the project and gave evidence to the Committee.

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): Let me say, as one Chairman to another, that this excellent report is welcomed by hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber and by people throughout society. However, what does my hon. Friend think about the issue of exercise as against over-consumption of food? Does he agree that they are of equal importance in tackling the dreadful problem of obesity?

Mr. Hinchliffe: If I display my pedometer, Mr. Deputy Speaker, my hon. Friend will see that I have taken nearly 13,000 steps so far today. He will also note that I am on the hefty side. We need to address the balance between the two areas he has mentioned. One problem—I might refer to it again in a moment—is that things can be overstated. For instance, one hears things like, "If you wear one of these, you can lose a lot of weight." I exercise at length every day, and I walk miles and miles at the weekend, but I probably need to address other aspects of my personal life to get back to how I was before I entered the House of Commons.

Mr. Keith Bradley (Manchester, Withington) (Lab): Think what you would be like if you did no exercise!

Mr. Hinchliffe: Yes, indeed.

I return to the Government's response. We were pleased at the introduction of a public service agreement target to reduce childhood obesity—our report stressed the importance of introducing targets on obesity—but we feel that the target chosen, which was to

"halt the year on year rise in obesity among children under 11 by 2010 in the context of a broader strategy to tackle obesity in the population as a whole", is hardly ambitious.

The Clerk's Department scrutiny unit prepared some background material on that target as part of an analysis of the Department of Health PSA targets, carried out for the recent public expenditure inquiry sessions. It pointed out that the target, rather than calling for a reversal of trends, simply calls for a plateau at 2010 levels. Between 1995 and 2002, the average annual increase was 0.8 per cent. The way the target is constructed means that childhood obesity could increase at that rate for another four years and then plateau, but the target would still be met. If the current rate of increase continued, it would result in a childhood obesity rate of about 19 per cent. Obesity rates could increase faster, and even level off at a higher rate, and the target would still be met.

The situation facing today's children was brought home to me on two occasions last year by events in my constituency. As part of the healthy schools initiative, I was asked to present various play items during a primary school assembly. They included skipping ropes, but I was told that girls were having to be taught how to use them. Some children had requested seats to be provided in the playground; they appeared to have lost the ability to participate in active play.

On another occasion, I was asked to speak at an event drawing together various schools activities under the healthy schools initiative. As part of my contribution, I asked the children present, who were in the year 7 age group, to describe what they did when they returned home from school each day. The message was clear and totally consistent: "I go on my Playstation, I watch TV, I go on my computer, I text my friends or I have something to eat." When I pressed them further, I found that "something to eat" was usually crisps, chocolate or biscuits.

Interestingly, Dr. Rory O'Conor, from the public health directorate at Eastern Wakefield PCT, considered the weight status of pre-school children in Wakefield between 1988 and 2004, and concluded that there is an increasing problem with obesity and being overweight, even with children as young as five years.

Dr. Gibson: Does my hon. Friend agree that this is not just a problem of overeating and indulging? Because of the obsession with the body, slimming and eating disorders—this is eating disorders awareness week—are a phenomenon often correlated with obesity. The social pressures on people to lose weight by dieting can lead to anorexia and bulimia.

Mr. Hinchliffe: In the work that I did before I came to the House, I had contact with young women who were a good illustration of that. In many respects, those pressures have worsened during the past 20 or so years, so my hon. Friend makes a valid point. Similarly, in a previous inquiry on mental health, the Committee drew attention to the gross lack of facilities available to take account of the problems that women have—young women, in particular—as a result of support being so variable in different parts of the country.

The comments made by the children whom I met last year confirmed so much of what was at the heart of our obesity inquiry. Alongside increasing physical inactivity, we have over the past 20 years seen significant changes not only in what people eat but in how they eat, with snacking and regular fast-food treats becoming commonplace. Wider societal changes, with both partners usually working, mean considerably more eating out and a much greater reliance on convenience food.

We were struck by the fact that we seem gradually to have lost the skill to prepare meals, and by the fact that healthy eating messages are totally swamped by the massive amount of advertising and promotion of energy-dense food, much of which is aimed at children. Given these profound and worrying trends, what can we do?

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Paragraph 174 of the report deals with the healthy schools initiative. I am particularly interested in the local food chain element and reviving the idea that we can get food locally. We should try to get schools to think about the food chain once again. Many authorities still have their own county farms estates, but they never provide for the county councils or local authorities. If we could get schools to think about the food chain, we would be able to re-educate people so that they would get cooking. Does my hon. Friend agree that that is the way forward?

Mr. Hinchliffe: I fully agree. I remember visiting two schools during the inquiry, one of which was a primary school in my area that was part of the healthy schools initiative. The school had started gardening in the school grounds, and some children saw for the first time what vegetables look like when they are growing. Those children had never seen them before. The knock-on effect was a demand from the children for their parents to buy the fresh vegetables that they had become aware of, and in some instances a desire to grow their own food.

[Mr. Hinchliffe]

I also went to a secondary school in Boston Spa near Leeds, which is one of the Government's sports colleges and which had transformed the attitude of its pupils to eating. It had, as I recall, made a connection with local food producers, as suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew), so that the youngsters could learn about the entire process of food production, rather than just seeing what was produced in the school canteen.

Concern has been expressed about school tuck shops selling food such as crisps and chocolates. Something else that struck me about Boston Spa was the sight of children queuing for a tuck shop that supplied only fruit—in other words, entirely healthy food. So, the idea that children do not want healthy food is simply not true. If it is available, they consume it. I was very impressed by that school.

To the Government's credit, there are tremendous examples of progress being made through the healthy schools initiative and other initiatives. We need to learn lessons from those examples throughout the country and apply them, because we can do much more. Much good work is being done, which is commendable.

I shall conclude by suggesting where we go now. My first and perhaps most important point, and arguably the most difficult to achieve, is that we must restore public health to the engine room of Government health policy. I hope that we are starting to do that with the public health White Paper. We must shift public health from its position on the margins back to the mainstream. I do not want to ramble on about what happened before 1974, but one or two of us remember public health committees and medical health officers who drove forward health initiatives in local government. We lost a lot when those people were sidelined in health authorities in 1974.

I do not underestimate how politically difficult all this is, because the success of public health measures can take many years to become apparent to the electorate. The benefit brought by current measures might well be reaped by a Government of a different party. I suspect not, but that could happen—many years from now. Spanking new hospitals are a much more noticeable manifestation of so-called progress in health, but it is not easy to convince the public that expenditure on the hard slog of preventive measures is a much better use of taxpayers' money, particularly when such measures are often portrayed as a politically damaging arm of the growing nanny state, as they often are in certain newspapers.

The problem of obesity is undoubtedly a key challenge for the Government in taking forward the public health White Paper, perhaps because more than any other health issue it requires many other Departments to include important public health considerations in their policies.

We pointed to the need to incorporate physical activity into everyone's daily life. We can all wear our pedometers, but our ability to achieve our 10,000 steps a day would be enhanced if the Department for Transport gave the pedestrian more priority than the motorist on occasion. If people could get across roads safely in some of our cities, that would help to encourage walking.

Underlying my point about the resurrection of a public health strategy is an assumption that such a strategy must have at its core the ability to join up policy making. Our proposed Cabinet committee on public heath would, for example, ensure that the Department of Health had a strategic input to transport policy. We need to put an end to the embarrassing contradictions, such as when ministerial blessings are given to children's consumption of energy-dense products in return for the producer's donation of some sports or computer equipment to their schools.

In short, all Departments need to be singing from the same hymn sheet and developing their coherence in individual departmental policy, which is not always there at the moment. We need politically to make the obvious connection between wider global environmental issues and our individual lifestyle choices in terms of car use, for example, which has a bearing on our health and well-being.

There are considerable challenges to be faced in addressing obesity. The biggest is recognising that public health is not just an occasional add-on and should be the central driver of our entire health care system. If the Government fully recognise that following the White Paper, the time we spent on the obesity inquiry will not have been wasted.

3.21 pm

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): Since I first became a Member of Parliament, the power, influence and importance of Select Committees has grown tremendously. I note that the second paragraph of the Government's response to the Health Committee's report on obesity says:

"We welcome the Committee's thorough and comprehensive investigation of the issues surrounding the growing problem of obesity. It complemented and directly contributed to the consultation and ongoing debate on Choosing Health? and made an important contribution to the development of proposals for action on obesity set out in the Choosing Health–Making healthy choices easier White Paper that we published on 16 November."

The reality is that if it had not been for the Health Committee's inquiry into obesity, today's national and international discussion of the subject would not have taken place.

I choose this moment to pay tribute to the Chairman of our Health Committee, the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe). I regret very much that he is retiring from Parliament, although I understand his reasons for choosing to do so. He has given the Committee great leadership, and it and Parliament will be the poorer for his retiring. I also echo his remarks on the value of the support that we got from our advisors; Dr. John Benger was a superb Clerk to the Health Committee. I entirely endorse our Chairman's views on the leaking of the report, which was regrettable.

The delay in the Government's response to our report was unacceptable and had much more to do with media management than with their duty to respond. I am sure that it was a nuisance for the Department of Health that the Government felt that they should make all manner of announcements. However, their failure to respond in the way that they should have was a discourtesy to the Committee.

A number of individuals and organisations have tried to take ownership of the obesity problem, but there is no quick fix to it. It has not been invented only now or in the past few years; it has been a growing problem. When the history of health care comes to be written, the Health Committee's report on obesity will be seen as having made a fundamental and vital contribution to the health of our nation. I do not believe that it would have been produced were it not for Sue Diebelius and Jackie Cox, from the Obesity Awareness and Solutions Trust, to whose work I shall turn in due course.

The hon. Member for Wakefield has already given the facts and figures on the dangers of obesity, but as I said, there is no quick fix to the problem; we are looking at a 10 or 20-year programme. However, in the light of the Government's response to the Select Committee report, we need to embark on action, and to do so now.

A few weeks ago, the Minister had to listen to my good self during a debate on obesity in young people. She will be relieved to know that I shall not discuss all the issues that I raised then in great detail, but I do want to pick out some of them. I am delighted that all sorts of TV programmes are jumping on the bandwagon, but I hope that the Government keep in close contact with them. For instance, if the BBC "Fat Nation—The Big Challenge" programme is to continue for two years, it would be useful to research its findings in Birmingham.

All Members, I think, will have received a letter from the organisation Breakthrough Breast Cancer. We are advised that being overweight after the menopause increases the risk of breast cancer—an issue that we should not take lightly.

An important part of our report is that dealing with education. The Committee felt that educating our young people on the dangers of obesity was all-important. A few weeks ago, the Minister heard me talk about Sally Lawrence of Outloud Productions and her pioneering programme on getting young people interested in the dangers of eating too much. When we took evidence, there was an interesting exchange involving the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport and an education Minister. I am not sure how convinced the Committee was about the existence of joined-up government, and in the light of the Government's response to our report, I am not entirely convinced that they take this matter sufficiently seriously.

It is a sheer coincidence that, today, there has been an announcement about school meals, and I want to know why the Government have failed to take on board our recommendations 38 and 39, on food at schools, which are very important. The real solution to combating obesity is not physical exercise; rather, the emphasis should be on what we eat and drink.

During the Health Committee's inquiry into obesity, we visited America and saw first hand how the vested interests are in complete denial about how serious the problem is. Only this week, there was a disgusting TV programme on very late at night—I could have turned it off but my older children and their friends were watching—about the fad for making people very fat. One lady has reached 54 stone and another 60 stone. That sick fashion for making people fat says it all. Having listened to Coca-Cola and McDonald's in America, I can easily see how that happens.

It is also obviously sheer coincidence that those minded to take part in this afternoon's debate will have had a letter from Coca-Cola, telling us about all the virtues of Diet Coke. I salute that, but the reality is that if it had not been for the Select Committee report on obesity, the food and drinks industry would not have taken the action that it seems to be taking. The level of salt, sugar and fat in what we eat and drink is all-important in combating obesity.

Last year, I had an exchange with the then Under-Secretary of State with responsibility for schools about the dispensing of snacks and drinks in schools. I hope that the Minister here today will have something to say about progress on that issue. I am sure that curbing the sale of junk foods will encourage youngsters to find healthier alternatives. As I told the Minister a few weeks ago, Southend schools are leading the way in that regard, although I am sure that similar things are happening throughout the country. I fully accept that we should not live under a nanny state, and that it is up to schools' governing bodies to determine their priorities.

In that context, I turn to recommendation 14, which states:

> "Parents, teachers and school governors must all be fully engaged in tackling obesity, which should command a high priority on school board agendas."

I must admit that when the Committee was agreeing our report, I thought "school board" a rather old-fashioned term, but never mind—as long as we get action from our school governing bodies, I shall be delighted.

Southend is leading the way in encouraging young people to lead healthier lifestyles. We have had a walking buses initiative since 1999, and an obesity conference is due to take place at Southend United football club. I will be joining forces with the chairman, Mr. Ron Martin, and a range of sporting celebrities will also be present, as will—I hope—representatives of the food and drink industry. The Obesity Awareness and Solutions Trust—and, coincidentally, a couple of my constituents—have come up with the wonderful idea of an obesity telephone helpline. That is an excellent proposal and I hope that the Government will do their best to encourage it.

I hate the expression "traffic light labelling" but we are stuck with it, so I suppose that I shall have to continue using it. I am pleased that the Government have taken the Committee's recommendation seriously and aim to introduce by the middle of 2005 a system that can be used as a standard basis for signposting food, building on the "five-a-day" logo for fruit and vegetables. As the Chairman of our Committee said—he mentioned glasses and food labelling—we need something quickly that people can recognise as a way to a healthier lifestyle.

Given that many Members wish to speak, I shall draw my remarks to a conclusion. It is an absolute disgrace that TOAST's funding has been withdrawn under section 64 of the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968. The usual ministerial response to letters setting out good ideas is to refer people to the primary care trust. The Government's announcement yesterday gave the impression that huge amounts of money are being given to every PCT in the country. However, I speak from experience when I say that there simply is not enough money for the PCT in my area to deliver on all the duties that the Government are increasingly imposing on it. TOAST had plans to build a centre of excellence, run a mobile drop-in centre and produce the TOAST Bites journal to help people who, despite dieting and other measures, cannot lost weight and need help badly.

I am proud to have been a member of the Committee, but there is no earthly good in any Select Committee's producing a report, only for the Government of the day to pay it lip service. It is so easy to be swept up in gesture politics—a photo opportunity, a sponsored tea on the Terrace, a public meeting, a letter. What we need from the Government—whoever the Government of the day might be—is serious action on this issue not only this year, but over the next 10 to 20 years. It was not the Government who suddenly discovered that obesity is a problem, but it is they who hold all the cards in terms of power and media manipulation.

I ask the Minister not only to give us a considered response today to the Health Committee's report, but to encourage her colleagues consistently to follow up the Committee's recommendations on obesity.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I call the next speaker, I advise Members that we have a fraction over two hours' debating time to go, and I urge them to allow the Minister adequate time to respond. I am referring not only to Back-Bench contributors, but to Front-Bench ones from the Liberal Democrats and the Conservative Opposition.

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): I can be ultra-brief, because I am a cuckoo in the nest; I am not a member of the Health Committee. However, its Chairman, my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) and I work together—and with you, Mr. Deputy Speaker—on the Liaison Committee, and I sympathise with what my hon. Friend says about the media pressures put on his Committee. We have had that in the Science and Technology Committee, too, and perhaps the Liaison Committee can try to do something about it, as good work and excellence emanates from all our Committees.

I will be brief, because I have had the opportunity to ask a couple of questions, and also because I want to give hon. Members who have done much more work on this subject a chance to contribute. I want to talk about diet, which often comes up in discussions, and about the pressures that are put on young people in particular when obesity enters their lives—the social pressures that they are put under by glossy magazines and other sources, and the disgust that they have for their bodies. That kind of pressure is particularly felt by young women, and we must resist it. Doing that involves working with the media, and we have a lot of educating to do there.

I am interested in dietary solutions, because if I had to go on a diet, I would not know which one to pick, and I can understand that neither would many young persons and other people. There is the Atkins diet, low glycemic diets, and many issues to do with matters such as low calories. I should declare an interest now; I am a non-executive director of the Institute of Food Research in Norwich, where lots of work is being done on different types of food and its influence on health, people's bodies and recovery from diseases such as cancer. We need some randomised trial research in this area to see whether there is such a thing as a good diet, because my information is that as soon as somebody goes on a diet, they lose weight but it returns because of the conditions imposed on them when they are forced into the avenue of having to undertake a diet. It is not long before they are again having food walloped down on plates for them in grub pubs and elsewhere. I must hold my hand up and admit that I indulge in that occasionally, too.

I particularly want to flag up one issue that I have already raised in a question. Some young people are put under pressure at school and elsewhere because they are called fatties and, under that social pressure, they have to take up certain types of behavioural patterns. That often leads them on a difficult journey down a road of restricting their intake of food, vomiting it up, preventing themselves from following proper diets and so on. The pressure on them is amazing. I do not know about the correlations in this regard; figures are quoted by the Eating Disorders Association, but I say, not in a one-upmanship way, that a Committee such as this one does not have the time to address every issue that is correlated with this. It has done a sterling task.

I want to raise this matter, particularly in this awareness week. People are pushed into trying to shape their bodies into the way that society demands—to get the right size and weight loss, and so forth. That is often associated with psychiatric pressures, which are a real problem. That is important, not just among women, where anorexia and bulimia occur, but among young men, because they are now being pulled in as well. I would not want to look like David Beckham nor would I like to play football like him, but many people see those role models as being of the perfect shape.

The problems faced by young people with eating disorders often lead to other health problems, such as kidney diseases and osteoporosis, and to absences from school and a reduction in academic achievement. As my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield says, such disorders could be an increasing problem in young people and we have to correlate that with the issues raised. It is difficult for such people to form and sustain friendships with peers, for example. The low esteem that people feel about food and how they ought to look—whether they should be thin, sporty or less plump—is an amazing pressure. If people survive that in our society, they are very lucky.

This week has been important for engaging young people on the issue of eating disorders and for talking to general practitioners, few of whom understand the problems, spot the diagnosis early or do much about it. When we talk about obesity, we should also consider the situation where people think that they have a funny body mass index. I do not understand BIMs. [HON. MEMBERS: "BMIs."] What did I say—BIMs? As long as I did not say BMW—but that is how little I understand them. Such figures are, I think, suspect. Nevertheless, we know that we can be over-plump and want to lose weight.

We have to be careful about the knowledge we have, the pressures we put on people and the figures that come through from the medical people about where one should try to be. It is an amazing pressure, and I am sure that people here feel it. When one looks round the Chamber of the House of Commons, one does not get the impression that any attention has been paid to that knowledge whatsoever: about 1 per cent. of people must have the right BMI. I say well done to my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield and his Committee, who have done excellent work. There is a lot to do, and other Committees will take the issue up over the next five or 10 years.

3.42 pm

Dr. Richard Taylor (Wyre Forest) (Ind): May I start by adding my tribute to the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) and his skill in chairing the Committee with great tact and amazing humour at the same time? It is a unique combination that will be difficult to follow. I knew that he was on the same side as me—I can say this as I am sure that he does not mind a straw what the Whips think of him now—on one of our very early visits to a hospital in the north somewhere. We all introduced ourselves around the table, and I said that I was an Independent MP, and immediately after that he said, "I am a fairly independent Labour MP." That says a lot.

I would also like to pay tribute to our advisers. We have found them especially helpful on occasions when, at their own expense, they have found themselves in, or have come out to, the same foreign country as us. At some of the meetings that we have had on such visits, our advisers have been able to chip in with useful comments and have steered the discussion. At one point in the meeting this morning, which the Minister will remember, a contribution from an adviser might have been helpful. I wonder whether other quarters could take on the idea that, because of the value that the advisers provide, perhaps there could be some method of arranging funding for at least one to come with the Health Committee on visits to parts of England or abroad.

The report and the Government's response made us all very aware of our own body shape and size. I am sure that we all worked out our BMI fairly quickly. I was absolutely horrified to find that although I have always thought of myself as pretty slim, I creep in to the overweight category.

As a junior doctor, I did an extraordinarily difficult house job not more than half a mile from here, where I had an extremely irascible chief. He took it out on his housemen all the time. A friend said to me that when one is really being got at by someone who is irascible and very fat, one should imagine what he looks like in the bath. That immediately cured it. The problem is that I have looked at myself in a full-length mirror from the side after a shower and it is not as good a sight as one would have hoped.

Sitting suspended for Divisions in the House.

4.10 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think that I was right to break for 15 minutes. I was not sure that there would be a second Division, but I was fairly confident that there would be.

Dr. Taylor: I come now to the slightly more serious part of my contribution. The Chairman of the Select Committee gave me the cue to talk a little about the risks to health of obesity. I can do no better than refer to table 3 on page 17 of our report, which lists them with lurid clarity. There is a greatly increased risk of type 2 diabetes, gallbladder disease, lipid abnormalities, breathlessness and sleep apnoea. There is a moderately increased risk of coronary heart disease, hypertension, wear-and-tear arthritis of the knees and, of course, gout.

Many of us learned—I certainly did; I am ashamed to say that I did not know it before—that associated with obesity is a slightly increased risk of certain forms of cancer, particularly breast cancer in post-menopausal women, endometrial cancer, colon cancer and other more obvious conditions such as low back ache and anaesthetic risks. On the same page of the report, reference is drawn to the alarming fact that the relative risk of death for someone with a slightly raised BMI, such as me, is 1.3. Even for a moderately raised BMI—and long before the definition of obesity is reached—the relative risk is 1.6 and, just before reaching the official definition of obesity, the relative risk of death is 2.1. Even being a slight degree overweight is bad.

I intend to pick up on only a few matters from the report and the response. I refer to children and schools because that is important. We sampled the healthy lunch that was given to all children, without choice in one of the Scandinavian countries. It was well taken up and very edible. Some mention has been made already of vending machines. Several of us know that it is possible for vending machines to contain low-fat crisps and low-calorie drinks. There is often talk of nanny states, but someone should dictate to schools and parent-governor committees and say that it is easy to put healthier items in vending machines and make it clear how essential such action is.

Most of us here, certainly those above a certain age, will remember being weighed and measured at school. At paragraph 369, we say:

> "We recommend that throughout their time at school, children should have their Body Mass Index measured annually at school, perhaps by the school nurse, a health visitor, or other appropriate health professional."

To avoid the stigmatisation that is one of the objections to such action, we went on to say:

> "The results should be sent home in confidence to their parents".

We had evidence that parents of quite severely overweight children did not realise that there was a problem, so the only way in which the problem can be known about is to weigh and measure the children. That is crucial.

Yesterday, the meeting of the associate parliamentary health group on obesity was addressed by Sir Derek Wanless, Dr. Fiona Adshead, a representative from

[Dr. Taylor]

Dr. Foster and from the National Obesity Forum. The meeting was well attended. It was said repeatedly that there was lack of data and information about the problem. Weighing and measuring children is, to my mind, a first and easy essential, because there should not be a cost of even tens of pounds; it could be woven into the work of a school nurse, who, it is to be hoped, would be available. Even school teachers could surely weigh and measure, if they were allowed to touch children, which they probably are not. It does not strike me that expense should be a limiting factor.

I want to say a few words about physical activity. One of the recommendations in the White Paper is that it should be made possible—or children should be helped—to walk to school. It is a fact, and there are figures in the White Paper to prove it, that children on average burn up more calories walking to school than during their two hours of physical activity. It is so obvious: if it can be made safe for children to walk or cycle to school, they have to get there so they will burn up calories. I should very much like that to be made possible somehow. I know how difficult it is, but we visited a town in Denmark where virtually everyone cycles, so it is not impossible.

The hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) mentioned walking buses. I shall be surprised if he has any in his constituency that have been going for a long time. Usually they depend on a small number of parents who start them. When they leave, no one else keeps them going.

I am of course wearing my pedometer. I am slightly puzzled by our Chairman's score of 13,000 today already, when I know that he was sitting absolutely still from 10 am to 12.30 pm. He must have walked six miles to work, or something like that. However, pedometers are superb for making one aware of what one is doing We heard how, in Colorado, children were fitted with them, and they were used in maths and even geography lessons to work out where the children had travelled. They can be a huge help.

We fear that prevention might not be a priority for primary care trusts and GPs. We were talking to the Minister this morning about local development plans for PCTs. I wonder whether there is any incentive for GPs to put prevention of obesity in their local development plans. That would be good to know.

Treatment requires vast amounts of new money. I am sure that we all welcomed yesterday's announcement of the money going to PCTs. I wonder whether there is enough for the all things that PCTs would ideally like to do. We had an example of the limitations that targets put on services during our inquiry, which was repeated at the meeting of the associate parliamentary health group on Wednesday, at which a GP from Nottingham, who ran an obesity specialist clinic, told us that when the waiting lists had got to 12 weeks, he went into discussions with the managers because they were going to go over target and the only answer was to suspend the clinic. That does not seem to be the right way to use targets.

I want to mention industry briefly. I have been approached since the inquiry by Burger King, PepsiCo, Coca-Cola and McDonald's to emphasise how they were trying to be part of the solution. If they have voluntarily become part of the solution, rather than having anything pushed on to them, that will be a good outcome of the inquiry..

I travelled home on the train a few weeks ago with another hon. Member—who I am glad is not here—and I was so hungry that I had the giant-sized Burger King bacon double cheeseburger. I must own up to that, but I had it only as an extreme luxury.

There is a sign that those companies are becoming involved. Coca-Cola tells me that Diet Coke accounts for more than 50 per cent. of its sales in the major supermarkets. That will make a huge difference, as Diet Coke contains about 0.4 kilocalories per 100 ml, compared with about 43 kilocalories in ordinary Coke. I would very much like to hear the Minister's comments on some of the points that I have raised.

Mr. Colin Challen (Morley and Rothwell) (Lab): I wish to make a brief speech on the Committee's excellent report, which will, I hope, be lean and unsaturated. I begin by declaring an interest: I am a vice-chairman of the all-party weight watchers group, having been elevated to that post last year after losing 3 stone. It seems that the lighter one is, the higher one rises.

Last year—on the day this report was published, coincidentally—it became clear to me that I had to lose weight because I had a combination of high blood pressure, blood sugar, and cholesterol, which were all conspiring to do me permanent damage, which had become evident. I had an increased risk of stroke, diabetes, and possibly all the ailments listed in the helpful guide to diseases linked to obesity on page 126 of the report. The idea that, through my own inaction, I could suffer the fate of having to go on to permanent medication and treatment appalled me. Given that the cost of medical treatment for obesity set out in the report is calculated to exceed £1 billion, I am not inclined to add to that burden.

The report asks whether obesity should be blamed on gluttony, sloth, or both of those deadly sins. I should not like to own up to either of those lifestyle choices this close to a general election, but after my first year of working in this building it became apparent to me that there are many opportunities here for gluttony and sloth, as far as one's waistline is concerned. I got into the habit of always using the lifts, but now I never use them. Like other Members, I occasionally take the opportunity to go to a reception or two, but if I do so now, I have my diet in mind: I discovered that it is no rudeness to one's host if one does not hoover up the entire contents of the nibbles tray.

Exercise and a more structured approach to eating have helped me to attain a weight at which, according to the chart in the back of the report, I am no longer obese—I was just in that dark bracket—but slightly overweight. Many of my constituents sought my advice, and asked how I did it. Many people are concerned about their weight, but sometimes feel that losing weight takes too much effort. I recommend simply that one's approach to escaping obesity must be individualised: it must work for them at their pace and should be free of quick fixes and fads.

There are a few effortless ways in which one can lose weight. People should read food labels, and not be fooled by the fancy, healthy-sounding names that are given to many food products nowadays, such as "Simply Good" or "Healthy Living". I discovered that those descriptions are always meaningless and misleading. Instead of using the lift, people should climb the stairs to the next floor at least, and then take the lift, until they can eventually climb to the top floor. That is useful advice when one is using Committee Room 20, which is on the Upper Committee Corridor, and there are lots of Divisions. I now look forward to Divisions, because they are an excuse for a bit of exercise. Generally, I beat Members who have taken the lift back to the Committee Room.

On the subject of pedometers, I too should be interested to know how my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) achieved the fantastic feat—

Mr. Hinchliffe: I have to confess that when I looked at it, I was rather surprised to see that I had done 12,000 steps today. I think that I forgot to turn it back last night. I do apologise.

Mr. Challen: Honest to the core. Over the past year or so, I, like many other hon. Members, have been sent pedometers by various companies. I received a very good one from the BBC, although the one from ITV told me that I was walking twice as far as before, even though I was doing the same number of steps. I also received one from a company that manufactures crisps, although I do not intend to wear it to find out how far I am walking. One recommendation that we should take up, therefore, is that there should be a clear standard for pedometers. These things are manufactured very cheaply, which is possibly a good thing, but if they are not made to a standard, how do we know that they are reliable? They could give people the wrong impression about the effort that they are putting in.

Jim Dowd (Lewisham, West) (Lab): I calculated that members of the Committee were each given about six pedometers over the course of the inquiry. I know that the Chairman distributed them liberally to most of his friends and family at Christmas, along with the umbrellas that he got at that hotel in Boston the year before. However, the real point about a pedometer is not whether it is accurate, but that it is a permanent reminder that we should walk when we can. Part of my fitness programme involves parking on the second floor of the underground car park and walking up. So, a pedometer does not need to be technically accurate.

Mr. Challen: I am grateful for that intervention. This is a serious point, and I certainly take my hon. Friend's comments on board, although it is also nice to know when we have walked 50 more steps—or 13,000 more steps—than we did yesterday. However, my hon. Friend raises an important point.

Another recommendation that I would make is that people should go food shopping only after they have had a meal. They will then buy less and reduce their impulse purchases. Having said that, buying more fruit is a good idea and drinking more water is important.

Of the suggestions, or effortless steps, that have been proposed, reading food labels is the most difficult. As the report says, these labels can be confusing or even meaningless to the lay reader. In that respect, I have the greatest admiration for the approach adopted by Weight Watchers; it may have been adopted by other groups, too, but Weight Watchers is referred to in the report. The organisation has simplified the essential information—chiefly the calories and the fat content—and put it in an understandable format, and that approach should be used more generally. Combining information in a single figure, which could be printed in a larger typeface and displayed on the packaging where one would usually see the weight of the product, would enable people quickly to understand what the product on the shelf contained.

I was positive about the traffic-light system, but I have one fear about it. The report suggests that manufacturers might be encouraged to change the content of their food slightly to move up to a better bracket. However, the change might be so slight that, although the food gets into a better bracket, the consumer will have no knowledge of it, other than a relative idea of the content of the food. As I said earlier, therefore, it is important that good, sound, absolutely concrete information is printed on the label on the back of products; otherwise, people will have no more than a relative idea of the food's content.

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): I very much appreciate the hon. Gentleman's point, and I think that there are problems with a simplistic version of the traffic lights, particularly when applied to what is called the avocado conundrum. An avocado can be good for people, but too many can be very fattening. I gather that it is also very good as a facial scrub. None the less, the system can be too simplistic: the question is not only what is an unhealthy food, but what is an unhealthy diet.

Mr. Challen: Indeed it is. I would urge the Government, when they commit themselves to these proposals, to see how the label on the back can be improved so that if someone looks at an avocado, and the label puts it in the middle or the bottom bracket, they will think, "That's a surprise. What does it say on the back?" The traffic lights might encourage more people to read the label, because there will be quite a few surprises. So, people need to be better educated about what they consume.

Many people think that the process of eating should end only when they feel full. In practice, that means that people overeat most of the time. I bet that that is especially true when they consume junk food, which has little nutritional value. The worse the food is, the more people feel that they must eat it in order to feel satisfied.

One of my constituents asked me whether it was necessary to feel hungry every day to lose weight; that is the other end of the scale. Thankfully, from my own experience, I know that it is not. The last two activities on my effortless list, which includes drinking water and eating more fruit, can address that problem.

Finally, I welcome the report's recommendations on active transport, particularly those on walking and cycling. The report suggests that the Department for Transport might be a bit embarrassed because of the ministry of silly walks reputation that it might get if it talks up walking too much. That leaves a bit of a deficit in the Government's approach to obesity. There has been strategy after strategy to increase those activities, but targets are never met—not by a long chalk—even though Sustrans has achieved a much improved national cycle network. Perhaps there has been some improvement in recreational cycling.

4.31 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

4.49 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Challen: I was finishing on the subject of the Committee's recommendations on active transport. As part of my diet and fitness regime, I have started cycling again. I have picked it up again after about 20 or 30 years, and the roads are just as inhospitable now as they were then. Very little seems to have been done to encourage cycling. A few white lines painted down the road does not protect us from cars, so we must consider innovative ways of tackling that problem. We must also ensure that train operating companies are obliged to take people's bikes, without cyclists having to jump through a range of hoops or encounter difficulties. Some companies are preventing commuters from taking their bikes on trains, and there is something seriously wrong with a system that allows that to happen.

It comes as no surprise that the Dutch have lower obesity levels than ours, because they have a dedicated urban and rural cycle network, and have had for decades. I have had the pleasure of using it, and one can cycle all day long in towns, cities, villages and open countryside and never come across a car. We should bear it in mind that our country is hillier than Holland, which is conveniently flat for cyclists, but even in places such as Leeds we must consider new ideas so that people are not worried about cycling up and down hills all the time. My constituency has quite a few hills in it.

Only yesterday in the Yorkshire Evening Post, there was an article about an idea for a new, elevated cycle expressway from a Leeds engineering consortium. That is the sort of imaginative idea we must consider, because only when we have imaginary ideas will people be tempted out of their cars and other sedentary transport options.

The report is imaginative; it should be required reading for all Departments. If the Committee will forgive the pun, it would be ideal if a slimmed-down version were available for wider public use. It contains a lot of information, presented with clarity and strength by Members, and if it were available in surgeries and other places, it would be an excellent contribution to the wider debate that will have to continue.

Jim Dowd (Lewisham, West) (Lab): This afternoon has been so disrupted by events in the Chamber that I think we are running about 40 minutes behind schedule. I shall therefore keep my remarks brief and to the point.

I add my thanks and congratulations to the Chair of the Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe). Others have already given theirs. He is always a genial and firm guide to our proceedings in the Select Committee. None of us knows what may happen in the next few weeks and months ahead, but it occurs to me that this could easily be the last time he introduces a report from the Committee to the House, so I place on record my thanks to him for all his work over the years and for his unswerving friendship. It has been a pleasure to serve on the Committee with him.

There is a difficulty with the report. The hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess), who unfortunately is not in his seat, said that the delay in the Government's response to the report was intolerable. I suspect that—in his own Southend, Basildon kind of way—he over-egged the pudding, but the delay makes life more difficult. We undertook our first evidence session well over 18 months ago, and that makes recalling the detail much more difficult. None the less, the inquiry was a fascinating and revelatory experience. I certainly learned a great deal from a variety of sources from a range of backgrounds.

Like the Chair of the Committee, I must mention the gross distortion that afflicted the report when it came out in May. The vilification of the Chair—that is what it was; it was very personal—was wholly and utterly inaccurate. One could understand it if some tabloids behaved that way, but it is a complete and utter travesty when a newspaper as self-regarding and allegedly serious as The Independent headlines a story, "How obesity report was undermined by the quest to grab public's attention".

The Chair has already outlined in detail the issue contained in the second paragraph of the introduction to the report. It occupied little more than a couple of hundred words and was not alluded to anywhere else in the report. The report, including appendices, comes to more than 500 paragraphs, so the idea that what was contained in that one paragraph skewed the whole publication is completely and utterly absurd. That is what happens when one is as self-important as The Independent, which also ran a leader article on 11 June saying that the Committee had acted recklessly in including that information "without checking its veracity". It continued:

> "More than that, the committee has gravely damaged efforts to make Britain wake up to its obesity crisis."

That is plain and utter nonsense.

All the reports that have been produced over the years by the Health Committee and our sister Committees are excellent pieces of work, but this one will stand the test of time because of its focus on several different issues and elements of the obesity crisis, as it is called.

The Committee also learned when taking evidence that the so-called obesity crisis is, like climate change, not universally accepted, even in the scientific community. One witness said that obesity was "a big fat lie" and suggested that we completely misunderstand the nature of the problem, but rather like the argument on climate change and global warming, I believe that that is very much a minority view, if not an idiosyncratic approach to the problem, because we got a similar message right across the piece, whether from people who were individually affected by it—there was a debate on whether one should call obese people sufferers—or from food manufacturers, retailers and advertising agencies.

There are other examples of how the press trivialise things. The problem with the other paragraph was that it was the second in the report. Of course, most journalists will read only to paragraph 3 or 4 at the most and assume that they have read the lot. If the press had read further into the report, I am sure that what happened would not have happened.

When we were in New York, a commissioner told us that, for the first time in history, the generation of children and young people in the city would have a lower life expectancy than their parents. Evidence from this country and Australia also suggests that, and we make the point in the summary, because it looks likely to be the case in the United Kingdom if the trend is allowed to go unchecked.

The tabloids got hold of that, and I remember reading one article—I have not got it with me—that said that the crisis was so serious that children would die before their parents. That is patently untrue. If that were the case, the human race would be extinct in little more than a generation. Children are not going to die before their parents; they simply will not live as long as their parents can reasonably be expected to live. As the report makes clear, obesity is the most serious threat to public health not only in this country, but in other countries in the developed world, such as Australia and the United States.

Astonishingly, the Committee even took evidence that suggested that signs of obesity are emerging in Africa, and certainly in South Africa, which is the most advanced part of that continent. That is happening for various reasons, including the fact that as people move towards cities and away from essentially agrarian economies, they not only tend to have sedentary jobs rather than do manual work, but have access to buses, trains and other public transport systems. In more rural areas, they would walk quite a lot, whereas in cities they ride around in cars and on public transport. Even people who are not particularly wealthy have access to those facilities, and South Africa has started to experience the same trends that we have experienced in the more advanced economies for many years.

There is no simple way through the problem—indeed, the report makes 60-odd recommendations across the piece. The evidence that people eat too much of the wrong things and do not take enough exercise in return is at the heart of the calories-in, calories-out argument.

To some degree, obesity is a problem of affluence. Paradoxically, however, the richer someone is, the less likely they are to suffer from obesity, which peaks on a kind of curve. Richer people tend to be the ones who drink mineral water, join gyms, have pedometers and so on. Past a certain point of prosperity, the curve starts to fall, although the vast majority of people are on the rising part of that curve, which is the challenge before us.

I will mention a couple of other things. The human body, like those of most species, has defensive mechanisms and tends not to indulge in risky behaviour that jeopardises the individual. I asked one of our witnesses why that is not true of how we eat. We like things that are bad for us. We do not like the things that are good for us and find it a trial to eat properly. She explained the issue in a graphic way, saying, "In stone age times, the whole tribe would gorge themselves when the tribe killed a mammoth, because life was so precarious that people did not know where the next meal was coming from."

We are many centuries away from that and hardly anyone in this country does not know where their next meal is coming from, although there may be a few at the margins who do not. However, we still behave in that stone age way and have a stone age psychology and physiology. In part, that makes dealing with the issue difficult, because it requires most people to behave counter-intuitively. Society has progressed much more rapidly than our approach to food and healthy eating.

I am delighted that the hon. Member for Southend, West mentioned the other thing that I want to talk about—the traffic light labelling model. I was not going to call it that, but when I discovered that he dislikes the term so much, I could hardly resist. I accept what others have said about how that model can be simplified and welcome what the Government are doing to try to reach agreement on it.

We have said that we will give the Government and the industry a chance to reach agreement, but that other steps should be taken if they do not, because food labelling as it is now is fact without information. It is just numbers on the side of a tin saying how many calories and kilojoules and how much sodium and so on the contents of the tin contain. While those numbers are factually accurate, they do not convey information to people in a useable form. If we were to move to a traffic light model or some variant of it, much would be generalised.

I accept what was said about the so-called avocado problem. Obviously a bag of sugar would have a red label on it under any circumstances because it has a lot of sugar in it, but as it is a bag of sugar that is hardly surprising. The same would be true of dairy products, which have large amounts of fat in them. However, I agree with the hon. Member for Southend, West strongly on the argument about healthy and unhealthy food, which emerged when we were putting the report together. Although we slipped into using such language occasionally in the report, my impression is that there is no unhealthy food. If we were trying to tell people living on 50 cents a day in sub-Saharan Africa that there were unhealthy foods, they would look at us askance. There are no unhealthy foods; there are unhealthy diets. We need to put in place a balance.

Of course, everyone likes a treat such as chocolate from time to time, but they should not have it all the time. People like McDonald's. The hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor) admitted to that predilection. Once in a while such things are okay, but they must be part of a balanced diet and a more active lifestyle. That is patently obvious.

The other point that I want to mention is the one that the hon. Gentleman raised on recommendation 58: measuring the body mass index—BMI—of school children. I was pleased by the Secretary of State's announcement yesterday on funding. I was also pleased that every area will essentially have to restore the school nurse. I noticed last week that that is exactly what is to be done in the United States, although I cannot remember whether it will be in one state or by the federal authority. All schoolchildren will be weighed and measured, and a confidential report sent home to their parents. I am delighted to hear about that and hope we can do the same here.

In conclusion, it was a pleasure to work on the report. There are a lot of things in it, some of which will be easier to do than others, but if it helps to focus on a major threat to public health, the Committee and the House will have done a public service. I broadly welcome the Government's response, but hope that they can be slightly more positive and reduce some time scales accordingly.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I call the next speaker, I must tell the House that this sitting has to conclude at 6.23 pm and—I do not think I am saying something that hon. Members do not know already—that there will be a Division at 6 o'clock. We either continue after or conclude before then.

5.6 pm

Mr. Keith Bradley (Manchester, Withington) (Lab): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker; I shall work towards the latter stricture.

I start by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) on chairing the Health Committee and on doing such tremendous work on its behalf over many years. He and I were elected at the same time, 18 years ago. I will not say that we have grown fat together over those years or what the reasons for perhaps doing so were, but I am grateful for his friendship and he will be sorely missed by the Committee.

I reiterate one of the main points made by my hon. Friend in his opening remarks, which is the role of public health in the development of health policy. It is crucial that we return public health to the heart of our plans. I am concerned that primary care trusts, which now lead on public health at local level, still do not fully recognise the importance of the public health role; nor do they put the role of the director of public health as high up their development agenda as they should. Will the Minister ensure that all PCTs recognise the importance of that role, and that their public health plans are at the heart of all developments in the localities?

I want to concentrate on the "calories out" side of the argument. Given what I know of my local schools, I remain extremely concerned about the amount of physical activity that takes place in schools and in the community generally. We must put even greater emphasis on the role of such activity in schools and ensure that we move rapidly towards the Committee's recommendation of three hours' physical activity a day. Such activity need not be formal sport. Some children find it difficult to engage in sporting activities, and the report highlights a range of other activities in which they can engage, such as dance, aerobics and other useful activities that contribute towards "calories out". We should aspire to the Committee's recommendation of three hours' physical activity a day, which is based on the European Heart Network recommendation.

I welcome the fact that the Government now intend that by 2008, at least 85 per cent. of children will exercise for two hours a day. However, that is still too little, and progress towards ensuring that such activity takes place in every school, to the benefit of all children, is still too slow.

We have to look carefully at the curriculum. The curriculum authority needs to be charged with the responsibility of developing a physical activity plan and Ofsted needs to monitor it. We must ensure as soon as possible that children get back into a range of physical activities, because as we have heard, they certainly do not engage in them at home. They sit in front of the telly or play their computer games, and I know from my own family experience exactly how that happens. We have to work with local sports clubs as well as schools, because it is not only schools that need to develop physical activity. Even if we do manage to get more sport back into schools, the links between schools and local community clubs have to be reinforced, so that young people can be involved in sport for many years to come and not lose impetus when they leave school at 16, and become inactive again.

I welcome the fact that in our capital programme, "Building schools for the future", the importance of sports facilities is recognised. Many schools do not have decent changing rooms or sports facilities, which is an impediment to children getting involved in sport. For children who are already overweight or obese, there is also a fear of bullying in school. If there are no decent facilities—if that problem is not tackled—we will not achieve the level of participation in sport that we so desperately need. The Government have recognised the importance of this issue by investing £1 billion in sporting activities, but I urge them to take the extra steps as soon as possible to engage all children in such activities.

I should like briefly to comment on a related issue, which is how children get to school and existing initiatives to provide safer routes for those who walk or cycle to school. We have already heard about our visit to Odense in Denmark, where we saw the excellent safe routes being developed throughout the town to enable children and parents to cycle and walk safely. Far more needs to be done in this country on safer routes. I know from my own experience that car upon car arrives at the school gate, dropping off and picking up children. This is mainly a safety issue. Parents are worried about their children walking or cycling to school, and we must do much more to plan safe routes for them.

In Denmark, we saw a good example of a computer programme that enabled children to identify for themselves particular points on the route that were dangerous. A plan could thereby be worked out, so that parents were comfortable with their children taking such routes to school. There is much to do on that issue in this country, and it is important that the Department for Transport, in conjunction with other Departments, gets involved in such programmes to ensure that walking and cycling again become the normal way to travel to school, as they were when I was at school.

I used to cycle or walk to school and did not even consider being dropped off by my parents in a car, because cycling or walking was the norm. We had huge cycle sheds at school, but they no longer exist because children are not encouraged—or even able—to get to school in that way. A private Member's Bill was introduced last year, by my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew), on the use of helmets by children cycling to school. There were many arguments for and against that Bill, but if it would ensure that children can safely cycle to school, the Government should consider it again.

We noted in the report that it was, to say the least, "scandalous" that the Department for Transport had taken 10 years to develop a national walking strategy. I do not know how many years it will be before there is clear implementation of such a strategy. However, I hope that the Minister will, through the Department, encourage the healthy aspects of walking as a key part of the future strategy on public health.

Quite a few references have been made to pedometers today, and I was pleased to launch, in this House, the Granada Television "on the move" initiative. The fact that a wider range of organisations are now prepared to get involved in this debate is a testament to the Committee's work on the report. Granada Television continues to launch such initiatives regionally, in the north-west and nationally. It spoke to me only this week about the next phase in its programme. We have been able to engage key organisations—in industry, in the media or in government—to ensure that such initiatives are not one-off publicity exercises. There is a long-term commitment and a recognition of the problem. Such organisations want to engage continually to find new ways in which children and adults can become much more active, and be part of the solution to the "calories out" problem.

As a relatively new member of the Committee, I was amazed at the way in which we were able to be part of a massively growing debate on obesity. We helped to trigger that debate, and in that regard we can take some credit. I want to underline the point that the way in which the Chairman was vilified concerning the report's presentation was completely inappropriate; it did the media in question no credit, and it completely undermined the response that we received. However, we can now examine this important problem, which has massive health implications, put it seriously on the agenda and ensure that all participants work together to resolve it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Two further Back Benchers have indicated that they want to speak in this debate and then there will contributions from the two Opposition spokesmen and the Minister. I fear that we will not be able to complete everything by 6 o'clock. I call Dr. Doug Naysmith.

Dr. Doug Naysmith (Bristol, North-West) (Lab/Co-op): I have no wish to speak, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I call Jane Griffiths.

Jane Griffiths (Reading, East) (Lab): I, too, do not wish to speak, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps my comments about 6 o'clock had some extraordinarily magical effect.

5.18 pm

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam) (LD): I thank the Chairman of the Select Committee for introducing the debate on this report and for the opportunity to take part in it. I had the chance to serve on the Committee for about a year during this inquiry and I found it one of the most rewarding parts of my parliamentary life so far. I will keep the experience of serving alongside the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) throughout my time here. He is an exemplary Select Committee Chairman and is a hard act to follow. I wish him well in what he does when he leaves this place—by his own choice—at the forthcoming general election. I thank him for everything that he has done in that capacity.

The hon. Member for Wakefield was right to be robust about dealing with the way in which the misreporting, distortion and dishonest tactics of certain individuals has, in some ways, obscured the incredible worth and merit, not only of the report, but of the massive number of contributions from people who came to give evidence to the Committee. They should be properly recorded. He was right to put what he did on the record.

I was reflecting on one of two of the comments that have been made during the debate so far. Perhaps there has been almost too much disclosure about personal body images. I am not going to add to that. I was also struck by the admission by the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor) about his beefburger experience. I hope that his admission of eating a super-size burger does not become a decisive factor in his constituency in the forthcoming general election.

Obesity poses a major public policy challenge. It is a challenge because, although it seems easy to deal with, it is one of those classic wicked problems. Some say, "Just eat less," and others say, "Just exercise more." Although both are right, both are in a sense being simplistic and superficial because both assume that obesity can be solved if we just get a grip on our lives. Of course, we all have a personal responsibility for our health and diet, for taking exercise and for our lifestyles, but, as the hon. Member for Lewisham, West (Jim Dowd) suggested, our 21st century lifestyles do not fit terribly well with our caveman instinct to binge in times of plenty and conserve that precious energy in the form of fat. The hon. Gentleman made an important point. We have designed out activity and designed in comfort eating, and our fast-paced lives have fuelled a fast-food culture.

As the Committee report makes clear, and as the hon. Members for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) and for Morley and Rothwell (Mr. Challen) rightly said, there is no single, quick-fix solution that will shed the pounds and save lives. As the report, with its many recommendations, clearly demonstrates, a whole host of actions is necessary if we are first to halt the rise and then to reverse the trends in obesity.

If the rapid acceleration in childhood obesity over the past 10 years, which we have heard about in the debate, continues unchecked, by 2020 more than half the nation's children will be obese. So, we have a vicious circle that works its way down the generations. Most overweight and obese children grow up to become overweight and obese adults, and overweight and obese adults are more likely to bring up overweight and obese children.

[Mr. Paul Burstow]

As a result of that, many children born today—I was listening to what the hon. Member for Lewisham, West said about this—could be among the first generation to die before their parents. He said that that could not be quite how it should be formulated, but that was certainly the lesson that I drew from some of the things that were said in the hearings of the Committee. Because today's children could, as a result of type 2 diabetes and other things, wind up dying in their 40s, it is quite conceivable that their parents could outlive them. In effect, we are seeing a century's worth of public health improvement wiped out by childhood obesity. No wonder the chief medical officer has described obesity as a health time bomb—and the ticking is getting louder.

The hon. Member for Wyre Forest mentioned the increased risks that are associated with even a moderate level of being overweight. Being overweight, and being obese in particular, can take nine years off a person's life expectancy. Every day, 80 people die of diseases triggered by obesity. The time bomb may well have gone off, but its consequences will be with us for a good deal of time into the future. In this country, in this century, children are being diagnosed with type 2 diabetes for the first time. During the inquiry, we heard that children as young as eight are being diagnosed. The outlook for those children is bleak. Before the age of 40, many will die of heart attacks. The rest face the prospect of a life stunted by chronic kidney disease, tied to a dialysis machine, waiting for a transplant.

Already locked into future health care costs in this country is the growing number of children with type 2 diabetes, diagnosed and undiagnosed. The costs of that and all the other associated costs have been well rehearsed by the Chairman already and I will not repeat them, save to say that the National Audit Office said that by 2010 the total combined cost would be £3.6 billion, but the Select Committee's conclusion was that the upper limit now was £3.7 billion. Six years ahead of schedule, we are already realising the costs to society that were feared and forecast by the NAO in its report in 2002.

What is driving all that? As has been said, in simple terms the energy equation has got out of balance; we gain weight when we consume more energy than we expend in our everyday lives. It is glib and unhelpful simply to say, "Eat less and exercise more"; it is essential that we tackle the forces behind poor diet and sedentary behaviour.'

The data on the calories in and the calories burned are very poor. For example, the last national diet survey found that adults report that they eat 82 g of sweets a week. However, the industry sales data that we were given during the Committee's inquiry suggests that 250 g are sold per person per week. That represents an awful lot of chocolate bars being stashed in cupboards around the country, and one wonders what is happening to them. That is why the Committee's recommendation that there should be a review of how the food survey is conducted is important. I hope that we can hear more about that at some point—if not today, then from further Government announcements.

What children, particularly young children, consume is particularly determined by parental choices and what we do as parents. Those choices are not made in a vacuum, but are shaped by commercial and societal pressures that push people towards unhealthy choices. During the inquiry, we heard a lot about the tactics of the food industry: commercials, product placements, celebrity promotions and toy collectables are just a few of the tools of the trade. Most of that advertising promotes sugared breakfast cereals, sweets, salty snacks, sugary drinks and fast-food outlets.

We were given one example that is in the report, but bears repetition. The "Microstars" campaign by McDonald's ran for five weeks and there were 20 toys to collect. To collect them for free, a child would need to eat an average of four "happy meals" a week, which would total 12,260 calories over the five-week promotion. The creative and client brief for the campaign described the aim as getting "children to believe, 'I've got to have a Happy Meal so that I can have a toy' ".

The brief went on to state that that gave "scope to increase frequency from light to heavy users".

Just how heavy does a six-year-old get from eating 12,260 calories in five weeks? When one considers such a promotion, it brings a whole new meaning to super-sizing. If the Committee's report does nothing else, it should shame the industry into never using such tactics again.

It would be a mistake simply to see diet as the beginning and end of the obesity epidemic. We have to consider the other side of the energy equation: energy out. Hon. Members who have spoken have outlined the deeply depressing documentary evidence about the levels of activity in our schools and our society more generally. I shall not go through all those now. However, the inactivity among children today and the negative attitudes towards sport and physical activity generally, are likely increasingly to turn them into the couch potatoes of tomorrow.

In a debate about childhood obesity in this Chamber a couple of weeks ago, I asked the Minister about the public service agreement targets. She set out the 2004 PSA target on childhood obesity, to which the hon. Member for Wakefield referred. It is to

"Halt the year-on-year rise in obesity among children under 11 by 2010 in the context of a broader strategy to tackle obesity in the population as a whole."

The hon. Gentleman posed an important question, to which I hope the Minister will be able to respond. Is that target really challenging? Does it really act as an adequate stretch for dealing with these issues? It calls for a plateau at 2010. As childhood obesity is already at 15 per cent., that would mean, at current rates of increase, that 19 per cent. of children could be obese and that the target would still be met. Is that target good enough to address the problems? Is the Minister telling us that the measure is adequate? Surely, we need something more ambitious. She should be able to tell us now to what extent the public policy measures already in place will cumulatively have the effect of reversing the trend. When do the Government expect the trend to reverse?

The Government ought to be prepared to use law and regulation to help people push against the commercial and societal pressures that drive obesity. It is not about being a nanny state; it is about the state being on the citizen's side and ensuring that corporate interests do not harm the common good. A number of measures could help families in that regard.

The hon. Members for Lewisham, West and for Southend, West referred to the labelling scheme proposed by the Committee. That scheme could play an important part, particularly for packaged and processed foods. I hope that the Minister will be able to give us the assurances that were sought by the hon. Member for Wakefield on that subject, because it is a key part of moving the agenda forward.

Something that the Committee did not discuss, which is worth raising today, is the contribution that midwives and health visitors can make. Given that research points to the powerful role that parents play in shaping children's lifelong eating habits, those professionals have a key part to play.

This is a good time to ask the Minister to tell us precisely what is meant by a "cluster of schools" in respect of school nurses. It was said in yesterday's statement that there will be one school nurse for each cluster. It would help to know how many schools are in each cluster.

I have one or two more questions. On nutrition and school meals, the report recommended moving to a nutrition-based standard for school meals. Today, the Government made an interesting and eye-catching announcement about having tougher standards for school meals by 2006. Will the Minister elaborate on the Department's press release on school meal standards, and particularly what it means by saying that "the use of nutrient-based standards will be strongly considered".

How can one "strongly consider" something, and how long does one need to strongly consider it for? I hope that the Minister will be able to answer that question.

We are at a point in our evolutionary history where our instincts are putting our lives at risk. Our instinct is to eat, often too much, and that is putting lives at risk because of the plentiful supply of food. Obesity may not be the cause of our extinction, but it confronts us with some key policy challenges. Those challenges require the Government to take on the vested interests of the kind that sought to rubbish the report; they should ensure that the public interest is served, not the commercial interest.

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): To be on the safe side, I should declare an interest. On page 105 of the report, there is mention of some information from J.P. Morgan, and I have a registrable shareholding in J.P. Morgan Chase.

I welcome the debate. It has been good. I pay tribute to the chunky Chairman of the Select Committee, and to his stout chairmanship of the Committee over many years. The report raises some good points. I shall not repeat all the information that we have heard today, but I agree that obesity poses the biggest public health threat of this century. It is the single biggest health challenge, particularly with regard to young people, that any Government could face. It would be a false economy to do nothing about it, not only because of the financial figures that we heard about but because of its effect on people's lives and the fact that they will be shortened.

The report makes many interesting points with which I agree – the need for food surveys; the problems of pester power; the need to push the issue up the political agenda, perhaps through a Cabinet-level public health committee; the problems of simplistically seeking to introduce a fat tax or ban advertising; and the problem of moving the issue up the agenda for PCTs and giving them the resources to do something about it in a "largely sceptical NHS", a phrase that was used in the report. I certainly concur with the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) that we need to restore public health to the engine room of health policy, and that we need a joined-up policy.

A number of hon. Members made important points, not least about the influence of the report – something that my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) pointed out. It certainly had an enormous influence on the hon. Member for Morley and Rothwell (Mr. Challen) – so much so that, when it was published, he lost 3 stone.

Hon. Members mentioned Denmark. I remember going to Denmark with another Select Committee and meeting the Deputy Prime Minister, who was a larger than life character in many more ways than one. He had to leave our meeting early, whereupon he was not whisked away in a ministerial Jaguar, but got on his ministerial bicycle followed by a fleet of aides who were also riding bicycles and trying to keep up with him. That was a wonderful example to set, but I somehow fear that it might not catch on with our Deputy Prime Minister and his Department.

This subject has rightly had a much higher profile in the press of late; there are numerous groups to do with obesity and lots of sources of information on it. The problem is not a lack of information; it is clarity of the information and knowing which information to follow. Anybody will be blinded by a plethora of advice – what is in, what is out, what is good, what is not good – that changes from one week to another.

Lots of solutions for obesity have been put forward. I remember that Lord Digby wrote in a letter to The Times last year that the problem of obesity could be easily solved by designing teenage computers powered by pedal-driven generators but that in the modern nanny state the idea would undoubtedly be struck down by the European Court of Human Rights on the grounds of misuse of child labour. A study by the university of Maryland put obesity down to toddlers being strapped into pushchairs for too long after they were born. Professor Julian Peto suggests that there should be annual weigh-ins in schools and that fat reports should be sent home to parents. That has been mentioned today; it has some scientific basis.

One of the most worrying pieces of research was by Alison Jeffrey from the Peninsula medical school study. It revealed that only 25 per cent. of parents with overweight children recognised that they had a problem. No fathers recognised their sons as overweight, and 33 per cent. of mothers and 57 per cent. of fathers described their obese children as normal. There is a real problem if the families themselves do not recognise such problems.

There are all sorts of other theories for why we have this problem. One theory is that the decline in physical activity is to blame. Children today expend 600 kilocalories per day less than they did 50 years ago.

[Tim Loughton]

There are the problems of the lack of school sport and places for recreation, and two hours a week for 75 per cent. of our children is a woefully inadequate and unambitious target. In Sweden the target is 10 hours a week; we must raise our game in that regard. There are other problems to do with Chelsea tractors and the drive to school. We must do better in terms of designing safer routes to school. However, those safety issues are not only to do with traffic; parents also have other fears, such as child abduction. Our children lead very sedentary lifestyles. Up to the age of seven, a child will watch on average 10 hours of television a week, but a 13 to 15-year-old will watch an average of 17 hours of television a week, during which time they are doing no exercise.

There is also the fashion for new processed foods. People often have poor diets at home because they are subjected to increasing amounts of processed foods, largely because of the lifestyles of their parents—more parents going out to work and so forth. For every 25g of green vegetables a child now eats, they consume 100g of sweets and chocolates. That highlights the problem of school vending machines, and steps are being taken to deal with that. The Green Machine is a company that promotes healthy options in those machines. This is not just a problem in the UK or the US. It is also a problem in Europe. France is even catching up with us; it has 2 million members of Weight Watchers, and obesity has risen by 5 per cent. since 1997—and the 1,000th branch of McDonald's in that country has just been opened, I believe.

We have had a lot of reports and information, culminating in the recent public health White Paper. We must not tell people what not to do. We need to find a solution that people can easily identify with and go along with. Simply telling people that they must not go to Burger King or eat burgers and other junk food will not work. We are never going to persuade children not to eat and enjoy burgers, but we can hope to persuade them to eat fewer burgers as part of a better-balanced diet, and to persuade manufacturers to produce less unhealthy burgers and other similar fast-food options.

We need an integrated approach based on information, education and incentivisation. At the last count, a search using Google for healthy eating websites produced 1.76 million websites. We can get all the information we want on every single type of burger that is available across the entire North American continent, including its various ingredients and fat content. There is no lack of information. However, when someone goes into a supermarket, there is a four-second lag between taking an item off the shelf and putting it into a shopping trolley; in those circumstances, even the most committed mother or father who wants to choose healthy options for their children is completely bedazzled by the range of different labels and claims.

I tried an experiment with my children last year. I gave them each £10 when we were going round Tesco, and asked them to buy lots of stuff for the following day's meals. They came back with all the regular suspects: Frosties, which are 49 per cent. sugar, lots of chocolate and crisps. They did a fantastic job at getting two-for-one bargains—their money went a long way—but in terms of the healthiness of what attracted them and appealed to them in terms of presentation, it was a complete and utter disaster. They are not untypical, I am sure.

We need a better benchmark that is easily understandable for people who want to see better information that they can understand. We need to work with industry. Many people have said that the industry wants to and must be part of the solution. A joined-up solution must involve industry as well. For example, the salt action plan includes the Food and Drink Federation and is beginning to work. We need many more schemes like that.

Price is also a factor. Everyone has said that Coca-Cola now sells more Diet Coke than red, regular Coca-Cola. However, the price is the same. When unleaded fuel was brought in by a previous Government, it had a price advantage. If some of the big multinationals were serious, a price differential would promote the healthier options. That has not been tried. Those companies have the power to affect lifestyles, particularly of children.

The second aspect is education and promotion. We need to get people when they are young, with better education in schools. We have had the example of the five-a-day free fruit, which has had only a marginal impact. We need more nutritionists working in the health service and in schools. We need more school nurses—that has been cited as part of the solution several times. We need better advice from GPs, rather than a clutter of leaflets and, at the last count, only seven specialist obesity clinics in the United Kingdom. We need to teach better cooking and nutrition skills in schools. We need better GP training; a GP will typically receive only five hours of training on nutrition in a five-year course. PCTs receive poor funding to provide obesity conscious campaigns that will get them where they need to go.

We talked about school meal nutrition. That is important but many children—in my county, all children—have packed lunches. We have to get to the source of the problem. It is not just a question of what food we are providing them with in schools. I have mentioned vending machines and physical activity. Runnymede St. Edward's school in Liverpool, which I am sure is not untypical, banned fizzy drinks and instead installed water coolers in each classroom. In a short space of time, its test results improved. There are a lot of theories about hydration of the brain, which improves concentration and takes out the E-factors that we get in fast soft drinks.

We need to use advertising in a powerful way, as we did with HIV/AIDs in the 1980s. It should not just be a snapshot campaign; it needs to be an ongoing campaign that stays in people's minds, perhaps using shock tactics. The product—the fat—needs to be made into the enemy; not the consumer. That was the success of the anti-smoking campaigns in California and other parts of the United States. With fast food, it is no good merely to point the finger of blame at the fast food merchants—Burger King and McDonald's are always mentioned. McDonald's is now the largest retailer of fresh food in meals in the country. It has brought in salads, and as long as one does not completely drown them in the large sachet of dressing that comes with them, they are a healthy option. They are part of the solution.

The third aspect is incentivisation. We need to make healthy eating fun, cool, easy and mainstream. We need to have rewards for children who take healthier options so that they will use pester power when shopping. We need to use celebrities and cartoon characters to promote healthier foods. For example, the Lawn Tennis Association, in association with Ariel, ran a promotion where people collected tokens and got a free tennis lesson. That was enormously successful. A primary school in West Sussex awards points for each healthy option that a child brings into school in their lunchbox, which are then redeemable in local shops. Many imaginative measures can be adopted, but we need a multi-agency approach that must be realistic and able to change children's lifestyles. We cannot do that overnight.

The Government do not necessarily need to establish the benchmark. In the past, experience has shown that we need independent, credible benchmarks and endorsements that people can actually trust. The Government have a role as a co-ordinator and an enabler in such matters. With people in the industry, in the Government, in the health service and in education working together over the long term, hopefully we shall at last begin to deal with the serious time bomb that has already gone off.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. Member for his co-operation.

5.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Miss Melanie Johnson): The growth in obesity is a subject that has taken on an increasingly high profile over recent years and it now occupies a prominent place on our public health agenda. I therefore congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) and members of the Health Committee on their timely and comprehensive investigation into such a serious problem. We welcome the opportunity provided by the inquiry to set out our policy on the prevention and management of obesity. The Department submitted substantial written evidence to the Committee and I am grateful to my hon. Friend for saying that it was the best that the Committee had received and that it had proved helpful.

We obviously delayed our response to the White Paper, and I am grateful to members of the Committee for their tolerance in waiting for it. I wish to pick up quickly the point made about the delay; it was due simply to clearance by our domestic affairs committee of the response to the Select Committee's specific document, not to anything else. The speculation about the Government's intention in respect of the media has nothing to do with the matter. I assure the hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) that he is barking up the wrong tree.

Before I move on to the report, I must say that my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield will be much missed in the House. Ministers have greatly appreciated the contribution made by him and his Committee to the progress that we are making on health matters. The Committee's report was a valuable contribution to the debate on the topic and contributed to the development of our proposals, which we set out in the White Paper entitled "Choosing Health".

I wish to run through quickly some broader items. There is much more investment. There are key issues to be dealt with, such as prevention and health and equality issues. We want the service to be a health service, not only a sickness service. Indeed, public health must be at the centre of all that we are doing, and I agree with hon. Members who have been strongly arguing that point. It is also an area in which choices are important, as are information and support. We cannot make anyone do anything.

I might be disposing finally of the argument of the hon. Member for Southend, West. He seemed to be living on another planet when he said that all the cards were held by the Government. Very few cards on obesity are held directly by the Government. Indeed, many individuals have rights and responsibilities in such matters and many difficult issues have to be dealt with. I do not wish to simplify the problem. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman has found an intergalactic mammoth; the one that I am dealing with is definitely earthbound.

The Committee recognised that obesity is a complex, multi-factoral condition with a wide range of causes. I shall not spend time going into them, but the increase in weight and obesity and the increased energy intakes that are relative to needs is the key cause of obesity. Today, few children eat the recommended five-a-day portions of fruit and vegetables and three in 10 boys and four in 10 girls do not take the recommended hour of physical activity.

We need sound data to support delivery of the target. Several hon. Members have said that the target was not ambitious enough. I hope that it will not prove to be too ambitious. It is more difficult to halt the trend than hon. Members assume, not least because it is not only down to the Government to do something about it. We can do all that we can, but if people still choose to rush headlong towards the mammoth and put all of it in their mouths and not take much physical activity, we will not win quickly.

For the first time, the Department of Health has published requirements on strategic health authorities and PCTs to return local delivery plans and local monitoring data on the obesity status of adults registered with general practitioners from 2005 and the prevalence of obesity among children from 2006 or 2007. The new LDP lines will also back up the future action on obesity proposed in "Choosing Health". To support that, we are working closely with the Department for Education and Skills on appropriate systems for recording weight and height measurements among school children and the vexed question of body mass index. That is an important way forward.

There must be clear information that people trust for them to make healthy choices. Several hon. Members have sketched that out powerfully. We will press for simpler and mandatory EU labelling in 2005. There will also be nutrient criteria by mid-2005, followed by a signposting system that gives clear and consistent information about the nutritional content of food and the foods that should be eaten sparingly. Of course, all that work must go on with the industry, but we believe that healthier food should be the norm rather than the exception.

In the important area of promotion of food to children, Ofcom will consult on tighter rules for broadcast advertising, sponsorship and promotion. We will also be working with industry to strengthen codes for non-broadcast advertising and promotion. To take that forward, the Department of Health is leading on the establishment of a new food and drink advertising and promotion forum to review, supplement, strengthen and bring together existing provisions. The first forum meeting is due to take place this spring. We will also consider new legislation if there is no suitable improvement in the nature and balance of food promotion by early 2007, although I expect we will make some progress in the meantime. We also intend to discuss with the food industry how it might contribute funding to national campaigns and other initiatives to promote positive health information and education, because it, too, has a role.

We welcome the recent comments from the new EU Commissioner Markos Kyprianou, about the promotion of food to children. Indeed, today he met the Secretary of State for Health in London. We intend to use the UK's presidency of the EU later this year to press ahead on the matters that we have discussed. Clear, simple labelling that people can read, in particular from the front of a packet, is important, although I take on board the remarks made by my hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Rothwell (Mr. Challen)—clear, simple labelling on the back of a packet that people can understand is a key issue. However, I fear that most of us are in too much of a hurry to read it. We leave our glasses behind or we have small children in tow in a supermarket, and in modern life it is just too difficult to go through all that detail, so front-of-packet labelling is important.

I turn in more detail to the question of physical activity. Physical education in school is part of the Ofsted regime. It is the overall evaluator of the PE school sport and club links programme. As part of the new inspection framework to be introduced in September, Ofsted will pick up physical development as part of its assessment of the school's contribution to children's well-being. That will include details of the extra-curricular activities and sport available. The physical activity and diet components of the national healthy schools programme will be part of the framework as well.

A physical activity plan will be published shortly as part of our delivery of the White Paper's proposals. In investing in opportunities to make lives more active, all schools in England will have active travel plans by 2010. Many schools, including several in my constituency, already have active travel plans, and I hope that many more will be developed. I entirely accept the point made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley) and others that we need more children walking and cycling to school. One main problem is people's concerns about safety, but that creates a vicious circle. With more traffic on the roads, one becomes more concerned.

We must bite the bullet and make those activities possible, because they link up with the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield about how we must embed such behaviour in everyday life. It is not possible for sporting activity to form the main physical activity during the day; people need to be physically active as part of their everyday lives. Walking or cycling to and from school is a key activity for children; and to and from work it is a similarly key activity for adults.

We are making a massive investment in sport. Some £1.5 billion is going into PE and sport in the period from 2003 to 2008. Sport England announced allocations of £315 million of funding for sport only recently. We have discussed pedometers, and they have a huge motivational value. I have seen that myself, from wearing one and from the accounts of everybody I know who has one.

Schools are a key setting in which we can improve children's health. Our vision is that by 2009, all schools will be healthy schools that provide supportive environments, have policies on healthy and nutritious food, and have the time and facilities for physical activity and sport both in and beyond the curriculum.

We are committed to improving school food and drink not just at lunchtime but throughout the day. We are revising the school meal standards to reduce the consumption of fat, salt and sugar and to increase the consumption of fruit and vegetables. Indeed, we shall strongly consider introducing nutrient-based standards, as the Committee suggested. We are doing everything that we can to make that possible. A number of practical issues seemed to need resolution. I am confident that we will be able to cut through many of those issues and resolve them, but it is too early to give a cast-iron guarantee about that. It is certainly our intention to get as near to it as we can.

We will also extend the new standards so that they effectively address food throughout the school day, including vending machines and tuck shops. I was delighted that the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) advocated many of the things that we piloted, supported and encouraged in schools, such as green vending machines and the water initiatives. I disagree with him about the free school fruit and vegetable scheme, which is having a huge impact. I have been to schools where the scheme has transformed what goes on and has led to a much healthier consumption of food stuffs throughout the school day, with children acting as monitors for programmes. When they are not included in the scheme, the juniors are continuing to eat the fruit and vegetables that are supplied. It is built into the school day and the break-time. We want a lot more schools to do that, but schools can do a lot now.

We will give more support, to heads, governors and caterers to get the best meal service through, for example, training the caterers and giving them guidance on food procurement. We will also launch a toolkit that will guide, inspire and help schools to take the whole school approach to healthy eating. As I said, 2 million children benefit from the school fruit and vegetable scheme. Today, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Skills announced a package of measures that will make sure that considerable work is under way. We want parents to be empowered to make the change along with schools, and want them to be supported by an organisation that gives independent support and advice. We also want to introduce tougher standards on fat, salt and sugar.

I will briefly touch on two largely unrelated items that cropped up, which are both important. We are concerned about eating disorders, especially among young people. We take them seriously. Anorexia, in particular, can have serious consequences for general health and has high rates of mortality. That is why we asked the National Institute for Clinical Excellence to publish guidelines on core interventions for those disorders as part of its second programme of work that was published last year. The national service framework for mental health also makes specific reference to people with eating disorders. I am sure that change will not happen overnight, but we hope that, through the record investment in mental health, we will make a real difference for people who suffer from eating disorders.

The subject of bullying and body image in schools also arose. We are concerned about it. Anti-bullying strategies are being used to make sure that we have an effective response. Guidance has gone out from the Department for Education and Skills that says that bullying must not be suffered in silence. That guidance is available to all schools. Those in schools need to make sure that all that guidance and support is in place and that children are appropriately supported, whether the bullying is because of obesity or another reason.

I would like to have addressed many matters at greater length, but the debate has been lengthy. The Government cannot do everything alone. Joined-up action is important across government, but delivery will also require concerted effort from industry, the voluntary sector, local government and so on. There is a huge need to join this up. A huge delivery agenda is ahead. The NHS needs to be transformed from the sickness service to the health service, so that prevention is given the high priority that we all agree it deserves. That is a key message that we set out in the NHS improvement plan.

All that is only a start. We need to learn much more about what further action to take. We will soon publish a delivery plan for the White Paper with discrete plans on nutrition and physical activity, showing how we will take the work forward. That will be important. The White Paper commitments are backed up by funding of £1 billion during the next three years. Halting the rise in obesity is a challenging goal, but one that we are fully committed to achieving. We shall lead, but we need others to play their part. We will build on the partnerships and example that the report gives us.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I feel exhausted by the galloping pace at which the Minister attended to the winding-up speech. As a past Chairman of the Health Committee, I congratulate the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) on the leadership that he has provided to the Health Committee since he has been Chairman.
